How long, then, are such injunctions to be obeyed? So long as it is profitable—that is to say, so long as I can do what becomes and befits me. Then some men are choleric and fastidious, and say, "I cannot sup with this man, to have to hear him every day telling how he fought in Mysia." I told you, brother, how I went up the hill—then again I began to be besieged. . . . But another saith, "I prefer to have my supper, and listen to him prating as long as he likes." And do thou compare the gain on both sides—only do naught in heaviness or affliction, or as supposing that thou art in evil case. For to this no man can compel thee. Doth it smoke in the chamber? if it is not very much I will stay, if too much, I will go out; for remember this always, and hold fast to it, that the door is open. Thou shalt not live in Nicopolis. I will not. Nor in Athens. I will not live in Athens. Nor in Rome. Neither in Rome. Live in Gyara. I will live in Gyara. But living in Gyara seemeth to me like a great smoke. I will depart, whither no man shall hinder me to dwell—for that dwelling stands ever open to all.

Only do it not unreasonably, not cowardly, nor make every common chance an excuse. For again, it is not God's will, for He hath need of such an order of things, and of such a race upon the earth. But if He give the signal for retreat, as He did to Socrates, we must obey Him as our commander.

The obvious answer is that the signal for retreat is only unmistakable when it comes in the form of not-self-sought death. But when, even in this case, where complete approval is not possible, we compare such writing as this with our modern substitutes for it—with the morbid maunderings of Amiel, for instance—it is difficult not to think that thought has strangely retrograded. There is a kind of fibre in Epictetus which has been utterly wanting in what may be called profane meditation on life in Europe since the middle of the last century. It is "manly, sir, manly," as F. B. remarks; and the descendants of Rousseau and Senancour, whatever other merits they may have, are not manly.

To be included in the Golden Treasury Series is in some sort to take rank as a classic; and, in adding to the series an example of what may be called the modern school of English poetical translation, the publishers could not have made a happier choice than Mr. Lang's Theocritus. It is now nine years or so since the work first appeared—time enough and to spare for any charm due to mere novelty of style to pass away—and a second study fully confirms the high opinion of its merits which we then expressed. The successful translator of Homer could hardly fail in rendering the epic idyls; but to reproduce in prose the more subtle charm of the pastorals is a tour de force which has not often been surpassed. We know few translations from the classics where the atmosphere of the original has been so well preserved. Simætha's passion and despair, the gossip of Battus and Corydon, the song of the lovelorn Cyclops, each in its own style is rendered to perfection. Nor is Mr. Lang less successful in comedy. The humours of Gorgo and Praxinœ in the famous mime lose none of their effect in the transition from Greek to English; and, if any one chooses to compare this version of the idyl with Mr. Matthew Arnold's, he will hardly say that Mr. Lang comes off second best.

To students of poetry the introductory essay on Theocritus and his age is almost as interesting as the translations themselves. Mr. Lang rebuts by the most conclusive of all possible arguments the assertion that Theocritus is affected. He quotes modern Greek folk-songs, which show that rustics can express refined sentiment in poetical language, almost as well sometimes as Theocritus himself, provided they come of an imaginative and impassioned race, and that their daily toil is not so arduous as to destroy all joy of life in the struggle for existence. Theocritus knew and loved the country, and understood the feelings and modes of expression of the Sicilian shepherds. By giving to their songs artistic form and adding the necessary ideal touch he has made his poems the models of bucolic poetry for all time. If artificiality has since come to be the reproach of the pastoral, it is because later writers have imitated imitations instead of seeking their inspiration in nature itself. Those who, not knowing Greek, wish to know how the father of pastoral poetry wrote will find the secret of his charm rather in Mr. Lang's prose than even in such verse as Calverley's.

NOVELS AND STORIES.*

SOMETHING like gratitude is due from the experienced novel-reader to a writer who is able to extract anything fresh from the hackneyed subject of wills without outraging nature or drawing too lavishly upon human credulity. Mrs. Alexander has achieved this distinction in A Crooked Path. Her will-case has nothing in common with the innumerable stories of wills lost or strayed, stolen or mislaid, last wills and testaments that lead to more last wills, till positively the last will of all the enormous brood turns up and the sensational stream runs dry. Katherine Liddell is a clear-headed, unselfish, honourable young lady, the angel of the house—a Bayswater villa—where her widowed mother enlarges a scanty income by writing novels, which her good daughter, when her mother is ill, offers to the eminent firm of Channing and Wyndham in Piccadilly. With almost reckless devotion she takes charge of the two boys of her frivolous sister-in-law, and, when financial matters are at a crisis, beards her miserly old uncle in his Camden Town den, and by sheer savoir faire and self-sacrificing attention persuades him that she is a chip of the old block—himself, to wit—and deserving of his wealth. His only son he had long discarded before news arrived of his murder in the colonies, and he had devised a will leaving all to a stranger, the son of an old friend. Unhappily he dies suddenly just when he had determined to set Katherine's mind at rest concerning her beloved mother and nephews. Then Katherine takes to the crooked path by possessing herself of the will, without consulting it, wrapping it in paper neatly endorsed "Old MSS.," placing it at the bottom of her box, murmuring to her innocent self, "If my mother sees it, the idea of old manuscript will certainly deter her from looking at it." Now here is the only touch of improbability in a clever story.

* A Crooked Path. By Mrs. Alexander. 3 vols. London: Hurst & Blackett. 1889.

Judge Lynch. By George H. Jessop. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

Princess Sunshine. By Mrs. Riddell. 2 vols. London: Ward & Downey. 1889.

Robert Leeman's Daughters. By J. Fogerty. 3 vols. London: Bentley & Son. 1889.

At the Moment of Victory. By C. L. Pirkis. 3 vols. London: Ward & Downey. 1889.

Even if mothers are never inquisitive as to the contents of their daughters' boxes, a literary lady is only too likely to be tempted by old MSS. However, the artistic success of Mrs. Alexander lies in the narration of this incident. You do not feel any desire to reprehend the beautiful and simple-hearted Katherine for this unprincipled act. It seems quite acceptable, though no extenuating plea and no sophistical excuses are put forward by the author. Of course it entails dreadful consequences when Katherine meets Errington, the stranger who should have inherited the wealth she does not enjoy, but uses only in the interests of her mother and nephews and worthless sister-in-law. She learns from her lawyer that Errington should have benefited if the will were forthcoming. While he is rich she is silent; when he is ruined she has to face the shameful ordeal of confession to him. She gives up the deed. He magnanimously will have none of it, and, unknown to her, destroys it. Then the only son and heir of the miser comes to life, and vastly complicates matters. Thence in what ways she wanders, beset by her two admirers, Errington and the rakish, amusing, worldly De Burgh, is told with the admirable art and the skilful control of the sources of interest which Mrs. Alexander can always command. The minor characters are finely sketched and delicately discriminated. The small talk of society, so difficult to reproduce in writing without provoking boredom, is excellently natural. Dialogue, indeed, is one of Mrs. Alexander's strong points. Whoever may be involved in it—small school-boys, literary ladies, the man about town, the enthusiast in social reforms—all alike are delightfully human and individually characteristic.

Mr. Jessop's story of Californian life, though somewhat spun out, may be commended to all who love a stirring tale of men and times with which few can have enjoyed any practical acquaintance, and especially is it medicine for those benevolent spirits who hanker after that singular institution of our day, the Vigilance Committee. In the rowdy community of San Pablo there was, it is true, some excuse for the institution. It was "a bad place to bluff"; it refused to be "bluffed"; and when murder and other outrages became frequent, and Juan Estudillo attempted to "clean out" the Independent office with a six-shooter, the leading men resolved themselves into a Vigilance Committee. The conduct of this body was more businesslike, and not more illogical and idiotic, than the proceedings of our own self-constituted guardians of morals in the East-End and elsewhere. When Drunken Dick "passed in his checks"—anglicé, was murdered—no one regretted his removal, but it was felt there was an example to be made. Some one had to be lynched, and that speedily. So they fixed on the innocent and popular Jack Scott, against whom there was barely the shadow of suspicion. The story of his flight with the friendly sheriff, his capture and almost miraculous respite, and the final lynching of the veritable murderer, is thrillingly told. Mr. Jessop's pictures of life in the Californian vineyards in the old unsettled days, drawn from life, as we understand they are, are alive with colour and movement. It is a mistake, perhaps, to indicate the real murderer from the outset by naming him Haman Jefferies. A man with such a name in a story is bound to be hanged. Nevertheless, the excited reader of Judge Lynch has no reason to complain of any stinting of the fuel of interest from first page to last in Mr. Jessop's picturesque story.

The short stories in Mrs. Riddell's two volumes are all written in the crisp, forthright, effective style that makes reading pleasurable. Princess Sunshine is the longest and best of the three. The sketch of the dismal suburban household for which the conscientious Gregory Gifford toils from morn to dewy eve is a capital example of Mrs. Riddell's graphic art. The supercilious younger brother, the three maiden sisters, with their insufferable airs of pretence and discontent, and the sweet-hearted ward of Gregory, the "Princess Sunshine," who warms the dreary home by her unselfish nature, are all vigorously characterized. When poor, plodding Gregory eventually gains a great literary triumph, and, better still, is wedded to Joan, the "Princess," we are overwhelmed with a genuine rush of "gallery" sentiment, so complete and surprising are the triumph and the retribution, and this, as all novel-readers will admit, is a sensation rarely experienced. "A Terrible Vengeance" treats of ghostly phenomena that trouble a murderer's conscience, and, in part at least, recall the late Lord Lytton's Haunted and the Haunters, only in this instance the foot-prints follow, and do not precede, the object of ghostly attendance. They are the wet foot-prints of the drowned victim. They appear round the murderer's bedside on the carpet the morning after the deed, they follow him into the railway-carriage to the exceeding fright of his servant, up the church aisle they go when he is married to the ghost's rival, and before long they work his death. For he dies suddenly with "a rushing sound as of many waters" in his ears, and the ground about him "was wet, and trampled as though by hundreds of little feet." The grimness of the story is rather mitigated by the humours of the valet, who, on purely interested grounds, not through psychical enthusiasm, attempts to blackmail his master, and elicits certain promises that were never fulfilled. "If Mr. Murray had been a gentleman," he was wont to plead, "he'd have seen me righted."

The "little girl lost" of Blake's poem had a much briefer period of wandering than the pretty babe in Mr. Fogerty's story, who drifted in a boat from an Irish estuary into the Atlantic, to be picked up by a kindly Dutch skipper, and finally wafted into the secure haven of a rich Dutch family, where she found a new mother, whom she learned to love better than the one she could scarcely remember. A whole volume of Robert Leeman's Daughters and half of the second comprise the relation of this incident and its spare but discreetly-spread consequences. Robert Leeman and wife have in the interim emigrated to America, and are solaced with another little girl, named Muriel, after her lost sister, and Mirelle for the distinguishing. The family thrive apace, and months elapse, though inquiries are brisk on both sides, before the lost girl is identified. From Ireland to Holland, from both countries to America, homeward-bound again, we pass, till the feel of deck-plank and railroad-car are only too familiar. Of a truth, the reader grows foot-weary because of this insistent locomotion. Mr. Fogerty's novel, for all this tedium, is not without merit, though it wants the supreme merit of concentration. It is dreadfully long-drawn. The narrative drags at times as a goods train does on the irritated ear of the sleepless in the small hours when semaphore lamps weep in the fog. There is a certain disconnexion of the American from the Dutch portion of the story, and by the time the one has charmed you the Irish antecedents become dim.

The astonishing "thunder and lightning" prologue to Mr. Pirkis's At the Moment of Victory prepares the reader for the rank growth of melodrama that succeeds. Characters, incidents, plot, are all alike maddening, save only a rather diverting baronet, in whom is personified with considerable humour an old man in a hurry. There is an astrological lady from Corsica, whom the prologue leads us to suspect of murder, who visits the wild Cumberland home of the baronet, by the chance of a railway accident and the importunity of her host's insensate philanthropy, and causes dreadful discord between an amiable young lady and the young man she adores. For some reason known only to the author, for we cannot accuse the astrological beauty of the infelicity, the Corsican girl passes under the disreputable name of Jane Shore. Of course she represents herself to be homeless, friendless, distressed, in want of money. Yet, having done all the mischief she could to the young couple mentioned, she absconds one night, leaving her jewels and money behind and the family plate intact. She was a star-gazer, not a common adventuress, which may account for her extraordinary conduct. But no human charity can absolve the author. On the supposition that Miss Shore, alias Etelka, was inconceivably fascinating, she might work worse havoc than she does, but never for a moment does the faintest ray of attraction move us. She is nothing but the lay figure of theatric puppetry.

ROGER DE WENDOVER.—VOL. III.*

THIS slender volume completes Mr. Hewlett's edition of Wendover's Flores Historiarum. It contains only 114 pages of text, together with a rather long and somewhat weak Introduction. As the Flores is well known through the medium of the edition of the late Rev. H. O. Coxe in the English Historical Society's publications, it is not worth while to enter here on an independent discussion of its value. Indeed, considering that a vast amount of unprinted material of the highest interest yet remains to be taken in hand by the director of this series, and that we already had a good and by no means scarce edition of the Flores, as well as Mr. Luard's noble edition of the Chronica Majora, which gives us the compilation of the anonymous St. Albans writer, the work of Wendover, and the alterations, additions, and continuation of Matthew Paris, it may well be doubted whether it was at present worth while to print Wendover separately. The Introduction repeats the scanty notices of the author given by Matthew Paris and by the compiler of the Gesta Abbatum S. Albani. They are discussed in Mr. Coxe's edition, and it is apparently impossible to add anything to them. Early in the reign of Henry III. Wendover appears as Prior of Belvoir, in Lincolnshire, which was a cell of St. Albans; he was censured by Abbot William de Trumpington, in the course of a visitation made "tempore guerræ," for prodigal waste, and was shortly afterwards deprived of his office. It seems impossible to fix the date of this visitation. Mr. Hewlett limits it to 1224, 1227, or 1231-4, when the country was "disturbed by successive internal commotions." Although it certainly took place after the expulsion of the French, there seems no valid reason for assigning a date coincident with, or later than, the fall of Falkes de Breauté. The words of the Gesta Abbatum (i. 269, 270) lead us to think it probable that the "time of war" refers to the years 1219 to 1224. We are told here that no disturbance took place in 1219, the year to which Wats and Coxe apparently refer the visitation. Coxe, as will be seen in a note, leaves the matter in doubt, and his words "about the year 1219" do not, as Mr. Hewlett seems to imagine, imply a mistake. Both in 1218 and 1219 there was mischief brewing, and the country was more or less disturbed by the attempts of certain leaders of the late King's party to resist Hubert de Burgh's measures for restoring the royal authority. These attempts came to a head in the revolt of William of Aumale in 1221. After Wendover was deprived of his office he of course returned to St. Albans as a simple monk. He there wrote the Flores, which he brought down to 1235, and died the next year.

* Rogeri de Wendover Liber qui dicitur Flores Historiarum ab anno MCCIV. annoque Henrici Anglorum Regis Secundi primo. The Flowers of History. By Roger de Wendover. Edited from the Original MSS. by Henry G. Hewlett, Keeper of the Records of the Land Revenue. Vol. III. Published under the direction of the Master of the Rolls. London: printed for Her Majesty's Stationery Office. 1889.

Mr. Luard's suggestion that the compiler whose work Wendover adopted may have been Abbot John de Cella does not meet with Mr. Hewlett's approval. He is, however, unable to make any other suggestion as to the authorship, and scarcely gives sufficient weight to the grounds on which Mr. Luard founded his cautiously expressed opinion. In his first volume he expressed a conviction, adopted, we believe, from Sir Thomas Hardy, that Wendover's own work begins with 1154, and his edition accordingly starts with the accession of Henry II. Mr. Luard, on the other hand, believes that the earlier compilation goes on to 1188. Mr. Hewlett is perhaps a little uncomfortable at differing from so distinguished an authority, for he here says that the question does not appear to him important enough to require discussion, which implies a queer way of looking at the duties of an editor. He takes up a good deal of space with a discourse on the merits and weaknesses of his author. What he says on this subject is for the most part true enough. Wendover was an annalist rather than an historian; he relates events without appreciating their importance, or seeing their connexion with one another. He inserts a great deal of irrelevant matter, and sometimes leaves out facts that are necessary to a right understanding of his story. At the same time he is, as Mr. Hewlett points out, candid, patriotic, and outspoken. While we agree in the main with the criticism of his work contained in the Introduction, it strikes us as expressed in far too many words, and as written too much from a modern standpoint. For example, Wendover is blamed for not declaring his disgust at the severity of the naval regulations of Richard I. Does either the author of the Gesta Henrici II. or Roger de Hoveden do so? Again, Mr. Hewlett complains that he indiscriminately accepts rumours and suspicions as "equivalent to fact and proof," and brings as an instance the terms in which he speaks of the accusation brought against Hubert de Burgh with reference to the death of the Earl of Salisbury. In telling his readers that Hubert was accused of poisoning the Earl, Wendover puts in the qualifying words "ut dicitur" and "dixerunt quidam." The accusation was certainly brought, and though we believe that it was a malicious falsehood, we are glad to hear about it. While it is important to get at the truth as to matters of fact, it is not less important to know what people thought and said. The strangest of all Mr. Hewlett's strictures is his solemn observation that Wendover, when relating a story on which he and his house naturally prided themselves—the discovery of the relics of St. Amphibalus—does not hint that he believed the whole affair to have been got up in order to bring gain to the convent. Did he expect that a monk of the thirteenth century, however honest he may have been, should look on such a matter with the eyes of a Protestant lecturer?

FARM LIVE STOCK.*

FEW country gentlemen who take up this book will care to put it down again until they have looked at its ninety-nine illustrations, chiefly by Messrs. Angerer and Göschl, of Vienna, from photographs of prize cattle, sheep, pigs, and horses. As the author very truly says, photographs of living animals but rarely represent the balance and proportion of their different parts as we are accustomed to imagine them, especially when they are foreshortened, and some allowance must be made in this respect for the apparent shortcomings of a few of the plates in Farm Live Stock; yet we have no hesitation in saying that this is the very best collection of pictures of prize stock that we have ever seen. Nor must we forget to say a word in praise of the four maps, showing the Orographical Features, the Distribution of Cattle, the Distribution of Sheep, and the Distribution of Agricultural Population in the British Isles.

It must not be supposed that the illustrations are the only things of value in Mr. Wallace's book. It contains useful chapters on the principles of breeding in general, the breeding, management, and grazing of cattle, the house-feeding of cattle, dairying, horse-breeding, horse-breaking, the management of farm-horses, the management of sheep and pigs, and the stocking of farms. But to our mind the best and the most typical chapters of the work are those which describe the origin and leading characteristics of the various breeds. Without being dry, they are so concise that they inspire the critic with the same spirit, and a short summary of a small portion of their matter seems the most appropriate review that we can offer of this book.

The author very properly begins with the wild cattle. The only herds remaining in Great Britain are those of Hamilton Park, Chillingham Park, and Chartley Park. It is difficult to determine to what extent either of them is pure. Storer was of opinion that "no wild herd, if imprisoned in a park, and interbred for several hundred years without a cross, could be in existence now." There is a tradition that a whole herd from Drumlanrig "was sold and driven off to Chillingham" about a hundred years ago; and that fresh blood was occasionally introduced from other sources. On the other hand, there are evidences of in-breeding in the fact that the annual increase is only one in five. It is well authenticated that the Hamilton cattle were formerly hornless, and the horns which they now possess are said to be the result of the invasion of the park by a West Highland bull. Black, black and white, and brown calves are occasionally born in each of the three wild herds, which is another symptom of crosses in the past. These coloured calves are always destroyed, and, were it not for this, it is by no means certain that white would now be the prevailing colour. At Somerford Park, in Cheshire, Sir W. Shakerley has a herd of domesticated hornless cattle which strongly resemble the Chartley breed. Their milking powers are extraordinary. Individual cows have sometimes given fourteen quarts at a milking, and seven gallons a day. The ordinary cows most like the existing breeds of wild cattle are the Ayrshires, which have much in common with them in form, colour, and horn.

It is often mystifying to the uninitiated to hear shorthorn fanciers talking about Bates and Booth blood. Thomas Bates and Thomas Booth were the leading breeders of shorthorn cattle during the latter part of the last and the early part of the present century. The stock of each was descended from a celebrated "yellow-red and white" bull, named Hubback, who was calved about 1775. Upon the whole, the Bates shorthorns are the best milkers, while the Booth are the best beef-producers. White and light colours are more common among the Booths than among the Bateses. The best Bates bulls have an arched crest with a stylish head, and their general appearance is very stately. The head and neck of the Booths is set on lower, and their expression is less animated; but their frames are more substantial and massive, and they are richer in flesh. So distinct, in certain respects, are the Bates and Booth strains, in consequence of long-continued in-breeding in both herds according to the taste and selection of their owners, that some authorities strongly object to their being intermixed, as they maintain that the usual disadvantages of cross-breeds follow after the first or second crosses. Yet some splendid beasts have resulted from a combination of these two bloods, especially where the bull has been a Booth and the cow a Bates. It may be worth mentioning that a single Bates cow (the well-known Duchess) bred stock that sold for 30,000*l.* Another and a very useful breed of shorthorn is the Aberdeenshire. Aberdeen shorthorns are not, as a rule, closely inbred, and they may be a little coarse; but they are grand butcher's cattle, and are rapidly increasing in favour both in British show-yards and in the estimation of American purchasers.

Turning to the longhorns, we read that the Herefords were formerly bred chiefly for purposes of draught and land cultivation. There are good reasons for supposing that the original breed was "self-coloured," and that the white head is comparatively modern, although it is pretty certain that they are connected with the ancient white forest-cattle of Wales. They are remarkable for their large, heavily-fleshed shoulders; but they are not generally well "made up" interiorly, and they are poor milkers. The old longhorn of the Midland counties has many points in common with the shorthorn; but it is coarser both in bone and flesh, and it is slower in fattening. Devons are bad milkers, although what little they give is rich. Their beef is excellent, and "they have peculiarly neatly-formed shoulders, with a full girth." Sussex oxen have long been famous for draught work; but they are coarse in quality, and the cows are not good milkers. Another bad milker with long horns is the picturesque West Highlander. As a fatterer, again, it is exceedingly slow. When its beef, however, has at last been formed, it is unsurpassed in quality, and the cost of rearing a four-year-old West Highlander on its natural food is considerably less than that of rearing a two-year-old of the same weight from one of the Lowland or Southern breeds. Many of the characteristics of the West Highlanders are shared by the Welsh black cattle; but they are far better milkers, the best being those of South Wales, while those of the North are the better fatteners. The Glamorgan and the Old Gloucester breeds vary but little from the Welsh, and the old Castle Martin white breed is much the same, except in colour.

The Norfolk red polled is a breed of comparatively modern descent from "the little, old, red-horned cattle of Norfolk and the dun or mouse-coloured polled animals of Suffolk. The latter, though coarse and ill-formed in appearance, was (sic) noted for very superior milking power." The author tells us that, in "refinement of parts," the Norfolk polls strongly resemble the North Devons. By far the most fashionable breed of polls at present is the Aberdeen Angus. It is the result of an "amalgamation of a number of very different local polled and also horned breeds, associated with careful in-and-in breeding, together with, it is asserted, the infusion, within comparatively recent times, of a greater or less degree of alien blood." The Galloway is another black polled-breed of the North; but it has a longer coat than the Aberdeen poll, and it has been spoken of as the "West Highlander without horns." The Galloway cows when crossed with shorthorn or Hereford bulls produce excellent stock for the butcher, and it is for purposes of crossing that they are chiefly valuable. We will conclude our review of the portion of this book devoted to cattle by a few words about the cattle of the Channel Islands. It may be a shock to some people to learn that the Alderney, "in its genuine form," "does not now exist." What many people call Alderneys are usually either Jerseys or Guernseys, or a mixture of both. A law which forbids the importation of foreign cattle has had the effect of keeping the Jersey cattle purer than any of the breeds in this country. We have often heard people ask the difference between Jerseys and Guernseys. This book will inform them. The climate of Guernsey, being more bracing than that of Jersey, the cattle of the former island are the hardier of the two; they are also larger and stronger-boned than the Jerseys. While the Jerseys are usually whole-coloured, the Guernseys are very often marked with patches of white; yet the Jerseys used frequently to have white markings until the American taste demanded "self-colouring." The muzzles of the Jerseys are dark, encircled with light colour; while those of the Guernseys are flesh-coloured, and the Jerseys are more "deer-like" in appearance than the Guernseys, especially about the head.

* Farm Live Stock of Great Britain. By Robert Wallace, F.L.S., F.R.S.E., &c. Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd. London: Simpkin, Marshall, & Co. 1889.

Pigs are divided into two groups, the European—of which the chief are the various English and the Neapolitan breeds—and the Chinese. Professor Wallace considers the red or chestnut Tamworth breed, which is so common in the neighbourhood of Birmingham, the most direct descendant of the aboriginal pig of the country. Small breeds are the fashion at present. Some years ago, on the contrary, size was the most esteemed point in a pig; Yorkshires used to be made as heavy as bullocks, and a pig called Sampson VI. weighed 9 cwt. All amateur breeders may not be aware that the produce of a white boar and a black Berkshire sow is almost invariably white.

We so often have to review books on thoroughbred horses, that we think it best to pass over the pages devoted to them in a work on Farm Live Stock without special notice. The descriptions of Clydesdales and Shire-horses are very much to the purpose. Their relative characteristics are thus summarized:—

The differences in the ordinary form of Shire-horse, as compared with the Clydesdale, are:—

Lower and more sluggish action; the belly, or middle, larger, the animal being a greater feeder; the quarters shorter, more like the Belgian horse, and the plates consequently steeper and flatter; the hocks wider between than in the Clydesdale, in which they usually incline slightly inwards; the leg bones rougher and not so straight; the pasterns shorter and the hoofs more upright, giving a stilty look. Long pasterns are now sought for in the best horses, no doubt to try to counteract the general weakness in this point. The space between the eyes is frequently not so wide, and the eyes are not so prominent as in the Clyde. Roans and chestnut colours are most prevalent in the Shire. There is more long hair on the legs, and it extends round in front.

It is stated that 3,000*l.* was given not very long ago for a Clydesdale stallion. High as this price sounds, it does not seem so exorbitant if Professor Wallace is correct in estimating the earnings of a first-rate Clydesdale, by winning one Premium and by service fees never exceeding 5*l.*, at 700*l.* a year.

The chapter on sheep contains much valuable information as to the origin of most of the breeds; such, for instance, as that the Oxford Downs are a comparatively recent breed, made by crossing Cotswold rams with Hampshire ewes, and that the Cluns were "bred from the tan-face sheep that at one time abounded in that region, by crossing with hardy Shropshire and black-faced Longmynd mountain rams." The breed that has, perhaps, the most curious history is the Herdwick, or mountain sheep of Cumberland and Westmorland. There is a tradition that one of the vessels of the Spanish Armada was wrecked on the sandy coast of Drigg, and that about forty sheep which were on board swam ashore, and were claimed as flotsam and jetsam by the lord of the manor. From these sheep the Herdwick breed is said to be descended. All attempts at improving it by crossing have been unavailing. A curious custom prevails among the shepherds of the Herdwick flocks of painting the rams bright red, so as to enable the ewes to find them on the hillsides. Another breed, which "resists any attempt at crossing with other breeds," is the Ryeland, so named from a poor upland district in Herefordshire. This "is, perhaps, the breed of longest standing in England." But those who wish to learn all about the various breeds, and improved breeds, of the modern British sheep must read for themselves in this capital book.

THE A B C BOTH IN LATIN AND ENGLISH.*

THIS is a prettily got-up reprint of an old primer preserved in the Library of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and believed to be unique. It was printed by Thomas Petyt, in St. Paul's Churchyard, "at the Sygne of the Mayden's Head," and, though it has no date, the late Mr. Bradshaw was satisfied that it must have been produced about 1538. Primers, like all school books, have a tendency to become scarce through wear and tear; and this, which seems to be the earliest known specimen of its class, was well worth reprinting. The preface by Mr. Shuckburgh, the Librarian of Emmanuel College, does not err on the side of prolixity, but it tells us nearly all we want to know. These little books were intended to teach a child what was necessary to enable him to understand the rudiments of Christianity, to join in the service of the church and even to serve at Mass, or, as it is called, "to help a Priest to sing." Considerable space is taken up with various Graces to be said before or after "dyner or souper," including one "for fysshe days." The type is bold and handsome; but the numerous contractions must have added considerably to a scholar's difficulties.

* The A B C both in Latyn and Englyshe. London: Elliot Stock. 1889.

AN HISTORICAL HANDBOOK.*

IN this Handbook Professor Emerton gives a sketch of the barbarian invasions and settlements, chiefly in Western Europe, from the crossing of the Danube by the Visigoths to the foundation of the mediæval Empire by Charlemagne. He treats his long period as a period of regeneration rather than of decay, and accordingly takes little account of the affairs of the Empire, except so far as they were immediately affected by the invasions, while he gives special prominence to the three agents which had the largest share in producing the Europe of the middle ages—the Church, the character of Germanic civilization, and the predominance achieved by the Franks. Thus, while almost all that he has written may be read with pleasure in Gibbon, his little volume looks on events from a somewhat different standpoint to that taken in the Decline and Fall, and may be used by young students with some profit either as a guide in working at the period with which it deals, or as an introduction to later history. As a guide, it gives copious information as to modern books, and has some, though by no means equally copious, notes on contemporary authorities. In the case of standard works by English authors American editions only are cited. Perhaps the best parts of this little book are the chapters on the "Germanic ideas of Law," and on the early history of the Carolingian house; the least satisfactory, the meagre notices of the Ostrogoths. As the work of a Professor of History, it must, of course, be judged by a higher standard than handbooks by undistinguished authors; we have a right to complain even of small matters. The notice of the Council of Whitby will certainly leave the uninstructed reader under the impression that the Celtic missionaries were Britons, who at last took part in the conversion of their conquerors. We do not suppose that Professor Emerton does think that Columba, Aidan, and Colman were Welshmen, but he certainly writes as if he did. In another place he seems to exaggerate the dependence of the English Church on Rome in early days, while he most unduly depreciates the position of the Roman See in the seventh century, declaring that for more than a hundred years after the death of Gregory the Great "the papacy goes on with very little to distinguish it from any other bishopric, under the sovereignty of the Eastern Emperor." To turn to a later period, we are at a loss as to the authority for the statement that Charlemagne summoned Felix, Bishop of Urgel, to the Council of Frankfort in 794 to answer for his heresy. Felix appeared two years before at the Council of Ratisbon, was condemned, and recanted his adoptionist doctrine; his heresy was again condemned at Frankfort, while he was, as it appears, still under sentence of deprivation. Professor Emerton has confused the two Councils. Lastly, he has been led by his enthusiasm for all things Teutonic to assert that, when Leo III. took a solemn oath that he was innocent of the crimes laid to his charge, he acted according to "good Teutonic custom." Is it likely that a Bishop of Rome who wished to persuade the Roman people of his innocence would have attempted to do so by adopting a barbarian process? or that the Frankish King, who wore when in Rome the chlamys and the sandals, would have urged him to take such an extraordinary course? The oath of Leo, with its attendant ceremonies, was of the same character as the oath with which Pelagius I. publicly asserted his innocence of the death of his predecessor, Vigilius. No one, we imagine, will contend that the earlier ceremony had anything to do with Teutonic custom.

EMERSON IN CONCORD.†

THIS is a welcome supplement to what has already been published about Emerson, and a discreet one, notwithstanding its intimate character. It gives us a faithful view, much of it in Emerson's own words, of his everyday habits of thought and life, and it avoids that plague of pitiless detail which has been the ruin of so many modern biographies. It does not aim at forming any estimate of Emerson's place in literature, or correcting any which has been put forth. Obviously it is not a son's place to perform this judicial office for his father's memory; and, indeed, it is not now the time for any one to perform it. The generations of those who walked with Emerson in his lifetime, or looked up to him as a living power, have had their say, and the time of posterity is not yet. Nor is the book a didactic one in any sense, much less controversial. We have noted a distinct undertaking of biographical correction in only one point. Various odd notions have been current about Emerson at different times. Once he was commonly thought, and especially by well-informed, matter-of-fact persons constitutionally incapable of appreciating his work, to be a merely dreamy and impractical kind of man; a latter-day mystic, with all the unsocial and unaccountable perversities which that character is supposed to imply. Lately it has been found that Carlyle, who certainly had no predilection for weak-kneed folk, did not esteem him that kind of person at all, and that he was effectually helpful to

* An Introduction to the Study of the Middle Ages (375-814). By Ephraim Emerton, Ph.D., Professor of History in Harvard University. Boston: Ginn & Co.

† Emerson in Concord: a Memoir written for the "Social Circle" in Concord, Mass. By Edward Waldo Emerson. Boston, Mass., and London: Sampson Low & Co. Limited. 1889.

Carlyle in quite solid mundane arrangements with American publishers. Hence a contrary exaggeration has led some to regard Emerson as having in him a keen Yankee man of business as well as a philosopher. But it did not take any extraordinary faculty of that sort to make a man look businesslike in contrast with Carlyle, and Dr. Emerson disclaims for his father anything beyond this, "that he was usually right in his instincts of the character of the persons with whom he dealt." Such an instinct, however, when joined to perfect simplicity of purpose, often enough disconcerts the man of the world, who thereupon credits its possessor with new and strange depths of cunning. Emerson was, in truth, a plain citizen, who would never wittingly neglect a duty, but who took a very moderate interest in his own affairs, loving his books more than business, and nature better than his books. It appears that soon after his first marriage he was elected a hog-reeve in Concord (a burden imposed by the custom of the town on newly-married men), and we are left to suppose that he executed that office with due diligence and with whatever dignity it was capable of. Considered as a parallel to Emerson's intellectual activity, the work of a hog-reeve was hardly appropriate. A nameless sage has observed, "They're an animal that's hard for one man to drive—very—is a pig." Now it was not in Emerson's nature, as a teacher or moralist, to drive anybody. People who expect to be driven along a lane or led by the nose have therefore found Emerson a disappointing guide.

He assumes a certain willingness to go along with him, for the moment at any rate; at the same time he almost requires a certain independence. He does not profess to lead except by enlightening, nor to enlighten except by clearing away accidental obscurities and making room for every man to use his own light. "The office of the scholar," he wrote in a journal quoted in this book, "is to cheer, to raise, and to guide men by showing them facts amidst appearances." His way of teaching was to bear witness to what he perceived as true and right, and let the rest come of itself. He would have no part in the dissembling and temporizing of practical politics, and would rather hold his peace than speak where he might not speak his whole mind. Once he was asked to lecture in Salem about anything he pleased, "provided no allusions are made to religious controversy, or other exciting topics upon which the public mind is honestly divided." He refused, with the remark, "I am really sorry that any person in Salem should think me capable of accepting an invitation so encumbered." The philosophic reader will remember Spinoza's refusal of a professorship at Heidelberg, similar to Emerson's in principle, but less bluntly expressed. The diplomatic irony of Spinoza's letter was a necessity of his time and circumstances; he might well have envied Emerson's plain English.

We get here many interesting details of Emerson's training and early life. Every one who has read Emerson's essays knows that Montaigne was one of his favourite authors; but it is something more to have it under Emerson's own hand that he actually formed himself on Montaigne in the most active and receptive period of youth. "In Roxbury in 1825" (at the age of twenty-one or twenty-two) "I read Cotton's translation of Montaigne. It seemed to me as if I had written the book myself in some former life, so sincerely it spoke my thought and experience. No book before or since was ever so much to me as that." Of course, much of the attraction was the attraction of unlikeness. Montaigne talks with a splendid indifference about all things in heaven and earth, himself included. Himself, not because he thinks Michel de Montaigne a specially interesting or important person, but because he does not see why he should be less interesting than other people, and happens to know a good deal more of him. Emerson projects himself into the world, and leaves you to divine him as best you can from his way of seeing things. He has nothing to tell us of the habits of the swine whose trespasses he was appointed to correct. If Montaigne had been hog-reeve instead of Emerson, we should have known half the pigs in Concord by sight. Nevertheless, the two men have much of the root of the matter in common. Their widely different ways of expressing themselves are alike founded in a robust belief in the nature of things, and a healthy distrust of formulas whether old or new. Here is a protest against fads which comes with singular opportuneness at this day; it was written in 1842:—"A man cannot force himself by any self-denying ordinances, neither by water nor potatoes, nor by violent passivities, by refusing to swear, refusing to pay taxes, by going to jail, or by taking another man's crop." Hear this, ye New Radicals, our apostles of refusals and violent passivities—if your sensitive ears, attuned to the mild persuasions of your passive O'Briens and recusant Conybeares, can abide to hear out such blasphemy. True it is that Emerson adds, "By none of these ways can he free himself, no, nor by paying his debts with money"; he need not have warned you against excessive belief in that method.

It must be added that Emerson was a humanist, and somewhat of the Renaissance type. He read Erasmus's Dialogues with his son, the writer of this book, and made him read Plutarch's Lives. Nay, he shared that singular prejudice or illusion of old-fashioned scholars that modern languages are easy; "he said one could easily pick up French and German for himself." Thereafter as the one may be. Some have become scholars by picking up Latin and Greek for themselves, but their success has not been considered a safe example for the majority of boys.

Emerson was by constitution, education, and profession a man of peace. Probably he would never have been a smart soldier, certainly he could never have been a disciplinarian. But he was far too good a citizen to be a peace-at-any-price man. He not only accepted the Civil War as inevitable, but took pleasure in observing how the stress of war developed national virtues. Some ten years before the war there were premonitions which seem not to have wholly displeased Emerson. A Concord elector said to him, as he passed on his way to town meeting, "No—I ain't goin'. It's no use a-ballotin', for it won't stay. What you do with a gun will stay so." The opinion was premature; but Emerson—and, let us hope, his sturdy neighbour also—lived to see it justified.

Is it necessary to prove that Emerson was a gentleman? Hardly; but there is one little trait which to any one in search of proof should be conclusive. It is a piece of Emerson's familiar advice:—"In a letter any expressions may be abbreviated rather than those of respect and kindness: never write 'Yours aff'ly.'" Dr. Emerson gives this in a note in connexion with his father's general habit of severe revision and his precepts to young authors. These are so good, and so much to the point after forty odd years, that we shall end by transcribing some of them:—

"Your work gains for every 'very' you can cancel." "Don't italicize; you should so write that the italics show without being there." "Beware of the words 'intense' and 'exquisite': to very few people would the occasion for the word 'intense' come in a lifetime."

SCOTLAND IN 1298.*

THE first title of this book does not describe its contents, which relate rather to Edward I. than to Scotland. It is a collection of materials illustrative of Edward's campaign in Scotland in 1298, the year of the Battle of Falkirk. Mr. Gough presents us in his introduction with a carefully compiled record of the King's movements from March 14, the day of his landing at Sandwich, after an absence of about seven months in Flanders, to October 20, a few days after he had crossed the Border on his return to England. Before he left Flanders arrangements were made through the mediation of Pope Boniface VIII. for a two years' truce, which finally led to a permanent peace between him and Philip IV. of France. It was well for him that this was so, for his presence was urgently needed in Scotland; on September 11 of the previous year the English had been defeated by Wallace at the bridge of Stirling; the whole country had been wrested from him, and the Scots had devastated the Border. Edward had already ordered extensive preparations to be made for a campaign, and an army had been sent across the Border under the Earl of Surrey, who relieved the garrison at Roxburgh, and occupied Berwick. The Earl's army was not large, and as it was necessary to avoid all risk of another defeat, Edward ordered him to attempt nothing further, and as soon as he landed, marched northwards to take the command of a large force which had been summoned to meet him at Roxburgh. Extracts relating to the campaign are given from various English chronicles, all of them already printed, and most of them included in the Rolls series. Late as Fordun and Winton are, their narratives should have been inserted, if only for the sake of comparing them with the accounts of the English writers, contemporary or otherwise. These extracts are followed by a considerable number of documents from the Exchequer, Patent, and Close Rolls, which give a good idea of how an army was raised and victualled at this period. Students of heraldry and family history will no doubt be pleased with the annotated collation of the two manuscripts of the Falkirk Roll of Arms. The original Roll, which is said to have been kept at the Heralds' Office, has disappeared, and the earlier existing copy is only of the sixteenth, and the later of the beginning of the seventeenth, century. The Rolls of the Horses illustrate the custom of recording the description and value of every horse employed in a campaign, in order that, if it was killed, the owner might claim its price. The horses entered in the Rolls are described either as chargers (dextrarii), or hackneys (runcini), or as being of a Welsh breed (pouis), or else are distinguished simply by colour. The highest price at which a charger is assessed seems to be 70 marks, which, considering the purchasing power of money with respect to other articles, was certainly a large sum. William de Ferrers, who followed Lord Hugh le Despenser, had a black charger, "cum stella in fronte, cum iij pedibus albis," assessed at that price; but the average value of a good charger seems to have been about 60 marks. Some hackneys were valued as low as 5 marks, though 10 and 12 marks were the more usual prices; in a few cases, however, 24, and even 30, marks are entered as the worth of hackneys. Pounce de Varese, for example, had "unum runcinum sorum bauzain [pied sorrel] precii xxx mar." The names of all the riders are given, and when a horse was slain the place and date of the loss are recorded in a marginal note. Several clerks rode with their lords, and one at least of them, a certain Richard de Lugteburghe, who was in the company of Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, must have fought at Falkirk, for his horse, which was worth 20*l.*, was slain in the battle. We next have a number of instruments of presentation to ecclesiastical benefices in Scotland, two of them in favour of clerks who followed Sir John de Benstede, dean of the King's free chapel of Tettenhale, and one of the chief of the King's clerks. Sir John, who brought into the field two knights, nine squires, and three clerks, was presented to the provostship of St. Andrews, and became a justice of the Common Pleas. Among a rather miscellaneous lot of documents at the end of the book we come on a curious indenture containing the terms on which Sir Thomas de Berkeley (Lord Berkeley) engaged to follow Sir Aymer de Valence (Earl of Pembroke) during the campaign with his son Sir Maurice and his retinue. If Mr. Gough's volume is of no very great historical value, it will at least enable the reader to gain a clear conception of the military administration and usages of the period.

* Scotland in 1298. Documents relating to the Campaign of King Edward I. in that year, and especially to the Battle of Falkirk. Edited by Henry Gough, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. Paisley and London: Alexander Gardner, Publisher to H.M. the Queen.

TWO LAW BOOKS.*

THE growing habit of building monstrous houses, principally accessible only by means of lifts, has already had results conspicuous enough to justify the writing of a text-book on the legal rights and responsibilities of persons who have to do with them. The fact that it is possible to own a freehold estate in a single floor of a house without having any proprietary rights in those below, or any positive rights at all in those above, constitutes a natural but technically anomalous exception to the general principles of the law of real property. The leading characteristic of realty, and that which philosophically justifies it in having laws different from those of personalty, is its permanence. A floor or a flat is not permanent. It may be burnt, or those underneath it may tumble down, and in that case it seems that, unless there is a contract to the contrary, the freehold of the super-terrestrial owner is gone. For you cannot, says Mr. Clode, have a freehold in a piece of space; and, though it seems hard on freeholders, the probability is that he is right. This position, however, is, up to the present time, one rather of academical interest, and the substance of Mr. Clode's book rather concerns the mutual relations of freeholders and leaseholders of floors, or parts of floors, with the owner, or intermediate landlord, of the rest of the building or of the soil, in respect of the roof, the staircases, halls, passage-ways, lifts, and other parts of the edifice which the floor-owner has more or less right to use in one way or another. As hideously tall houses have been common in the United States longer than they have been in England, Mr. Clode has occasion to quote a good deal from American reports, and for a similar reason he has been compelled to acquaint himself with some of the awful mysteries of Scottish law; but his chapters on Water Supply and Drainage, Inhabited House Duty and Rating, are, of course, free from any such reproach. His appendices contain some useful forms, and the whole volume appears to have been written with the same learning and judgment which characterize his former book about petitions of right. Tenement Houses and Flats will be useful to a comparatively limited body of persons; but its importance—especially to conveyancers—cannot but increase, and, as far as we know, Mr. Clode is perfectly correct in asserting that there is no other work devoted to the same topic.

Mr. Horace Nelson treats of Private International Law by the method of leading cases, and of these he has collected and suitably annotated some three dozen. Certain Acts of Parliament—such as the Territorial Waters Act, 1878, the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the Patents, Designs, and Trade-marks Act, 1883, and the International Copyright Act, 1886—are treated of in chapters to themselves. Mr. Nelson understands the proper meaning of the phrase Private International Law—that is, he remembers that what he has to expound is that part of the law of England which provides what notice shall be taken by English courts of what parts of the law of foreign countries and what proceedings of foreign courts of justice. It is a pleasure to think that the immortal teachings of Austin are by degrees becoming the accepted principles of the ordinary British text-writer. Mr. Nelson's book is not one to read through, and its value must therefore depend a good deal upon the index, which appears to us to be constructed far too much on the plan of few headings and many sub-headings. For some recondite reason not necessary to investigate here, this fault is invariably accompanied by the still graver one of the headings being ill chosen altogether, and Mr. Nelson's might well be improved. Who on earth would ever think of looking for subjects relating to insanity among the P's, under "Person of Unsound Mind"? A good deal of care and research have been devoted to the text, and we hope the volume may prove useful.

* The Law Relating to Tenement Houses and Flats for Residential and Business Purposes; including the Taxation and Rating Thereof. By Walter Clode, Barrister-at-Law, of the Inner Temple, Author of "The Law and Practice of Petition of Right." London: William Clowes & Son. 1889.

Selected Cases, Statutes, and Orders, Illustrative of the Principles of Private International Law as Administered in England. With a Commentary. By Horace Nelson, M.A., B.C.L., Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens & Sons. 1889.

DAMPIER.*

DAMPIER, by W. Clark Russell, forms the sixth volume of the series of "English Men of Action" published by Messrs. Macmillan. The choice of one seafarer to edit the Life of another was a happy one, and has resulted in an interesting volume. Perhaps the narrow limits to which these biographies are restricted may prevent modern readers, who seldom have the history of the buccaneers at their fingers' ends, from thoroughly understanding the part of Dampier's life which was spent in the society of those famous desperadoes, although the editor describes their origin and habits with the greatest clearness and thoroughness as far as the space at his disposal permits. But Dampier was much more than a buccaneer; he could write as well as he could fight; he had seen much more of the world than most men of his time, and had a great power of close observation and graphic description of what he saw. Captain Basil Hall, in his Fragments of Voyages and Travels, speaks of the "beautifully written and accurate Essay on Winds and Currents, by that Prince of all Voyagers, Old Dampier; who with means far more circumscribed than most of his successors, has contrived to arrange and condense his information in such a way as not only to render it available to practical men, but to make it intelligible and interesting to every class of readers." This is high praise from a professional seaman, who found the book serviceable even in the present century. Nor was Dampier's power of observation confined to winds and currents. Nothing escaped him. He never touches at any port without giving a list of its products, of the birds, beasts of prey, dogs, monkeys, &c.; and his page "charms us by the vivacity of his descriptions of coasts, of storms, of the corposant, of the turtle, and by a hundred unlaboured and unconscious felicities of phrase." The difficulties under which voyages were made in the seventeenth century were such as seem hardly credible in the nineteenth. It is amazing, as Mr. Russell says, that these early voyagers were not constantly blundering on shore. The quality even of an expert mariner in those days may be gathered from the fact of Dampier's telling us that, seeing a large black bird flying near the ship, he suspected that he was much nearer the Cape of Good Hope than he had imagined, "since it was well understood that this sort of bird is never met with more than ninety miles from land." The list of uncouth instruments "of seasoned pear-wood" carried by a well-found ship of his time does not include anything by means of which a navigator could do more than guess at the longitude; and when, in addition to this, one takes into consideration the inability of most of the old ships to beat to windward, and the rotten, inefficient state in which they were generally sent to sea, it speaks volumes for the seamanship of those days that they were so seldom lost.

Mr. Russell is quite free from the lues Boswelliana, and does not try to represent the subject of his memoir as in any way a hero. He owns that Dampier could not be considered to possess the qualities of a born leader of men; that he was apt to be enthusiastic when first setting about an adventure, but soon lost heart and longed to give it up. Though he was almost the first civilized man who landed on the mainland of Australia, he was far from foreseeing the future in store for that country, which he describes as a savage and worthless land, inhabited by loathsome monsters; and by far the most successful of his voyages was that which he made as "pilot" to Captain Woodes Rogers. We cannot help regretting that we do not find any account of a picture which used to delight our childhood in an old History of all the Voyages round the World, in which Dampier was represented buried in the sand up to his neck by way of a cure for fever. But in the opinion of most readers by far the most interesting subject connected with Dampier must always be that he not only was on board of the ship which rescued Alexander Selkirk from Juan Fernandez, but that it was his account of Selkirk's sojourn there which inspired Defoe to write Robinson Crusoe. In the following passage, Mr. Russell thinks, the style of Defoe's masterpiece may be distinctly traced:—

The Evening of this 18th Day was very dismal. The Sky looked very black, being covered with dark Clouds, the Wind blew very hard, and the Seas ran very high. The Sea was already roaring in a white foam about us; a dark night coming on and no Land in sight to shelter us, and our little Ark in danger to be swallowed up by every Wave; and what was worse for us all, none of us thought ourselves prepared for another World. The Reader may better guess, than I can express, the Confusion that we were all in. I have been in many eminent Dangers before now, some of which I have already related, but the worst of them all was but a Play-Game in comparison with this. I must confess that I was in great Conflicts of Mind at this time. Other Dangers came not upon me with such a leisurely and dreadful Solemnity; a Sudden Skirmish or Engagement, or so, was nothing when one's Blood was up, and push'd forward with eager expectations. But here I had a lingering view of approaching Death, and little or no hopes of escaping it, and I must confess that my Courage, which I had hitherto kept up, failed me here, and I made very sad reflections on my former life; and looked back with Horror and Detestation on actions which before I disliked, but now I trembled at the remembrance of. I had long before this repented me of that roving course of my life, of which kind, I believe, few Men have met with the like. For all these I returned thanks in a peculiar manner, and this once more desir'd God's assistance, and Composed my mind as well as I could in the hopes of it, and as the Event shew'd, I was not disappointed of my hopes.

* Dampier. Edited by W. Clark Russell. London and New York: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

FEW sovereigns have been better known, and certainly few have been known more favourably in our days, than the Emperor Pedro, second of the name, of Brazil. A representative (the representative in one case) of the three least "liberal" reigning Houses of Europe—those of Braganza, Bourbon, and Hapsburg—he has been fortunate enough, or clever enough, or both, to play the "liberal" sovereign very advantageously for himself, his dynasty, and his people. When the Infanta Izabel and her husband (your constitutional monarchy runs somehow into kings and princes-consort) come to their inheritance it will have been considerably smoothed for them by Dom Pedro, who has also given Dona Izabel a good experience as Regent. M. Mossé's book (1) is of that "officious" character to which some purists take exception, but which is really valuable for the amount of precise information which it gives. It did not need the odd assortment of testimonials from Lamartine and Victor Hugo, Darwin and Mr. Gladstone, which its cover bears, to commend it; and it will be found a very useful book by those who want to know the public, and something of the private, life of the Emperor Pedro and the, we may hope future, Empress Izabel.

"Territorial waters" is not a very excellent expression, and perhaps the German "Coast-sea" is better, if not prettier. The thing, however, is an important thing, as the Black Diamond has reminded even careless persons quite recently. M. Latour's treatise (2) upon it has the merit of very considerable thoroughness. He goes through the whole subject of the "territorial sea" in the abstract of its various modifications—seas surrounded by land, inlets of various kinds, straits, canals, and so forth. Then he deals with the large and contested matters of fishing rights, of the jurisdiction over foreign ships in home waters, of the modifications introduced by war, and so forth. The book is therefore not a treatise on the whole of maritime international law, as it does not nominally concern itself with the high seas; but in other aspects it is a very full and exhaustive handling, with due notice of special points and cases, such as that of the Franconia. Sometimes the author goes out of his way a little; it is difficult to see what the bombardment of Alexandria has got to do with his subject. But a Frenchman who could write a book on any international subject just now without trying to show the "regrettable" nature of English conduct in Egypt would be "either a beast or a god."

There is no crime in letters or in life greater than forsaking old loves; to take new ones is another thing altogether, and, provided the old be not forsaken, not in the least reprehensible, despite the proverb. Therefore we hope and trust that our affection for "Gyp" has not cooled our friendship for the descendant of Blondel. That lively Viscount's tales (3), however, do certainly seem to us to have gone off somewhat since the days of Le capitaine Parabère and M. Mars et Mme. Vénus. They are still amusing, but with less touch of good company than those of Le plus heureux de tous and Les séducteurs, and with a substituted touch of reportage which is not pleasing. Still they are amusing, sometimes very much so, though what Mrs. Newcome the elder would have said if, being able to understand French, she had detected them in the sacred household at Clapham, we tremble to think. M. Ricard's stories (4) are very much of the same kind, but (as becomes the author of Pitchoun!) with less of journalism and more of literature about them. It is perhaps rather a pity that there should be an appearance of deliberate selection of subjects likely to take the vulgar merely as subjects by persons who are capable of making any subject amusing; but that is hardly a matter which need be argued here. Neither of these books is likely to be given as a prize in school, and neither is likely to do any great harm to anybody, while both will certainly amuse their proper readers.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

IT would be hard to decide whether romance or history, poetry or archæology, is most prominent in Lady Middleton's Story of Alastair Bhan Comyn (Blackwood & Sons), a narrative poem of almost epical proportions, yet not the less a "family" poem, being based on annals of the Cumming family. Oblivious of the author's object, the poetical reader may consider the illustrative notes to the poem much too copious. The first appearance of the hero, for instance, in "marled tartan," with "brogs untanned, thonged to his shapely feet," calls forth a lengthy and learned note on the wearing of the kilt, the historical costume of Macbeth, and other collateral themes. But this profusion will only arouse admiration of Lady Middleton's industry in those possessed of the antiquarian passion. Of a truth, it accords perfectly with the theme. The poem is founded on certain traditions concerning the deadly feud that sprang up between John Randolph, the Earl of Moray, and Alastair Bhan Comyn and his kinsfolk. The origin of these traditions is set forth in letters written to Sir Thomas Dick Lauder by Mr. Rose, minister of Drainie, near Elgin, whose father collected much Gaelic lore from one Miller, a strolling minstrel of the type beloved by Scottish antiquaries. Unfortunately, perhaps, the elder Mr. Rose did not live to complete the versified translation of those of Miller's old ballads that treated of Randolph's strife with the Comyns and the cruel fate of Alastair the Fair. Enough, however, was preserved to supply the enthusiastic author with a substantial basis for an ingenious and spirited poem. Faithful to the old traditions, it shows also plenty of invention. A poem without "the female element" would be, as Lady Middleton urges, somewhat dull, especially if it aims at presenting living pictures of savage times—for of what else

Is life composed but love and battles?

To this sound principle we owe the heroine, the beautiful Ydonia, ward of the wicked Randolph; and Alastair the Fair has a fairer Imogene. He could not choose but to love her, though it is a little odd he should introduce himself by declaring

I am a treacherous twig of a traitorous tree —which he decidedly was not. Probably he could not resist the punning allusion to the old Gaelic proverb, "While there's a leaf in the forest there's guile in a Comyn." Other persons who play important parts are Randolph himself; Allan Shaw, who treacherously betrays his master, Alastair; and the mysterious waiting-woman to Ydonia, well named Lupola, a lovely creature with terrible eyes when the moon is full—in fact, a were-wolf, who causes extreme fright to the monks of Altyre and the belated shepherd on the hills. Her legend is a poetical circumstance that is deftly woven into the poem. Best of all the scenes of this stirring story are the cantos that describe the gathering of the clan after the fight at Inverloch, with the rousing lyric of the "fiery cross," and the death of Alastair in the cave in the glen of Slaginnan, where he is "smoked" like a wolf in his lair. There is altogether so much of the primitive spirit of poetry, so much that is bold and refreshing, it is a pity to have to note not a little that is perversely quaint and over-affected. Peculiarities of diction neither beautiful nor archaic are not infrequent.

The August number of Art and Letters (Boussod, Valadon, & Co.) is unusually attractive. The continuation of M. Armand Dayot's notes on the fine-art galleries in the Paris Exhibition deals chiefly with the works of David and his school. It is illustrated by some admirable reproductions after David, Gérard, Gros, and Ingres. The account of the painting of the great "Coronation" picture by David, quoted from his biographer Delécluze, might lead the reader to infer that the painter himself selected the pose of Napoleon crowning the kneeling Josephine, or that he obeyed the instructions of Napoleon. There is a well-founded story that gives Gérard the credit of this happy circumstance in the composition. David's original design for Le Sacre was very different. This Gérard saw and suggested the alteration, which on being carried out gave the Emperor intense pleasure. A second instalment of M. Marchetti's admirable drawings, "The Italian Army," the first portion of an interesting story by M. Ferdinand Fabre, and M. Paul Perret's article on Laure Permon, who became Mme. Junot and Duchesse d'Abrantès, with portrait and other drawings by Isabey, are noteworthy contributions to a well-varied number.

Mrs. J. E. Panton's Bye-Paths and Cross-Roads (Ward & Downey) is a collection of sketches of country scenery, old houses, decayed towns, and unconsidered corners of suburban rusticity not yet obliterated by the jerry-builder. The book offers pleasant reading for an idle hour, though in no sense has it any marked distinction. The pictures of homely country life and the more familiar aspects of nature are agreeably diversified by the writer's reflective comparison of the brave old days of leisurely movement and the bustle of the present.

The Book of Wedding Days, dedicated to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales (Longmans & Co.), is the most imposing and handsome of gift books, an album of decorative designs by Mr. Walter Crane, whose frolicsome amorini play at soldiers, football, or some other sport, on almost all of its quarto pages. These devices, printed in a warm red on stout paper, reveal Mr. Crane's lively fancy very favourably, though we cannot say they are less "mannered" in design than the artist is now wont to be. The verses selected by K. E. J. Reid, May Ross, and Mabel Bamfield are from many sources and generally happily chosen.

The industrious and observing Mr. Max O'Rell has collected from various newspapers and American magazines certain papers on the Frenchman at home, the Englishman abroad, and so forth, under the title Jacques Bonhomme (Bristol: Arrowsmith), a little book and a shallow, though good enough, no doubt, to catch people who are not yet surfeited with "national characteristics."

Mr. Charles Hardy's book of verses, My Boy's Request (Remington & Co.), is full of the sentiment and humour fit for the reciter and his audience. No Penny Reading can be complete without the pathos of the title-poem or the humour of "The Slavey's Letter." Poems and Song Words, by Rosie Churchill (Simpkin & Co.), is a harmless gathering of verse that is quite up to the standard of the words for music, or "song words," that tempt the minor composer.

Mr. R. Simkin's military designs we have commended more than once in Christmas-card form. In Life in the Army (Chapman & Hall) the artist makes a braver show in portraying the record of life in camp, field, and quarters. The book is made up of a variety of clever drawings, full of life and character, and well reproduced in colour.

(1) Dom Pedro II. Par B. Mossé. Paris: Firmin-Didot.

(2) La mer territoriale. Par J. S. Latour. Paris: Pedone-Lauriel.

(3) Le péché capital. Par Richard O'Monroy. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(4) Contes à mon singe. Par J. Ricard. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

"Is Bad Sight on the Increase?" is a question readily answered by any one who possesses good sight and observes the increasing number of children compelled to wear spectacles, and the prodigious number of eye-glasses worn, if not used, on all sides. This evidence, however, is no sort of evidence at all, if we are to accept the paradoxical treatment of the question offered in M. Aristide Fournet's brochure, The Philosophy of Sight (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.) Spectacles, says this cheerful mentor, increase sight; their prevalence, therefore, is a proof that "sight is on the increase." To suppose the contrary is only less absurd than to take the absence of glasses as a proof of good sight. This is the long and short of it, according to M. Fournet. It is an ingenious thesis, and ingeniously is it urged in this little book.

By Dr. W. H. J. Brown and Dr. A. Campbell we have a little book on a subject of general interest—The Complexion; How to Preserve and Improve It (Renshaw)—which is notable for its practical scope and common-sense treatment. The advice given as to "personal hygiene"—diet, baths, soaps, exercise, and so forth—possesses the excellent merit of being entirely practicable, as well as admirably sound.

Mr. G. H. Armitstead, who has done into verse a Selection from Æsop's Fables (Leeds: Watson), asks:—

Is it wholly wasted time,
Turning such wise words to rhyme?

Certainly not, we should say. It is a blameless exercise, and these specimens are neatly turned.

Everybody's Book of Jokes (Saxon & Co.)—there are some 3,000 quips and jests in it—is good to dip into, yet fearsome to read. The editor thinks you cannot destroy an old joke, forgetting that your printer may spoil one, as he does when he turns Sydney Smith's "dean and chapter" into "dean and chaplain" (p. 16).

The modest and cautious investor may be commended to a little handbook by Mr. G. Bartrick-Baker—Sound Investments for Small Savings (Virtue & Co.)—which is full of trustworthy information and guidance.

We have received new editions of Charles Kingsley's At Last: a Christian in the West Indies (Macmillan); Inebriety, by Norman Kerr, M.D. (H. K. Lewis); The Armourer's Prentice, by Charlotte M. Yonge, and Unknown to History, by the same author (Macmillan); Mr. W. Warde Fowler's Tales of the Birds (Macmillan), and Mr. Austin Dobson's Fielding (Macmillan).

We have also received a translation by Professor A. R. S. Kennedy of an Assyrian Grammar, by Professor Friedrich Delitzsch of Leipzig (Berlin: Reuther; London: Williams & Norgate); The Petrine Claims, by Dr. R. F. Littledale, a re-issue, with additions, of articles published in the Church Quarterly Review (1878-84) (S. P. C. K.); Life of St. Bonaventure, translated by L. C. Skey (Burns & Oates), and The Volapük Correspondent, an adaptation of R. Kniele's Tedaspod, by G. Krause (Swan Sonnenschein).

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

THE UNITED STATES.

The Annual Subscription to the SATURDAY REVIEW, including postage to any part of the United States, is £1 10s. 4d. or $7 39, and may be forwarded direct to the Publisher, Mr. WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, or to Mr. B. F. STEVENS, American Agency, 4 Trafalgar Square, London. International Money Orders can be sent from any office in the United States, and Subscriptions, payable in advance, may commence at any time.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse), Paris,

by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may likewise be obtained in Paris every Saturday of Messrs. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

Now ready, VOLUME LXVII., bound in cloth, price 16s. Cloth Cases for Binding all the Volumes, price 2s. each. Also Reading Cases, price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. each. May be had at the Office, or through any Bookseller.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,763, AUGUST 10, 1889:

Crete.

The German Visit and the German Press.

The General's Case. Cave Proceras.

The Battle of Toski. Inspection and Review.

The Royal Grants. Friendly Societies. The Education Debate.

The Irish Constabulary Vote. Lord Tennyson's Birthday.

A Woman's Plea for the "Gloves."

The Pension List. The Tithes Bill.

The Liverpool Murder.

Mr. W. R. S. Ralston.

Modern Cavalry. Racing at Goodwood.

"The Faerie King." Division of Railway Ordinary Stocks.

Senatorial Elections in the United States.

Orchid Nomenclature. Soudanese and Dervishes.

Porpoises. Little Billee.

Lord Torrington.

Mr. Kipling's Stories. Some Classical Translations.

Novels and Stories. Roger de Wendover—Vol. III.

Farm Live Stock. The A & C both in Latin and English.

An Historical Handbook. Emerson in Concord.

Scotland in 1298. Two Law Books.

Dampier. French Literature.

New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE NEW GALLERY, REGENT STREET.—SUMMER EXHIBITION NOW OPEN. 9 till 7. Admission, One Shilling.

THE NEW GALLERY SUMMER EXHIBITION will CLOSE on SATURDAY, AUGUST 10.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—CHILDREN'S FIREWORKS on Thursdays, August 15 and 22, at 8.30.

Amusing Novelties by C. T. Brock & Co. Novel Aquatic Fireworks, from Lake spanned by "Tower Bridge," Superb Illuminations, Saturdays, August 10, 17, and 24, at 9.15. Admission, One Shilling daily.

PLEASURE CRUISE to NORWAY and SWEDEN.—The ORIENT COMPANY will despatch their large full-powered steamship "CHIMBORAZO," 3,847 tons register, 3,000 horse-power, from London on the 21st of August, calling at Leith on the 23rd of August, for Lerwick, Trondhjem, Molde, Naes, Gudvangen, Bergen, Vik, Gothenburg, arriving in London on the 9th of September. The steamer will be navigated through the "Inner Lead"—i.e. inside the fringe or islands off the coast of Norway, thus securing smooth water.

The "CHIMBORAZO" is fitted with the electric light, hot and cold baths, &c. Cuisine of the highest order. The "CHIMBORAZO" will leave London on the 25th of September for a Cruise in the Mediterranean.

Managers..... (F. GREEN & CO., 13 Fenchurch Avenue. ANDERSON, ANDERSON, & CO., 5 Fenchurch Avenue, London, E.C. For further particulars apply to the latter firm, or to the West-End Agents, Grindlay & Co., 55 Parliament Street, S.W.)

A Y R T O N & T H O M A S, PATENT AGENTS.

Conduct every kind of British, Foreign, and Colonial Business connected with PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.

Mr. H. M. THOMAS, Author of "The True Position of Patentees," being a practical engineer, PERSONALLY SUPERINTENDS the applications in respect of mechanical inventions.

Moderate Terms. No charge for preliminary advice.

Telegraphic Address, "Prolonged, London."

& 10 Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, W.C.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond. ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London. Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES. Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

SCHOOL PIANOS.—NEW MODELS from 18 Guineas. All the latest improvements. These instruments are remarkable for their beautiful tone, perfect touch, and durability. PIANOS for HIRE, or on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.—W. J. ENNEVER & SON, Manufacturers, 57 Berners Street, London, W.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

The SESSION of the FACULTY of MEDICINE will commence on October 1. Introductory Lecture at Four P.M. by Mr. R. J. GODLEE, M.S., B.A., F.R.C.S. The Examinations for the Entrance Exhibitions will commence on September 21. Scholarships, Exhibitions, and Prizes of the value of £300 are awarded annually. In University College Hospital about 3,000 In-Patients and 35,000 Out-Patients are treated during the year. Thirty-six Appointments, eighteen being resident, as House-Surgeon, House-Physician, Obstetric Assistant, &c. are filled up by competition during the year, and these as well as all Clerkships and Dresserships are open to Students of the Hospital without extra fee. Prospectuses, with full information as to Classes, Prizes, &c. may be obtained from the College, Gower Street, W.C.

JOHN WILLIAMS, M.D., Dean.
J. M. HORSBURGH, M.A., Secretary.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb. One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates). The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating. The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks. Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition. For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.
Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A. Heidelberg.
A. B. CATTY, M.A., Christ's Coll., Camb.
WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.
At the recent Exam. for the I.C.S. a Pupil of Heidelberg College obtained THE HIGHEST MARKS IN GERMAN of all the Candidates.
SANDHURST FURTHER EXAM., August 1889.
Alexander R. C. Rew..... 7539.
Mr. LAWRENCE in London: Oakley Lodge, Fulham, S.W.

TUDOR HALL COLLEGE (for Ladies), Forest Hill,

Sydenham, S.E. Established over Thirty Years.—Principals: Mrs. TODD and Rev. J. W. TODD, D.D. Head-Mistress: Miss TODD (Girton), Cambridge. Professors: Seeley, Churton Collins, Garcia, Diehl, Loman, Duleken, Larpent, &c.—Gymnasium, Tennis-courts, Swimming, Riding. Full particulars, Photo of Coll., &c., on application.

PROFESSORSHIP of MODERN LITERATURE and ENGLISH LANGUAGE at UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LIVERPOOL, VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

CANDIDATES for the Chair are requested to send in applications (with testimonials) on or before October 12.
Residence to commence in January 1890. Endowment, £375 with two-thirds of fees.
For particulars apply to REGISTRAR, University College, Liverpool.

ST. GEORGE'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL,

HYDE PARK CORNER, S.W.
The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1, when an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS will be delivered by Dr. T. CLIFFORD ALLBUTT, F.R.S., at 4 P.M.
The following ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS will be offered for competition in October:—
1. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £125, for the sons of Medical men who have entered the School as bond fide first-year students during the current year.
2. TWO SCHOLARSHIPS, each of £50, open to all students commencing their studies.
3. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £90, open to all students who have entered the school during the current year, and who have passed the Cambridge 1st M.B. since October 1888.
4. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £65, for students who, having been signed up for or previously passed the Oxford 1st M.B. or the Cambridge 2nd M.B., have entered the School during the current year.
The following Exhibitions and Prizes are also open to students:—
The William Brown £100 Exhibition; the William Brown £40 Exhibition; the Brackenbury Prize in Medicine, value £32; the Brackenbury Prize in Surgery, value £32; the Pollock Prize in Physiology, value £18; the Johnson Prize in Anatomy, value £10 10s.; the Treasurer's Prize, value £10 10s.; General Proficiency Prizes for first, second, and third year students, of £10 10s. each; the Brodie Prize in Surgery; the Acland Prize in Medicine; the Thompson Medal, and Sir Charles Clarke's Prize.
All Hospital appointments, including the two House Physicianships and two House Surgeonships, are awarded as the result of competition, and are open to the students without additional expense of any kind.
Clerkships and Dresserships, and all the minor appointments, are given without extra fees. Several paid appointments, including that of Obstetric Assistant, with a salary of £100 and board and lodging, are awarded yearly upon the recommendation of the Medical School Committee.
The new Physiological Laboratories and Class Rooms are now open.
Prospectuses and fuller details may be obtained by application to
THOMAS WHIPHAM, M.B., Dean.

GUY'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL.

The WINTER SESSION commences on Tuesday, October 1.
The Hospital contains 605 beds, of which 500 are in constant occupation. Special Classes are held for Students preparing for the Examinations of the University of London, and other Higher Examinations.
APPOINTMENTS.—All Hospital Appointments are made strictly in accordance with the merits of the Candidates, and without extra payment.
ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS.—Two Open Scholarships in Arts, one of the value of 100 Guineas, open to Candidates under twenty years of age; and one of 50 Guineas, open to Candidates under twenty-five years of age. Two Open Scholarships in Science, one of the value of 125 Guineas, and another of 50 Guineas, open to Candidates under twenty-five years of age.
PRIZES are awarded to Students in their various years amounting in the aggregate to more than £400.
DENTAL SCHOOL.—A Dental School is attached to the Hospital, which affords to Students all the instruction required for a Licence in Dental Surgery.
COLLEGE.—A residential College is in course of erection upon a site close to the Hospital, to accommodate about 50 Students in addition to the Resident Staff of the Hospital. The College contains a large Dining Hall, and Reading Rooms for the use of the STUDENTS' CLUB.
For Prospectus and further information apply to the Dean, Dr. PERRY, Guy's Hospital, London, S.E.

ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL,

ALBERT EMBANKMENT, LONDON, S.E.
The WINTER SESSION of 1889-90 will OPEN on Tuesday, October 1, with an Introductory Address, at 3 P.M., by Mr. WILLIAM ANDERSON, F.R.C.S.
TWO ENTRANCE SCIENCE SCHOLARSHIPS, of 125 guineas and £60 respectively, open to all first-year Students, will be offered for competition. The Examination will be held on September 25, 26, and 27, and the subjects will be Chemistry and Physics, with either Botany or Zoology, at the option of Candidates.
Scholarships and Money Prizes of considerable value are awarded at the Sessional Examinations, as also several Medals.
Special Classes are held throughout the year for the "PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC" and "INTERMEDIATE M.B." Examinations of the UNIVERSITY of LONDON.
All Hospital Appointments are open to Students without extra charge.
The fees may be paid in one sum or by instalments. Entries may be made separately to Lectures or to Hospital Practice, and special arrangements are made for Students entering in their second or subsequent years; also for Dental Students and for Qualified Practitioners.
A Register of approved Lodgings is kept by the Medical Secretary, who also has a list of local Medical Practitioners, Clergymen, and others who receive students into their houses.
Prospectuses and all particulars may be obtained from the Medical Secretary, Mr. GEORGE RENDLE.
E. NETTLESHIP, Dean.

CRONDALL SCHOOL, FARNHAM, Surrey.—Invigorating

country life, healthiest in England (see Registrar's Report). Preparation for Public Schools, Royal Navy, &c.; French and German guaranteed; school farm, cricket and football fields, tennis, carpenter's shop, riding ponies.—Address, PRINCIPAL.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-

Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils. —41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

CRYSTAL PALACE EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

THIRTIETH SESSION, 1889-90.
THE HIGHEST EDUCATION IN ART, SCIENCE, AND LITERATURE.
For LADIES: I. The School. II. Junior Section. Opens September 30.
GENTLEMEN: SCHOOL OF PRACTICAL ENGINEERING.
NEXT TERM September 9.
I. Mechanical Course. II. Civil Engineering Division. III. Colonial Section.
SCHOOL FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF ESTATES. September 1.
Prospectuses in the Library, Byzantine Court, Crystal Palace.
F. K. J. SHENTON, F.R.Hist.S.
Superintendent Educational Department.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near

TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-

Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

HILLSIDE, GODALMING, Surrey. (Close to Charterhouse.)

Preparatory for Charterhouse and other Public Schools. A. M. CURTEIS, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. G. GIDLEY ROBINSON, M.A., formerly Scholar of Exeter College, Oxford, and late Assistant-Master of Charterhouse.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR.

BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

RADFORD HOUSE, COVENTRY.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS of GENTLEMEN. Established 1800. Boys received from Six to Twelve years of age, and prepared for College and Local Examinations, which have hitherto been successfully passed by the Pupils of this School. Eight acres of recreation ground.—Apply for particulars to Mrs. and Miss HOUGHTON.

FARM PUPILS.—GENTLEMEN are received on the FARM

of the AYLESBURY DAIRY COMPANY, Limited, Horsham, Sussex. 1,400 acres arable and pasture: 400 head of cattle.—For terms and particulars apply to the SECRETARY, Aylesbury Dairy Company, in London, St. Petersburg Place, Bayswater, or Horsham, Sussex.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS and NAVY CADETSHIPS.

An EXAMINATION will be held in September to admit FOUR BOYS at half-fees into the Scholarship Class of a large, very well known Preparatory School.—For particulars address, REV. HEADMASTER, New University Club, St. James's Street, S.W.

TO FAMILIES sending SONS to LONDON.—A well-known

FRENCH FAMILY, of good position (Official) offer a very superior HOME to a few GENTLEMEN, with practical instruction in French and German. French always spoken. Most excellent table and service. Billiard-room. Extensive tennis-ground. Liberal terms.—Address, VALMONT, care of Mr. Parker, Chemist, 35 Clifton Road, Maida Vale, W.

THE MASTER of a large SCHOOL recommends a LADY

MATRON, who has been with him five years. A trained nurse, with much experience. Address, Miss HUTCHINSON, 3 St. George's Terrace, South Lowestoft.

SCHWEITZER'S

COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

PURE—SOLUBLE.

BEST & GOES FARTHEST.

EASILY DIGESTED.

MADE INSTANTLY.

VAN

HOUTEN'S

COCOA.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."
Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."
British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

FRY'S

PURE CONCENTRATED

COCOA.

E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that I have ordered it for family use."

J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."

AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

Dr. PAGET,

SURGEON-DENTIST,

445 STRAND, W.C.
(Facing Charing Cross Station.)

ARTIFICIAL TEETH,

without plates. Perfect imitations of the natural teeth. Artistic, painless, and perfect. Most moderate fees. Consultations free daily.

Illustrated pamphlet post free.

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES,

Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESS' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY. Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician (President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 57 Oxford Street, London, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

FOR THE DECORATION OF THE HOME
visit THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Gallery,
74 New Oxford Street, W.C. A noble display of Copies of THE GREAT MASTERS, framed
and unframed.

The Chef-d'œuvres of THE NATIONAL
COLLECTIONS of London, Paris, Rome, Dresden,
St. Petersburg, Madrid, &c. &c.

Catalogue of 186 pages, Sixpence, post-free.
A descriptive Pamphlet free by post on application to
THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY.

THE PERFECTION
OF SCOTCH WHISKEY.

DOUGLAS & MASON, EDINBURGH.
ESTABLISHED 1839.

The LANCET says:
"DOUGLAS & MASON'S Whiskey is excellent in every respect, smooth in taste and delicate in flavour, the advantage of skilful blending."
Cash Price 40/ per dozen. Carriage paid to any Railway Station in England on two dozen and upwards.

NATIONAL ORPHAN HOME
HAM COMMON, RICHMOND, SURREY.
OFFICE: 12 PALL MALL, S.W.

Patrons.
H.R.H. THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE.
H.R.H. THE PRINCESS CHRISTIAN.
H.R.H. THE DUCHESS OF ALBANY.
H.R.H. THE DUCHESS OF TECK.

The object of this Charity is to receive Orphan Girls from Seven to Twelve Years of Age, without distinction as to Religion, into a "Home" where they can obtain a plain English Education, a practical instruction in the Kitchen, House, and Laundry, to fit them for all Household Duties, and are taught to cut out, make, and mend their own clothes. Over 650 have thus been more or less provided for. There are now nearly 100 on the books. The Building affords ample room for 50 more, but for want of funds they cannot be received.

Children are admitted by election, on payment till elected, on purchase, on presentation, subject to the life of the donor.

A Cot for all time may be had for £450.

The Charity is in

URGENT NEED OF ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS AND DONATIONS.

Donations, Subscriptions, and Bequests are earnestly solicited, and will be gratefully received by Messrs. HERRIES & Co., Bankers, 16 St. James's Street, and by the SECRETARY, at the Offices, 12 Pall Mall, S.W., where all communications should be addressed.

WEMYSS, Chairman.
E. EVANS CRONK, Secretary.

ROYAL ALFRED AGED MERCHANT SEAMEN'S
INSTITUTION. Opened in 1867.
THE HOME, BELVEDERE, KENT.
Pensioners at all Ports of the United Kingdom.
Annual Disbursements, £6,000. Annual Subscriptions, £1,800.
Number of Inmates, 100. Out-Pensioners, 200.
Patron—Rear-Admiral H.R.H. THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH, K.G.
Chairman—Admiral Sir F. LEOPOLD MCCLINTOCK, F.R.S.
Deputy-Chairman—Captain DAVID MAINLAND, F.R.G.S.

The object of this Charity is to give a Home or a Pension to the Merchant Sailor when Old, Destitute, and Friendless.

800 Old Sailors, out of 1,700 Applicants, have enjoyed the benefits of this Charity; but from want of funds the Committee are unable to admit hundreds of necessitous and worthy Candidates, who for Forty years have been at Sea as Seaman, Mate, or Master.

Subscriptions and Donations are urgently needed to reduce this heavy list and to relieve many from destitution.

Bankers—Messrs. WILLIAMS, DEACON, & CO.
Office: 58 Fenchurch Street, London, E.C. W. E. DENNY, Secretary.

METROPOLITAN DRINKING FOUNTAIN and CATTLE
TROUGH ASSOCIATION.
Supported entirely by Voluntary Contributions.
This is the only Society providing Free Supplies of Water for Man and Beast in the streets of London and Suburbs.
Contributions are very earnestly solicited.
Bankers: Messrs. BARCLAY, BEVAN, TRITTON, RANSOM, BOUVERIE & Co.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW
LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).
12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.
Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.
Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.
ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,
Established 1836.
LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
INCOME and FUNDS (1888).
Fire Premiums £615,000
Life Premiums 203,000
Interest 149,000
Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

NATIONAL PROVIDENT
INSTITUTION.
FOR
MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE.
See New Prospectus, page 17, for particulars of ENDOWMENT-ASSURANCE POLICIES
combining
LIFE ASSURANCE at MINIMUM COST
with provision for old age.
48 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON.

LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION.
Established by Royal Charter, A.D. 1720.
7 ROYAL EXCHANGE AND 43A PALL MALL, S.W.
Marine, Fire, and Life Assurances have been granted by the Corporation for more than a century and a half.
Funds in hand exceed £3,500,000.

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE,
LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.
Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.
Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.
W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
F. B. MACDONALD }
Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.
Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.
E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.
THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application. FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK
ISSUE of £371,320.
(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)
The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.
Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.
Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, & Co., 67 Lombard Street.
No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.
Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by Borough Accountant's Office, W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.
Bridge Street, Sheffield,
June 13, 1889.

GOOD MORNING!
Have you used
PEARS' SOAP?

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR
by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.
BROWN & POLSON'S
CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal Claim to the Public Confidence.

TONGA, the SPECIFIC for NEURALGIA.
"Tonga maintains its reputation in the treatment of Neuralgia."—Lancet.
"Invaluable in facial Neuralgia. Has proved effective in all those cases in which we have prescribed it."—Medical Press.
2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. Of all Chemists.

BENGER'S FOOD FOR INFANTS, CHILDREN AND INVALIDS.

GOLD MEDAL, HEALTH EXHIBITION.

EXTRACT FROM PRIVATE LETTER.—"The infant was very delicate; our medical adviser ordered your Food. The result in a short time was wonderful; the little fellow grew strong and fat, and is now in a thriving condition—in fact, 'the flower of the flock.'"

BENGER'S FOOD is Sold in Tins, at 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 5s., and 10s., by Chemists, &c., everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED BY ALL WHOLESALE HOUSES.

SHOPPING BY POST.

Before purchasing their DRESS MATERIALS elsewhere, Ladies are requested to write to HY. PEASE & CO.'S Successors for a box of their New Patterns of

DARLINGTON DRESS FABRICS.

Which include the celebrated Gold-Medal Merinos, Cashmeres, Cross-Warp Serges, and an immense variety of new goods for Spring and Summer wear. The Patterns are sent free on approval by return of post to any address in Town or Country. Telegrams: "SUCCESSORS," DARLINGTON.

HY. PEASE & CO.'S Successors, THE MILLS, DARLINGTON.

BOOKS, &c.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.

A MONTHLY CATALOGUE OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.

Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.

136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly, London. All the New and Standard Books, Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c. Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1	8	2
India and China	1	12	6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1	10	6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.—The following NUMBERS of THE SATURDAY REVIEW are required, for which 1s. each will be given, viz.: 1, 2, 15, 25, 56, 59, 73, 75, 99, 112, 130, 132, 138, 174, 452, and 1627 (clean copies)—at the Office, 34 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London; or Green Bank House, Hall Green (near Birmingham).

NEW VOLUME IN THE CAVENDISH LIBRARY.

Large crown 8vo. cloth, uncut, 3s. 6d.

WILLIAM HAZLITT, Essayist and Critic. Selections from his Writings. With a Memoir, Biographical and Critical, by ALEXANDER IRELAND, Author of "The Book-Lover's Enchiridion," "Memoir of Emerson," &c. With Steel Portrait.

Mr. Ireland's lifelong acquaintance with the works of Hazlitt, one of the most brilliant essayists of the century, and certainly the most hardily-treated man of genius of his time, guarantees that this volume is edited with care and discrimination. 125 Copies have been printed on fine thick paper, crown 4to., with an Engraving of Winterslow Hall, a favourite resort of Hazlitt. These 125 Copies will be supplied in the order of application.

London: FREDERICK WARNE & CO., Bedford Street, Strand.

Just published, post 8vo. cloth, 2s.

ALGERIAN HINTS for TOURISTS. By CHARLES E. FLOWER. An Appendix to the Guide-Books, telling just What to See and How to See It, with latest information about Hotels, Railways, Dilligences, &c.

London: EDWARD STANFORD, 26 & 27 Cockspur Street, Charing Cross, S.W.

Just published, price 12s. 6d., or in sheets, unbound, 7s. 6d.

MS. BIBL. REG. 17. A, or REGIUS MS. This celebrated Poem, the oldest document of the Craft (late 14th Century), reproduced in Facsimile, with a Glossary, Introduction, and Transcript, by Bro. H. J. WHYMPER, C.T.E., Past Dep. Dis. G.M. Punjab, Author of "The Religion of Freemasonry." Bound in exact imitation of the Original in the British Museum, and deemed by all authorities to be a most beautiful work of art.—SPENCER & CO., 15 Great Queen Street, W.C.

Fcp. 8vo. price 1s. post-free.

THE SCHOOLMASTER'S CALENDAR: Handbook of Examinations and Open Scholarships for 1889. Third Year of Issue. London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, 4 York Street, Covent Garden.

HURST & BLACKETT'S NEW NOVELS.

THE TREE of KNOWLEDGE. By G. M. ROBINS, Author of "Keep my Secret," "A False Position," &c. 3 vols.

BOTH OF THIS PARISH. By ALGERNON GISSING, Author of "Joy cometh in the Morning." 2 vols.

A CROOKED PATH. By Mrs. ALEXANDER, Author of "The Wooing o't," "The Freres," &c. 3 vols.

A POOR GENTLEMAN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT, Author of "It was a Lover and his Lass," "Agnes," &c. 3 vols.

HILARY ST. JOHN. By Mrs. A. PRICE, Author of "A Rustic Maid," "A Wilful Young Woman," &c. 2 vols.

WITH EVERYTHING AGAINST HER. By Colonel CUTHBERT LARKING, Author of "Bandobast and Khabar" &c. 3 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET,

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

"MEMORY'S HARKBACK THROUGH HALF-A-CENTURY."

THE RECOLLECTIONS OF DR. GRETTON.

1 vol. demy 8vo. 12s.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "WORTH WAITING FOR."

THE SCOTTS OF BESTMINSTER.

By J. MASTERMAN, Author of "A Fatal Error" &c.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "MDLLE. DE MERSAC."

MISS SHAFTO.

By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "The Rogue" &c.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "COUNTESS IRENE."

ROBERT LEEMAN'S DAUGHTERS. By

J. FOGERTY, Author of "Lauterdale," "Caterina," &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "FASCINATION" &c.

PAST FORGIVENESS? By Lady MARGARET

MAJENDIE, Author of "Precautions" &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "NELLIE'S MEMORIES."

THE SEARCH for BASIL LYNDHURST.

By ROSA N. CAREY, Author of "Not Like Other Girls" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

AUGUST 1889.]

No. III.

[Price SIXPENCE.]

THE NEW REVIEW.

Edited by ARCHIBALD GROVE.

THE RELATIONS BETWEEN FRANCE AND RUSSIA SINCE 1871.....By M. FLOURENS (Member of the French Chamber).

MATTHEW ARNOLD. Part II.....

By the LORD CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND.

TALK AND TALKERS OF TO-DAY (Continued).

TWO VIEWS OF THE GERMAN EMPEROR.

I. By POULTNEY BIGELOW.
II. By

EIGHT HOURS THE MAXIMUM WORKING DAY By H. M. HYNDMAN.

MYTHOLOGY AND THE OLD TESTAMENT .. By ANDREW LANG.

THE NEW TREASURE HUNT..... By TIGHE HOPKINS.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING By the DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH.

LONDON: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

AUGUST. 2s. 6d.

GROUSE SHOOTING. By GEORGE CAMPION.

THE RELIGION OF OUR BOYS. By AUSTEN PEMBER.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN PROBLEM. By Major H. ELSDALE, R.E.

LAND LEAGUE BALLADS. By C. J. HAMILTON.

PROFESSOR GREEN'S POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY. By F. C. CONYBEARE.

SOME EAST-END WORKWOMEN. By CLEMENTINA BLACK.

SOME FEW THACKERAYANA. By D. D.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTIONARY CALENDAR. By FRANCIS HITCHMAN.

AN EMPIRE OF CROFTERS. By JOHN ROE.

A FRENCHMAN'S IMPRESSIONS OF LONDON IN THE SEVENTEENTH

CENTURY. By ARTHUR IRWIN DASENT.

POLITICS AT HOME AND ABROAD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LONDON: W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

AUGUST. 2s. 6d.

A BREAKFAST PARTY IN PARIS. By FREDERIC HARRISON.

THE NEW LIBERALISM. By L. ATHERLEY JONES, M.P.

ON CHANGE OF AIR. By Dr. BURNES YEO.

WANTED—A GOSPEL FOR THE CENTURY. By the Rev. Father BARRY.

THE DEADLY WILD BEASTS OF INDIA. By Sir JOSEPH FAYHER.

THE WORKS OF HENRIK IBSEN. By WALTER FREWEN LORD.

MR. GLADSTONE'S "PLAIN SPEAKING." By Lord BRABOURNE.

THE ART OF CONVERSATION. By Lord RIBBLESDALE.

PHENICIAN AFFINITIES OF ITHACA. By the Right Hon. W. E. GLADSTONE, M.P.

THE FRENCH IN GERMANY. By Professor GEEFFCKEN.

WOOL-GATHERINGS. By FREDERICK GREENWOOD.

NOTICEABLE BOOKS—

(1) By the Right Hon. JOHN MORLEY, M.P. (2) By W. S. LILLY. (3) By ROWLAND E. PROTHERO. (4) By Sir FREDERICK BRAMWELL. (5) By H. G. HEWLETT.

(6) By FREDERIC MYERS. (7) By the Hon. HALLAM TENNYSON.

THE APPEAL AGAINST FEMALE SUFFRAGE: A REJOINDER. By Mrs. CREIGHTON.

APPENDIX—SIGNATURES TO THE PROTEST AGAINST FEMALE SUFFRAGE

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

W. H. ALLEN & CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.

MISCELLANEOUS LIST.

A NEW WORK BY GEORGE GRESSWELL, OF KELSEY HOUSE, LOUTH.
1 vol. demy 8vo. Illustrated, 15s.

THE DISEASES and DISORDERS of the OX. With some Account of the Diseases of the Sheep. With Additions on Human and Comparative Pathology, by Dr. ALBERT GRESSWELL.

1 vol. crown 8vo. with Frontispiece, 7s. 6d.
OUT-OF-DOOR SPORTS in SCOTLAND: their Economy and Surroundings. Deer Stalking, Grouse Shooting, Salmon Angling, Golfing, Curling, &c. By "ELLANGOWAN."

1 vol. 4to. with 67 Illustrations, 15s.
HEARTS of OAK. By Rear-Admiral H. F. WINNINGTON INGRAM.

The Academy says:—"We must not part from our author without thanking him for the pleasure we have derived from reading his simple, straightforward narrative."

NEW and CHEAPER EDITION. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.
THE NEW PARIS SKETCH-BOOK—MEN, MANNERS, and INSTITUTIONS. By J. G. ALGER.

EMINENT WOMEN SERIES.

Edited by JOHN H. INGRAM.

New volume, just published, 3s. 6d. each Volume.

JANE AUSTEN. By Mrs. CHARLES MALDEN.

POPULAR EDITION, limp cloth, each 1s. 6d. Vols. I. and II. already published.

GEORGE ELIOT. By MATHILDE BLIND.

EMILY BRONTË. By A. MARY F. ROBINSON.

* * * Other Volumes will follow in due course.

1 vol. crown 8vo. 5s.
THE RAMBLER PAPERS. By JEFFERY C. JEFFERY.

The World says:—"The sketches of character are admirable.....The headstrong, impulsive Margaret is a charming study, and all the characters may claim to be instinct with life."

A NEW NOVEL BY A NEW WRITER.

New and Cheaper Edition, 1 vol. 3s. 6d.

CYRIL. By GEOFFREY DRAGE.

The Manchester Courier says:—"It is most refreshing in these unregenerate days to find a young author pleading so earnestly and eloquently for patriotism and love of Church and Queen."

The World says:—"He writes well, with fluency and ease; his grasp on his characters never relaxes."

The Morning Post says:—"The author is sometimes brilliant, often witty; while his hatred of Mr. Gladstone is only equalled by his unbounded patriotism."

A NEW NOVEL BY C. A. MONTRESOR.

1 vol. crown 8vo. 5s.

MORE SAIL THAN BALLAST.

The Saturday Review says:—"The story 'founded on fact' is not often so full of interest or so skilfully composed as is 'More Sail than Ballast,' by C. A. Montresor..... From cover to cover the story is charmingly told."

The Scotsman says:—"A narrative as true to life and consistent in all its parts as it is simple, beautiful, and of the deepest human interest."

1 vol. crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

THE STUDENT'S PLANE TRIGONOMETRY.

A Comprehensive Manual for the Use of Schools, Colleges, and Private Students. With upwards of 1,500 Exercises, specially adapted to the Present System of Examinations. By T. RONEY.

NEW BOOKS AND NEW EDITIONS ON INDIA.

CABINET EDITION, to be completed in 6 vols. each 6s. Vols. I.—IV. ready.

HISTORY of the SEPOY WAR. By Sir

JOHN W. KAYE; and HISTORY OF THE INDIAN MUTINY. By Colonel G. B. MALLESON, C.S.I. New Edition (in which the Original Third Volume of Sir John Kaye's Work is left out). Revised and Edited by Colonel G. B. MALLESON, C.S.I.

1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

FOUR FAMOUS SOLDIERS: Sir CHARLES

NAPIER, HODSON of "Hodson's Horse," SIR WILLIAM NAPIER, SIR HERBERT EDWARDES. By T. R. E. HOLMES, Author of "History of the Indian Mutiny."

The Spectator says:—"The book is not a compilation: but exhibits throughout the most careful and independent research.....The four biographies show the author's mastery of his materials, and make excellent reading."

THE STATESMEN SERIES.

Vols. I.—IX. now ready, each 2s. 6d. Two Latest Volumes.

THE MARQUESS WELLESLEY. By

Colonel G. B. MALLESON, C.S.I.

The Athenæum says:—"A most excellent little Life, of which there is nothing to be said except that it is almost a perfect example of the manner in which to treat a biography in a condensed handbook form."

The Saturday Review says:—"Among the actors in the Anglo-Indian drama no name is more conspicuous than that of Richard Colley Wellesley, and few writers are better qualified to describe his character and administration than Colonel Malleison."

THE MARQUIS of DALHOUSIE. By Captain

LIONEL J. TROTTER.

1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

KEBLE COLLEGE SERMONS, 1877-1888.

Being a Companion Volume to the First Series, which comprised those preached 1870-1876.

This Collection of Discourses embraces Addresses by the Rev. E. S. Talbot, D.D. (late Warden of Keble Coll., now Vicar of Leeds), the Rev. W. Lock, Sub-Warden, the Hon. the Rev. A. Lyttelton, Master of Selwyn College, the Rev. F. J. Jayne, now Lord Bishop of Chester, the Rev. W. J. Richmond, since Warden of Trinity College, Glenalmond, the Rev. Aubrey L. Moore, and others.

The Guardian says:—"Such a combination of varied faculty is seldom concentrated in a single volume."

ORIENTAL MANUALS.

THE PERSIAN MANUAL. Containing a Concise Grammar, with Exercises, Useful Phrases, Dialogues, and Subjects for Translation into Persian; also a Vocabulary of Useful Words, English and Persian. By Captain H. W. CLARKE, R.E. 18mo. 7s. 6d.

A TURKISH MANUAL. Comprising a Condensed Grammar with Idiomatic Phrases, Exercises and Dialogues, and Vocabulary. By Captain C. F. MACKENZIE. Fcp. 6s.

THE ARABIC MANUAL. Comprising a Condensed Grammar of both Classical and Modern Arabic, Reading Lessons and Exercises, with Analyses and a Vocabulary of Useful Words. By Professor E. H. PALMER, M.A. Fcp. 7s. 6d.

THE HINDI MANUAL. Comprising a Grammar of the Hindi Language, both Literary and Provincial, a Complete Syntax, Exercises in various styles of Hindi Composition, Dialogues on several subjects, and a Complete Vocabulary. By FREDERIC PISCOTT, M.R.A.S., Corresponding Member of the Anjuman-i-Panjab, Editor and Annotator of the "Sakuntala in Hindi," Editor of the Urdu "Alf Salla," and Translator of the Sanskrit "Hitopadesa." Fcp. 6s.

FORBES'S HINDUSTANI MANUAL. Containing a Compendious Grammar, Exercises for Translation, Dialogues, and Vocabulary in the Roman Character. By J. T. PLATTS. New Edition, entirely Revised. 18mo. 3s. 6d.

THE PUSHTO MANUAL. Comprising a Concise Grammar, Exercises and Dialogues, Familiar Phrases, Proverbs, and Vocabulary. By Major H. G. RAVERTY. Fcp. 5s.

THE RUSSIAN MANUAL. Comprising a Condensed Grammar, Exercises with Analyses, Useful Dialogues, Reading Lessons, Tables of Coins, Weights and Measures, and a Collection of Idioms and Proverbs, alphabetically arranged. New Edition, Enlarged. By I. NESTOR SCHNURMANN. Fcp. 7s. 6d.

EGYPTIAN, SYRIAN, and NORTH-AFRICAN HANDBOOK. A Simple Phrase-Book in English and Arabic for the use of the British Forces, Civilians, and Residents in Egypt. By the Rev. ANTON TIEN, Ph.D., M.R.A.S. Fcp. price 4s.

MANUAL of COLLOQUIAL ARABIC. Comprising Practical Rules for Learning the Language, Vocabulary, Dialogues, Letters and Idioms, &c., in English and Arabic. By the Rev. ANTON TIEN, Ph.D., M.R.A.S. Fcp. 7s. 6d.

SANSKRIT MANUAL. By MONIER WILLIAMS. To which is added a Vocabulary by A. E. GOUGH. 18mo. 7s. 6d.

KEY to the EXERCISES in WILLIAMS'S SANSKRIT MANUAL. By A. E. GOUGH. 18mo. 4s.

A MANUAL of the ANDAMANESSE LANGUAGES. By M. V. PORTMAN, M.R.A.S., F.R.G.S., F.S.Sc. Fcp. 10s. 6d.

NEO-HELLENIC MANUAL. Comprising Practical Rules for Learning the Language, Vocabulary, Dialogue, Letters, Idioms, &c. In English and Neo-Hellenic. By Rev. ANTON TIEN, Ph.D., M.R.A.S. Fcp. 5s.

AID to RUSSIAN COMPOSITION. Containing Exercises, Vocabulary, Syntactical Rules, Extracts from Government Despatches, and Specimens of Russian Manuscript. By IVAN NESTOR SCHNURMANN, Author of "A Russian Manual." Fcp. 7s. 6d.

TWO NEW MANUALS.—JUST ISSUED.

THE CHINESE MANUAL. By Professor R. K. DOUGLAS. Fcp. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

A MANUAL of ANGLICISED COLLOQUIAL BURMESE. By Captain F. A. DAVIDSON. Fcp. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

THE INCE & GILBERT SERIES.

624th THOUSAND.

OUTLINES of ENGLISH HISTORY. New and Revised Edition. By ARTHUR HASSALL, Student of Christ Church, Oxford. Sewed, 1s.; cloth, price 1s. 6d.

ENGLISH HISTORY. Crown 8vo. with 4 Maps, half-bound, price 3s. 6d.

OUTLINES of BIBLE HISTORY. Sewed, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

OUTLINES of SCOTTISH HISTORY. Sewed, 1s.; cloth, price 1s. 6d.

OUTLINES of FRENCH HISTORY. New and Revised Edition. By ARTHUR HASSALL. Sewed, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

OUTLINES of ROMAN HISTORY. Sewed, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

OUTLINES of GRECIAN HISTORY. Sewed, 1s.; cloth, price 1s. 6d.

OUTLINES of GENERAL HISTORY. Sewed, 1s.; cloth, price 1s. 6d.

OUTLINES of TECHNICAL KNOWLEDGE. Sewed, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

OUTLINES of DESCRIPTIVE GEOGRAPHY. Sewed, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

NEW QUESTIONS on INCE'S OUTLINES of ENGLISH HISTORY. Sewed, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

OUTLINES of ARITHMETIC. Sewed, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d.

The KEY to the OUTLINES of ARITHMETIC, 1s.

HISTORICAL RHYMES for BOYS and GIRLS. Sewed, 6d.; cloth, 1s.

LONDON: W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 WATERLOO PLACE.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London, and Published by WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, August 10, 1889.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,764, Vol. 68.

August 17, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE MAYBRICK CASE.

IT is perhaps fortunate for Mrs. MAYBRICK that a certain Dean of St. Patrick's, whose quality of mercy was not excessively strained, and who, according to a well-known passage of his own, once "hindered a man of his pardon" because he was "a rogue and deserved hanging for something else," is not Home Secretary. Adultery since the happy days of the Commonwealth has not been a capital offence—indeed it would appear in the eyes of some Liverpool "ladies" and others to be a virtue entitling the person committing it to a reprieve for possible murder—but SWIFT was not likely to be very severe on this head. The "something else" which might in his estimate have hindered Mrs. MAYBRICK of her pardon would probably have been the intolerable and, in some cases, positively loathsome folly of her partisans. These irregular retrials of regularly tried cases always give occasion for fools; but the fools have seldom taken such advantage of it as in the present instance. In the still more famous case of thirty years ago, with which Mrs. MAYBRICK's has been chiefly compared, there was less of such folly, because the popular verdict—"popular" being here distinguished from populacier—was almost openly "Served him right." But in more recent instances there has been much less of sturdy and much more of mawkish sentiment. The defenders of the verdict—with whom we have a certain sympathy, though we cannot go their length—are not guiltless. The persons who talk about "one whose admitted misconduct makes it an iniquity almost even to mention her name" are not defenders of whom jury or judge may be proud, and there are too many of them in their own party. But the other side might almost induce the person whose life is at stake herself to say "Hang me; but stop their mouths!" The "F.R.S." who says that Sir JAMES STEPHEN was not distinguished for great judicial capacity when he was a boy at school is so pyramidal an object that he may almost dispense us from mentioning other of his company. After the Eiffel Tower, the Nelson and Duke of York Columns, with all other objects of the same kind, are naturally disappointing. But no depth of folly or height of extravagance or excess of indecency has been left unexplored by the unlucky woman's defenders. The mobs who hissed a scrupulously fair judge and a jury who, whatever else they were, were at least conscientious and courageous; the worthy peers who put it on "the marriage laws"; the doggrel rhymesters who hint, in verses of which any bellman would have been ashamed, that if Mrs. MAYBRICK is not guilty they do not wish her to be hanged, and that if she is then they wish her to be hanged still less; the "ladies" whose "floral tribute," as they would probably themselves have said, may not have expressed indifference to the Sixth Commandment, but certainly took scant notice of the Seventh—the whole idiotic pack might well drive a less misanthropic as well as, which is much to be feared, a less able person than SWIFT to some such conclusion as that at which we have hinted. And the climax may justly be put to this disgust by the holding of public meetings on the subject. Outrageous as the conduct of the Cannon Street meeting was, it behaved only after its kind. If there is one thing more than another in which a public meeting is likely to be wrong, and unlikely to be right, it is the decision of such matters as these.

And yet, as not unfrequently happens, the fools are not wholly wrong. It is unusual for a Queen's Counsel like Mr. MOULTON to erect himself into a Commissioner of Assize, and we are entirely unable to share Mr. MOULTON's childlike belief that, if you will only get scientific evidence enough and believe it with sufficiently charcoal-burning faith, you cannot go wrong. But Mr. MOULTON has, nevertheless, formulated, after a fashion, what we believe was and is the opinion on the subject of the great majority of persons who are capable of forming a judgment on evidence; a great majority which would not, perhaps, overcrowd a very large place of public assembly. And we believe that the expression of this opinion would have been much louder than it has been if it had not been for the thoroughly silly, and in part disgraceful, outcry against the jury, and still more against the judge. It is difficult to conceive a more impartial summing-up than Sir JAMES STEPHEN's, which carefully avoided pointing to either verdict, and with which it is impossible to find just fault, except that perhaps it went into the evidence somewhat too minutely. And, except those ribalds who say that the jury had made up their minds that, as Mrs. BARTLETT was acquitted, Mrs. MAYBRICK should be condemned, it is difficult to conceive any one justly blaming the jury. The easy, popular, and obvious thing to do was to bring in a verdict of Not Guilty, which would not have run counter to the Bench, and would certainly have pleased the public. The jury did the thing which was disagreeable and unpopular, and all honour to them for doing it. But it does not follow that their verdict should be upheld through thick and thin. We repeat that we believe that a great majority of the best qualified judges—taking the two great questions of the trial as being, Is it proved that Mr. MAYBRICK died of arsenic? and Is it proved that arsenic was administered to him by his wife?—would incline to answer both in the negative. And, if neither fact was proved, then it certainly is not in accordance with either the principles or the practice of English law to hang the prisoner, merely because it seems, not on direct evidence, but on certain grounds of inference and conjecture, not improbable that Mrs. MAYBRICK may have wished her husband's death, and not impossible that she may have done something to bring it about. A jurymen is not to give a verdict of Guilty because he believes the prisoner to be guilty, but because the prisoner has been proved to be guilty. A shadow of doubt, as the phrase is, must not stand in the way of the verdict. But in this case there was not a shadow, but the substance of very grave doubts, whether Mr. MAYBRICK died of arsenic at all, backed up by at least considerable suspicions that, if he did, it may not have been arsenic of Mrs. MAYBRICK's administering. If doubt of this sort is not to be admitted, we had better hang everybody who is not, as the common and generally absurd phrase goes, "proved to be innocent."

The debate has revived, even in the placid atmosphere of the House of Lords, the cry for a Court of Criminal Appeal—a cry which, if mere à priori reasons were listened to, would be irresistible. It is, of course, on the face of it utterly absurd that the one irreversible punishment of the law should also be the one the sentence of which admits of no regular review, and is virtually passed by persons whose one qualification is like that of the judges in the novel, that they know nothing of the matter in hand. Yet it is to be observed that even in other cases the decision of a jury as to a matter of fact is seldom reversed; that the exact constitution of the Court of Appeal, its procedure, and the question whether acquittals as well as condemnations should be reversible, are rather thorny matters; that it is by no means certain that the same rush of popular gabble would not follow the revised as it now follows the original verdict, and that the present exercise of the QUEEN's prerogative through the Home Secretary does, as a matter of fact, provide what is wanted. The worst of it is, of course, that it is provided in the most ludicrously illogical of manners. The Crown "pardons" a crime when the argument for pardon is wholly and solely that the crime has never been committed; it commutes into a sentence less shocking and alarming, but probably worse than death, the punishment for a crime in regard to which the law knows no punishment except death, not because it is shown that a minor crime has or may have been committed, but because there is some more or less considerable doubt whether any crime has been committed at all. A more absurd proceeding, on the face of it, cannot be conceived. And yet there is every reason to believe that it does, on the whole, substantial justice. At least we cannot remember any recent instance in which any obvious injustice has been done, either by "letting off" or by enforcing the sentence, except such as is implied in the formal absurdities just commented upon. Whether we shall be able to say as much after the decision of the present case depends upon Mr. MATTHEWS.

THE SENTENCE ON THE GENERAL.

THE very lengthy speech in which M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE emptied the bag of all the charges which could be collected against General BOULANGER will probably be little read even in France in its complete form, and will certainly not be read in England at all. It fills no less than three sheets of four pages of about the size of the Observer, and on each page there are six columns. The print is not large. This is a serious piece of reading to take in hand. Yet whoever wishes to understand French legal methods, politics, and character might do worse than make a careful study of the eloquence of the Procureur-Général. There is one passage which merits quotation at full if space allowed. It is that in which M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE, struggling with emotion, informed the High Court that, moved by a painful sense of duty, he would unmask M. HENRI ROCHEFORT, though at a terrible cost; for what he had to say was of such a nature that it would close his mouth with disgust. After this the pallid Procurator read a quotation from a leading article, in which M. HENRI ROCHEFORT, with more truth than tact, remarked that, though the German armies plundered a good deal when in France, yet the French armies had behaved quite as badly, or even worse, in their time. This horrible insult to the army did M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE hold up to universal reprobation before dropping it into that abyss to which his withering invective was consigning M. ROCHEFORT. In truth, there is a great deal of this bathos in the Procurator-General's speech, and with it much vague statement, much repetition of what that eminently respectable man A thought B must mean, much mere guesswork, much inconclusive chatter. But it must be remembered that the whole level of French eloquence has sunk within the last generation, and that French law courts are in the habit of receiving a great deal which would not be thought evidence at all in this country. An address may be effective, in spite of what we should think its faults, and this one is really in a way convincing. Like so many of the equally illogical and much more violent harangues of Mr. ATTORNEY-GENERAL or Mr. PRIME SERJEANT in our own State trials of the sixteenth or seventeenth century, it leaves the impression that the speaker, in spite of faults of manner and intellectual clumsiness, is right in the main point.

The difference between the positions of M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE and of COKE or FINCH is, however, very considerable. When the Crown lawyers had convinced the jury that RALEIGH had really been playing with schemes for putting the King under duress, they had convicted him of a definite crime. There might be and were men who thought the sentence unjust, but no one differed from the Crown lawyers as to the nature of the offence if committed. It was treason beyond all question, and the verdict, however obtained, entailed certain known consequences which could only be removed by the pardon of the King. The position of M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE before the High Court is very different as far as the charge of felonious attempt to alter the form of government is concerned. We may put aside all that large part of his speech which is devoted to proving that the General is surrounded by bad company. All that was known long ago, and did not prevent the Conservatives from forming an alliance with him, or discontented Republicans from voting for him. The charge of fraud in money matters would, if proved, be ruinous; but it has yet to go before a jury. As for that part of the charge of fraud which the High Court did decide on, it only amounts to this—that the General used public money for political purposes of which his political opponents disapproved. As the attack on the General has been conducted, it was necessary for M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE to prove that General BOULANGER had been guilty of a distinct attempt to seize power by violence. It was not enough for him to prove that the Boulangists proposed to alter the form of government, as long as he could not prove that they meant to do it by other means than votes. Unfortunately for the Procurator-General, what he has done has been to show conclusively what everybody knew already—namely, that M. BOULANGER wishes to alter the form of government. What he has failed to do is to show any serious reason for believing that an attempt was made to upset the existing Government by force at the General's instigation. The mere attempt to alter the form of government by persuasion is not in itself treason under a Government based on universal suffrage. If it were, the Senate might as well proceed at once, not only against the Conservative leaders, but against all those members of the Chamber of Deputies who are in favour of Revision. A Monarchy which claims to be of divine right may logically punish even a peaceful enemy as a traitor; but a Republic based on universal suffrage cannot without absurdity make it treason to appeal to the power from which it derives its own authority. It cannot recuse its judge as suspected, for to what higher Court is it to appeal? M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE obviously felt the difficulty of his position, and tried to escape from it in different ways. He laboured hard to prove that the General was guilty of an actual attempt at revolt in the Gare de Lyons because he did not clear the station himself of the excited mob which nearly squeezed him to death. Then he made strenuous attempts to prove that there had been attempts to debauch the soldiers. After all, however, he clearly felt that the railway-station scene and the popularity-hunting of the General were not enough, and he boldly proceeded to sweep his difficulties out of the way by means of a definition of the word "attentat" which may be commended to universal attention. Our fathers, said M. DE BEAUREPAIRE, in their rough way, used to upset an omnibus at the street corner, and tear the pavement up. These simple methods are antiquated. Now, when criminal ambition leads a political adventurer to attack the Government, he goes about making abusive speeches, and telling lies. By these means he persuades many to follow him, and it would be folly on our part to let him escape simply because he does not go so far as the more straightforward insurgents of 1849 did. The animus is there; let us punish it. It is an ingenious view; but, on the whole, more becoming to M. JULES DE GLOUVET, the author of Le Forestier, than to M. QUESNAY DE BEAUREPAIRE, the Procurator-General. Time was when it would have done very well. That majestic lord King HENRY VIII. would have seen that here also was a man who had the right sow by the ear; but whether it will serve the turn now is another question. The majestic lord to whom the Senate is, in the long run, responsible may prefer to decide for himself.

For the moment the Senate has played HENRY VIII. very well. It has condemned the General and his accomplices. Now it remains to be seen what weight that condemnation will carry in the country. The vote is a strictly party vote. If it turns out that the majority of the country is really heartily sick of the Third Republic, if the Boulangists and Conservatives together contrive to carry a majority of seats at the coming general election, it will be a mere flourish in the air. It is not at all necessary that the General should sweep the country in order to make the condemnation a form. As we have pointed out before, if he and the Conservatives together can carry only a bare majority of seats, the Third Republic goes to pieces. If these two and the Radicals come back with a majority in favour of Revision, everything is in the melting-pot again. Who knows what will come out of the welter? If we are to judge on ordinary principles, we should conclude that the trial will have a considerable effect on the election. On the whole, the General cuts a very miserable figure. It is impossible to read the réquisitoire without feeling that, if he ran, it was not only because he found it convenient to keep out of prison, but because he dared not face cross-examination as to his connexion with such persons as M. BURET and Mme. POURPRE. Beyond all doubt he has done shabby things in the company of ignoble people. It is further tolerably well proved that he spent the Reserve and Secret Service funds at the War Office in ways which he would find it difficult to justify. There is nothing in all this which will be quite new to those who have watched the General's career; but it has never been equally well collected before or so effectively paraded. If there is any regard for the national dignity, such a man as this ought to have no chance. Against this, however, must be set three considerations. First, that, if there were a keen sense of the national dignity in France at this moment, neither the General nor a good many other persons would ever have been heard of. Secondly, that the peasantry, as M. JULES DE GLOUVET well knows, are a race on whose conduct it is not safe to count. Thirdly, that, unfortunately, with the exception of the colourless Moderate Republicans, headed by M. LÉON SAY, the defenders of the Republic are either intensely unpopular like M. FERRY, or have become insignificant like M. CLÉMENTEAU, or are nonentities like so many, or are tarred with the same brush as the General. It will not be the most surprising thing in General BOULANGER's career if he does come to the top after all in this ferment of little men and mean quarrels.

THE FLEET SWANNERY.

THE decision of Mr. Justice KEKEWICH, in the case of the Earl of ILCHESTER v. RASHLEIGH and others, is understood to be final, as the order was partly settled by consent, and costs were not demanded. Otherwise it would be rash to regard the judgment as irreversible, both on general grounds and because there was undeniably an element of doubt in this particular question. But, without blaming the fishermen for asserting what they believed and were advised to be their legal rights, one may express satisfaction at a result which preserves a very curious and interesting rarity without causing any serious public inconvenience. The piece of water called the Fleet adjoins Portland Road, and is separated from the English Channel by Chesil Beach. Lord ILCHESTER claims ownership of this "land covered by water," and he values it because, time out of mind, a game of swans has built, nested, and bred there. Those who have represented this action as raising the pretence of a rich man to set his private luxuries above the general interest may be invited to consider, if, indeed, they know, that Lord ILCHESTER's swannery is about the only one in England worth mentioning, and that nobody would be benefited by the disappearance from the country of a bird which used to be much more common here than it is now. There are swans on the Thames and elsewhere, and there is a swan-pit at Norwich for fattening cygnets; but swan-breeding on the royal old scale has ceased. It was not Lord ILCHESTER's contention, nor could it have been sustained, that fishermen or the community at large are excluded altogether from the Fleet. The plaintiff's possession of the soil only enabled him to sue, and the defendants might have proved such qualifications as would have reduced his claim to a practical nullity. Every bit of land not formally dedicated to the public belongs to somebody; but the formal title of adjoining proprietors to the foundation of a high road is, so far as they are concerned, a barren technicality. What Lord ILCHESTER submitted, and what Mr. Justice KEKEWICH has decided, is that fishermen and others must communicate with Portland Road through Portland Passage, and not trespass in other parts of the Fleet. The well-known undergraduate of St. John's who desired to feed upon swans was told they were kept for the dons. Lord ILCHESTER not unnaturally complained of persons who "came up the Fleet in boats, shot off guns, and made loud and violent noises," apparently relying on the dictum of COWPER, J., that a noisy man is always in the right.

In this instance, however, the noisy men have been declared in the wrong, and restrained from trespassing on Chesil Beach, in the immediate neighbourhood of Abbotsbury. The injunction is really in favour of the swans, who might otherwise have been compelled to seek a warmer climate and a less democratic constitution. Mr. Justice KEKEWICH, with that irresistible tendency to autobiography which characterizes the modern race of English judges, introduced into his "learned and elaborate" judgment a picturesque account of his own pursuits. "With such industry and zeal," he says, "as the opportunities at my disposal and the season of the year permitted, I have angled in all these waters, and in some others which, though not specified by counsel, were probably in their minds." It will soon be possible for an enterprising editor to produce a small volume of judicial confessions and disclosures. One judge, as the civilized world now knows, was once acquainted with a dog which died of arsenical poisoning. Another judge went to Mabilly when that edifying institution was still in existence. Yet another is able to say offhand which reredos in which cathedral tempts the beholder most strongly to commit the sin of idolatry. It is recorded of a worthy Vice-Chancellor, now alas no more, that he interrupted counsel in the course of a narrative with the pensive exclamation, "Devonshire? 1845? Ah, I was in Devonshire that year. If your client had consulted me, this deplorable litigation would have been avoided." But Mr. Justice KEKEWICH is epigrammatic as well as autobiographical. "Like the inhabitants of Chickerell and the neighbouring villages," he observes in his incisive style, "I have, as regards many of them, been only more or less a fisherman, but like them also my occupation has not been without profit." Chickerell and the neighbouring villages are only less fortunate than the Chancery Division of the High Court. The substance of the decision, as distinguished from its picturesque embroidery, is simple enough. The right of the public to fish and navigate in the open sea, being paramount to the right of the Crown, must be also paramount to Lord ILCHESTER's, which is derived from the Crown. But the right of the public does not extend to places only occasionally covered by water, and therefore does not comprise Chesil Beach. "Navigable" water means not water which may be navigated in the lightest possible boats, but water where the tide ebbs and flows. So Lord ILCHESTER's swannery has been saved, and the local fishermen must catch fish instead of frightening swans.

THE TITHES BILL.

ALTHOUGH the wild howls of jubilation which have been uttered over the Government change of front in regard to the Tithes Bill on Wednesday are only part of a system on which we shall comment presently, Ministers cannot be congratulated on their tactics, and the presentiment of blunder which was caused by this late and partial measure has been amply justified. It is true that the proposal which the ATTORNEY-GENERAL announced on Wednesday, with a want of tact which unfortunately has more than once or twice distinguished Sir RICHARD WEBSTER's political proceedings, is identical with a measure which this very Government brought forward two years ago. It is also true that it is so far from being identical with anything moved or argued for by the Opposition that the only amendment at all falling in with it came from the Conservative ranks. It is known to be acceptable to those members who are informally charged with the interests of the tithe-receivers and the Church on this occasion; and it was in itself formally approved by Sir WALTER BARTTELOT, out of whose rebuke to the Government so much capital has been made; while it is notorious that the Nonconformists and their tools dislike it quite as much as the original proposition of the Bill. All this is quite true. And it is further true that the proposal itself is a step in the right direction. Half the dust which has been thrown in the eyes of persons better intentioned than intelligenced by the political agitators of the sects on this question has come from the continual forgetfulness of what tithe really is. It is a grant by the landowner, in effect, of a tenth of his land, in the form, not of the land itself, but of its yearly produce. The successive variations which have been introduced by custom and law in this sufficiently simple arrangement have altered the relation of the one-tenth to the other nine-tenths, and the commutation of the tithe-pig and the tenth sheaf into money has naturally made the occupier, and not the owner, the apparent channel of payment. It would be better, no doubt, that the real owner had what he owns in fee-simple rather than in the troublesome and misleading form of a complicated rent-charge payable by one person through another. But, short of this, the new, or rather old, proposal for giving the tithe-owner better means of getting his own is well enough. The inexcusable thing in the conduct of the Government is the uncertainty and vacillation of it, not the result to which it has come. It would have been in any case, and even in the earliest part of the Session, a mistake to chop and change in this fashion. But when, at the very eleventh hour, the sittings of the House have been prolonged unexpectedly on purpose to carry a particular measure, it certainly has the air either of very great levity or of very great want of foresight to introduce such changes in such a manner and at such a moment.

Still those comfortable optimists who hold that there is good in everything may point to the debates on the Tithes Bill as evidence of the wisdom of their position. When those debates began there was little good expected of them by either side—even the best wishers to the Church and the Government being of opinion that the measure was one of those half-loaves which are not better than no bread. So far as the Government is concerned these forebodings have been more than confirmed. The discussion, however, has set another matter beyond all doubt, and that is the hopeless bad faith of the opponents of the Bill. At every moment they have shifted their ground in a manner which may be justly called the prevarication of debate. They began by exclaiming against the discreditable conduct of a rich Church in allowing her ministers to starve and in coming on the poor agriculturist for their support. Even Gladstonian Radicals might perceive that, if you take away the income of a Church, or anything else, it can hardly be called “rich,” and that tithes happen to be the main source of the Church’s riches. But this is nothing to what has followed. We shall not be expected to enter into Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT’S comparison of the wickedness of Oxford and the goodness of Cambridge colleges respectively regarded as managers of property. That matter must be fought out by armed bursars from each University. But, unless we very greatly mistake, there are Cambridge colleges, neither few nor unimportant, which are very largely interested in tithe, and they will hardly thank Sir WILLIAM for his attempts to put tithe-owners, who are not actually dischargers of clerical duty on the spot, out of the benefits of the Bill. But this particular squabble about the lay impropiators illustrates most excellently what has been said above as to the absence of good faith in the opposition to the Bill. We have nothing to do here with the moral question as to such impropriation, which may be as nearly equivalent to impropriety as some persons are said to hold. But it is sufficiently clear that the position of the Government, as of all persons who care to consider things honestly according to facts and history, is that tithes are not wages, not taxes, but property. And it must be further clear that the question To whom does this individual piece of property belong? has nothing to do with the question Are the rights necessary to the enjoyment of this kind of property capable of being exercised as they should be? It would be exceedingly convenient, no doubt, to the hungry claimants who are snapping and growling round the tithe if a legislative distinction of this sort were set up between tithe payable to incumbents and tithe payable to lay impropiators and corporations. But it would be folly on the part of the Government to allow such a distinction, and it is dishonesty in the Opposition to ask for it on false pretences. And now, last of all, when the farmer (the honest farmer we mean, not the dishonest one) has practically obtained what he has been crying for, and the landowner has been treated in a manner which even so typical a landowner as Sir WALTER BARTHELOT acknowledges to be equitable, the Government is accused of betraying the landlords. There is evidently no pleasing critics of this kind—critics, the least disingenuous of whom frankly admit that they wish tithes to stay as they are in order to make the Church more unpopular.

On the other hand, uncomfortable as the position of the Government is, especially after the revolution of Wednesday, and doubtfully as it is entitled to the prize of wisdom, it may, at any rate, fairly claim that of honesty. Ministers are fighting for the rights of those whose political power is now small against the wishes of a considerable number of their own adherents, and with the certainty of small thanks from any one. On the other hand, the Opposition is unblushingly and almost avowedly fighting for no purpose but to curry favour with the political Nonconformists, not perhaps without an additional hope of playing the CODLIN-and-SHORT game with Tory farmers and landowners. It appears to be as yet uncertain what amount of genuineness there is in the remarks alleged to have been translated from the newspaper directed by the notorious Mr. GEE, in which that person, protected by the obscurity of an unlearned language, appears to have declined to recommend a royal address to the QUEEN, and to have suggested that HER MAJESTY may think herself lucky if she is not hooted in Wales. Mr. RAIKES has denied the authorship of the very unwise opening given or asserted to be given to GEE. We do not observe that GEE has denied his loyal and dutiful answer; on the contrary, he seems to have repeated it. It is said, and it is to be hoped that it is true, that he has disgusted the more respectable Welsh Nonconformists who have declined to be hectorated out of loyalty and decency. Unluckily there is little reason to believe that he had these in his mind. The ignorant and the fanatical are the persons at whom writing of this kind is aimed, and if it hits them, the intelligent minority can well be spared from the sportsman’s game-bag. There is, however, some faint hope that conduct of this kind will provoke a reaction. As it is, it illustrates the extreme political inconvenience of the maintenance of dialect newspapers, unless the mischievous part of the press is counterbalanced by a well-disposed part. Irish newspapers of the seditious kind have done harm enough, but they would have done ten times more harm if anything similar to the Welsh vernacular press had existed—and if there were any considerable number of Irishmen who could read it. And it may be feared that, after all, the Baner represents only too truly the spirit which English members of Parliament are now taking under their protection, and the only excuse for which is that some Welsh farmers have been inconvenienced in trying to detain for their own use money entrusted to them for conveyance to the tithe-owner.

THE COUNTY COUNCIL ON ITS DIGNITY.

THE temper of the London County Council and the measure of its discretion are again illustrated in a large, unlovely way. It is the 9th of June, or thereabouts. Persuaded by certain reports of a trustworthy kind, the Privy Council resolves to issue an order to the local authorities in their various districts that “all dogs affected with, or suspected of, rabies” shall be killed; that no unmuzzled dog shall be allowed to roam in public places; and that stray dogs, and dogs unmuzzled, shall be seized and kept in detention. Behold the London County Council in receipt of this lawful order, and eager to discover in it some slight on their own authority, or some means of asserting themselves against every other. Promptly sought, soon found. If there is one thing more than another upon which the Council has set its heart, that thing is sole command of the Metropolitan Police; and the order from the Agricultural Department seemed to afford a splendid opportunity of furthering the desire, as well as of striking the attitude of AJAX before “their Lordships” in Whitehall. The Clerk of the Council is instructed to tell their Lordships that their order cannot be carried out. The Council “decline to assume responsibility which they are absolutely powerless to fulfil.” “Their case is simple enough.” It is impossible to obey the order without control of the police force. The Government chooses to deny to the Council command of that force. Lord ROSEBURY’S colleagues have no officers at their disposal who could carry out the order, and do not propose to seek for any. “To engage for this temporary purpose an army of men adept in dealing with these cases, and able efficiently to cope with the whole area of London, would not merely be impracticable, but would involve an enormous expense”; and the Council are not justified in burdening the ratepayers with such an outlay, “when there is already in existence a body of men who have had experience of these duties, and can readily carry them out again.” In short, the Council’s remonstrance comes to this:—Hand over to us the control of the police, and then we will see what we can do. If, through a continuance of perversity, that cannot be done, send your order to the HOME SECRETARY; we will have nothing to do with it. The answer of the Privy Council is that Parliament has imposed on the local authority (in this case the London County Council) the duty of carrying out the Rabies order; while, as for the means of execution, as for the necessity of employing the police, there can be no difficulty about that. “Their Lordships believe that the London County Council will find the Metropolitan Police ready to co-operate in enforcing and executing the order,” as they have always been on precisely similar occasions. No doubt their Lordships imagined that, after this pregnant intimation, there would be an end of the matter. But, if so, they little knew the haughty spirit of the Body they addressed. The Council proudly answers that it is not going to bemean itself by approaching a force over which it has no control with suggestions that may be rejected and requests that may be refused. “Suppose the Police Commissioner declined or neglected to enforce the proposals of the Council, what could the Council do?” How would that august assembly stand then? Who can expect it to run the risk of “landing itself in a position so “helpless and undignified”? No. “The Council can only reiterate with regret their strong sense of the impropriety of their offering suggestions to the police on this subject; for that is all they can do in a case where they have no authority either of supervision or control.”

The rest of the story is soon told. Their Lordships curtly declare that, if the London County Council are not willing to discharge the statutory duties imposed on them, measures will be taken to carry out the order at the Council's expense. Their municipal Highnesses reply that they have nothing to add to their previous epistles, which communicate “the settled judgment of the Council.” In fine, the Whitehall authorities, acting upon statutory instructions provided for such contingencies, quietly take the matter out of the hands of these preposterous City Fathers, hand it over to a certain Major TENNANT, and the London County Council will have to pay the bill. At any rate, they have to pay it in the regular order of things, as marked out by Parliamentary decree. But we see what sort of thing “the settled judgment” of the Council is. Being such a judgment as vixenish women are cursed with, there is no knowing what may happen should it become unsettled by the cool decision of the Privy Council; but it is quite on the cards that this other affront, and the obvious craving to bring the police question to a crisis, may resolve the London board of Radical enragés to refuse payment. It is to be observed that, as matters stand, the last word is not with them; and they cannot be expected to put up with that very willingly. Already we read in the columns of a sympathetic newspaper that “the appointment of Major TENNANT is a declaration of war”; though to the eyes of orderly people it seems nothing but a peaceful, effectual means of carrying out a duty to the public which the London Council have obstructed too long, while they acknowledge it an urgent duty. Too peaceful a means the Council may think it; too manifest a demonstration of the absurdity on which they based their simulated fears of a ridiculous outraged dignity. Of course Major TENNANT has no more difficulty in engaging the services of the police than the Council would have found if they had made a claim upon them in the usual course. But that is just what they would not do. They wouldn't do it; and they have told us why in the plainest terms. It would have hurt their dignity, it would have lowered their pride, to prefer a request even of the most formal kind to an authority which they feel they have a divine right to “boss” altogether. According to the natural fitness of things the nigger in Scotland Yard is their nigger; and it will not do to acknowledge his independence of their control by asking the favour of his assistance. That is the motive of the worse than childish petulance which the London County Council evidently mistake for settled judgment of the old Roman cast. It is disgraceful to them; but though it has delayed the working of a most useful and even necessary order for weeks and weeks, it will profit us in the long run. Control of the police? Command of a semi-military force fourteen thousand strong in the heart of the kingdom? This to be conferred on a knot of men who have no more control over themselves when they are excited, or when their “dignity” is touched, than the typical angry woman? It is not to be done; as even they must see who have so far clung to the belief that, after a little while, the responsibilities of office would reduce our Radical London Council to sober thinking and steady conduct. That is not the way with the kind of aspirants who form the majority of the Council. No such consequences of official responsibility are to be expected in their case, and none will ever follow.

CRETE.

THE EMPERORS, German and Austrian, have had but few political matters to disturb their amusements of reviewing and banqueting this week. The anniversary of Prince FERDINAND's accession to the Bulgarian throne (or princestool, as some persons would perhaps prefer to call it) has passed off without any such foolish act as was apprehended; the partisans of the Armenians are still unable to produce any positive evidence of Armenian wrongs, and Crete is almost the only focus of trouble for the moment. Even there things have a little improved. SHAKIR Pasha seems to be losing no time, though a great deal of time has been lost in sending SHAKIR Pasha. It is reported, and may very well be believed, that at least the majority of the Powers have decidedly snubbed M. TRICOUPI's Note on the Greek-Cretan question; while it would appear to be certain that the Porte has had no difficulty in contradicting and confuting such allegations in that Note as were of importance. It did not need reporting to assure us that the pretensions of Greece have aroused claims for compensation in the other States of the Balkan Peninsula, or that the Continental Powers who do not wish to see trouble have been convinced by this of the necessity of supporting Turkey as far as possible. What is least certain in the matter is the precise attitude which has been assumed by the two Powers—France and Russia—which, if they do not distinctly wish for war (and it is pretty certain that one of them at least does not), have chosen to set themselves in a vague kind of way against the Powers that wish for peace. No statesman who does not desire a fresh and general fight can desire a new curée of the Turkish Empire, and this of itself would incline the majority of European Governments to turn a deaf ear to M. TRICOUPI. Much allowance, indeed, is, and ought to be, made for that politician. It is not forgotten how but a year or two since the reckless folly of his principal rival brought the Eastern question nearer to a fresh blaze than it has been since the war of twelve years ago, and it is at least believed that this same person is not beyond the reach of Russian and French influence. France, in particular, has long maintained very curious relations with Greece, and on the occasion referred to was the only European Power which declined to help in keeping the Greeks in order. The relations of the CZAR with the diminutive kingdom which has the assurance to contest the Sick Man's chief inheritance with him are more dubious; but the Russian Consul in Crete is the only representative of a European Power—not excepting the Greek Consul himself—who is accused of having played the part of firebrand.

It is not to be wondered at that some impatience has been expressed at the slowness of the Porte to act. The Western and Northern Powers have, no doubt, demoralized Turkish sovereigns and statesmen as much by their help as by their refusal to help, and have in particular aggravated that fatal tendency to trust to the chapter of accidents which is the bane of all Oriental Governments that are not on the growing hand. The incomprehensible but ascertained fancy for trusting to avowed enemies, turn and turn with friends, may also come in. But the SULTAN or his advisers certainly have incurred a very heavy responsibility in delaying, as they have done, attempts to keep order in Crete. It seems certain that at first they had a considerable number of Christian as well as Mussulman inhabitants on their side, and the most elementary diplomacy can work such a situation to advantage with the aid of a very little energy. Whether arms have been distributed (which seems to be contested) to the Mussulmans or not, it seems to be certain that the beginnings of violence were made on them, not by them. Although the Turkish navy is apparently in so bad a state that no proper blockade can be maintained, the SULTAN has plenty of troops and quite enough ships to transport them. But little or nothing seems to have been done, and time has been given to the agitators to manufacture “atrocities,” to the two Christian parties to coalesce, to Greece to put herself forward in a position where it was perfectly easy for the Porte itself to forestall her. It is wicked to beat or starve lame dogs; it is at least not Christian to refuse to help them over stiles; but they really might be expected not to sit on their tails while the stiles in front of them are being built higher and higher.

THE USE OF GRAND COMMITTEES.

THE little quarrel which has arisen between Mr. STOREY and his friends of one part, and the Chairman of the Grand Committee on Trade of the other, illustrates very neatly a criticism we have made before on those aids to the dispatch of work by the House of Commons. As to the merits of the dispute considered in themselves, there is no need to discuss them at length. We know approximately what amount of love Mr. STOREY and his friends bear the Light Railways (Ireland) Bill, or the Government which brought it in. By no stretch of charity can we suppose that they meant them any good by their amendment. So much may be allowed, and yet it may remain true that their amendment was a perfectly fair one, and such as a sincere opponent might reasonably propose. The SPEAKER when appealed to thought it was, and we really do not think there will be many found to differ from him. To propose that money granted under a Bill shall be disbursed in a certain way, and subject to definite restrictions, is surely within the limits of what is permissible in Committee of the whole House. To afford opportunity for making just such amendments as this is one of the purposes for which Committee of the whole House sits. But a Grand Committee is supposed to be the equivalent to Committee of the whole House, and therefore what is permissible in one is surely allowable in the other. The Chairman of the Grand Committee on Trade would seem, therefore, to have been mistaken when he ruled the amendment of the minority out of order. It is not to be wondered at if the minority, being in an intelligible, human way anxious to harass the enemy, have withdrawn from the Committee, and await their chance to play the majority a return match when the Bill is reported to the House.

The striking figure of Mr. STOREY waiting in the House for his innings in dignified expectancy serves, we think, to call attention to the moral of the whole story, which is just this—that the Grand Committees are of very dubious value as labour-saving machines. When they were first proposed as means of lightening the work of the House, reasons for doubting their efficacy were pointed out. It was said that they were at least as likely to lead to the discussion of everything twice over as to any saving of time. No Grand Committee or other subsection of the House can shorten debate unless its own decisions are to be final. But, from the nature of the case, it is impossible that the decisions of the Grand Committees can be final. The House cannot part with its own ultimate authority. So there is always a possibility that what a majority of the Committee has accepted, a majority of the whole House may be at least asked to discuss again—in other words, the point may be argued twice instead of once. The manner in which this can be done is so obvious that it hardly leaves any room for doubt; but, if an explanation was needed, it has been fully given by the SPEAKER. “The remedy” (for the troubles of Mr. STOREY) “is that, when the Bill ‘comes back to this House from the Standing Committee ‘on Report, it will be competent for the hon. gentleman ‘and those who are with him—or, indeed, for any hon. ‘gentleman—to move such amendments as they think fit, ‘and indeed he can move the particular amendment to ‘which reference has been made.’” In other words, the fight may be fought out, and in spite of the Chairman of the Committee, which is precisely what was predicted. When, as in this case, the Chairman sticks to his guns, and asserts his right to act as captain of his own ship, let the SPEAKER say what he may, a conflict is only the more certain. It is true that where the business is not highly contentious, when all hon. gentlemen are very anxious to promote business, when the House is quite prepared to abide by the decision of the Grand Committee, and the Grand Committee contains no members anxious to have it out again in the House—then the system of devolution may do very well. But what hope is there that this idyllic condition will be reached by an ordinary fallible House of Commons? Moreover, when the House of Commons is so virtuous as this, it could perfectly well contrive to get its work through before the 12th of August without having recourse to devolution. Therefore the Grand Committee seems at its best to be a needless piece of machinery, and at its worst an obstruction.

EGYPT.

THE conversation which took place in the House of Lords on Monday in reference to Egypt was a very interesting conversation, and came as near to being an important one as such things can do. At present (a present which has lasted for many years past) we look almost anywhere rather than to the Houses of Parliament for enlightenment on questions of foreign policy. In the House of Commons all serious treatment of the subject is rendered impossible by the knowledge that Mr. STOREY, or Mr. ABRAHAM, or Sir WILFRID LAWSON, or Mr. PICTON, or somebody else who knows as much about foreign policy as Mr. COBDEN did about the bibliography of THUCYDIDES, may, and probably will, turn the discussion into a farce. In the House of Lords there is no such danger; but the circumstances of that House tend rather to “conversations” than to serious debates, and conversations have their drawbacks. It was rather wicked of Lord SALISBURY to misunderstand Lord CARNARVON as having suggested repudiation as a cure for Egyptian ills; but an official exponent in these irregular discussions is always somewhat tempted to treat things lightly, and it is notorious that Lord CARNARVON, with all his undoubted ability, his more undoubted experience, and his most undoubted good intentions, exhibits a special form of the cross-bench mind which provokes an unholy desire to trip him up. The absence of strict practicality which distinguishes that noble Earl could hardly have been better illustrated than by the sermon which he chose to preach on a most promising text—the recent overthrow of WAD-EL-NJUMI. It was an excellent opportunity for pressing home the special consideration of the folly, and indeed iniquity, of wasting the forces of England and of Egypt on continual and futile prevention, instead of employing them on radical cure. But Lord CARNARVON did not do this. He ranged from justice to finances, from the seasoning of British troops to the cultivation of sentiments of independence in the fellaheen, and from the doctrine of a general European condominium to the problem of the present status and duration of the English authority in Egypt. A Government spokesman, even if he were less keen to cut into undefended places than Lord SALISBURY is, would be more or less than human if he neglected to avail himself of this desultoriness. Perhaps the most really important utterance of the discussion was Lord HERSCHELL's weighty and impartial testimony as to the improvement during the last two or three years (in which Lord HERSCHELL's party have been out of office) in the judicial system of the country.

Lord SALISBURY's own reply, that he had but succeeded to the limitations imposed on England by Mr. GLADSTONE, was quite final as far as it went, and the formal weakness of Lord CARNARVON's interpellation invited it. But there are times when it is not quite sufficient to “play the game,” and perhaps this is one of them. No pledge given to any foreign nation bars England from advising Egypt or from helping Egypt to take the only possible steps to check “Dervish” incursions, or to restore the trade of the interior. It may be quite true that when you spend half your income in paying the interest on your debt things are not well; but it is pretty certain that there are financiers at Lord SALISBURY's command who can devise methods of employing an Egyptian surplus which all the dog-in-the-mangerism of France cannot defeat. And, last of all, inviting as Lord CARNARVON's fourthlys and fifthlys may have been, the PRIME MINISTER knows perfectly well that it is not necessary to declare our relations to Egypt “those of a conquering country to a “conquered” in order to do all that is necessary. The sanctity of the obligations of England—a thing which we all revere—need not be outraged, if outrage there would be, in this way; and that sanctity does not require the, to Egypt decidedly damaging, and to England not in the least, necessary reiteration of the fact that we shall go some day or other. Perhaps we shall. But that day will be one of three other days—the day of the coming of the Coquecigrues, the day of the overthrow of this country in a great European fight, or the day of the accession to power in England of some one more ignorant of, or more indifferent to, his country's welfare than the negotiators of the Treaty of Dover, the surrenderers of Manilla and Havana, or even the acceptors of the Transvaal Convention.

THE BRITISH MEDICAL ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of the British Medical Association, which opened at Leeds on Tuesday, under the presidency of Mr. C. G. WHEELHOUSE, is the first of the larger scientific Congresses that herald the autumnal season. The Association may claim also another and more notable priority for their Congress. They differ from other bodies in one important particular, though in the general features of their meeting they follow the common rule. They have their speakers and their sections, like the British Association, but their sections are composed exclusively of members, and these are all qualified practitioners in medicine or surgery. They speak, in fact, as professional men to professional men. The irresponsible or amateur element is absent from their audience, yet they do not disdain to mitigate the severity of their congregation as professional men by the agreeable relaxation that dinners, picnics, or excursions afford. They invariably present an imposing and influential array, and theirs is the distinction of getting through the business of the day in businesslike style, and of having something to say that is of public interest. Mr. WHEELHOUSE's opening address on Tuesday was to a certain extent retrospective, and in scope comprehensive, being, of course, independent of the specialized subjects allotted to the heads of the various sections of the Congress. Dealing with the progress of medical science, the President illustrated his theme very effectively by contrasting its past and present. Taking the century as the field of survey, Mr. WHEELHOUSE depicted the old practitioner and the new, their practice and equipment, their education and the qualifications demanded by examiners. On the whole, his too suggestive survey ought to make the patient of to-day deeply grateful that he was not subjected to the medical practice of old. The average general practitioner of ninety years ago, as sketched by Mr. WHEELHOUSE, was not without his good points. He was usually industrious, hard-thinking, skilful in treating disease. But his knowledge and practice were alike empirical. It was "kill or cure" with him. To let blood was his great panacea for all the ills of flesh. He went about on horseback a good deal, always armed with the "all-potent lancet," and, though "a regular" in those days, would now be looked upon as nothing but a free-lancer. As a physician, the doctor of the period drugged his patient on compulsion. His charges for attendance were so small that he had to find remuneration in a generous supply of pills, powders, and potions. Too often, perhaps, he must have been literally

Stored with deleterious medicines
Which whosoever took is dead since.

He was a man of robust faith and many remedies. The cleverest doctor was, to quote the President's epigrammatic language, the man "who possessed the greatest number of formulæ for the greatest number of complaints." As a surgeon he is pictured as "further behind the practitioners of to-day than he was as a physician." But in that he was compelled to rely on the skill of others, as Mr. WHEELHOUSE observed, it is difficult to see that he differed from hundreds of good practitioners of the present day. If the local doctors were wont to refer important surgical cases to the famous WILLIAM HEY of Leeds, it would appear that, in one respect at least, the practice of the past was like that of the present. But it was on the subject of education that the President offered the most striking and suggestive evidence of the old order and the new. Fifty years ago the young aspirant in medicine served a rough-and-ready apprenticeship. He might be "almost devoid of education," and his tastes such as Mr. ROBERT SAWYER would have approved. He was subjected to an examination which the students of to-day would consider extremely mild. "Once and for all" he had to bring his information to the Royal College of Surgeons and the Apothecaries' Society—"the College of Physicians took no notice of him"—and he was not required to show that he was as well qualified as his examiners "in all the subtleties of elaborate practice." His three years' experience in the hospital generally sufficed to qualify him for the intelligent charge of the public health, and once "passed" he was no more worried by tests. Under the present system all is changed. The five years of apprenticeship, that "homely and infinitely useful form of preparation," as the President terms it, are swept away, and replaced by the "great burden of modern examinations."

Mr. WHEELHOUSE, pleading for a radical change in medical examinations, occupies a position common to all who object to the examination system of the day. He thinks it is undeniable that they are inadequate, unnecessarily multiplied, and so conducted that they harass alike the examined and the examiners. Decidedly overstrained was the young examiner mentioned by Mr. PRIDGIN TEALE who was called upon to look through fifteen hundred sets of answers in a fortnight—an examination equivalent to "five minutes for each paper." The hurry and worry occasioned by the present system are, to a great extent, the cause of the inadequacy of examinations so effectively illustrated by Mr. WHEELHOUSE. Like a practical man, he is ready with a remedial scheme. This is, in the main, a reform of the conduct of examination by adopting the procedure of the Universities Local Examinations. The question papers might be forwarded, under the examiners' seal, to the local officials, to be broken in the presence of the candidates, and the answers returned, once more under seal, to the examining body, who would "take a reasonable time" for judgment. Lastly, and, as Mr. WHEELHOUSE remarks, "most important of all," those candidates who entirely failed and were obviously incompetent would be promptly and humanely relieved of all suspense. There is much that commands the careful attention of the authorities in Mr. WHEELHOUSE's suggestions on this important subject, and probably most people sympathize with his desire that examinations should become "more and more practical in character" and reduced in number. One full and far-reaching examination that tests the educational basis as a starting-point is decidedly to be preferred to several more or less scrappy trials.

Wednesday's proceedings were occupied by the reading of several papers of purely professional interest and enlivened by certain novel propositions of the kind that usually characterizes scientific Congresses. Dr. HUGHLINGS JACKSON spoke on the "Comparative Study of Nervous Diseases"; Mr. PRIDGIN TEALE delivered the address in Surgery, taking for his theme "Detail in Surgery"; and Dr. HACK TUKE read an interesting and exhaustive paper on the provisions and treatment of the lunatic poor in Yorkshire. Dr. BRINDLEY JAMES brought before the Congress his scheme for a new Government Department of Health, in which at least two medical peers and a Minister of Public Health—a Cabinet Minister he should be—would undertake highly responsible duties, such as the supervision of medical officers of health. What the medical officers may think of this suggestion we cannot attempt to forecast. The creation of medical peers would be decidedly popular with those persons who think the medical profession is too sparingly honoured with titles of dignity. "Patients," we believe, were not admitted to the Leeds Medical Congress, yet Sir WILLIAM ROBERTS managed to supply a real object-lesson for a portion of the public in his address on "Antacid Remedies" in the Pharmacological Section. It is really very cheering for the numerous sufferers from acid dyspepsia to know that "an excess of acid in the stomach is almost as easily neutralized as if it were contained in a bottle in the laboratory." Here is good news for the million, though the afflicted may well wish the acid in the bottle, and have done with it. Sir WILLIAM sang the praise of the common or B. P. bismuth lozenge. His "table of antacid equivalents," based on "direct alkalimetric determinations," reveals at a glance the relative powers of the gastric antacids sold in shops. It may be extremely useful to know at times, and to remember, that 10 grains of bicarbonate of soda = 12 grains of bicarbonate of potass, or three Vichy lozenges, or one bismuth lozenge B. P., and so forth. Too often does the distressed victim take a heedless, unmeasured dose of bicarbonate of soda, or devour a whole rouleau of bismuth lozenges, or some other "official articles" that are much too common with the public. Altogether, Sir WILLIAM's address was full of comfort for the dyspeptic.

IRELAND.

WHEN we consider how good a harvest Ireland was blest with last year; when we view the prospect of a yet more abundant harvest this year; when we take account of the contentment, thus encouraged, that turns its back on an agitation from which no further profit is anticipated, we can well understand how desirable it seems to Mr. PARNELL's followers that the Session should end with a rouse. It has been a tame Session. Circumstances of which nothing is known with certainty except that they were beyond control have damped the spirits of these gentry and cast their activities into a decline. That they submitted unwillingly to the bonds of a restraint or the encroachments of a dulness that made them almost inoffensive we can believe without assurance on their part; nor is any explanation needed if now, in the last hours of opportunity, they rush into a display of sensitive and violent nationalism. To do the Irish agitator justice he is seldom purely mercenary. The histrionics of his occupation—which carry him away so completely that he hardly knows when he is playing a part—are its sufficing reward. But, of course, a man must live; it is dangerous to let any business run down; and the growing contentment of the Irish people, the failing supply of Parnellian Peter's-pence, have to be considered at the close of the Session by hon. members who have shown little sport and who spend much money. But it is ill making bricks without straw, and, though the Irish Parliamentary party goes gleaning up and down, with minute assiduity, for grievance-material, poor is the supply that rewards their toil. Dr. TANNER's comforts as a first-class misdemeanor; how it is that Mr. CONYBEARE suffers from lumbago; whether the whitewash on that martyr's cell does not glare too much upon his sight; whether his bed is not placed in a draught; questions like these afford but sorry baiting for a brutal and bloody BALFOUR, and yet they have been pelted at the IRISH SECRETARY night after night, with all the energy, fire, and vigour of an attack in chief. But it is quite evident that there is not enough here to keep the pot boiling long; this will not re-inflame the dying ashes of voluntary contributions; and, therefore, we may judge how welcome is the promise of material for another outcry of the MANDEVILLE kind, with boundless scope for wrath and tears.

It is impossible to form any confident opinion at present as to how M'GEE and SIZE, two men lately released from Derry Gaol, came by their deaths; but the assertion is that one was killed by typhus fever contracted in the prison, and the other man is supposed to have perished in the same way. An inquiry has been opened in M'GEE's case, and, whatever the truth may be, it is already clear that we may expect another outburst of false or exaggerated indignation. Derry Gaol is the place of Mr. CONYBEARE's confinement. It is there that the cells are thoughtlessly or purposely white-washed; there it is (or so Dr. KENNY insinuates) that beds are sometimes placed in a draught between door and window; and, that being the case, some colour is given to the idea suggested by Mr. SEXTON that the gaol has been turned into "a death-trap" for Nationalist prisoners by the cultivation of typhus-germs within its walls. At present, however, there is no sufficient ground for believing that the gaol Governor has gone so far as that, or that typhus infests the gaol at all, or that M'GEE died of that terrible malady. The doctors who made a post-mortem examination declared that tuberculosis was the cause of death. But typhus is asserted—typhus caught in a pestilential gaol; and, when the Coroner's inquiry is resumed, it may very possibly turn out that typhus it was that killed M'GEE. Yet prisons are no more exempt than palaces from the visitations of that insidious disorder; accident—sometimes favoured by carelessness, sometimes not—carries it into many a home where there are neither minions nor victims of Castle cruelty; and, even though M'GEE did die of typhus fever, it does not follow that the Government is convicted of manslaughter, or even of deliberate inhumanity. But the Parnellites—English and Irish alike—are indisposed to that view. If they could not afford to be fair in a similar case a year ago, far less can they afford it now, and already the lines of another MANDEVILLE campaign are traced out. Mr. SEXTON has uttered his pregnant saying about the "death-trap." Correspondents report an "intense feeling" in Donegal, dwell upon the splendid physique of "the fine strong young fellow when he entered 'gaol,' and (amongst other things) say they hear that "the 'emergency men who are in charge of the places which 'M'GEE and others defended during eviction ran up the 'Union Jack over the ruins after news of the death of 'M'GEE and SIZE." This is a precise repetition of the tactics in the MANDEVILLE case; and, whatever may be the truth as to M'GEE's death, the Parnellites, from their English leader downwards, may promise themselves an excellent chance of another brisk little agitation.

So far, then, they are favoured; and—though this they must deplore—the uncontrollable extreme men of their faction have at the same time broken into a new spell of activity. Rejoiced as the Parliamentary members of the party must have been at the cessation of murder and outrage, it must have been hard to hear it described as a proof of their own loss of influence and a sign of declining discontent. And, just as they have fallen into the dolefullest dumps through circumstances still more distressing, their intolerable friends in Ireland have perpetrated three attempts at assassination, all of the regular agrarian kind. Perhaps those mistaken men felt the misery of the constitutional reformers too much; perhaps they thought, in their wrong-headed though not bad-hearted way, that the constitutional ones needed stimulus; or (perhaps) that a failure of oratorical energy at Westminster must be compensated by practical demonstration elsewhere. In any case the Parliamentary party are relieved from the reproach of expiring outrages. At Kilorglin, County Kerry, a farmer was shot at on the road, and bullets were lodged in jaw and thigh; motive, apparently, objection to a certain purchase of land. This was on Monday. On Tuesday another farmer living near Woodford, County Galway, was fired at, and dangerously wounded. "He was in bed at the time, and shots were "fired in through the window." A yet more stirring case is the shooting at Mr. TENER, Lord CLANRICARDE's agent, who, while driving with his police escort on the road between Woodford and Portumna, was fired at by a small party of men concealed in a field of wheat. Four shots were directed at him; his horse was wounded in the neck, and some pellets grazed Mr. TENER's shoulder. This also happened on Monday. Three old-school attempts at assassination in two days—one attempt on a land agent, and a couple of farmers badly wounded. This looks like business, which is to be resumed, perhaps, on a liberal scale for a while. But continuation of it for long need not be dreaded, we fancy. In all likelihood, it is merely spasmodic—spasmodic in its own way, like the greater liveliness at the virtuous end of the party, where all such violence is loathed. So be it. Notwithstanding these ebullitions in field and forum, notwithstanding the intolerable wickedness of the officials of the British Museum, notwithstanding the new measures for dragooning Parnellite members into Parliamentary attendance, a general weariness of the game is stealing over all concerned, while for our part we are as ready as Readiness itself to forgive and forget.

THE KENSINGTON COMMISSIONERS' REPORT.

THE seventh Report of the Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 treats of a very eventful past, and considers with much detail, as well as abundant confidence, what promises to be a not less eventful future. Since 1878, the date of the last Report, the management of the Kensington Gore estate has been decidedly energetic. Many and great are the changes to be noted. The more important of these were directly brought about by the unsatisfactory financial position of the Royal Horticultural Society as occupiers of a portion of the estate. The income of the Society had for years been steadily diminishing, owing to insufficient public support. The local householders and owners of property appear to have been strangely lukewarm, though it was obviously in their interest that the Gardens should be preserved from the builder. The rent of the Gardens was 2,400*l.*, which cannot be termed excessive, yet the Society could not meet this liability, in spite of the various suggestions offered by the not impatient Commissioners. Their income from annual subscriptions, which should have amounted to 10,000*l.*, had fallen below 6,000*l.* in 1876; in 1878 it was only a trifle above 4,000*l.*, and in 1877 was less than this sum. The outcome of this deplorable lack of funds was the action of ejectment brought against the Society by the Commissioners in 1880, which led to continued litigation for two years, and the subsequent reoccupation of the Gardens by the Commissioners. With one exception, all the changes contemplated by the Commissioners, or now actually in progress, are direct consequences of the unfortunate condition of the Society and the successful litigation of their landlords. The proposal to build for the Government a Science Museum on the estate was, however, under the consideration of the Treasury some four years before the Commissioners entered into possession of the Gardens. The offer was finally declined, though the sanguine Commissioners continued to reserve a site for the inevitable Science buildings. Last year they once more approached the Government by offering, at about one-third of the estimated value, four and a half acres, on condition that the land should be permanently used for purposes connected with Science or Art. No response, says the Report, has yet been made to this offer, as a Committee is examining, on behalf of the Government, the condition of the various Science collections at South Kensington, upon which they will issue their own Report.

After the somewhat harrowing recital of its dealings with the Royal Horticultural Society, the Commissioners proceed to the history of their business engagements with the various Exhibition Commissioners of 1883-86, and their relations to the Corporation of the Albert Hall, the Council of the City and Guilds Institute of Technical Instruction, the Royal College of Music, the Imperial Institute, to name the larger of the many undertakings with which they are connected. Closely following the ejectment of the Royal Horticultural Society from their Gardens came the Exhibitions of Fisheries, Health, Inventions and Music, India and the Colonies, each of which, save the third, produced a good surplus, and all contributed to increase considerably the annual rental of the estate. But these popular shows could not, of course, be depended upon as sources of income. During the last three years the Commissioners have been energetic in opening new sources of revenue by further development of the estate of which, as the Report reminds us, they are Trustees. They found themselves in the possession of land with extraordinary advantages of frontage, readily apportioned into eligible building sites, and in the centre of the most fashionable part of London. They have lost no time in setting about the work. The charming Horticultural Gardens are doomed. The fine conservatory is already sold. One broad road has been cut through the property from Exhibition Road to Queen's Gate, and on its north side the Imperial Institute is slowly rising from its foundations. Another and parallel road is projected between the Imperial Institute and the Albert Hall, which will open the most tempting sites to the enterprising builder. Houses, indeed, are already arising on the extreme borders of the estate facing Queen's Gate. The changes contemplated will completely transform the pretty terraced garden where a few years back delighted crowds promenaded to the music of the Guards' band and the waltzes of Herr STRAUSS. Nothing, indeed, can give the uninformed any idea of the undertakings in view, except a careful study of the coloured plan thoughtfully provided by the Commissioners. Taken in conjunction with the estimates in the Report, this map of the future affords overwhelming evidence that the policy of the Commission is not wanting in thoroughness. North of the projected new road and facing the Albert Hall an open space is reserved for the statue of the PRINCE CONSORT now in the Gardens. On each side is a large site for building, occupying the ground from the road to the east and west quadrants familiar to exhibition visitors. To the south of the road the new Royal College of Music will stand, confronting the Albert Hall, flanked by building sites that face the somewhat larger sites over the way. These four noble positions are to be devoted to the erection of huge blocks of "mansions," the effect of which can be readily realized by the least imaginative observer of our street architecture. It is true that the advice of Mr. WATERHOUSE as to the suitability of the designs will be forthcoming, and that he is empowered to secure the harmonizing of these buildings and the College of Music with the neighbouring existing structures. This is, of course, a proper and wise provision; though, after all, "mansions" are unhappily what they are. Moreover, it would be easy indeed to harmonize any specimen of this monstrous order with the "existing buildings"; for it is not beyond the attainment of any architect successfully to emulate the style and elevation of the Albert Hall Mansions or the dignity of the Albert Hall itself. The prospect alone is enough to make everybody rue the day when the Horticultural Society were thrust out of their little Eden. The mere thought of mansions makes us tremble for Sir ARTHUR BLOMFIELD'S new College. It is rather hard to implicate, however indirectly, the public in this new scheme. The Commissioners declare themselves to be influenced by the increasing opposition to the building of more museums in South Kensington, and the public desire for museums and the like in other localities. They have determined, therefore, to raise a "substantial disposable income," by setting aside portions of their estate for private building purposes. They have also allotted an annual sum of 5,000*l.* for Science scholarships, supplementing the existing schemes of scholarships under the Science and Art Department. Much more than this may be done with the increased revenue that will certainly be available as the development of the estate progresses. The South Kensington Museum awaits completion. The larger portion of it, indeed, is practically not built. Its rich collections are actually excluded from the one building that deserves to be considered permanent; the façade of which, in the Exhibition Road, is the sole redeeming feature in the architectural display of the district. Let us have our Patent Museum, and house our Science collection decently, by all means; but before these things are done it would be well to commence the more important work of completing our National Museum.

A LEADING AMERICAN CASE.

WHETHER, when the Court is slapped on the face while it is at breakfast, it is the duty of the Deputy-Marshal to shoot the slapper through the heart, is a question on which the judicial wisdom of the United States will shortly be called upon to decide—if it has not been settled already. The opportunity for a decision has been afforded by Mr. DAVID NAGLE. This prompt officer was at breakfast with Mr. Justice FIELD, of the Supreme Court of the United States, at Lathrop, California, when two persons entered the room—namely, Mrs. TERRY and her husband. They were old acquaintances. Mrs. TERRY had been before the judge under the name of SARAH ALTHEA HILL, when she was fraudulently pretending to be the wife of SHARON, one of the common breed of American millionaires. Mr. Justice FIELD, having decided against her, the lady made a disturbance in court, in which she was abetted by her counsel TERRY. In the course of this scene he knocked down a marshal. Client and counsel were committed for contempt. Being in perfect sympathy, they very properly married, and, as we see, came across Mr. Justice FIELD again. The lady, with a delicacy we should hardly have expected, did not, it seems, care to face the judge, and therefore retired from the refreshment-room. She was not followed by her husband. Mr. TERRY had already announced his intention of shooting the judge. Perhaps because he had no pistol—perhaps for some less adequate reason—he did not keep his word; but, in a spirit of compromise of the most fatal kind, contented himself with slapping the judge on the face, for which he was instantly shot down by Deputy-Marshal DAVID NAGLE, who is plainly not a man of half measures.

We do not know whether it will tell against Mr. NAGLE, a man we should like to have with us if we ever travel in California, that he had a professional quarrel with the late TERRY. This, however, appears to be the case. Not only had TERRY knocked a marshal down in the Supreme Court, but he had tried to murder one in California many years ago. On this third occasion the honourable corps has been too much for him. The attempted murder took place at a time when Mr. TERRY was himself a member of the Supreme Court of California. The details are obscure. Judge TERRY did the rash act in the Vigilance Committee time, and he may have been aggravated by amateur interference with his professional duties. The marshal recovered, and Mr. TERRY resumed public life after a brief sojourn under charge of a Vigilance Committee. In public life he distinguished himself by shooting BRODERICK (Senator in Congress) through the body in a duel. They were on different sides in politics. TERRY said unpleasant things about BRODERICK. The Senator regretted that he had helped TERRY to escape the Vigilance Committee. This and other caustic remarks he made in the hearing of several—among others, of an Englishman. Men who repeat the ill-natured things their friends say of one another deserve to be kicked, according to TOPHAM BEAUCLERC. Some of the Senator's hearers—not the Englishman, we hope—proceeded to merit this penalty. TERRY, being informed of the Senator's remarks, challenged him. It was a time of crisis before the war, and TERRY was apparently anxious to follow in the footsteps of AARON BURR. The Senator refused to gratify him till the election (what election?) was over. Then he, too, resigned his seat on the supreme bench (they were all judges and all in Supreme Courts) and met TERRY on the field of honour. The duel was irregular. Mr. BRODERICK was annoyed because TERRY'S seconds insisted on searching him for concealed armour. He became flurried, and "in attempting to fire his pistol went off prematurely." It was the pistol which, while he was attempting to fire it, went off prematurely, and not the Senator who went off prematurely in attempting to fire his pistol. Then TERRY straightened himself (had he been squatting before?), took deliberate aim, and shot the Senator. "The calmer judgment of men released TERRY from any imputation of unfairness"; but in California it was generally felt that he had better transfer his activity elsewhere. He appears to have then practised in the Supreme Court till he met his elective affinity in the person of SARAH ALTHEA HILL, now his sorrowing widow, and began that course of adventure which brought him into fatal collision with Deputy-Marshal DAVID NAGLE. Such was, in little, the life, activity, and tragic end of one of those heroes on whom the rapt eye of Mr. POGRAM dwelt with complacency. It makes a very interesting part of that judicial and political history of the United States towards which many thinkers invite us to turn our attention from the worn-out subjects of study presented by Europe. It is at least quite as noble, as original, and as profitable as many other portions of that great whole which we have been asked to admire.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF A COMMUNARD.

THE death of M. Félix Pyat recalls to mind a little book published at Toulon, in 1872, by one of his most enthusiastic followers. A copy was once presented by the chef of the Café Riche to a guest, in consequence of a short conversation which opened with compliments upon a supper, and diverged—the hour being late and the cook devious in his topics—to such warm eulogium of the Commune that the maître d'hôtel thought it prudent to interrupt. He grumbled that ces messieurs are always Communists. Next morning arrived this small work at breakfast-time, en souvenir d'un ami, with the assurance that it contained, in compactest summary, the views of Citizens Félix Pyat, A. Toussenet, and F. V. Raspail upon things in general. One would not have expected a course of philosophy under the business-like title Menus d'un Restaurant de Paris pendant le siège, but we understand that the author had a great deal of leisure-time just then, on a foreign strand, to enlarge upon his text.

The Menus themselves have a certain interest, as authentic records, kept from day to day, in the course of business, showing the gradual pressure of the siege upon the clientèle of a Boulevard restaurant. As such we may give them a few words; but they prove, as the author says, that “le pauvre pouvait être privé; le riche a toujours eu des aliments à foison.” Cat makes its appearance on December 15 at 5 frs. the portion; it cost 6 frs. in bulk, we learn. Ass next day. Peacock on the 17th; it cost 15 to 20 frs., and sold at 7 frs. the portion. Rats en salmis are introduced on the 19th at 4 frs.; they cost 75 centimes each at that time, while a goose cost 40 frs. We observe bear on the 27th at 8 frs.; the carcass was bought for 200 frs. at the Jardin des Plantes. On July 1st the Patron bought two and a half kilos of elephant at 30 frs. the kilo; at 6.30 P.M. there was none left; but he continued to sell “elephant” all through the week. By January 6th rats had gone up to 2 frs. each; a fowl to 36 and 40 frs. On the 11th dog is introduced at 5 frs. the portion, costing 4 frs. the kilo. Fish, from the Seine, 30 frs. the kilo, on January 15th. He-goat appears on the 18th, and the author cries bitterly, “Never will the culinary art succeed in making billygoat un mets potable (sic). I employed oxalic acid, tartaric, nitric, sulphuric; nothing would remove the smell.” On the 24th a rabbit fetched 45 frs., a shallot 50 centimes; hams, 24 frs. the kilo. The Armistice was signed on the 28th, when the Patron had still three hundred boxes of preserved horseflesh in his cellars.

But before treating this prosaic theme the author expounds his philosophy, which he terms “analogie passionnelle.” It seems to be based upon the principle that any conclusion may be deduced from any premisses; but those who do not accept the particular conclusion he draws partake of the nature of the quadrupeds. It must be admitted, in truth, that, if the principle be sound, most of us are proved donkeys. But such a system defies analysis; we must let the gentleman speak for himself. Only it is hard to choose a beginning. All very well to cry “Ecoutez l'analogie passionnelle!” But a philosopher who declares that bread is the staff of life; there are milestones on the Dover Road; therefore let the mothers of France cease to put their children out to nurse, employs a form of argument which it is difficult to follow. We can only take an illustration here and there, and ponder it. Beetroot is one of the gravest foes of humanity. “An Englishman drinks the blood of the negro in taking his tea; a Frenchman swallows the blood of the working-man in drinking his coffee. Pourquoi voulez-vous que ce soit autrement? One cannot have the gamut of the senses complete if one cherish the beetroot; it contains a heap of lies equivalent to the Seven Deadly Sins. I have surprised in the cooked beetroot the perfume of truffles—ignoble cheating of a foul plant. Like the harlot, nothing can make a beetroot blush—nothing can make it drop its eyes—the smallest kiss takes away its colour.” So much for the beetroot. We turn to “Objections à l'Empereur Guillaume. Voyons, citoyen Guillaume! I will permit myself a few objections. You are of royal blood. I am republican. Let us deal with the question impartially, and the peoples shall judge. I sound the attack. Why have you not checked the German emigration? You know well, sire, that you have no French servants in Germany. Je vous le répète, Empereur Guillaume; your people have servitude for dominant note. You are the chief of them. You detest France. Your Berlin jewelry is three centuries behind that of Paris. Your Imperial soirées are simple entertainments of the Paris bourgeoisie. Why do you read French books, and go to sleep over German? Why will your generals always bow the head before the generals of France? You will not make of a German a culinary artist, an artist distiller, nor perfumer.” There is no more to be said. We change our subject to Erreurs des Rois. “Woe to the Government which lowers the status of the horse! Woe, thrice woe, to the Government qui fait fi de l'art culinaire! This is unknown in Spain, in Russia, in England, in Germany. The nations which despise the horse are on the straight road to ruin. Crowned heads are men topsy-turvy. They have a spirit innovating, affable; at the end of a few years all is changed. If it please an usurper to make a plébiscite, you will find them the wolf, the fox, the viper, the ass, the mule, the pig, the rat, the mole, the badger, the fly. You will never find the dog, the ox, the stag, the whale. Every creature which has large eyes is granted a superior intelligence, and gives not its voice for murder—the laws of God are so laid down.” And thus, naturally, we come to a vehement attack upon the medical profession, and a declaration of faith. It is good to hear that the author has a profonde croyance en Dieu. The foremost erreur des gouvernements, it seems, is their persistent refusal to admit dumb persons to Parliament. The exclusion of the deaf might be justified, but of the dumb—it is monstrous! Morale et philosophie displays that every bad thing has its good side. “Thanks be given to the kings, to the noblesse, who raised the culinary art to such degree that no man can deny the genius of that art. The brigand, the bandit, the assassin des bagnes, the wretch of Sedan, the Hernani of Victor Hugo, the Robin Hood of Walter Scott, give us a striking idea of the cook's business. For example, make an extract from first-class meat”—and, in brief, do all which good cookery books do not recommend. The result will be louche. But, upon the other hand, follow their directions conscientiously, and you obtain a sauce of high merit, “worthy to be served at the table of the great Condé.” Both processes are detailed minutely, and they throw light on the career of Robin Hood.

As for organisation communale, the author is “very sorry to say anything disagreeable, but there is somewhat of the Squirrel in the principle of Mayors.” This is a painful subject, however:—

Tenez, jetons un voile et n'en parlons plus. I lived long in Algeria during the time that the Emir tormented France. I can say that I am acquainted with no organization more vicious than the military régime. Everything goes to the bad there—l'honneur et le cœur. I know not a history more repugnant to trace than that of the seven poisons—tobacco, the soldier, religions, strong drink, money, flattery, and ambition—la gamme des malheurs! One more word of analogie passionnelle. Do you know why the Church has not kept the monopoly of civil registration? It is because the Church has not the gamut of marriage. Remark at the Mairie what a masterpiece is the law of nature. Withdraw one person from the gamut of marriage, and it becomes null. For example, the number seven is necessary; four witnesses, bride and bridegroom, and the adjoint. Total, seven. Complete figure of the series.

Q. E. D. in short. And thus the organisation communale—but you should read it again, and form your own conclusion. As for the author, who “during thirty years supported the tyranny of the fools with an invincible repugnance,” he would not carry out his ideas, lucid and beneficent as they are, by force. He once knew a sparrow which came every morning for fifty-eight days to feed upon his window-sill when he was in prison under Napoleon III. “One fine day the doors were opened; my first thought flew to the sparrow. I wrote upon the walls Vive la République!—Revenons aux oiseaux. It is impossible that man should prevent insects and vermin from destroying his harvests without the help of the birds; difficult for him to prevent theft in rural districts without the help of a dog. Now, remember that the dog mounts guard whenever his master is at home; but from the moment that you abandon the dog, to defend your property and your cash, he has nothing to do with all that. He is less interested than his master.” Therefore let us have no revolutions à mains armées.

Then we pursue our “Analogy” into the colours, and these excursions are more pleasing than the rest, if possible. It is not generally known that colours have their grandes qualités, their virtues and their vices. White and black form grey, of which the qualité est bien connue:—

Potash, cinders, salt de cuisine, grey partridge, grey hen, the nightingale, truffles, coffee, &c. Potash and cinders cure the vine disease; salt purifies the body and doubles the harvest; partridges and grey hens restore the strength and hasten convalescence; the nightingale rejoices the soul; truffles are a tonic; coffee imparts science and great philosophy. The poodle, the white horse, have a certain tendency to become slaves. . . . Soldiers in black uniform are free men; nations which follow the white flag are nations of slaves. Napoleon the First had a white charger; he abandoned his army at Moscow; he was the slave of the English. Men with white hair are slaves after being free. The highwayman sleeps in the daytime. The Paris cocotte turns day into night.

Here the author interrupts himself to protest against cabinets particuliers, and to urge that pères de famille should cause restaurants to be closed at midnight:—

Reprenons l'analogie des couleurs. Arsenic struck down the organizer of the Dix-huit Brumaire; snow was the cause of the retreat from Moscow (white). The white bear is the slave of the Polar Seas; the egg is the slave of the hen; the white-headed veteran permits himself to be led wherever the child wills. . . . Another word on the virtue of salt de cuisine. The sailor is much braver than the soldier. If I had been a soldier I would never have fired upon a town. The cannon, emblem of brutality, ought to vanish from the hands of our soldiers; for—I must say it—French generals are not analogistes. They have a routine for making war. I should have cut the railroads. I should have provisioned the besieged city with all sorts of food. I should have suppressed every kind of salt meat; and by a system of extreme vigilance I should have prevented any one from conveying salt to the besieged. Now, truffles, partridges, &c. without salt are tasteless food, incomplete. If a besieged city wants salt, vermin breed there, courage fails. If salt is lacking in a fortress, it is the tomb, it is capitulation. That's why the sailor is more courageous and more free than the soldier.

As clear a demonstration as could be wished.

These extracts are fairly made and literally translated. The reader may well declare them ravings and drivellings alternately. But it is not quite so. The little book would not have been received, as it was, by men who are certainly not idiots had it been mere nonsense. There is, in fact, a kind of system in it, for those who can follow the working of thoughts among a tumultuous and inconsequential crowd of illustrations. Persons familiar with the works of those great citizens Félix Pyat, A. Toussenel, and F. V. Raspail may have a key which enables them to find their way through the muddle.

SIAM.

A BROAD, alluvial valley, more than a hundred miles in length, flooded annually by a slow-flowing river more fertilizing than the Nile—a still longer range of mountains full of valuable ores—a wilderness of forests producing teak and other costly woods—and a landlocked sea profusely stocked with some of the best fishes that swim—such are, broadly speaking, the leading characteristics of the peaceful little country called Siam. Geologists and explorers unite with the merchants of the Far East in attesting the enormous potential wealth which lies hid beneath its soil, and no one who takes any trouble to inquire can now doubt that Siam presents what advertisers call a “splendid field for the employment of European capital.” Is it at all likely that this inviting field will soon be opened to British enterprise, and under what conditions? To answer the question one must have regard to some special circumstances little known to people at home. At first sight one would be apt to suppose that nothing more is needed for developing these riches than a few prospectuses well circulated in the City. Modern speculation has familiarized the public with an idea that distant countries are overflowing with concessions, ready to be granted to pleasant-spoken adventurers, who present suitable backsheesh to the local dignitaries, accept gaudy decorations and more or less generous leases or contracts, and, coming home, dispose of them on such terms as they can to Company-mongers in the first place and adventurous shareholders in the end. This theory is only very partially true in the case of a shrewd people like the Siamese. The King of this country is no doubt one of the monarchs whom it is the fashion to call “enlightened.” But he understands the word in a very different sense from that which is often applied to it in the City. He does not interpret it to mean a sovereign who throws about valuable lands and privileges to be scrambled for by all the needy adventurers and greedy speculators who are on the watch for such pickings. No; King Chulalongkoon and his Ministers, many of whom are highly-accomplished men, are sincerely anxious for the speedy development of the great resources over which they have command. They have shown, by the most practical proofs, that they have this desire and are able to carry it out. An extensive network of telegraphs has rapidly been established throughout their wide territory. Schools, hospitals, and other public buildings have been erected and are increasing every day. Last year a tramway Company, mainly supported by Siamese capital, began running cars in the metropolis. A river flotilla Company, wholly Siamese, carries the passenger traffic of the fine stream on which Bangkok is built; and this year important gold-mining operations have been begun by a Company formed in London, in which the great majority of subscribers are Siamese nobles and other inhabitants of that country. Lastly, a well-known Englishman, formerly Governor of the Straits Settlements, obtained two years ago a contract for surveying a trunk line of railway in Siam, for which he is to be paid some 50,000*l.* by the Siamese Government.

With these evidences staring us in the face, it would be very absurd to speak of the country or its ruler as hanging back in the path of progress. One must, moreover, remember that, besides these signs of advancement, a free field has been and is opened to the wide employment of foreign capital in ordinary matters of trade. Rice-mills, saw-mills, and docks are doing a very large business, with very large profits to their owners, who consist of English, French, German and Chinese capitalists. Within the last five years a most lucrative trade in cattle has sprung up, conducted by Indian capitalists and dealers, who now export some thousands of cattle per month from Bangkok. German and English ships do a flourishing general business; and, in fine, the capital as well as the other big towns present daily more and more the appearance of improving civilization, commerce, and wealth. Everything points to an acceleration of progress in these and other directions; and if only the country were less rich than it is one might be well content to leave its development to the natural course of events. Unluckily, however—or rather luckily, if all goes well—the exceptional wealth of the land has excited projects in the minds of certain speculators, both commercial and political, for still more quickly and completely opening it up. The King is pestered on all hands with applications for large concessions. Mines, banks, railways, waterworks, and a dozen other sorts of schemes, are thrust before him for acceptance; and the less modest of the schemers do not hesitate to ask him to guarantee a profit on their own pet undertakings. Siamese statesmen would be justified if they adopted the non possumus attitude of the Chinese or the Turks. It is a little hard to ask that City promoters should at their own convenience and at their own sweet will proceed to “develop” His Majesty’s territories, reaping such profits as are usual in the case of Oriental enterprises, whilst the owner remains liable for any losses that may occur after Throgmorton Street has taken the cream off the milk and the gilt off the gingerbread. King Chulalongkoon would have some show of right on his side if he declared a preference for going his own way to work in utilizing the resources of his empire, and declining to allow a Panama Canal scheme or an Emma Mine enterprise to be undertaken for him by self-interested adventurers. The fact is, however, that his Siamese Majesty makes no such reply. A policy of reaction or inaction is the very reverse of that which Siam now professes; and the ruling powers in that country are as anxious as any foreigner to improve it in a wise, liberal, and even generous spirit. We have thus, on the one hand, a King and Ministers sincerely desirous of promoting European enterprise, and, on the other hand, a European public hardly less ready to embark capital therein. What hindrance is there to the immediate accommodation of both parties in so commendable a design? We will endeavour to show where any obstacles are to be found, and hope, at the same time, to show that they can easily be removed.

Let it, then, be in the first place remembered that Siam is one of those Oriental countries where foreigners enjoy—such is the accepted phrase—extraterritorial rights—that is to say, that in any dispute, either amongst themselves or with the native race, they “enjoy”—we shall see presently what the term means—the privilege of going before a Consular Court for judicial purposes. The jurisdiction and competence of such courts are regulated in part by treaties and in part by a series of obscure rules only imperfectly understood by those who have to put them in force. Now it is hardly necessary, after what has occurred in Japan and Egypt, to enlarge upon the paralysing influence which is exerted by such treaties. Drawn up—hurriedly enough—at a time when the needs and aspirations of the Orientals were in an embryonic condition, badly adapted even at the time to the requirements of the case, they have in the thirty or forty subsequent years become intensely unsuitable to the existing conditions, and impose upon the Asiatic rulers such harassing and unwelcome restrictions as positively tie their hands in almost all directions. The simplest measures of police regulation and local government, even if it be a new liquor traffic law, or an opium farm regulation, cannot be carried into effect without the separate consent of every European Power, whether great or small, which has a Consul in the place. Quay-dues and market-dues cannot be effectually imposed, public improvements cannot properly be effected, unless his worship the Portuguese Consul and his honour the French Chargé d’Affaires are obliging enough to withhold their veto and approve the scheme. This, however, is not the worst part of the business. The Consular officials, who have to decide every case in which a European is plaintiff or complainant, are too often persons wholly unqualified for the simplest judicial functions. Small wonder, therefore, that there is dissatisfaction, even amongst their own “subjects,” with the decisions and proceedings of these Solomons and Daniels. We find that at one time ninety petitioners, including the best educated British subjects, were of opinion that charges made against the Consular Court ought to be properly investigated; at another time a hundred and fifty memorialists prayed “that a better Consul might be appointed, or, in default of this, that they might be placed under the jurisdiction of some other Power, from whom they might obtain that justice which is now denied them.” When such is the state of discontent professed whether reasonably or unreasonably by British residents themselves, how is it to be supposed that the Siamese can be very anxious to enter into important contracts which may come to be interpreted in such courts? The practical authority of such officials is, moreover, hardly greater than their judicial competency. Only a few days ago the post brought tidings of a serious squabble between Chinese factions, composed largely, if not chiefly, of persons under European jurisdiction. It should naturally have been the Consuls’ business to quell the disturbance. But, as a fact, it had to be put down by the Siamese police, who, with an armed force of their own, arrested no less than nine hundred of the rioters.

Such anomalies as the above would be more than enough to account for any little hitch that might impede the more free granting of concessions to Europeans. And they would be regrettable if it were not for the one fact that they are most easy of remedy. With 50,000 British subjects resident in Siam, with very large judicial business to transact, and with exceedingly handsome court fees exacted from all litigants, nothing could be easier than to appoint a judge to preside over a court resembling on a small scale those in Egypt and Japan. Discontent would soon vanish; and the example set by England, which has the most important commercial interests, would be followed quickly by the other nationalities. If, besides this, a partial revision of antiquated treaties were effected, as it easily might be, business relations between Europe and Siam would establish themselves on a fair footing, and the commercial and industrial aspirations entertained on both sides would combine freely, to the mutual advantage of all parties interested.

SOUTH AND NORTH DEVON.

THERE is a South and a North Devon, and an East Devon also, and the three characteristic divisions correspond pretty closely to the Parliamentary divisions before the eventful year 1885. Devonshire is Devonshire, and Devonians are Devonians, in whichever division they may be born and bred; but to the student of details of character and characteristics, dialects and modes of expression, it is impossible to say how far analysis, differences, divisions, and subdivisions may not be carried. It would not be to inquire too curiously if a distinction were to be detected in parishes. Some mute, inglorious Miltons, or Cromwells guiltless of their country's blood, may lie beneath the green mounds in the churchyard after unconsciously moulding a parish habit of thought, a parish trick of expression, a parish dialect or graphic word or two. Clever men leave their mark behind them whether they go far or near, and a tone or a style in life is acquired through their influence. The parish is so engrafted in the manners and customs of the folk, so much a part of every man's life, that the statesman's hand will be rash which destroys it in the name of reform, and transforms parishes into districts, by way of making things symmetrical. Is nature equal and symmetrical? A statesman would be the last to say that our brains were equal, and the inequality of our outward and visible forms is manifest enough. The very inequality of the parishes gives a wholesome variety to our public life, and a small parish may be stronger in Miltons and Cromwells than its larger and more worldly neighbour. There is something old, well established, and durable in the parish and in parish life that should be spared the hand of the destroyer and reformer.

South and North Devon are divisions, and not parishes; but, because they are distinct, and their distinction offers opportunity for suggestions of interest, they may not inaptly illustrate in broader lines—or in larger type, to use another metaphor—the differences that can be observed, if looked for, in parishes. They have both a good extent of sea-coast of considerable beauty, with a fine race of seafaring folk, as we know from Kingsley and from the historians. They have both a Royal forest, or what was once a Royal forest, of considerable extent, by no means a trifle in their influence on the people—Dartmoor and Exmoor. Dartmoor was granted to the Prince of Wales so long ago as the time of the Black Prince. Exmoor was sold in the present century by the Crown to a private gentleman. But they are practically forests, in the sense of wild primitive picturesque tracts of land, and they have impressed their qualities on the children of men. The South and North folk are both also Devonians, which it would hardly be necessary to say were it not that such towns as Exeter, Plymouth, and Torquay may well be said to have been greatly sophisticated by the outer world. Towns, as parishes, have their distinctive characteristics for the same reasons, and it may be worth while to study them; but the country folk to the anthropologist, like the wild flower to the botanist, offer better food for contemplation than the busy, bustling townsmen, who nowadays have something cosmopolitan about them.

The seas, the moors, and the Devonian character are resemblances patent to all, not differences; but it is needful to mark the resemblances in order better to appreciate the differences. There is a roughness and hardihood in the North of Devon, quite consistent with very civil and good-natured manners, which is much softened in the South of Devon. The population in South Devon is much more dense than in the North—exclusive of the towns—and this is probably occasioned by the proximity of the large towns, together with, on the whole, a richer soil. Although both the South and the North are much given to sporting, the sporting turn of mind is more manifest in the North than in the South, and the horse, the much later invasion of the railway not displacing him so soon, is more universally known and in use in the former. The wild red deer, which pervaded the whole county a century ago, is now peculiar to Exmoor and the surrounding coverts, which are extensive and dense. He wanders far at times, and he may be said to have left his footprints, commonly called his slot, on the sands of time all over North Devon, and given a sort of stag-hunting style to the natives, which goes a long way to account for their sporting and horsey instincts. There are as fine riders to be found with the Dartmoor hounds as any in Devon, but they do not get on their horses and ride forty or fifty miles in a rough-and-ready way as they do in the North. The steam covert hack has made spoilt children of them.

In the South of Devon the stranger is a more constant visitor. He goes to Torquay for the winter, or to Plymouth on business—naval, military, or trading—or he may be a tourist, or he may go to hunt with the Dartmoor foxhounds or otterhounds, which are packs of fame. This is happening all the year round. In the North of Devon he comes in crowds for amusement only, either to hunt with the staghounds in August and September, or to observe the usual tourist custom of flitting from hotel to hotel, and visiting all the places ordained for that rite by the guide-books. The North of Devon is almost purely agricultural; the South is agricultural, and a great deal more besides. The pretty little towns on the fine North-Devon coast are supported by the tourists in their season of migration. In the South the tourist is not of so much account in comparison. He does not leave much behind him, barring his money, and his influence extends but a very little way into the country. This may also be said of the North; there, however, he is a more important personage as the principal source of revenue all along the northern coast. On the southern coast there are some of the best harbours in the world—Plymouth and Dartmouth, with Torbay and Brixham. On the North there are no harbours worth mentioning (with the estuary of the Taw and Torridge for a dubious exception), and the bold dangerous coast, with the lofty cliffs and the deep combs running down to the sea form the great attractions to the pleasure-seeker. Torquay is a large watering place and health resort in the winter, with its warm southern climate. Plymouth is a great arsenal, and a place of trade, with sailors and soldiers and shipping. Yachts frequent the harbours of Plymouth, Dartmouth, and Torbay, and the common tourist is very much lost in the crowd of traffic. On the northern coast the tourist is everything, and he is petted and made much of accordingly. There are few places where he can be better off, or where his touristical wants are provided for with more exclusive attention. If Plymouth may be said to be the capital of the South of Devon for all sorts and conditions of men, Ilfracombe may be said to be the capital of the North of Devon for the tourist, and a very gay and amusing capital it is. It is too far from Exmoor for the stag-hunter: even Lynton, which is twenty miles nearer, is out of the way for him, and entails long rides to covert. But for the tourist Ilfracombe is perfection, with its Ilfracombe Hotel, excellently managed, right on the sea-shore, only protected from the waves by its own sea-wall and terrace. Everybody seems to sit on the rocks at Ilfracombe, not by the sad sea wave, but by the jovial sea wave, where they can watch the stately ships go on, to their haven under the hill. And every child, high or low, boy or girl, seems to be perpetually up to the waist in sea-water. Decency prevails to such an extent that every little boy, of whatever class, wears bathing-drawers, and à fortiori the girls are properly cared for. The high hills, the deep combs, and the snug sandy bays are all beautiful. The population is bright and gay; four-horse coaches of the good old style to and from Lynton and elsewhere are driven through the town, with horns blowing, nearly all day; and there are carriages and donkey-carts, bands of music, the Salvation Army, and Punch, with numerous lawn-tennis courts, to add to the amusements and while away the time. The well-arranged market, with its vegetables, fruits, including the whortleberry in profusion, and the North Devon lasses from the country, is a fashionable resort and an extra charm on the Saturday. Ilfracombe is a tourist's paradise, a perfect rest for his weary and jaded spirit, where he can leave the world and its cares behind him.

The North Devon parson is a different being from the South Devon rector, vicar, or curate, as the case may be, though there are symptoms that he, too, will be superseded in time by the wearers of the long black coat with upright collar, and all-round linen on the neck, which mark the modern Churchman. His great representative was the Rev. John Russell, known to fame as Jack Russell, a mighty stag-hunter, always with the foxhounds, hunting a pack of his own for the best part of his life; a fine horseman of the true North Devon sort, who knew how to ride his horse almost any distance, a rare accomplishment nowadays; and, moreover, a good and well-beloved parish clergyman. The typical North Devon parson wears a black coat, a white tie, breeches, boots, and spurs. He talks broad Devonshire of the northern variety. He does his work, except the duties in church or churchyard, on horseback. Weddings and funerals, it is understood, should not be appointed for stag-hunting days. He does as much farming as possible, and he tells (to talk is to tell in Devonshire) chiefly of horses, hounds, deer, bullocks, sheep, and dogs in general. There have been notable specimens of this North Devon parson besides Jack Russell, one especially, to whom Jack Russell acted as curate and whipper-in early in his career, well known in their time; but it is to be feared the young curate of to-day, the parson of the future, will change all this, and even North Devon itself will know no more Jack Russells.

The dialect of North Devon varies from that of South Devon, though they are both distinctly Devonshire. Perhaps the most decidedly Devonshire speech now spoken is to be heard on Exmoor, just on the borders of Somersetshire, though Dartmoor is not far behind with the South Devon variations. The Elementary Education Acts are putting an end to the vulgar tongue everywhere, by the simple process of interposing a tongue yet more vulgar. Not long ago there was hardly a country gentleman in Devonshire who did not speak his own dialect. Lord Iddesleigh, who spoke pure English himself, was fond of the dialect and rather admired it. He could use it in telling a Devonshire story to perfection. Now the children are educated out of it, and it is somewhat singular that the middle classes in towns talk their wonted stilted tongue, using long compound words of Latin or French extraction, with the worst and most uninteresting, because bastard, accent, the old, time-worn, graphic phrases and all originality of expression being carefully avoided. The Devonshire dialect of the towns must be condemned as bad and uninteresting; whilst that of the country, both South and North, doomed to extinction in the schools, is of antiquarian and philological value, more for the words in current use than for their pronunciation, which, however, has its attractions for the curious in such matters. As the South is softer than the North, the winds more tempered to the shorn lamb, so are the people and the dialect softer; but civility and good manners are equally apparent in both. There are beauties in South Devon and beauties in North Devon. Stag-hunting on Exmoor begins this month, and there is other hunting, North and South. It is well to talk to the natives for the sake of exploring both the resemblances and differences in them and their speech. Dartmoor and Exmoor offer the best field for such exploration, and a fund of humour is to be found, which, when found, make a note of.

THE NEW SCHOOL OF ORIENTAL LANGUAGES.

AN institution which professes to represent an Empire on which the sun never sets must necessarily partake of some of the difficulties which surround that Empire. One of these difficulties—namely, that of drawing a hard-and-fast line round its limits and aspirations—has proved to be as perplexing to the Council of the Imperial Institute as it is to the rulers and pro-consuls of the Imperial Power. The original intention was to confine the objects of the Institute to direct commercial purposes; but, just as Indian viceroys have from time to time been compelled by irresistible circumstances to overstep the boundaries which they had laid down for themselves and to annex territories and States, so the Council of the Institute have found themselves under the necessity of undertaking work which at first they were content to regard as beyond the field of their labours. It would doubtless be useful to display in the galleries and cases of the Institute specimens of the products and manufactures of every nation; but, unless students were supplied with such information as would make these objects living entities, and their histories and surroundings clear and intelligible, it is obvious that they would be of no more use for instruction than a collection of classical antiquities to men who had never studied the history of Greece and Rome.

The Institute has found it necessary, therefore, to establish means of disseminating among the students full and accurate information on the history, geography, and language of every Eastern country which has commercial relations with Great Britain; and it thus aims at providing both merchants and officials whose pursuits entail residence, either temporary or permanent, in Eastern countries with the linguistic and historical acquirements necessary for the due prosecution of their calling. To the discredit of British enterprise and intelligence it has to be confessed that, though our stake in the East far outweighs that of any Continental nation, the interest hitherto shown by our countrymen in Oriental history and language has been considerably less than that displayed by other leading European communities. For more than a hundred years a school of living Oriental languages has been maintained in Paris, to which the State contributes the free use of a building and a grant of over 6,000*l.* per annum. In Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburg the several Governments have largely subsidized similar institutions, and, as a matter of fact, it is in England alone of all the nations interested in the East that official countenance has been practically withheld from, or at best only grudgingly given to, Oriental studies.

Some little has been done in spite of official discouragement by the energy of institutions and the generosity of a few persons. University and King's Colleges, London, have for years struggled to interest people in some of the principal languages and the history of the East. They have founded professorships and have given all the encouragement within their power to the pursuit of these branches of knowledge; but no adder ever turned a deaf ear to the enchanter than the public have to the blandishments of these professors. Cassandra-like they have preached the advantage of Oriental studies to unheeding generations, and their class-rooms have borne melancholy testimony to the small amount of interest which they have been able to excite in the subjects of their lectures. This lack of interest doubtless arises, to some extent, from the necessary want of completeness in the arrangements which the colleges, with the means at their disposal, have been able to make. A man applies, for example, to University College for instruction in Malay, or possibly Turkish, and he is told that neither of those languages is included in the College curriculum. It is nothing to him that Sanskrit and some other Eastern tongues are taught if the language which he wishes to learn is not among them; and he goes away under the impression that nothing is being done in London for the promotion of Oriental studies. And his complaint, though exaggerated, is not altogether unfounded. It seems to be almost beyond belief that in the metropolis of a State possessing an Oriental empire, and bound by political and commercial interests to every country in Asia, from the Dardanelles to the Sea of Japan, there should be no recognized school at which students who may desire to make themselves acquainted with any Oriental languages may be able to apply for help and instruction.

It was with the intention of supplying this want that the Council of the Imperial Institute conceived the idea of establishing a school of living Oriental languages. But since King's College and University College have for years been labouring with unrequited energy to supply so much of this want as was within their power, it would have been obviously unfair and unwise to establish an institution which should in any of its departments create a rivalry with those already at work within their walls, and it was determined, therefore, to invite them to co-operate in forming a combined school. The advantages of such a plan to all these institutions were so plain that an agreement was readily come to. On the part of the colleges it was shown that they had to offer a staff of professors, libraries, class-rooms, and as regards each a central position. On the other hand, the Imperial Institute would bring great prestige, begotten by the distinguished patronage extended to it, and the stimulus which the Oriental commercial museums which are to be formed in connexion with it will give to Oriental studies.

At the present moment there is at University College an Indian department similar to those established at Oxford and Cambridge in full working order. There is a special residential hall set apart for those Indian students who may desire to live in college, and there is a staff of professors prepared to teach all the principal languages of India. At King's College, where there is no such distinctly Indian department, there are professors of various Indian as well as of the most important non-Indian languages, and there are residential chambers for students. So far as the framework of an Oriental school, therefore, is concerned, the colleges are in full possession of all that is necessary. The particular lines also which they have adopted have marked out with sufficient clearness the part which each should play in the new school. It is obviously to the convenience of all concerned that the Indian languages should continue to be taught at University College, and that King's College should rather devote itself to that portion of its present work which is directed to giving instruction in the other Oriental tongues. This is the system on which the work to be done will be distributed, and, in accordance with it, Sanskrit, Bengali, Hindi, Hindustani, Tamil, Telugu, Punjabi, Pali, Marathi, Gujarati, Arabic, and Persian will be especially taught at University College in connexion with the school; while colloquial Arabic and Persian, Modern Greek, Russian, Turkish, Chinese, Burmese, Japanese, Malay, and Suaheli will be taught in the same way at King's College.

The school thus proposes to cast a very wide net, but not too wide a one when the national requirements are duly considered. Roughly speaking, the troops of young men who year by year go out to the East may be classified under the heads of Indian Civil Servants, Consular and Colonial Officers, Mercantile Clerks, and Missionaries. Of these the Indian Civil Servants alone are taught anything of the languages of the districts to which they are going before they leave our shores. But, strange as it may appear, neither these nor the Consular and Colonial officials are allowed to take up any Oriental language at the initial examinations which qualify them for Eastern appointments; and it is only after they have passed into the Service that the Indian Civil Servants are sent to the Universities to study Oriental languages. By virtue of this privilege, however, these officers possess a distinct advantage over the student interpreters who go out to the Levant and the extreme East. These unfortunate young gentlemen have no Oriental training in England at all. Having passed a fairly severe examination in general subjects, they are sent out in entire ignorance of the languages they are destined to study, and without having furnished any assurance of their capacity to learn them. Further, on arriving at Constantinople or Tōkiō they are not passed into the hands of any such qualified Professors as those who instruct the more fortunate Indian Civil Servants at the English Universities, but are put down to text-books with munshis, who know as much about grammar, as we understand the word, as they do about the differential calculus. These unlearned literati succeed probably in drilling a certain amount of colloquial and literary knowledge of the languages into their pupils by the rule of thumb, but they are quite incapable of teaching them scientifically, or with the slightest regard to comparative philology. The result is that, in nine cases out of ten, their pupils never acquire a mastery of the languages they are called upon to study, and never attain to exact scholarship.

But the mercantile clerks reach a still lower level of linguistic ignorance. For them no munshis are provided, and they are too often discouraged by their seniors on the spot from undertaking independent study, apparently on no more intelligent principle than that which guided the fox without a tail in the advice he gave to his fellows. It cannot be denied that a knowledge of the language of the country in which a man resides must be of benefit to him, whatever may be his calling or taste. But yet so entirely are Oriental studies neglected by English merchants that not one in a hundred ever dreams of even learning enough to make himself commonly intelligible to the natives. Until quite lately there was at Bombay only one merchant who could converse in the vernacular, and as a case in point it may be mentioned that if it had not been for the knowledge thus possessed the Government would have been without information of several important movements—political and social—among the natives, and that individually a prosperous career would have fallen far short of its ultimate success.

This and similar other instances illustrate the advantages which must inevitably accrue to merchants from a knowledge of the language of the country in which they reside. But experience has proved that, except in a very few cases, merchants never learn Oriental languages unless they have had some grammatical knowledge of them before going abroad. It is much easier to speak "pidgin English" than to learn Hindustani or Chinese, especially when all the drudgery connected with the beginning of such studies has to be encountered under the debilitating influences of a high thermometer. A preliminary course of study in England would materially lighten the work to be done on the spot, and would give the student a more intelligent knowledge of the language than he can ever hope to gain from the instruction of the most learned munshi. This grounding the new school, which will open its doors next term, desires to impart, and the movement deserves the ungrudging support of all those who are interested in our Eastern Empire and commerce.

PROHIBITION IN CANADA.

WHATEVER may be the truth as to the effects of Sunday Closing in Wales, there is no doubt whatever as to the effect of Prohibition in Canada. It has proved a disastrous failure. This assertion we shall have no difficulty in justifying. Indeed, it is not denied in Canada, as will be gathered from the quotations printed below from leading journals of the Dominion friendly to the (so-called) Temperance cause. As most people know, and as everybody should know, Canada possesses a stringent liquor law—the Canada Temperance Act, generally known as the Scott Act, after the name of its promoter. This Act, adopted by the Dominion Parliament in 1878, provides that, by a bare majority of voters, the selling of intoxicants may be prohibited in any county or town, except for sacramental, medicinal, or industrial purposes. The penalties for violation of this edict are 50 dollars for the first offence, 100 dollars for the second offence, and imprisonment for the third offence. With commendable foresight, however, a clause was inserted providing that, after the Act had been in force three years, a test vote as to its repeal may be demanded. But for this provision it is horrible to think how drunkenness and its attendant crime would have continued to thrive under the stimulating influence of the Act. Fortunately full advantage has been taken of this permissive clause, and the drink traffic, freed from the fostering influence of this ill-conceived law, is assuming healthy proportions once more. In a word, then, the Act has been repealed in all parts of the country. It is impossible by any amount of argument to add force to this fact. And those who do not appreciate it will appreciate nothing. It means that those who, by their votes, carried the Act into force in the first instance have, upon experience of its working, become convinced that it does harm instead of good, and so much so that its repeal is preferable to its continued enforcement. The enforcement of the Act at all implies a majority in the locality anxious to advance the cause of temperance; and the repeal of the Act after trial clearly expresses the opinion of this same temperance-loving majority upon the results of the Act. What evidence could be stronger?

During the present year seventeen counties and two towns have joined the revolt against Prohibition—namely, Colchester, Lennox and Addington, Kent, Frontenac, Victoria, Northumberland and Durham, Brant, Wellington, Lanark, Ontario (a county, of course, of the province Ontario), Lincoln, Carleton, St. Thomas, Leeds and Grenville, Oxford, Lambton, and Middlesex (counties), Guelph and Peterborough (towns). In the greater number of instances the majorities for repeal are sweeping and unmistakable; in some cases they are far greater than the majorities by which the Act was adopted. Thus, in the county of Wellington 1,430 voted in favour of the Act in the first instance. It is now repealed there by a majority of 1,570. In Carleton county eleven voters carried the law into force. A majority of 500 now testifies to its disastrous results. Such figures as these, together with the fact that in no single instance has the Act been sustained, speak for themselves. Here is an instructive news paragraph from a late number of the Canadian Gazette:—"In connexion with the recent Scott Act contest at Colchester, where the Act was adopted in 1882, it is noteworthy that the most active workers for repeal were, not the liquor-sellers, but the Temperance people. The fact seems hardly credible, but is claimed as none the less true, that more actual freedom was experienced under nominal prohibition than under license." Comment upon this is, indeed, superfluous.

Even more instructive are the remarks and confessions which have appeared in leading Canadian newspapers avowedly favourable to the cause of Prohibition. Thus the Montreal Gazette, one of the leading "Liberal-Conservative" journals of Canada, says respecting the recent discomfitures of the coercive party:—"The defeat is overwhelming; it is much more than was calculated upon, and, coming after last year's repeated rebuffs, can only be regarded as a popular condemnation of legislation which, theoretically good and unquestionably productive of good results, has been shown to be incapable of efficient enforcement." The Toronto Globe, which may be defined as the Daily News of Canada—the official and authoritative Liberal organ—says:—"Having fairly tried a measure intended to prohibit liquor-selling over a small district, the people find that the thing cannot be effectively done. Intoxicants come in all along the borders of a Scott Act area. They are sold in spite of every possible vigilance, with the connivance of a large part of the population." The Toronto Mail—perhaps the leading newspaper of the Dominion, remarks:—"It is obvious that on trial the Scott Act has not fulfilled the expectations of its friends. In some places those who voted for the Act subsequently became half-hearted, and in other localities the officials did not enforce the law, and the result was a laxity greater than prevails under the licensing system." These extracts from the three principal journals of Canada, which, were there space, could be multiplied a hundredfold, fairly represent the opinion of the Canadian press upon this subject, and, coupled with the facts upon which they are based—the defeat of the Act all over the country at the polls—should, we think, carry conviction to the mind of every intelligent fair-minded person. Had we space it would be desirable to point out precisely how and why this law, seemingly so simple, so effective, and so well intended, has failed—and always must fail. It would be useful, also, to dwell upon some of the injurious, but quite unforeseen, effects, unconnected with the actual liquor traffic, which it has wrought. Much might be said, for instance, as to the terrible growth, and effects, of perjury at prosecutions under the Act; and upon the evil effects of a fanatical "Temperance" party at Parliamentary elections, swaying very frequently the balance of power, and subordinating all graver considerations to the advancement of its particular doctrines. But these things can be imagined by any reasonable person: the facts are the facts.

INFORMACÓN FOR PYLGRYMES.

GUIDE-BOOKS to the Holy Land were in brisk demand during the early part of the sixteenth century. Three editions of Wynkin de Worde's Informacón for Pylgrymes into the Holy Londe have come down, and there may have been other issues that were thumbed out of existence. One copy, preserved in the Advocates' Library, is undated; in Heber's noble collection (Biblioth. Heber., Part IV. p. 123) there was a copy dated 1515; and a writer in the second volume of the Retrospective Review (1820) described the 1524 edition, which may be seen in the library of St. John's College, Cambridge. The Advocates' undated edition was reprinted in 1824 for the Roxburghe Club, but only thirty-five copies were struck off.

In the sixteenth century pilgrims to the Holy Land seem to have been very anxious to accomplish the journey out and home with the least possible amount of fatigue or inconvenience; and the old guide-book was at considerable pains to show how the thing might be done comfortably and economically. When the pilgrim reached Venice he could proceed to "Porte Jaffie" either in a galley or in one of the large vessels known as "carracks." It was cheaper to go by "carrack," the return fare by galley being fifty ducats ("for to be in a goode honest place, and to haue your ease in the gally and also to be cherysshed") and by carrack thirty. A pilgrim travelling by galley was to be careful to choose a place "in the ouermost stage, for in the lowest vnder it is ryghte euyll & smouldryng hote and stynkyng." If he went by carrack he was to secure "a chambre as nyghe the myddes of the shippe as ye may, for there is leest rolyng or romblyng to kepe your brayne & stomacke in tempre." The pilgrim should not be in a hurry to pay down his passage money; let him first go before the Duke of Venice and have the "patron" (sea-captain) bound in the sum of a thousand ducats "to kepe all manere couenauntes." Drive a stiff bargain, is the advice given, and hold the patron to it. Stipulate that he shall call at certain ports to get fresh water, fresh bread, and fresh meat; that he shall not tarry longer than three days at any port without the consent of the pilgrims; and that he is not to ship any obnoxious cargo in the course of the voyage. Furthermore, the patron must clearly understand that the pilgrim is to be provided every day with "hote meete twyes at two meeles, the fore none at dyner and the after noon at supper." It is of the utmost importance that the pilgrim should be amply supplied with wine; but he will find himself dry-throated unless he exercises keen foresight and strict vigilance. He should take on board two ten-gallon barrels of red wine (and half that quantity of water), for after leaving Venice he will be unable to procure wine, though he may offer twenty ducats for a barrel. Having purchased his stock of wine he must take care to keep it for his own consumption. Let him therefore hire a chest, with a lock, key, and a "lytyll doore." Inside, against the door, he must lay the barrel that is first to be broached; the other barrels may lie at the further end of the chest, with his "brede, chese, spyces, and all other thynges." It is highly necessary to secrete the wine, for "if y^e shipmen or other pylgrymes may com therto they wol tame [broach] and drynke of it." With his wine in the locker, and the key in his pocket, he can pace the deck equo animo.

Our pilgrim should provide himself with a bed ("a fether bed," of course), a mattress, two pairs of sheets, and a quilt. All these could be bought at a shop beside St. Mark's for the lump sum of three ducats; and the obliging shopkeeper would repurchase the articles at half price from the pilgrim on his return, even though the bed were brought home broken. "Marke," says this wariest of counsellors, "his hous & his name that ye bought it of ayenst ye come to Venyse."

It is satisfactory for a pilgrim to be sure of having hot meat served twice a day by the captain. So far so good; but what about poultry? Hire a cage, advises the guide-book, and put half a dozen hens or chickens inside. At the same time, remember to buy half a bushel of "myle sede at Venyse for theym."

Before starting it must be settled that the boat is not to touch at "Famagust in Cypres," for it will be all over with the pilgrim if he is detained at that unwholesome port, where air and water are alike corrupt. Many Englishmen and travellers from other countries have perished there; verbum sap. When the pilgrim goes ashore at the various ports he must beware of eating fruits, particularly melons. If a stay of three days is to be made at any port, he should disembark without a moment's delay, secure the best lodging in the town, and then hasten to buy up the choicest "vytaye" before the other pilgrims appear on the scene. At Jaffa the pilgrims leave the ship and take to mules or asses; therefore he must make every effort to get the best beast, "for ye shall paye no more for the best than for the worst." He must be cautious when he is out walking in Jaffa, "for the Sarrasyns wol go talking bi you & make gode chere, but they woll stele from you yf they maye."

A full list is given of the spots that the pilgrim should visit at Jerusalem and in the neighbourhood. Among them are the house of the rich man "whyche denyed Lazare the crümes of brede" and the chapel "where Jhū Criste was prysoned whyle his crosse was in shapyng." The houses of Pontius Pilate and Herod were also on view. That the pilgrim may not be altogether at the mercy of the Saracens, a brief vocabulary of the "langage of Moreske" is appended. It is better to teach by example than by precept; so the writer gives an account of a journey to Jerusalem made by a party of forty-six pilgrims, who set sail from Venice on a June day in a ship belonging to a certain John Moreson. The company made a lengthened stay at Crete in very hot weather, and they were also detained at Rhodes. Once the ship was nearly wrecked on some dangerous rocks; but, on the whole, things went very smoothly. With hot meat twice a day (and a pen of poultry in reserve), with a cupboard rather than a chest full of wine, and a feather-bed, what had a pilgrim to fear?

CETTINJE.

THE usual way of reaching Cetinje is viâ Cattaro. On landing a choice is offered of a seven-hours' drive or a five-hours' walk. For those who are stout of wind and limb the latter is decidedly preferable. Striking straight through the little town, the walker finds himself in ten minutes face to face with the towering mountain he has to climb. There is no deception about it, no gentle slopes, and no illusive succession of primarily unseen crests. It lies in all its craggy grandeur with its feet touching the sea and its brow in the clouds, and if the heart quails it is better to turn back at once, for the descent is only a few degrees less arduous than the climb. The first half of the ascent is made along a series of eighty or ninety zigzag paths whose elbows are sometimes only a few yards from each other, so steep is the gradient. At the last of these a small plateau is reached, from which the lovely Bocche can be viewed, spread out like a panorama below. After this the path runs here and there, straggling ever upwards over rock and boulder till the summit of Kerstaz is attained, and then the horizon is wider still, and the mountains which shut in the Bay of Cattaro are dwarfed till the eye passes clear over them to the Adriatic beyond. An idea of the sheerness of the mountain-side can be obtained by throwing a stone from the top, which will fall almost on the spot from whence the start was made a couple of hours before. From Kerstaz we cross the Negush plain, and then struggle up the opposite mountain, which brings us in full view of the snow-capped heights of Albania, with the Lake of Scutari glinting in the mist and distance. Another hour or so and we enter Cetinje, the most extraordinary capital in Europe. It consists of one long street, with four smaller ones crossing it, and ending vaguely in the fields. The whole town covers perhaps thirty or forty acres. The principal building is the hotel, which worthily blocks the end of the main street. It is a bare and ricketty-looking structure, but represents the acme of luxury at Cetinje. The other public places are the prison, the church, and the school. The first of these lies on the right-hand side, and in front of the gates, on a lawn, the prisoners amuse themselves by playing various rude games—bowls, with pieces of rock for balls, leap-frog, and so on. A few of them are engaged in odd building jobs about Cetinje, and others hew wood in the mountain. They are not chained, but appear seldom to dream of running away. When a case of evasion happens, one or two fellow-convicts are despatched to catch the runaway and bring him back. The theory of setting a thief to catch a thief is here practised most literally and methodically. The only distinction between a condemned convict and a free citizen is that the former is deprived of his arms. This is an equal degradation to the usual dress or brand elsewhere. Close to the Hotel is the Royal Palace, a whitewashed house with green venetian blinds, which is popularly supposed to have cost a million of francs, owing to the expenses of transporting the materials. Over against it is a long, low, red building, known as the "Bigliardo." It received this nickname from an English billiard-table having been set up there. The carrying of this piece of furniture by fifty men over the mountain was considered—and undoubtedly was—a great feat. Whilst the porters struggled manfully under the slate, a pilot stood astride on high, and shouted his directions as to how to get round awkward corners. The "Bigliardo" is now used as offices for the different Ministries and a Parliament-house. The church is very small, capable of holding, perhaps, a hundred and fifty people. On either side of the entrance are the tombs of Prince Danilo and his brother Mirko Petrovitch, and in the chancel a sort of sarcophagus, which is opened on solemn occasions, containing the embalmed remains of the Bishop-Prince Peter I. The old monastery faces the Palace. Fifty or sixty years ago this monastery and twenty or thirty cottages round it represented the town of Cetinje. Behind the monastery is the famous Tower of Skulls. In the old days no Montenegrin was entitled to be considered an able-bodied soldier until he had decorated the Tower with a Turkish head. The last occasion on which it received its ghastly decorations was after the battle of Grahovo, which took place on the 13th July, 1859. The Montenegrins lost four hundred men, and brought in four thousand skulls, at least so says tradition. The account is more or less confirmed by independent witnesses, one of whom, an Austrian officer, counted two thousand three hundred skeletons on the field several weeks after the famous fight. The custom has, however, now died out, having been abolished, together with most practices of a similar nature, by the Draconian code and inflexible rule of Danilo I. This Prince endeavoured to put an end to the vendetta, amongst other barbarities, and his successor, the present sovereign, carried on the system with such success that, although at first his subjects refused to believe in the sincerity of his determination, a few summary executions of offenders sufficed entirely to stamp out the crime, which is now the subject of a special convention with Turkey. The last instance of vendetta occurred in the beginning of the present year, when an officer of Prince Nicolas's household, smarting under the rimbecco or taunt of having an unavenged death in his family, decoyed some relatives of the murderer into a boat on the Lake of Scutari and there assassinated them. With some reluctance he was sentenced to be shot at Rijeka, on the shores of the Lake, and he fell before the firing party, crying out "Long live Prince Nicolas! Long live his family!"

The sentiments of blind devotion to the Sovereign are probably coloured with a religious tinge from the days when the ruler was Vladika, or Supreme Head of the Church as well as of the State. Such as they are they constitute a priceless guarantee of national unity and order. Amidst the dynastic questions which trouble the rest of the Balkans there never has been, and never will be, any wavering in the loyalty of the Montenegrins for their Prince and his stock. Together with this feeling of almost worshipful reverence for the authority of the Palace is a pleasant sense of individual equality. The Prince has been designed by Providence to rule, but his family and relations are not otherwise distinguished from those around them. The Princess Milena was a peasant girl, who one day washed the feet of the royal traveller in her father's cottage in the mountains, and now stretches her hand to be kissed by the Grand Dukes of Russia. In the street of Cetinje, or under the Tree of Justice, Prince Nicolas and his family could not be picked out by a stranger from the rest of the crowd. Proud as they are and jealous of certain appurtenances of rank—especially when abroad or in the presence of strangers—the Montenegrins are eminently republican in their habits of daily life. A group of three or four may be seen smoking round a table or taking an evening stroll, all dressed alike with an arsenal in their belts and the inevitable strouka, or raw goat's-hair blanket, thrown over the shoulder. One is perhaps the hotel proprietor (related to the Prince), the second the Minister of War, the third a tailor, the fourth a sheepowner, and the fifth the President of the Senate. The priests have no distinctive costume, but can be readily recognized by their long hair and beards, and by their carrying no arms in times of peace. As a rule, the men wear only a moustache, and it is considered slovenly for any but a priest to let the beard grow. As a race they present an almost perfect embodiment of all that is admirable in physique. The average height is considerably over six feet, and their frames are splendidly proportioned, broad and deep in the chest and lean in the loins, with long sinewy limbs and not an ounce of spare flesh. They offer a good example of the survival of the fittest, as they take very little care of their children, and only the strong and sound grow up. In after life, too, they are extremely averse to any sanitary precautions or medical treatment, and a sick Montenegrin is almost synonymous with a dead man. At least he at once gives himself up, and if he recovers looks upon it as a curious instance of a freak in nature's laws. They have no fear of death, and endure the severest bodily pain with incredible fortitude. The few who submit to surgical operations invariably refuse anæsthetics, and converse with their friends smoking a cigarette whilst a leg or arm is being amputated. The doctor of the hospital has consequently very little work to do beyond making unique observations on this unique population. If the men are remarkable in many ways, their wives and daughters are little less so in others. The ladies in Montenegro play the secondary rôle which always falls to their lot in patriarchal communities. In the lower classes they perform the whole work of the house and the fields, tilling the soil, gathering the harvest, and even building their own cottages, whilst their lords and masters play backgammon and otherwise amuse themselves in each other's company. In the better ranks of life they still take a very unequal half of life, staying at home all day, and taking upon themselves all the worries of existence, leaving the sweets for mankind. The result of centuries of this training has been to obliterate much of the feminine grace and timidity from their manners and character. But while treating them with little outward show of admiration, the Montenegrin has a profound respect, well merited, for the virtues of the other sex, and nowhere perhaps could a young girl enjoy such perfect liberty of action and movement as in the Black Mountain. It is common to meet a peasant damsel of fifteen or sixteen years old alone and halfway between Cetinje and Cattaro—a journey which she will make on foot there and back two or three times a week to sell eggs and buy fish. And woe betide the man who should offer her the slightest insult by word or look.

It would be easy to write a couple of volumes on the life and habits of Cetinje, and it is somewhat surprising that nobody appears yet to have taken the trouble to do so. Beyond one work in Russian and another in French—written, in reality, by a Servian officer, though his name is not on the title-page—little of any value has ever yet been published on Montenegro. Even for a passing visit it would be difficult to find any place with so many original attractions. Like Japan, however, it will probably get spoilt as soon as it is included among the happy hunting-grounds of the globe-trotter. At present a capital where there are no lawyers and no bankers, no Jews and no policemen, could only exist in a country without a Custom House or a passport office, and such a land sounds almost like a Utopia. But it is a real State, and long may it live.

THE WORLD'S WHEAT HARVEST THIS YEAR.

SO far as the information yet collected enables us to judge, the world's wheat harvest this year will fall somewhat short of the world's consumption. At the beginning of July the crops all over Western and Central Europe, with the exception of Italy, promised well; but since then the weather has been unfavourable, and much injury has been done in Germany, France, and this country. The harvest in Spain and Portugal appears to have been got in in excellent condition, and its quantity is large. But in France reaping was frequently interrupted by heavy rains, and consequently has been unusually protracted. It is said, too, that the quality proves to be not nearly as good as a little time ago was expected. Indeed, where threshing has taken place disappointment is expressed in many districts. Here at home it is certain that much corn has been lodged and twisted, mildew has here and there made its appearance, and, unless there is an early change in the weather, it is to be feared that our farmers will again be completely disappointed. In Germany the only districts from which good reports are received are those west of the Rhine. Still, it seems to be well established that the yield throughout Western Europe will be larger than it was last year. The home estimate is somewhat over the average production. And it is anticipated by many that France will need to import only about 3 millions of quarters, while some are sanguine enough to hope that her home yield will equal the consumption. But drought and heat have done great damage in Austria-Hungary, Roumania, and Southern Russia. There appears to be no reasonable doubt that these countries will have a much smaller surplus to export than they had last year. Russia, of course, is the most important European wheat-exporting country, and respecting the probable Russian yield there is much difference of opinion. All authorities are agreed that the winter wheat crop is a failure; but it is evidence of the little trust reposed in Russian official returns that the commercial world refuses to accept the official statement of the proportion borne by the winter crop to the spring crop. The official estimate is 30 per cent. of the whole yield; but commercial reports make it very much higher. Again, commercial reports are far less favourable respecting the quantity and quality of the spring wheat crop than are the official returns. The point is of very great importance. During the past two years the Russian harvests were so good that they supplied the demands of the rest of Europe with a very slight rise in prices. If, as the official returns represent, two-thirds of this year's crop are again good, the deficiency in Europe will be very much less than it will be if the commercial estimate is correct. Upon the whole, it will be safest to assume that the Russian surplus this year will be small, and, if so, it appears certain that the European production will fall very much short of the European consumption.

Turning to the wheat-exporting countries outside Europe, we find from the Indian Government's official memorandum that the present year's harvest in the Punjab shows an increase of $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. over that of last year, and the harvest of Scinde an increase of 9 per cent. But, on the other hand, there is a falling off in Bombay and in the Central and North-West Provinces of 23 per cent. The yield, then, must be regarded as under the average. The Australasian harvest will barely suffice for home wants, and the only other important source of supply is the United States. The winter wheat crop there, which was a failure last year, is good this year. And, although the last report of the Agricultural Bureau shows that on the first of this month there was some falling off in the spring wheat crop compared with the previous month, and that, therefore, it will not yield as much as some time ago was expected, it practically is equal in condition to what it was at the same date last year. It will be recollected that the spring wheat crop last year was about an average yield. The American harvest, then, upon the whole, will be decidedly better than that of last year; but whether the increase in America will offset the falling off in Russia it is impossible to say as yet. Upon the whole, however, as the only marked improvement amongst the principal wheat-exporting countries of the world is in the United States, while there is a decided deterioration in Russia, Austria-Hungary, Roumania, and Australasia, it seems safe to infer that the yield of the whole world will be less than it was last year, and, therefore, will not be sufficient to supply the world's consumption during the next twelve months. The deficiency will have to be made up from the stocks of old grain remaining over from recent harvests, and the course of prices will, therefore, depend upon the magnitude of those stocks. A memorandum issued at Simla early last month by the Revenue and Agricultural Department states that the last three seasons have been more or less unfavourable to the cultivation and export of wheat from India, and that in consequence of this and of the larger local consumption of the grain in store, owing to partial failure of this year's early crops of other kinds, the stocks of wheat at the beginning of the present agricultural year were not large, and in a few places were reported to be insufficient. Therefore, the memorandum concludes that the exports during the current year will not exceed those of the past year. In Australasia it is estimated that there is no surplus for export, either from old harvests or from the yield of the present year. And if this be so, we have mainly to look to the old stocks in Europe and in America to make good the deficiency of the present year's harvest. Unfortunately, there exist no trustworthy statistics as to the quantity of those stocks. We have to depend largely upon mere estimates.

Adding the estimated stocks in the United Kingdom twelve months ago to the recorded imports since, and comparing the total with the estimated consumption, it does not appear probable that the stocks in store now are unusually large, and the accepted opinion is that the stocks in the other wheat-importing countries of Europe are rather lower than they were twelve months ago. The imports into France, more particularly, during the past twelve months have been smaller than was anticipated, from which it seems to follow that the old stocks must have been drawn upon, unless, indeed, the harvest of 1888 was decidedly better than it is generally believed to have been. As the American harvest of 1888 was decidedly deficient, it seems reasonable to conclude that the stocks now held there are smaller rather than larger than usual, although it must be added that what is called the visible supply—that is to say, the stocks that are known to be held by traders and farmers—do not show a deficiency. In Russia, on the other hand, it appears certain that the old stocks are very large. The harvests, both of 1887 and 1888 were exceptionally good, both as regards quantity and quality. And though the exports during the two years were on an immense scale, there yet seems to be no reason to doubt the statement of the Russian Government that the old stocks still retained are very large. If so, there appears to be no ground for expecting much rise in price. That clearly is the opinion of millers; for they show no eagerness to buy, and there has been no material advance in quotations. At the moment France is not competing with this country for foreign wheat. And, if the present estimate proves correct that she will require but a very small import during the next twelve months, the course of prices will depend, at least for some months to come, mainly upon the character of the weather here at home during the next few weeks. It is generally believed that the crop of the United Kingdom is up to the average. And, though it is laid, and twisted, and otherwise damaged in many places, it is yet generally admitted that a few weeks of heat and bright sunshine would remedy much of the damage, and would enable farmers to get in what is yet uncut in good condition. If they can do this, the grain will be fit for milling purposes without an admixture of foreign corn; threshing will proceed rapidly, and the supplies sent to market will be large. But if the weather does not improve, and the grain in consequence proves too soft for milling, the demand for foreign grain will increase, and some rise in price must be looked for. Even so, however, the rise is not likely to be very considerable. India, according to the official memorandum referred to above, will send us this year nearly as much as she did last year; America will send us considerably more; and, although the Russian surplus from the crop now being harvested will be much less than the surplus of the two preceding crops, the stocks remaining over from these two crops can be largely drawn upon. Besides, though the miscellaneous countries from which we receive supplies are unimportant taken singly, in the aggregate they can furnish very considerable quantities, and a slight increase in the demand here will bring out supplies sufficient to prevent any material advance in prices.

NATIONAL INSURANCE IN GERMANY.

THE National Insurance legislation of Germany, and especially the Act of 1889, deserves far more attention than it has yet received in this country. Entirely without parallel in the history of nations, it has taken theory rather than experience as its guide. It is a complete leap in the dark; a gigantic experiment in State Socialism, conducted and enforced by a despotic monarchy.

Under the Act of 1889 every Saturday night every dependent workman above the age of sixteen, whether male or female, will be called upon to pay a fixed proportion of his or her wages into a common fund of national insurance. Every employer of labour is bound to contribute a sum equivalent to the total amount contributed by his workmen, and the State supplements these sums by a grant of 2*l.* 10*s.* (50 marks) to each pension. The object of the insurance is threefold (i.) against sickness; (ii.) against accident; (iii.) against old age. The first two objects were attained by previous legislation; the third is the subject of the Act of 1889. The workmen who are thus compelled to insure are divided into four classes according to their wages:—

Class I.	350 marks and under, or £17 10 s. a year,	pays 1 d. a week
" II.	550 " " or £27 10 s. " "	2 d. "
" III.	850 " " or £42 10 s. " "	2 d. "
" IV.	Between 850 and 950 marks, or £47 10 s. a year,	3 d. "

The scale of pensions to which these payments entitle the workmen necessarily vary with the amount of the weekly premiums. At seventy every workman is ipso facto entitled to a pension for old age, and this pension varies between 7*l.* 7*s.* a year in Class I. and 20*l.* 15*s.* in Class IV. For the purpose of insurance the year is divided into forty-seven weeks. Cards are issued to each workman with forty-seven spaces, and, as the employer deducts the weekly amount, a stamp is affixed in the space. When the card is completed it represents the owner's claim for the year, and is deposited in the official pigeon-hole. It is calculated that in 1891, when the Act will be brought into full working order, it will affect twelve million workmen.

Such in brief outline is the effect of the National Insurance legislation in Germany. In this country it is probable that the scheme would be vigorously opposed as an undue extension of State interference which destroys the principle of self-help. Apart from this initial question, it would be easy to point out the indeterminateness of many of the provisions of the Act or the financial dangers through which it must pass until capital has accumulated to meet the claims. Nor would it be difficult to put forward a strong case that the benefits are trifling, while the burden is enormous. Dealing as the Acts do with three different classes of insurance, consolidation is almost impossible, and the expenses of management greatly increased. Thus in the old age insurances the organization is territorial; in the accident insurances the organization depends upon the nature of the employment; in the sickness insurances the organization is local in order that successful malingering may be rendered more difficult. So, again, the results of the Acts are necessarily doubtful. In all probability they will lower the rate of wages, diminish employment, raise the price of commodities, decrease the letting value of land, and lead to an extension of the policy of Protection. On the other hand, they will probably check the tide of emigration; for the pensions will only be paid to German subjects, and increase the expenses of war, since the State, as the employer of a nation under conscription, ought to discharge the duties imposed by this Act upon employers of labour of contributing a third to the pension fund.

But, passing by these points of criticism or speculation, the remarkable and striking features of the legislation are the State contribution and the political design which lurks behind the ostensible object of the Chancellor. These two points hang closely together. It is an application of the principle of the progressive Income-tax, an attempt to redress by taxation the inequalities of property, a seizure of one man's goods for the benefit of another, an attack upon the capitalists and commercial middle classes who form the backbone of the "Liberal" party and supply the bulk of the opponents to the domestic policy of the Chancellor.

A brief retrospect makes this clear. The Insurance laws originated in the collapse of trade in 1878. Before that date Delbruck's Free-trade policy commanded the confidence of the Chancellor. But commercial depression and political management produced a reaction. On the one side, agriculture was protected by heavy import duties, while, as compensation for the taxation of necessities, the lower orders were promised a course of social legislation in their special interests. On the other side, in order to check the Liberal middle classes, the Government not only coquetted with the masses, but destroyed the independence of political life by exceptional laws, nominally directed against the Socialists. By the imposition of protective duties, the promise of social legislation, and the propagation of Socialist scares, the Conservatives secured a majority at the elections; and thus was begun the policy, which has been steadily pursued since 1878, of conciliating the masses, and using the dread of revolution to curtail the liberties of the subject, the press, and public meeting. The Crown offers to play the part of Social Democrat if the people will make it absolute master of its political opponents. At first the German Government gave less than it took. Its new social policy was inaugurated with more show than substance. It was only when the elections of 1881 had increased the strength of the Liberal party to formidable proportions that it was roused to activity. By prodigal promises to the masses of the approaching removal of all want and distress, and by severity in enforcing arbitrary measures against the Social Democrats, it endeavoured to check the progress of German Liberalism. It is in pursuance of this political policy that the Government carried its schemes of national insurance against sickness in 1883 and against accident in 1884. It was as the completion of this same campaign that the Chancellor, by an almost unexampled exercise of his personal influence, secured, though by the smallest of majorities, the passing of the Act of 1889 for national insurance against old age.

REVIEWS.

SONGS AND LIFE OF AN ANGLER.*

HERE is one good book among the few good books which appear between the seasons. Mr. Thomas Tod Stoddart was the best angler of the old school, when men could still fish down stream, and yet load themselves with trout, when the fall of the dry fly was yet unknown on Scotch and unfamiliar even on English waters. Mr. Stoddart was an angler first, a poet next, and in the earlier part of his long life he was intimate with Christopher North, the Shepherd, Aytoun, and other glories of Blackwood's Magazine. His poems were for the more part written in youth, and some half-dozen of his fishing songs are of the first merit. His Death Wake: a Necromant in Three Chimæras, is now very rare. If we may judge by the account of the plot and the extracts, Stoddart had appropriated a good deal of Shelley, something of Keats, and animated it all with the spirit of Pétrus Borel. It is odd to think that, just when Pétrus and Philothée were running their rigs in Paris, a young Scot was out-doing them in their own vein of romance during the winter months, when fishing was out of the question. It is no exaggeration to say that the Death Wake should take its place in any collection of the Romantiques, and yet it is most unlikely that the author had even glanced at Hugo or Gautier, not to speak of Feu et Flamme.

A more orderly account should be given of a life and talent so original—a talent which touched that of the Lycanthrope on one side, of Thoreau on another, and of Walton on a third. Happily, the Memoir of her father by Miss Stoddart is a pearl of a memoir—not a word too long, not padded out in the modern way with letters and scraps. Indeed, writing on a day of deluge in front of his own loch, St. Mary's, we could wish that Miss Stoddart had written a longer book, and had even rescued a few angling letters, if any exist. How different is this brief, natural, humorous record from the prodigious volumes of theatrical sumphisms and newspaper cuttings! how different from the hotchpotch of correspondence which is offered as the biography of notorious nobodies in politics, religion, literature! Miss Stoddart's book is all good; it is a book of which a man should have two copies—one to keep with his fly-book in the pocket of his coat, and to lie in the boat with the landing-net and creel; another copy to bind in morocco and place among honoured volumes on his shelves. There is quite a little library of Stoddart literature, including the original edition of the Poems, the Death Wake (if that could be found in shop or stall), the Angler's Companion (1847), and the novel Abel Massinger, which we have never had the good luck to come across. Miss Stoddart, in the next edition of her book, should print a bibliography of her father, for his old green-clad volumes "keep their green," and are valued by the persons whom he would have liked to like them.

The Stoddarts are of the old gentle blood of the Borders, though not sprung from any of the reiving clans. Miss Stoddart thinks the name was originally Stoutheart, basing this opinion on an ancient tombstone (1462) in the churchyard above St. Mary's Loch. But the letters on the stone are now obliterated, and oral tradition alone speaks of this etymology. An old lady of the family burned most of the ancient documents, conceiving that she was bewitched, and that the seals on the papers were mixed up with the malison. The Stoddarts held lands in the forest, and possessed Williamshope, which marches, we think, with Ashiesteil and Elibank. They were on the Covenanting side. One of them, "the Beetle of Yarrow," was a man of enormous force. When his kindred had assembled round his death-bed, as they hoped, to hear his will read, he arose, a "gey gash" figure, and told them he would marry yet, and balk their greed. In this adventure he was successful. Mr. Stoddart's father, Captain Stoddart, was a great genealogist, and haunted the kirkyard of Yarrow, studying the inscriptions on the family tombs. A caricature was designed, probably by Tom his son, "in which he sat grim and silent on a low churchyard wall, rod in hand, fishing in the moonlight in a sea of ruined graves overgrown with nettles," and below the legend ran:—

His rod was made of the Family Tree,
His line was a long line of ancestry;
He baited his hook with dead men's marrow,
And he sat and he bobbed for the Beetle of Yarrow.
He bobbed till the moon rose over the hill,
And, for aught that I know, he is sitting there still,
Though the wind may blow, and the nettles may wave,
And never a rise can be get from the grave.

This is akin to Præd's Red Fisherman.

The Stoddarts intermarried with the Veitchs of the Glen, and they finally produced Captain Stoddart, who fought in the siege of Copenhagen and was honourably mentioned by Sir Ralph Abercromby and Sir Sidney Smith. His warring done, he settled in Edinburgh, and begat Thomas Tod Stoddart. As a child Tom divided his heart between fishing (there were good trout then in the Water of Leith!) and the composition of the most lurid tragedies. "Blood and battle were the powers with which he worked, and no meaner tools." His first trout was caught where there are more golf-balls than fish and more dirt than either, in a burn at Elie. He learned the evil art of potting salmon roe from M. Senebier, a prisoner of the old French war. While it was legal, we regret to say that he captured trout by the hundredweight with salmon-roe. Scotland will never be all she should be while her children fish with bait of every sort, from wasps and maggots to worms and natural minnow. The young Stoddarts' chief holiday was Saturday; they were thrashed if they came home over the border of Sunday; and once they crept into an empty hearse at a toll-door, frightened the driver out of his wits, and were rattled into Edinburgh at an exhilarating pace. In 1825 Stoddart went to lectures in Edinburgh University. He was intended for the Bar;

* Stoddart's Angling Songs; with Memoir. By Anne M. Stoddart. London: Blackwood & Co. 1889.

but he is believed never to have held a brief. Christopher North was one of his professors; and Christopher's son, Mr. John Wilson, his chief friend. At Wilson's house he met Aytoun, Ferrier, De Quincey, Hartley Coleridge, "Delta" (Dr. Moir), the Shepherd of course, and Henry Glassford Bell. In 1828 many of them went to Tibbie Shiels's, on the slender line of land between St. Mary's and the Loch of the Lowes. Here they often fished, danced with the shepherd wenches, and drank a prodigious deal of whisky. Is it not written in the Books of the Chronicles of Ambrose's? Tibbie (Mrs. Richardson) is reported to have said, "I aye likit the Cock o' the North best, that was Professor Wilson ye ken. I likit him, and Mr. Tom Stoddart, and Hogg. Eh, but they were the callants for drinkin'." Though he fished and drank with Hogg, Shelley and Keats (to Wilson's regret) were among his favourite poets. He wrote a Byronic piece, The Curse of the Dead Sea—no trout in that loch—and early in 1831 published with Henry Constable The Death Wake, or Lunacy: a Necromant in Three Chimæras. The pleasing fable is on this wise:—A Monk loves a Nun. He is called to bury a corpse; it is Hers. He goes mad, exhumes her, puts her in a boat, and goes to sea. He touches an island where her father dwells, a remorseful parent. "Here, in an interval of sanity, Julio shrinks from the now loathsome corpse, and tries to tell the Hermit his story." His reason collapses again; the tide bears him and the dead body to the deep; the father finds them and dies on their grave. This is a pretty tale after the manner of 1830. Here is the wedding of the living and the dead:—

He dropped upon a rock and by him placed
Over a bed of sea-pinks growing waste
The silent ladye, and he muttered wild
Strange words about a mother and no child.
"And I shall wed thee, Agathé, although Ours be no God-blest bridal—even so!"
And from the sand he took a silver shell
That had been wasted by the fall and swell
Of many a moon-borne tide into a ring—
A rude rude ring: it was a snow-white thing,
Where a lone hermit limpet slept and died
In ages far away. "Thou art a bride, Sweet Agathé! Wake up, we must not linger!"

Oddly enough The Death Wake was pirated eleven years later in Graham's Magazine without acknowledgment, and with the assumed author's name of Louis Fitzgerald Tasistro. O Edgar Allan Poe! is this among thy feats?

Mr. Stoddart began a new poem with the pleasing title "A Jalon of the Winds." Autant en emporte le vent: a jalon has perished. He now settled down to the serious business of his life—fishing. He gave the Highlands a fair trial, and in the Highlands was the pretty idyl of his love and marriage. The bride had no Sassenach; he had no Gaelic; but she was "more than common tall, with arched black eyebrows, grey eyes, and a cloud of raven hair." The story must be read as Miss Stoddart tells it.

Once married, Mr. Stoddart settled at Kelso, where Tweed and Teviot meet. His best piece is a poem on Tweed, then saddened by "trouble not of clouds nor weeping rain, nor of the setting sun's pathetic light"—the death of Scott. In his old age he walked, or tottered, every day to see Tweed from Kelso Bridge, and he was buried where—

Dreaming through the twilight
That does not rise or set—he might hear the sound "of all others the sweetest to his ear—the murmur of Tweed over his pebbles."

We shall not trespass on Miss Stoddart's angling anecdotes, but leave them to be read in their context. Her book is admirably written, and the gift of literature has clearly been inherited. But as to angling in the Border, Mr. Stoddart practically saw the last of it, so far as trout are concerned. By fishing at unholy hours of night and morning, and with unholy baits, a few fish may yet be gruppit. But, when you find the lone Glengaher burn, twenty miles from a railway station, as thronged with hulking wormers as the Regent's Canal with patient watchers of the float, the game of angling is up. Lime, sheepwash, pollution, nets, every kind of devilry, harry the trout of the remotest burn. A decision of the House of Lords has covered St. Mary's Loch with a flotilla of boats, where, of old, only Lord Napier could launch the light skiff. The people cry out for no preserving, and in another generation trout will be as rare in Yarrow as in the Serpentine. Aill is a desert, Meggat is flogged all day long by every kind of incompetent dabbler. The Worm, the proud worm, is the conqueror "still," as Poe sings, and fly is almost out of use. And, to be fair, it is the attractive writers on angling like Mr. Stoddart who are mostly to blame. In twenty years fishers have multiplied till the Chapelhope burn is mobbed and Loch Skene is "a perfect Peccadeely." Fishing is done:—

Sorrow, sorrow, speed away
To our angler's quiet mound,
With the old pilgrim, twilight grey,
Enter thou the holy ground;
There he sleeps whose heart was twined
With wild stream and wandering burn,
Wooper of the western wind!
Watcher of the April morn!

NOVELS.*

IT is impossible to deal seriously with Anno Domini 2000; or, Woman's Destiny, even if the author was in earnest when he arranged the advancement of the world according to his own views, and placed his theories before the public. It begins in 1920 with the career of a man who died of starvation. This incident caused the leading bankers to meet together and reorganize taxation, and create a fund for the poor, and from that time money was more equally divided, and nobody starved; while, although it is not clearly told, the enfranchisement of woman took place about then. The next great thing for the nation is achieved after the Colonial Ministers have frightened the British into giving Ireland Home Rule, and "United Britain" holds her own once more as the strongest and most important quarter of the globe. Women in A.D. 2000, having equal rights with men, are in the majority in the Federal Parliament, and they are most of them beautiful and young. The Prime Minister is not only lovely, but she is Irish, and she possesses "ease and grace peculiar only to the Irish of high degree." The comforts of the House are in wonderful and distinct contrast to those of ours of to-day. The male statesmen create the most marvellous precedents, and the female Ministers allow their personal feelings to influence them in the formation of a Government to a greater extent than present politicians do. In each of the official interviews we are allowed to peep into, confidential information is demanded and given, before the conference proper begins. The erudite, fascinating, and clear-headed "Under-Secretary of State for Home Affairs," aged twenty-three, Hilda Fitzherbert, is a person greatly perturbed, because she is told she "has no heart." And though there are no criminals, and all are wealthy and contented, it is found advisable to surround the Emperor with detectives. A leading politician, soldier, volunteer, Lord Reginald Paramatta, loves the young Secretary, and, because she refuses him, joins the Opposition. As this does not advance him in any way, he becomes a leader of a secret society, the members of which wish to make Australia a separate Empire. The Detective-in-Chief gets the young Secretary to go to their big meeting, and at a critical moment she jumps lightly on to a dais, touches a button, and all the conspirators, "cloaked and with overshadowing hats," are struck dumb and glued to their positions by "artificial magnetism"; then they are photographed. Lord Reginald escapes, and Hilda is created Duchess of New Zealand, only to be kidnapped and to cause a fight at sea between a yacht which goes thirty miles an hour and a "cruiser" which goes "four times as fast." The chief town of the Empire is Melbourne; "sybaritish" London can be reached in eight or ten days. The author feels very strongly upon the subject of the sluggish luxuriousness of the inhabitants of this island. A very magnificent war is fought with the United States (because the Emperor having once had one interview with the Secretary refuses the red-headed daughter of the Presidentess) in which the "Fourth of July is retrieved," "the States to pay United Britain six million sterling and to salute the British flag." But, instead of paying up, they prefer to be re-annexed, and the union was celebrated with enormous rejoicings." Of such and other things is Anno Domini 2000 composed.

The six stories collected under the heading of Elizabeth; and other Sketches are conceived and executed in a simple and interesting manner. Elizabeth is the natural daughter of a royal prince and a highly-born and beautiful subject who refuses to marry him because of the disadvantages which the marriage would cause him. This lady lives in an old-world and well-secluded garden, and never leaves it from the departure of the Prince until her death, which occurs soon after his marriage with a royal princess. Elizabeth grows up a poem of beauty, innocence, and high spirits—without any knowledge of her parent—knowing only that she is well-born and wealthy. She in her turn is loved by a prince; but, protected by her unknown father, she is kept from him, and made to marry a good Count, a union which fortunately turns out happily. Some time after it the Prince again appears, but she passes through the temptation this time triumphantly, more from her own nobility of nature than from the secret influence which is always working for her good. "Lois" and "Nenuphar: a Fancy" are curious studies well worth reading. "Denis" is a truthfully depicted incident portraying the changeableness of human nature, and "Eberhardt" is an effective story of a decidedly different type.

The Despot of Broomsedge Cove contains all the clever individuality of The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains, with the additional advantage of a better and more connected story. To English readers it is an extremely useful book, for it puts forward a new side of life, with new manners and newer ideas. Mr. Craddock sustains the equity of the obtrusive Despot's character admirably. Teck Jepson is a romantically dramatic person,

* Anno Domini 2000; or, Woman's Destiny. By Sir Julius Vogel, K.C.M.G. London: Hutchinson & Co. 1889.

Elizabeth; and other Sketches. By the Author of "Miss Molly" &c. Edinburgh and London: Blackwood & Sons. 1889.

The Despot of Broomsedge Cove. By Charles Egbert Craddock, Author of "The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains" &c. London: Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, & Rivington.

Miriam. By Mrs. Musgrave, Author of "Illusions." London: Sampson Low, Marston, Searle, & Rivington.

Kathleen Kilmaine. A Novel. By M. E. Beytagh. London: Tinsley Brothers. 1889.

who imagines that he is the only being capable of imparting to the community of Broomsedge Cove the right way in which they should take their religion. In fact, he is so fervent and has such an intimate knowledge of biblical character and characters that the parson is nowhere. Gifted with a melodious voice and a picturesque appearance, he is able to impress most of the weaker members of the settlement. He feels thoroughly "Grace is mine, I hev' got my sheer." He meets "Marcelly," a pretty and dainty heroine (whose phrases are an occasional shock to those unacquainted with the idioms peculiar to the "Rockies"), in a cavern during a storm; and almost immediately, when she allows that she likes going to "meeting," tackles her with "Them ez enjyes tharse'fs at camp won't low 't war sech ticklin' fun whenst they gits ter blisterin' in hell." But Marcella, although disposed to fall in love with this "suzvigrous saint," estimates him at his proper value and becomes more quaintly humorous as he becomes didactic. The love episodes are original and humorous. Is'bel and Andy Longwood are fantastic creations. Mr. Craddock has an especial gift of bringing the aspect of his characters, their movements and surroundings, vividly before the eye; each scene, besides being portrayed with such graphic accuracy that it is photographed on the mind of the reader, has its portion of the fresh humour which is distinctly Mr. Craddock's own—and to any one in search of a new and good piece of work we should strongly recommend The Despot of Broomsedge Cove.

Mrs. Musgrave always writes good, clear English, and her style is generally able and impressive; but it is greatly to be doubted if Miriam will in any way add to her reputation. The heroine is a waif washed up from an emigrant ship—the poor jury-men who wished to send her to the workhouse scarcely deserved the satire poured upon them for not taking her to their own homes—but Phineas Blight, a waterman burgher, rescues her from that fate, and plunges her into a worse one. She grows up "big and broad and brave," and of course different from and superior to her surroundings. She is called the "Duchess" by her companions; but altogether she is a very ordinary young person, whose chief merit seems to be that she prefers an aristocratic lover to a bargee, and that she keeps herself "physically clean."

Kathleen Kilmaine is a capital "young girl's" book; and, if the young girl gets rather a mixed idea from it as to the animosity which exists in Ireland between the Catholics and the Protestants, and as to which cause the author intends to make most successful or prominent, it will not be surprising, but it will not do her much harm. The writer seems to be thoroughly unbiassed in her opinions; she puts forward the best and worst qualities of each party, and her motives are always good, if not always sufficiently clear. The tale in itself is prettily arranged and told, though there is no date at which to fix the stirring incident of the riot. It is to be regretted that, feeling so strongly upon her subject as she does, the author has dealt so feebly with it; had she taken one side or the other, her work would have been of much more value. That she is Irish and adores her native land is told in many a quaint touch or expression.

THREE AMERICAN BOOKS.*

MR. CONWAY'S object in his vindication of Edmund Randolph has been to show that some of the founders of the Great Republic were capable of uncommonly sharp practice towards a colleague, and that the Father of his country fell into a somewhat imbecile state in his old age. He has made out a not contemptible case. We cannot say that, except to very voracious students of American history, the book is interesting. It is inordinately long, and is padded out by details and quotations of no interest. Mr. Conway is obviously a firm believer in the popular American creed that every single word said or written by or about an American, everything done or said to be done by him, done or said to be done to him, is of equal importance, and deserves to be treated at equal length. Thanks to this patriotic conviction, the materials for the brief, and not particularly varied, history of the United States are rapidly surpassing in bulk the combined published and unpublished records of the sixteenth century. Here is an addition to this mighty mass—a volume of 395 pages, the substance of which might with no great toil be set forth in fifty. The style may also appear to a younger generation than that for which Mr. Conway began to write as Corinthian in an old-fashioned way. When one is told that "Jefferson trembled before this man with sword thinly sheathed in his tongue," or learns that "Randolph was applying to Fauchet what syrup might still exude from the cherry-tree of veracity," one feels that it is not only rococo, but rococo in an outworn style. The historical reflections are also a trifle absurd. When, for instance, Mr. Conway, having to note that Washington made a treaty with Tripoli in 1796, bursts out, "So bravely did the first President of the United States celebrate the seventh centenary of the first crusade—wherein six millions of armed Christians moved against Islam," the juxtaposition of the infinitely great with the infinitely unimportant only makes Europeans at least laugh. Mr. Conway was at Philadelphia the year before last, and saw many distinguished persons on platforms celebrating the remarkable fact that the United States had got along for a century; and then emotion bubbled in his breast, and it seemed to him that

In the mystical mood of that hour one might recall old legends of heroic princes—Arthur, Barbarossa—whom folk-tales said had never died, but were sleeping a charmed sleep in hidden grottoes, whence, on the stroke of some appointed hour, they would emerge to lead on some happiest reign for their race. The historic imagination might even have seen emerging from Independence Hall, as its clock struck noon of the Republic, a quaint procession of gentlemen in wigs and knee-breeches filing out on the platform to mingle with the magnates their work had created.

It is astonishing how little sets the historic imagination going, and also how uniformly, in that new and original country, America, it has to fall back on Europe for its vestment.

The gentleman whose life has enabled Mr. Conway to indulge in much eloquence and epigram is chiefly known through his compulsory retirement from the office of Secretary of State in 1795, on a charge of intriguing with the French diplomatic agent, Fauchet, against his colleagues, and in opposition to the treaty with England. He was also accused on very slender grounds of corruption, and has been something of a whipping-boy in American history. Mr. Conway strives to prove that he was, in fact, the victim of an intrigue conducted by Jefferson, Wolcott, Pickering, and to some extent Hamilton, under the inspiration of Lord Granville. The story is a brief one enough. Fauchet, who succeeded the yet more noisy and insolent Jacobin Genet, got into trouble through opposing Washington's policy of friendship with England, and was as good as ordered out of the country. Before going he wrote a long despatch home, giving an account of the political condition of the United States—an account not of the most flattering kind. The despatch professed to report some rather loose talk of Randolph's, and spoke vaguely of corrupt and corruptible persons. It was captured in the Jean Bart privateer, and transmitted to Lord Granville, who sent a copy to the English Minister, Hammond, with instructions to make what use of it he thought proper. Randolph was known to be an opponent of the party friendly to England, and Hammond gave them the copy to be used against him. They again laid it before Washington, who was known to be very touchy about the discretion of his Ministers, was made exceedingly angry by it, and behaved to Randolph with a degree of rudeness which left him no alternative but resignation. Mr. Conway's aim is to prove that Fauchet's letter was mere tittle-tattle, and that the President behaved with little thought and much heat. As we have already said, we think that in the main he proves his point, and that there is no serious ground for accusing Randolph of either treason or corruption. He has also good ground for maintaining that the Secretary's colleagues were both themselves guilty of sharp practice, and successful in persuading Washington to behave in a by no means straightforward manner. It would really appear to be the case that the first generation of American politicians were not less smart than some of the "magnates their work has created." That being so, was it worth while yielding to the mystical influence of the hour which coupled their names with Arthur and Barbarossa?

Travellers and Outlaws is the attractive title which Mr. Higginson has given to a collection of miscellaneous papers on Salem sea-captains, a travelling Congressman of 1777, a New England rogue and vagabond of about the same date, and on negro Maroons and rebels. "There may," as Mr. Higginson judiciously observes, "usually be found in the best regulated minds some concealed liking for a vagabond"—on the condition, we would add, that he is amusing. Mr. Higginson's rogue, Henry Tufts, of Newmarket, N. H., is not the funniest vagabond we have met in the course of a long and assiduous frequentation of dishonest company, but he may pass. His autobiography, as quoted here, shows that he was a descendant of the great house of Guzman (of Alfarache), of whom the founder had no cause to be ashamed. If Mr. Higginson is right in maintaining that he is the first known specimen of the American-born vagabond, we can only wonder that the very favourable conditions he describes had not produced a specimen of the race earlier than 1748. Tufts surely found New England ready for him. In a more varied and larger society he might have done better. His fame would doubtless have reached the Newgate Calendar. As it was, however, he did the most he could, and no man can be asked to do more. More than half of Mr. Higginson's book is devoted to a type of outlaw more characteristic and American than a common swindler like Tufts—namely, the Maroons of the West Indies and Surinam, or the leaders of the few abortive slave revolts in the Southern States. Mr. Higginson's sympathies are Abolitionist, and strong for what are loosely called the rights of the blacks; but he deals with his subject as a man on the winning side should, and does not scold or abuse. Not the least interesting part of his Maroon papers is compiled from Stedman's well-known "Narrative" of his five years' fighting for the Dutch in Surinam. The author takes the facts, as he is entitled to do; but he appears to us to rely somewhat blindly on his authority. Stedman was, as even a cursory reading of his book will show, an honest man; but, after all, he was honest in a time when it was very creditable to be a man of feeling. They cultivated their emotions carefully at the end of the last century—and Stedman certainly fostered his with many a sympathetic tear for the innocent victims of oppression. He is to be read with some distrust, for it is the weakness of the man of feeling that he is apt, if not to make the oppression he cannot find, at least to exaggerate what he does find. So a cautious man will hear his touching accounts of the wrongs of fair slaves, and of the virtue of his innocent Joanna, with reserve. Joanna is really too like the heroine of a moral tale à la Bernardin de St.-Pierre. At the same time Stedman's sensiblerie is itself a sign of the times. He was doubtless a brave fellow and a good observer of nature; and whoever will allow for the point of view may consult him with profit for an account of Dutch Guiana, and of the African barbarism transplanted to its forests by the runaway slaves. The slave insurgents of the Southern States are not familiar to English readers. Indeed, to judge from the difficulty Mr. Higginson seems to have found in learning anything about them, they are obscure even in America. He has had to hunt them up in old files of Southern newspapers. To Mr. Higginson this is a proof of the care taken "at the South" to suppress an awkward subject. So to some extent it doubtless is; but, after all, a servile revolt is not a thing which can be "suppressed" in this sense. It is much too conspicuous. We gather from Mr. Higginson's account of Gabriel, Denmark Vesey, and Nat Turner that there was, in fact, very little servile revolt in the South, and what there was was the work of ambitious dreamers (one of them, by-the-bye, not himself a slave) whose imagination had been fired by stories from San Domingo. Mr. Higginson insists, rightly enough, that danger of servile revolt will always exist where there is slavery. So it will; but so a war of races is always a possible danger where two widely different races are set side by side. All things have their shadow, and cannot jump off it. We do not know that the shadow of Southern slavery was worse than some others. For the rest, Mr. Higginson must remember that, if slavery excuses the revolt of the slave, the horrible consequences of that revolt justify the master in standing on his guard. The stern repression of Nat Turner's revolt was not only inevitable, but was also, in the long run, humane.

* Omitted Chapters of History disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph, Governor of Virginia, First Attorney-General, United States Secretary of State. By Moncure Daniel Conway. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Travellers and Outlaws: Episodes in American History. By Thomas Wentworth Higginson. Boston: Lee & Shepard. 1889.

Pen and Powder. By Franc B. Wilkie (Poliuto). Boston: Ticknor & Co.

Mr. Franc B. Wilkie, whose nom de guerre was "Poliuto," explains that he was moved to write Pen and Powder by hearing excessive praises of Mr. Archibald Forbes's once famous ride in South Africa. Mr. Wilkie remembers well that he and other American War Correspondents did bigger rides than that (which is quite credible) and said nothing about them (which we hear with suspended judgment) during the American Civil War. He has, therefore, written this book to show that there were great War Correspondents "in our country, Sir," before Mr. Archibald Forbes. He makes out a very fair case, and prejudices us in his favour by a lively account of his experience of the emotions which come to a man when first he goes under fire. How his blood was stirred by the clatter of cavalry trotting forward to a charge, how he followed them in great exhilaration of spirit with the motion and the noise, and of the change which came over him when in the midst of other sounds he heard that peculiar one which Charles XII. loved, and a distinguished member of the Bonaparte family is reported to find disagreeable, he frankly tells. The end of it was that Mr. Wilkie got a smart wound to teach him not to push in where he had no business another time, and was made more cautious. His account of the Federal camps is not very attractive, and perhaps not for that reason the less trustworthy. We note one story explaining how a certain correspondent—no witch at his business—gained wonderfully early information, because he secured the gratitude of a certain general whom he found drunk and helped to his tent quietly. The "certain general" is so plainly indicated that Mr. Wilkie might as well have told his name at once. Tales of this sort are perhaps better not told at all; but if they are told it ought to be openly, and not with a transparent affectation of discretion.

JANE AUSTEN.*

THAT "our Jane" (as some, we trust not mawkishly disposed, persons are wont to call Miss Austen) deserves the title of an eminent woman is indisputable; whether she is well suited for a place in an "Eminent Women's Series" is a question on which a man might take the negative side with considerably better hope of persuading the jury. Her short life was of the most uneventful character, containing absolutely no incidents but "the Basingstoke balls" and such "migrations from the blue bed to the brown" as her successive journeyings at Steventon, Bath, Southampton, Chawton, and where not. Even the volumes of letters published a few years ago, though their interest was perhaps rather unjustly depreciated at the time, and though a person with the genius of biography could make not a little out of them, are far from promising to the casual craftsman or craftswoman. When all is said that, without intolerable tedium and dawdling, can be said about her personally, it would be very hard to fill even half the solemn two hundred pages of a "series" book. In such circumstances it may seem a little unkind to blame Mrs. Malden for resorting in her desperation to elaborate accounts of the argument of the several novels with extracts (in the same type, to gain a little). But we cannot say that the result is an appetizing book. There are three classes of persons to be considered; yea, perhaps four. First, there are the faithful, the Janophiles, the initiated, those to whom, after many years' familiarity, a page of Mr. Collins or Mrs. Norris is a green pasture, wherein they would softly walk and softer chuckle, though the process took away part of the solid day. These blessed ones Mrs. Malden hardly caters for; and they would liberally allow her to preach to the Gentiles, even though she does not herself in all things follow the more excellent way. When Mrs. Malden says that "sensibility meant in Jane Austen's day warm, quick feeling, not exaggerated or over-keen," she says what is, as a matter of demonstrable literary history, wrong and untrue. When she says that the "disagreeable story of Willoughby's earlier life is unnecessary to the plot," we must disable her judgment—a disablement which must be repeated when she first says that "it is impossible to see how such a woman as Mrs. Bennet could have had two such daughters as Jane and Elizabeth," and in the same breath declares it to be "revolting to depict a girl of sixteen so utterly lost to decency as Lydia." It is evident from this, first, that Mrs. Malden does not know her eighteenth century (to which Jane, after all, belonged); and, secondly, that she has not studied the laws of human nature. She over-estimates Mansfield Park somewhat, having a curious affection for Fanny, whom other people think by far the most wooden, conventional, and eighteenth-century-missish of Miss Austen's heroines; while she is grossly unjust to Catherine Morland, and, indeed, to Northanger Abbey altogether. It is sad but important evidence that she barely mentions John Thorpe (a sketch simply of the first class), and that she dismisses the whole thing as "burlesque," "parody," and even "plagiarism," as were also, we suppose, Don Quixote, Joseph Andrews, and a few other childish trifles. On the other hand, she extols to the skies not merely Persuasion (a charming book), but Persuasion's rather washed-out heroine. Let this blasphemy be pardoned; but we confess that it is in the minor, not the major, characters of Persuasion that we recognize Miss Austen's hand, in Mary and Louisa, in Admiral Croft and Sir Walter, not in Anne and Captain Wentworth.

* Eminent Women Series.—Jane Austen. By Mrs. Charles Malden. London: W. H. Allen.

But Mrs. Malden may say, and justly, that she does not write for the "S. S.'s" of Austenianism. Neither, of course, does she write for those unfortunate—thrice unfortunate—ones who cannot like Miss Austen, though they seek to do so carefully, or for those who will not and do not care. For the mere general reader who may like Jane yet, we repeat that we do not think her book is likely to prove an appetizing one. Perhaps it would have been even less appetizing to him if she had written what we should have preferred, a regular critical study of the aims, manner, intent, and limitations of this wonderful art, with extracts, but without any compte-rendu business, except so much as was absolutely necessary to illustrate the points. To do this would, indeed, require no small critical faculty—indeed, we do not know that, though Miss Austen has been the special "critic's novelist" of England for some seventy years, it has ever been fully attempted; we do know that it has never been fully done. That it should be done is almost the only justification of a book on such a subject where, as we have said, the positive biographical information which is to be imparted amounts to little or nothing, and where there are no "problems" to discuss, or none except such extremely vague and uninteresting ones as Who was the young man who was not the late Chief Justice Lefroy? or that started by Sir Francis Doyle about the very weak-minded and weak-bodied young naval officer who walked himself to death. A propos of which problems we take leave to doubt whether Mrs. Malden would pass a doctress's examination in a well-constituted Cour d'Amour. She thinks that the future Chief Justice's heart "cannot have been irretrievably wounded" because he "was three times married in the course of his life and lived to be about ninety." Mrs. Malden is not like the Laureate's Madeline, she is not "perfect in lovelore."

SLIGO.*

ALTHOUGH we have one or two matters against this History of Sligo: Town and County, it is on the whole a good piece of work, and fully deserves a place amongst the best Irish local histories. Its author, the Venerable T. O'Rourke, is a native of the county, and a member of a family of some note in its annals. He writes with a not unbecoming pride of its natural beauties, its antiquities, and the part which it has taken in stirring events both in mediæval and modern times. That he is well furnished with most of the qualities and accomplishments desirable in a county historian is, we think, proved by the manner in which he has carried out his undertaking; for his volumes show that he has a lively appreciation of fine scenery, a thorough knowledge of the topography of the district about which he writes, and a sufficient acquaintance with its natural history, and that he has studied all that he thought likely to illustrate his work, both in print and in manuscript, industriously, and, though some of his conclusions are no doubt open to question in a critical spirit, not accepting as conclusively proved the assertions and theories of even the most eminent of older antiquaries, but thinking out every point for himself,

* The History of Sligo: Town and County. By T. O'Rourke, D.D., M.R.I.A. 2 vols. Dublin: Duffy & Co., Limited.

While, too, as regards matters of the present day, he says some things which had better have been left unsaid, he writes without violence or spite; for we are inclined to put down the Index reference to "the Rev. Firebrand Seymour" as an index-maker's eccentricity. At the same time his book has its defects; for he is apt to be provokingly wordy, and seems to have none of that faculty for story-telling which once distinguished his race. He constantly leads us to think that we are on the verge of a good thing, and as often disappoints us. His stories fall flat; his style is prosy, and his volumes are rather heavy reading. Here and there he forgets the lines which separate the duties of a local historian, the writer of a guide-book, and the reporter of a provincial newspaper, and inflicts on his readers information as to the cookery and charges at certain hotels, the "ornate mansion" or the "stately residence with its graceful portico" which Mr. This or Mr. That has lately built in the town of Sligo, the professional merits of divers physicians and surgeons, and the respectable character of the matron of the County Lunatic Asylum. He should have avoided bringing in the names, and discussing—even though he generally speaks in terms of praise—the characters and actions of ladies and gentlemen who are still living and who do not occupy any public position. Nor is his book the better for his references to questions of the present day. These, however, are not very frequent, and some of them, as, for example, the unstinted and well-deserved praise which he bestows on the Irish Constabulary, show that he wishes to be fair, and does not care to truckle to the passions of the ignorant. Strongly, therefore, as we differ with him in much that he says, we shall content ourselves with remarking that he is talking nonsense when he asserts that a gentleman who chooses to employ servants or accept tenants of the same religion as himself in preference to those of another religion is guilty of the "certain unsocial proceedings" which constitute the crime of boycotting. Such conduct may or may not be wise; but it is not illegal, and is no offence against society. Again, his statement that Irish landlords as a body have during the last twenty years shown an "increased and still increasing indifference to the welfare of their tenants" is notoriously contrary to facts, and does not seem consonant with what he says elsewhere as regards the management of some estates in his own district.

After a general sketch of the natural features of the county Dr. O'Rorke treats the history and antiquities of the different baronies one after the other, taking first, and allotting by far the largest space to, the barony of Carbury, which contains the county town. He points out that there is no evidence to show that the town of Sligo existed before the thirteenth century; for the famous Battle of Sligo, which was fought about the middle of the sixth century, took its name, as O'Donovan says in his edition of The Four Masters, from the river, and not from the town. We have an ingenious and interesting attempt to fix the precise scene of the defeat of the Connaught men by the Cinel Eoghan and the Cinel Conaill, which comprised all the forces of Ulster. The circles and cromlechs of Carrowmore are, he maintains, the burying-places of those who fell in the battle; while the cairn of Knocknarea contained the body of Eoghan Bel, the King of Connaught, who, according to his own direction, was placed in his grave in a standing posture, with his red javelin in his hand. Although the district of Sligo was evidently inhabited earlier, for in 1227 or thereabout several "noble women" were carried off from it, the real founder of the town was Maurice Fitzgerald, who built a castle and Dominican monastery there somewhat later in the reign of Henry III. Maurice and his family, the Geraldines, were constantly at war with the rulers of Tyrconnell, which about this time fell under the sway of the O'Donnells. The English, however, were extremely powerful in Connaught, and Sligo while under the Geraldines was, no doubt, almost wholly an English town. Their power fell into decay in consequence of their war with the Red Earl of Ulster, and before long Carbury passed to a branch of the O'Connors, who, after repeated struggles with the O'Donnells, became masters of the district in the time of Cathal Oge. This distinguished warrior died at Sligo of the Black Death, called in Ireland by the strange name of the "King's Game." A long period of fighting, treachery, and general confusion followed, during which the castle of Sligo was taken and retaken several times, until in the reign of Henry VIII. the English again acquired considerable power in the district, and enabled Donnell O'Connor to hold the lordship until his death. Under the Tudor dynasty the chiefs were induced by force, by flattery, or by gifts, to renounce their Irish captaincies, and to accept English lordships and titles, to abandon their Brehon tenures and customs, and take back their lands as grants from the English Crown on the usual conditions of English landed estates, and "in general to exchange their Irish status for an English status resting on, and supported by, the authority of the Crown." Donnell O'Connor, accordingly, made submission to Elizabeth in 1565, and surrendered his lands, to receive them back again in tail male at a certain rent, promising for the future to break off his "uncivil, rude, and barbarous" mode of life. In common with other Irish chiefs, he was glad enough to make this change, as it relieved him from the authority of the sept. During the rebellion of 1641 the English in Sligo, who were lodged in the gaol probably for protection, were massacred either by the direct orders, or at least with the connivance, of two of O'Connor's brothers. This massacre was terribly avenged by Sir Frederick Hamilton, whose barbarities certainly equalled those committed by the insurgents. Dr. O'Rorke, both here and in his notice of the surrender of the Castle of Templehouse, insists strongly on the untrustworthy character of the Depositions on which some historians have founded their accounts of the massacre of 1641. We fully agree with much that he says on this subject; though, at the same time, his readers will do well to remember that, after all reasonable allowance is made for exaggerations—and the temptation to deliberate exaggeration was great—the tragedy still remains horrible. Four of the baronies of the county were given up to 481 Cromwellian settlers, whose lots were so placed as to enable them to keep the Irish in subjection. The working of the Penal Laws is vividly illustrated by a series of Depositions taken in 1712 as to "non-juring Popish priests celebrating in the Town and County of Sligo," which the author prints from a Report in the Record Office at Dublin. We have a readable sketch of the condition of Sligo in the early part of the present century, in the course of which it is noted that it was then thought so disgraceful for a farmer to sell his eggs and butter, that those who did so took care to send these articles into the town by night. While Dr. O'Rorke believes that there was far less quarrelling amongst the lower classes in those days than there is at present, he demurs to the assertion which is, he says, often made that there was less drinking. Sligo was one of the first counties in which private stills were set up, and poteen whiskey was so cheap that a traveller who asked for a drink of water was pretty sure to receive it strongly fortified. The last of the many battles which have been fought in the county was at Collooney or Carriknagat, where Colonel Vereker engaged the French and the Irish rebels under Humbert, and, in spite of the smallness of his force, succeeded in counteracting the designs of the French general on the town of Sligo. Ballymote, the chief town of the barony of Corran, was chosen by the Red Earl as the site of a castle which, after having for some time been the stronghold of the Corran Mac-Donoghs, passed into the hands of the Taaffe family. From this house came Count Francis Taaffe, who commanded the left wing of the Christian army at the relief of Vienna in 1683, and the honour of the house is still worthily maintained in Austria by Count Edward Taaffe, the Imperial Minister. The town is often mentioned in the ancient Book of Ballymote, now preserved in the Royal Irish Academy, which was compiled in the castle towards the end of the fourteenth century.

Dr. O'Rorke has something worth knowing to say about most of the parishes in the county, and ends his work with a general sketch of its condition at different periods. His account of the custom of coshery should make every patriotic Irishman thankful for the rule which put down such an oppressive practice, and introduced the obligations of civilized life, which oblige the tenant "to discharge his liabilities, as he does at present [does he?], by a definite money payment every six months." Although during the first few years of this century Sligo was, we are told, free from organized illegal associations, the county was disturbed in 1806 by the outrages of "Threshers," who combined to resist the payment of tithes. Several notices are given of notorious crimes, and duels, and of the evil doings of the "Bucks," who were, Dr. O'Rorke says, descendants of the Cromwellian settlers. We have also a series of sketches of the lives of "Men of Mark" belonging to the county, though but few of the natives of Sligo, save Duaid MacFirbis, the antiquary, seem to have much claim to general remembrance.

A WEEK ON THE CONCORD.*

THOSE who like to record times and seasons may amuse themselves now, if they will, by keeping the jubilee of an elegant, but unexciting adventure, the voyage of John and Henry Thoreau on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers. There must be a distinct literary vitality about the style of a book which has kept alive for half a century the memory of a summer week spent by two New England brothers in a fisherman's dory on some local streams. The self-consciousness of Henry Thoreau was strenuous and effectual. When he weighed anchor in the port of Concord in August 1839 he set forth with an expressed intent of helping to immortalize the holy ground of the transcendentalists. He opens his little volume with a challenge to Xanthus and Scamander, and in some sort the proud boast has been justified. In 1834 Emerson had become a citizen of Concord, a little village-town scattered among secular elms, which was henceforth destined to form a centre of New England intelligence. When the Thoreaus made their voyage in 1839 the Delphi of Massachusetts was still but faintly illustrious intellectually, although it preserved a proud recollection of "the embattled farmers" and how their first fatal volley was "heard round the world." But between the fact of the voyage and the record—for Thoreau's book did not appear until 1849—much occurred to bring the name of Concord before the world of letters and to flatter the vanity or excite the parochial patriotism of the recluse of Walden. By the later date Emerson had come before the world as a poet and as an essayist; the Brook Farm experiment at Roxbury had sprung from the recesses of Concord, and had been withdrawn into its bosom; Hawthorne had arrived in 1842, and had settled in that ancient Manse from which he was to pull so many picturesque Mosses. The very boat, if we mistake not, in which the voyage was made had been, by 1849, transferred by Thoreau to Hawthorne's possession. The voyager is ever conscious, as he records his adventures, of the classic nature of the spots around him, and in his queer verse he celebrates the New Reformers together with the bitterns and the pickerels:—

* A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers. By Henry Thoreau. With a Prefatory Note by W. H. Dircks. London: Walter Scott.

On Penkawtasset, since we took our way
Down this still stream to far Billericay,
A poet wise has settled, whose fine ray
Doth often shine on Concord's twilight day.

Like those first stars, whose silver beams on high,
Shining more brightly as the day goes by,
Most travellers cannot at first descry,
But eyes that wont to range the evening sky,

And know celestial lights do plainly see,
And gladly hail them, numbering two or three;
For love that's deep must deeply studied be,
As from deep wells men read star-poetry.

This mixture of the student and the wild Indian, of the lamp and the morning star, this perpetual confusion between nature in its unconsciousness and Yankee transcendentalism in its conscious pomp, gives a peculiar flavour to all the writing of Henry Thoreau, but perhaps to no book so strongly as to A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers.

It is strange that Thoreau, with his love for the native names of streams and places, should have accepted the conventional form of Concord River, instead of the Indian one which Emerson and Hawthorne use, Musketaquid. Unless we recognize that these two are the names of the same stream, we lose the pleasure of comparing Thoreau's prose with Emerson's verse. It is to the Musketaquid, and therefore to the Concord River, that the latter has addressed one of the finest of his lyrics, that which opens

Thy summer voice, Musketaquid, Repeats the music of the rain; and the exceptionally graceful study in blank verse in which the poet attributes the favour of the wood-gods to his own modesty in being contented with the "low, open meads" which surround this slender and sluggish stream. This famous river, the Concord or Musketaquid, after entering the town of the Philosophers, receives the tributary waters of the Assabeth, and then flows down until it empties itself into the Merrimac at Lowell. The Musketaquid is sacred to Emerson; the Merrimac is Thoreau's by right of conquest; while the Assabeth, which Thoreau passes without a single word of appreciation, was specially favoured by the shy and recluse genius of Hawthorne. Those who have the Week before them may turn aside from it for a moment to hear Hawthorne's description of the voyages which he and Thoreau were wont to make over the confluent waters:—

Strange and happy times were those, when we cast aside all irksome forms and strait-laced habitudes, and delivered ourselves up to the free air, to live like the Indians or any less conventional race, during one bright semicircle of the sun. Rowing our boat against the current, between wide meadows, we turned aside into the Assabeth. A more lovely stream than this, for a mile above its junction with the Concord, has never flowed on earth—nowhere, indeed, except to lave the interior regions of a poet's imagination. It comes flowing softly through the midmost privacy and deepest heart of a wood which whispers to it to be quiet; while the stream whispers back again from its sedgy borders, as if river and wood were hushing one another to sleep. Yes; the river sleeps along its course, and dreams of the sky and the clustering foliage.

In none of his later volumes did Henry Thoreau express his peculiar philosophy with so much geniality and so little straining after exaggerated effect as in the Week. He was a closer observer later on, perhaps; he was certainly a quainter forger of concetti, but never more himself than here. The traveller by the railway from Boston to Concord, to whom is pointed out on his right-hand side the very tame and mild pond which is Walden, is apt to think that Thoreau, after all, knew but little of the wilder parts of nature. But his acquaintance with his native country was really extensive, and was formed before he had fallen under the influence of Emerson, had learned to commune with the Oversoul, or had lapsed into literature. On the present voyage, when he reached the Merrimac, it was not to greet it as a stranger. He was familiar with all the windings of its romantic waters. He had patiently traced it from its source in the White Mountains "to where it is lost amid the salt billows of the ocean on Plum Island beach." He had been a real nomad of the mountains before Emerson tamed him; he was personally friendly with those Titanic monsters of the back of New Hampshire, Agiochook and Contochook and the rest, of whose acquaintance Emerson rather ineffectually and unreally boasted in early and most indifferent odes and canticles. This is perhaps the reason why the Indian names, which sound pathetically exotic on the lips of Hawthorne, and downright barbarous on those of Emerson, seem genuine and inevitable when Thoreau uses them. Rivers are as pleasant company to meet Thoreau in as ever we find. His fault is to be stationary, to keep us poring over some little natural object long after we have extracted the mental nourishment from it. "A day passed in the society of the Greek sages who are described in the Banquet of Xenophon would not," he says in one of his most characteristic utterances, "be comparable with the dry wit of decayed cranberry-vines and the fresh Attic salt of moss-beds." But this is quite a matter of opinion, and there are those who love moss-beds and cranberry-vines and who yet cannot patiently endure a whole day on their knees in front of them.

For such readers it is a great consolation to get Thoreau on board his boat. The inevitable current carries him along. Talk as he will, the burdock passes, the yarrow is left behind, and we come in the process of time to fresh promontories with juniper on them and no longer catnip.

It cannot be said that Thoreau travels very fast, even when the Concord or the Merrimac is hurrying him along. He clings to the shore, he is the victim of every variety of eddy, he slips into backwaters and hums there, like a lost fragment of timber, for hours on hours. Take Friday, for instance, in this adventurous chronicle. We start fairly well, though in a fog; but we are soon caught in the Corybantes and "the whole paraphernalia of the Panathenæa." Here we hang for two or three pages, and when at last we start again we are caught almost instantly in a disquisition on genius and inspiration. Five pages are dedicated to a criticism of Ossian, and we are losing all hope, when suddenly "we sail fleetly before the wind, with the river gurgling under our stern, and glide past the mouth of the Nashua." We pause to indite a lyric to "Salmon Brook, Panichook," and so this delightful Friday wears itself out. Why should we proceed any faster? We are not travelling any whither. We have no duties, no engagements. Why not listen patiently to this pleasant and fantastic garrulity? Certainly it is agreeable to do so, but, nevertheless, we are glad to be on board, to have the moving water under us, for Thoreau's intellectual self-absorption is apt to resemble, in its wearying capacity, the faculty of a bore. This is a hard saying to the Thoreau fanatics, of whom we have a few among us. But it does not preclude the admission that the work of this writer is often enjoyable, and still more often valuable. We must not take Thoreau too seriously. We must not forget Dr. Holmes's really splendid definition of him as "the nullifier of civilization, who insisted on nibbling his asparagus at the wrong end." But we who know how to handle our asparagus may nevertheless take an acute intellectual pleasure in this curious Rousseau of Massachusetts, who had certainly mastered the art of favourably interesting those who can never agree with him.

The present reprint belongs to a series in which Walden has already appeared. A few years ago, in order to study Thoreau, it was necessary to procure from America editions, and in some cases even the original issues, of his works. While we do not think that he can ever, or should ever, be very widely read, we are glad that the most characteristic of his publications should be freely circulated. His books, and in particular the book now before us, started a kind of new thing in literature, much less simple and unaffected than Gilbert White or Gilpin, more fantastic than Cobbett, who, moreover, was as sociable as Thoreau was solitary, full of oddity and mistiness, but, at all events in their early manifestations, neither cynical nor empty. Thoreau was a true lover of books as well as of woodchucks. His knowledge of literature was perhaps more curious than profound, and he emulated Emerson a little over-boldly in his Oriental illustrations. But he could write English prose, although he could not manage good verse, and in the former section of literary labour he has accomplished some of the most satisfactory work of his time. Setting aside his great friends Hawthorne and Emerson, who was there in America in 1839 capable of the Praise of Friendship in the Wednesday chapter of A Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers? Perhaps not one, certainly none of the Ripleys and Alcotts and Channings who passed for prose writers at that dim and distant epoch.

EPOCHS OF CHURCH HISTORY.*

MOST of the volumes of Professor Creighton's "Epochs of Church History" have been rather historical than theological, so that the experiment of "popular" handling of purely doctrinal matters has not hitherto been tried. Mr. Gwatkin's handling of the half-century of controversy which ended in the establishment of the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity almost of necessity dares this dangerous experiment; and, perhaps wisely, dares it with boldness. The author has, comparatively speaking, neglected even such opportunities of description and anecdote as were open to him; and, limited as was Gibbon's space, more will be found in him about the death of Arius, the storming of the church of Theonas, the exploits of George of Cappadocia, and the other external incidents of the long conflict than in this monograph. On the other hand, Mr. Gwatkin is, as might be expected, both much fuller and more exact in his account of the shades, as of a dying dolphin, through which Anti-Trinitarianism passed before it (at least as a candidate for the position of recognized orthodoxy) gave up the ghost. One thing only we could have wished. As the book is presumably intended for not very learned readers, it might have been a distinct gain to put in some conspicuous place a tabular arrangement of the distinctive points in Arianism, Semi-Arianism, Homœanism, Anomœanism, and the earlier and later forms of Nicene orthodoxy, with such minor shades as the author chose. As it is, we fear that, except to experts, the statement that somebody's opinions had at a certain time become "quite Macedonian," though it may strike awe, will not produce understanding. But this is the besetting sin of all the better class of writers—that is to say, of those who write with full knowledge of their subject. And it is, perhaps, especially likely to occur where, as Mr. Gwatkin informs us is the case here, a popular book is to a great extent abridged from a previous series of specialist studies by the same author. Nor is it a serious matter where the subject is one which can hardly be appreciated at all without a considerable amount of attention.

* Epochs of Church History—The Arian Controversy. By H. M. Gwatkin. London: Longmans, Green, & Co.

On the other hand, the great merit of the book is its explanation of the hold which the different Unitarian systems have at various times gained on the Christian world, and especially of the long battle which Arianism itself waged with Orthodoxy. This latter was, no doubt, in part due to the fact that Arianism was a sort of halfway house between Paganism of the philosophical kind and Christianity—that it offered an escape from the lapis offensiois of the Cross. Mr. Gwatkin, in language, no doubt, intentionally strong, points out, and we think justly, that “the Arian Christ is nothing but a heathen idol, invented to maintain a heathenish Supreme in heathen isolation from the world.” In other words, the nearer the Son is pulled down towards man by the attenuation of his Godhead, the more remote from man becomes the unshared Godhead of the Father. You have an Être Suprême who is practically unapproachable, a mere “One and All,” destitute of personality, and a Christ who is to be worshipped, though he is not really God in the full sense, and is, indeed, only the first of creatures, with a creature’s limitation. The real mystery of the Incarnation, the distinctive doctrine of Christianity, is thus put on one side altogether, together with, in effect, the doctrine of the personality of God. And Mr. Gwatkin not obscurely hints, though he does not follow out the hint, that not a few much more modern thinkers than Arius fall into pretty much the same blunder. In fact, the most logical of our present Agnostics, anti-Miraculists, anti-Supernaturalists, and the rest, do very much the same thing by pushing all the supernatural part of religion (if they allow any such) away into an unknowable region, and rationalizing the rest down to mere naturalism. As for details, we have really nothing to comment on unfavourably, except that we think Mr. Gwatkin might have avoided calling the accepted “Nicene Creed” “spurious.” Of course it is so in the sense, the strict technical sense, that the formula now pronounced in the Eucharistic service is not the exact document which was signed at Nicæa after being rédigé from the old Cæsarean creed. The anathemas have disappeared, and divers clauses, especially in the second and third paragraphs, have been filled in. But “spurious” in the popular sense (and these books are popular) means more than this; and, as Mr. Gwatkin says that “the elaborate framework of Nicæa is completely shattered,” he seems to mean more too. If it be so, we cannot agree with him. Putting, of course, the filiogue out of the question, the accepted “Nicene” Creed seems to us to maintain the “framework” of Nicæa quite intact (Mr. Gwatkin himself elsewhere speaks of the only important omission, “from the essence,” as a wise removal), and to fill in only undisputed or else fairly complementary details. However, this is matter of argument. What is not is that “spurious” is to the vulgar, though not perhaps to the scholarly, a somewhat question-begging and misleading epithet.

THE SCOTTISH ART REVIEW.*

THE idea that a painter should write about painting, a sculptor about sculpture, an architect about architecture, is a very old one. Whether its soundness equals its antiquity is another matter, and one which we need not now discuss, especially as the editor of the Scottish Art Review, in a prefatory note, expressly states that he does not profess to exclude other critics “who, though not themselves professionally engaged in the arts, may yet have general culture or special knowledge.” The very first article, on “Progressiveness in Art,” is not by an artist, but by Professor Caird. It is followed by the first of a series of articles on the pictures at the Glasgow Exhibition by an anonymous writer, whether artist or critic. He does not spare some of the great names of the day, and speaks of “work from Sir Frederick Leighton, Luke Fildes, and Hubert Herkomer, which has in it no more of the vital spirit of Art than has the learned inability of E. J. Poynter and Sir J. D. Linton, the cheap sentimentality of Faed and Phil Morris, the hideously unreal realism of Brett and the meretricious prettiness of MacWhirter and Murray.” These are brave words, especially when we remember that they are applied in many cases to Scotchmen. We were certainly under an impression that to run down “MacWhirter and Murray” was one of the deadly sins in Scotland. As a fact, however, much of the criticism in this paper and the papers that follow seems to be very sound; and the experience of the Royal Academy Exhibition just closed goes far to justify the views of the writer in the Scottish Art Review. Music is not neglected, as in our London art magazines; and we find articles on the subject not only as practised in Glasgow and Edinburgh, but even in New York. The architectural papers are interesting, though few readers will share Mr. Andrew Hall’s admiration for the Glasgow Exhibition buildings. It would be as easy to admire the Albert Hall or the Bethnal Green Museum. Why does Mr. Honeyman observe, in another architectural article, “How different would our estimate be of the artistic merit of men like Inigo Jones or Wren if we had only their drawings to guide us”? We have not many of Wren’s drawings; but, on the other hand, we could but ill judge of Inigo Jones if we had only the few buildings from his hand which have come down to us. Whitehall Chapel and St. Paul’s, Covent Garden, have both been rebuilt. St. Alban’s, Wood Street, can hardly be adduced; Lord Grimthorpe can account for Lincoln’s Inn Chapel; and in London we have only left part of a façade in Little Queen Street and the interior of Ashburnham House. There are a few country houses, of course; but we should know little indeed of Inigo but for Kent’s volume and for the great engravings of D. M. Müller. The criticism on the Glasgow municipal buildings is sound, though anonymous.

We cannot go through the whole volume, but may observe once for all that, if the editor’s chief object has been originality, he has in great part succeeded; and, though some of his contributors are a little too iconoclastic and others write a little too much from the amateur point of view, there is a refreshing liveliness apparent everywhere. The engravings are all, or nearly all, of the kind known as “process”; and some of them, especially a beautiful frontispiece, the “Wood Nymph,” after Mr. Burne Jones, and the “St. George,” after Mabuse, are exceedingly pleasing and instructive.

OLD ARCHITECTURE IN SOUTH-WEST SURREY.*

THIS is a book which ought to be useful to more than one class of persons. The designers of buildings, intended to charm by their homely qualities, while they contain at the same time carefully-conceived picturesque grouping and detail of a simple kind; the contractor, who, disdaining the aid of an architect, perpetrates the modern villa on a “plot” at a ninety-nine years’ lease; the roaming artist; and perhaps, above all, the dweller in South-West Surrey, will find in its pages material both serviceable and enjoyable. At the same time, it will afford a valuable addition to the store of carefully-selected material already awaiting the historian of post-mediæval English architecture. We could have wished that the style had been somewhat less “scrappy.” The author seems in many chapters to have merely jotted down his notes, without any attempt to do more than string them together. And there is, in the architectural portion of the book, a cross-division of the subject into its analytical and topographical branches, which involves a frequent and tedious reference to illustrations placed many pages away from the immediate text. The illustrations themselves are of the kind best suited to the purpose of the book. The perspective views are, where we have tested them, faithful; and give, as they are intended to give, the picturesque results of old cottage architecture. The mechanism by which these results were obtained is illustrated by a fair number of drawings to scale. The work would, no doubt, have been more valuable if provided with a larger number of the latter. And it is to be hoped that, if it reaches another edition (as it well deserves to do), the author may take our hint.

Interspersed amongst the descriptions are many interesting critical remarks both on the old work, and on modern adaptations of the style. With most of these we agree, but some seem to be of more doubtful value. The statement, for instance, that “In all old carved oak-work the surface is powdered over with stamps of varying forms, and in turned work lines are drawn in addition to the mouldings. These give softness and richness that cannot otherwise be attained; but architect and workman often fail to take note of these points, when repeating the old forms, and the result is, in consequence, disappointing” is an exaggeration. Mr. Nevill must stand convicted of having failed to observe many fine oak carvings in which this is not the case. He makes a very true remark, however, when he analyses one of the causes of the failure of the modern Gothic revival. “I have always thought,” he says, “that one principal reason why the Gothic revival, in spite of the enthusiasm and talent of its directors, has failed to make a permanent impression on our domestic architecture, is the unsuitability of the style of the woodwork to the trade of the joiner, especially since machinery has come so largely to his aid.” He might have added that down to the later Gothic times there was no style in woodwork, the forms being mechanical imitations of those developed for stone construction and ornamentation.

His views on the effect of the old thin, as opposed to the modern thick, bricks will be endorsed by all men of taste. It is a most strange fact, that it is of recent years only, that this discovery has been made. Many endeavours have been made by various architects to produce the harmony of colour of old brickwork, the most terrible and revolting being the blackening of the joints. The inevitable result of this has been to give to the building, when new, a colouring of dingy purplish red, which grows dingier with age and exposure to town or country atmosphere. The secret of success is in the use of a brick about two inches instead of three inches thick, and set in a joint of the width of half an inch, with ordinary mortar (which may be tinted with brickdust); and these bricks have the enormous advantage of giving greater facilities for delicate mouldings. His views on the staining of tiles are of similar value; although we wish he had warned architects and builders against the use of

* The Scottish Art Review. Vol. I. Glasgow. 1889.

* Old Cottage and Domestic Architecture in South-West Surrey, and Notes on the Early History of the Division. By Ralph Nevill, F.S.A., F.R.I.B.A. Guildford: printed by Billing & Sons. 1889.

many kinds of modern machine-made tiles, which have a surface that declines to be toned by the minute vegetable growths that are the great source of the beauty of the colouring of the older tiles.

The owners of ancient houses will be interested in his theory of the real cause of those fires, which are usually considered as due to the smouldering of beams in chimneys. He attributes this to the insertion of new grates of strong heating power, fixed without the proper filling in of bricks into the old wide opening. The soot, he thinks, falls and collects in the empty space, and after a time ignites. One case in his own experience he quotes, and the theory seems likely to be a true one in many cases. But it must not be forgotten that smouldering beams have been discovered, and that fires (probably from this cause) have occurred in cases where there has been no renewal of the grate.

This interesting book closes with what the author rightly describes as "gleanings" of the evidences of Roman occupation in the district. These generally go to prove the theory that this district "remained in the possession of the Romanized Britons till a late period in the Saxon history." We hope that Mr. Nevill may find time to collect his information in a more consecutive form, and to deal with this important branch of antiquarian research in an exhaustive manner.

OUTDOOR SPORTS IN SCOTLAND.*

ELLANGOWAN'S range in this volume is a wide one. He teaches us how to kill and how to cook deer, hares, rabbits, pheasants, grouse, partridges, capercaillie, wildfowl, salmon, and trout; what to do with gamekeepers, poachers, and vermin; and how to manage badger-baiting, cock-fighting, otter-hunting, fox-hunting, curling, golfing, and shinty. The book is full of statistics, which are not only rather wearying, but in many cases highly speculative. It is undoubtedly a difficult thing to supply figures with regard to certain matters connected with sports, and where they must necessarily be exceedingly vague it may be a question whether it would not be best to dispense with them altogether. This was our feeling when we attempted to follow the author in his calculations as to the game supply of Great Britain. There are, says he, somewhere about 1,200 cafés, hotels, restaurants, dining-rooms, and superior public-houses at which luncheon or dinner may be obtained in London. Then he makes a guess as to the number of these at which game is regularly provided. He thinks that perhaps one might get it at 150 of them. At some of the others, he supposes, grouse may be given when the market is glutted. He considers it possible that this might be done at half of them. After various guessings and supposings, he finally decides to "take it that 500" of the 1,200 "will average two birds a day on each of the 120 days (including Sundays) of the grouse season," which makes such and such a number of grouse. To this he would add, say, 10,000 or 12,000 birds for Brighton and other watering-places on the South coast, and perhaps, "offhand, just five times the quantity required in London" for —, and so on. Now we have come across a good deal of wild figure-mongering in our day; but never before have we met with a writer who made such bold plunges into units, tens, and hundreds, averages, percentages, and inferences as Ellangowan.

All the author's facts and figures, however, are not equally hazy. Fifty years ago one could rent, says he, two or three thousand acres of shooting and a mile or two of good water in Scotland for 50*l.*, and he is supported in this opinion by the late Lord Malmesbury's statement that, for 25*l.* a year, he was once offered the moors, forests, and fishings of the Isle of Harris, which now command a rental of 2,000*l.* Two moors belonging to the late Mr. Butter of Faskally, which at present let for 800*l.* a year, were rented fifty years ago at 8*l.* On p. 20 Ellangowan says that the rental of the deer forests of Scotland is "close upon one hundred and fifty thousand pounds, which is equal to an average of 1*s.* 6*d.* per acre." On p. 133 he says of "the forests in Scotland" that "the best way to obtain the figures of rental is to average the area occupied at a given sum per acre, which may be taken at 2*s.* 6*d.* all over, making a total for the vast acreage of 150,000*l.*" The liberty of being allowed to take either eighteenpence or half a crown as the average per acre returned by a gross rental of a given sum is somewhat embarrassing. But this is not all, for he immediately adds:—"The cost of living and the extra outlay of different kinds will certainly increase the amount by the sum of 50,000*l.*, showing a grand total for deer-forests of 200,000*l.*" The cost of living! In the name of dry champagne, pâté de fois gras, lady's-maid's wages, and doctor's bills, is every expense of living during a season at a deer-forest to be included under this head? Then is this unknown quantity (for we see no particular reason for putting it at 50,000*l.*) to be added to half a crown or eighteenpence per acre, according to the taste of the mathematician, and to be again divided by the total number of acres of the Highland deer-forests? There is something sublime in the idea of the accuracy which would thus be attained. More to the point is the account of an English gentleman's experiences of a forest. He says:—"I have had the confounded place now for three seasons, and it has cost me in that time not less than ten thousand pounds," in addition to "no end of small sums" of which he grew tired of taking note. The pleasures he obtained in return for his outlay were of the following nature:—"For a couple of hours at a time I have walked with the water of a running stream well over my boots. A suit of clothes has been done for in a day's time; twice or thrice I have sunk up to my chest in a moss; once I fell over a precipice"; once when crossing a loch "I fell overboard, and was not fished out till I was nearly drowned." On another occasion "I was fired at by one of my own gillies, who said he mistook me for a 'beestie,' of what kind I know not; but I fancy I had rather a narrow escape. Per contra, I have on five occasions brought down a good stag." The largest proprietor of deer-forests in Scotland is the Duke of Sutherland, with three forests covering 147,010 acres; then comes the Duke of Fife, with the Mar Forest of 80,000; and, thirdly, Lord Breadalbane, with the Blackmount of 70,000. With regard to the number of stags that are shot on a forest, the author says that on one of 10,000 acres from a dozen to a score are usually killed, and he estimates the total number of stags shot in a year in Scotland at about 4,500.

Turning from deer to hares, we find many authorities quoted upon the disputed question of the average number of leverets bred by a hare in a year. One believes that hares have three litters, with two leverets in the first, three in the second, and four or five in the last; another thinks that they have only two litters; a third is of opinion that they have from ten to twelve young ones in a year; a fourth that they have fifteen or sixteen; a fifth says that a pair of hares turned into a large enclosed garden increased to the number of fifty-six in a single season; a sixth had a friend in Wales who once saw seven young hares in one litter. With rabbits, again, one naturalist puts their average litters at five and another at eight; one calculates that a pair of rabbits will multiply within a given period to the extent of 1,274,840, while another makes their increase only 478,062. Ellangowan himself estimates the probable descendants of a pair of rabbits through many generations, until he gets among very high figures, the accuracy of which we have not made it our business to test. We are inclined to receive his statement that, "despite the provisions of the Ground Game Act, rabbits are as plentiful as they were ten or twelve years ago" with some reserve. Certainly this is not the case on certain estates, whatever it may be in England as a whole. We are told that the value of the rabbits killed every year in Great Britain is about half a million sterling, but that rabbits are not nearly so valuable as they used to be, as the skin of a rabbit alone was worth from half a crown to three shillings in the early part of the present century.

Ellangowan believes in the theory, held by many, that a cock grouse takes two or three of the brood under his special charge, and that these develop with extraordinary precocity. The whole brood, he tells us, leaves the nest within twenty-four hours of hatching, never to return to it; and little grouse (runners) walk great distances, in proof of which he states, as an undoubted fact, that "Two tender birds, which were well identified by deformed legs, had travelled nearly seven miles in the course of two days and two nights." Capercaillie have "multiplied astonishingly in Scotland during the last twenty years"; Ptarmigan have become scarcer, and blackgame are decreasing. Fortunately, "Year by year grouse become more abundant." "In some seasons certain moors become so thickly populated with birds as to have been estimated to contain dozens to the acre." To certain acres, perhaps; but surely not "to the acre" in the usual acceptation of the expression. Partridges, on the contrary, have "much decreased" in Scotland during the last ten or twelve years, one reason of this being that they are desperately poached. Not that grouse are allowed to go scot free in this respect; for in the course of "the season over two thousand brace of grouse will be sent from Scotland to England packed, as has been hinted, in herring barrels and salmon boxes." But salmon-poaching is practised on a still larger scale in Scotland. We read that from six to eight thousand fish are annually taken by poachers in the Tweed and its tributaries, and chiefly at the spawning season. The majority of these poached salmon from the Tweed are sent to the Continent. A Tweed poacher told the author that he did not consider that he had done well unless he took more than twenty salmon in a night. Some account is given of the trade in feathers carried on by the inhabitants of the island of St. Kilda, of whom there are only about ninety all told. They pay their rents in feathers and earn their living by feathers. "The men of St. Kilda will collect and kill ten thousand birds in a very short space of time; but they are so numerous that such a number subtracted from the general stock is of no moment." Ellangowan informs us that plover's eggs, of which great quantities are sent from Scotland to London, only became fashionable about thirty years ago, although epicures have occasionally eaten them for double that period.

It must be discouraging to salmon-breeders to reflect that, according to the calculations of some authorities, "not two ova of the salmon in a thousand will live to become reproductive," and that others "have estimated that only one egg out of every thousand becomes in time a full-grown salmon." A female fish is supposed to yield about one thousand eggs for each pound of her weight; but for the accuracy of this estimate we should be sorry to vouch. Statistics are given to prove that more of the salmon eaten in England comes from Ireland than from Scotland or England and Wales. It is stated that the annual value of the salmon caught in England and Wales is not more than 100,000*l.*, and of that in Scotland about 250,000*l.*, whereas the average of that of Ireland is about 400,000*l.*

* Out of Door Sports in Scotland. By Ellangowan. London: Allen & Co. 1889.

Probably the most interesting chapter to some people may be that on "Game in Larder, Kitchen, and Dining Room." The author seems to be remarkably fond of onions and bacon, and he has a horror of "high" or underdone game or venison. "Only show it the fire," say certain epicures. "That of course is nonsense, only those who delight in 'feasts of blood' will permit" such an abomination. "I do not eat the rotten bird," said Monsieur Biazé; "those who keep the pheasant till it can change its position without man's aid must permit me not to be of their opinion." Sir Walter Scott used to say that he was not asked to eat his gigot of Cheviot mutton in a high condition, and that his roast beef was never sent to table in a highly-perfumed state, why, then, he would ask, should his pheasants and his venison be kept until they were "in a condition in which no Christian gentleman or lady should be asked to eat them. Bread-sauce and red-currant jelly," he would add, "I have found out—they are mere disguises." Even with the opinion of so high an authority many will differ, as well as with Ellangowan's statement that "all the wild animals we kill are so sufficiently 'high' by their course of feeding" as not to require much keeping; although Soyer himself said that grouse ought not to be "over-kept, because from the food they eat they are ready for the cook in three or four days after being killed." A man must be of a very robust temperament to share the author's opinion that when hare-soup is "rich, ruddy, and reeking it is most appetite-provoking." "Of the woodcock it has been said by a competent authority that no epicure eats the bird itself, all he wants is the trail on its bed of toast, the cock itself may be passed on to the servants' hall"; but another bon vivant "maintains that the woodcock is all for eating." We quite agree with the author that "thrushes are good for food in a high degree," so also are blackbirds, though it is, perhaps, rather wicked to eat either; but when he tells us that farmyard or granary rats are quite as palatable as rabbits when nicely cooked, we feel no inclination to avail ourselves of his suggestion. Wonderful man! He likes rats and does not care for venison.

Now and then Ellangowan's phraseology is a little peculiar; for instance, he talks about "almost no dog," and "almost nothing"; many of his opinions, again, are likely to be disputed, and he is very far from guiltless of the sin of padding; but read in the sort of way that a book of this kind ought to be read, Outdoor Sports in Scotland is by no means to be despised. A book on sports must necessarily contain much that is well-known to sportsmen; this work, however, has many things in it that will be new to most of them.

COOLIDGE'S SWISS GUIDE-BOOKS.*

THIRTY-TWO years have passed since the foundation of the Alpine Club, just thirty since the first series of Peaks, Passes, and Glaciers was published, and twenty-six since the purpose of that collection was taken up and continued in a more permanent and technical manner by the Alpine Journal. We may say, therefore, that for a generation of men the work of "mountain adventure and scientific observation" (to borrow the terms in which the scope of the Alpine Journal was and is defined) in regions above and beyond the range of ordinary travel has been acknowledged as a specific branch of human activity which has, and ought to have, like other special pursuits, a literature of its own. The year 1857 may conveniently be taken as the dividing point between the old and the new state of mountaineering. From that time there has been a constant flow of Alpine publications, historical, practical, scientific, popular, occasional and personal, or containing some or all of these elements in various proportions. Among these a considerable special class is formed by Alpine guide-books, general and local. The recent Continental literature both of this and of other kinds is abundant and much of it excellent. When a special class of books has thriven to this extent and is still thriving, no more words are needed to show that the harvest is ripe for the bibliographer. A sign of the times in England is that several second-hand booksellers make a distinct heading of "Alpine" or "Mountaineering" in their catalogues. One cannot expect the makers of such catalogues to come up to the standard of the British Museum; but material errors and defects in the description of this class of books are common enough to show that a readily accessible apparatus criticus is desirable and ought to be welcome.

Hitherto there has been almost nothing of the kind in English; and, although Georg of Basel and others have published copious and useful catalogues, we are not aware that a complete Alpine bibliography, much less a complete bibliography of mountain exploration and observation, can be found anywhere. It would be a long and difficult undertaking to construct one, and Mr. Coolidge's aim in the book now before us has been different, and within much narrower limits. At the same time the book is a valuable contribution of materials and resources towards the larger purpose; and the point of view of historical bibliography seems to be that from which its permanent value can be best appreciated. Mr. Coolidge describes his subject as "the history of the practical side of travelling in Switzerland," meaning chiefly "the development of guide-books and other means of travel," and this within "the boundaries of Switzerland according to what may be called tourist geography"—that is to say, excluding the Grisons and including the whole chain of Mont Blanc. In the result the "other means" or material conditions of travel—inns, steamers, railways, and roads—are dealt with in a few pages of statistics; and the first part of the volume is mainly a literary history of guide-books. No small part of the work done by Mr. Coolidge consists in tracing the several forms and editions of the same book, attributing anonymous and pseudonymous works to their real authors, and ascertaining, as between distinct publications resembling one another in contents, which is copied from or modelled on the other. All this, we need not tell any scholar, is eminently bibliographer's work, and Mr. Coolidge has done it with a scholarly thoroughness which makes his book a real landmark, and will save endless trouble to future workers on the subject. Moreover, he gives us, in the modest form of an appendix, a "List of the principal Works relating to the Alpine regions of Switzerland and the adjacent districts, which have been published from the fifteenth century to the beginnings of modern Alpine literature," and a supplementary list of modern English books, which, though professing to give only "some of the principal works," does not appear to us, on a cursory view, to omit anything of importance. These lists do not include "guide-books, purely scientific works, and, with a few exceptions, descriptions of special districts"; the total number of entries, counting addenda, is 245. The text is followed by a most interesting and useful body of notes. Our only complaint is that, in order to save space, a good deal has been stowed away in them which on its merits might quite as well have been displayed in the text. A virtuous reader ought to read the notes; but it is common knowledge that most people do not.

There is, for example, an early and curious English allusion to the terrors of the Alps of which Mr. Coolidge's text gives no hint, though it is fully described in the notes. It would seem that in the second quarter of the tenth century some English clerk, or perhaps a patron or superior from whom he had the description, crossed the Alps in winter, and had a bitterly cold journey. This clerk, having to draft royal grants of lands, which, according to the constant practice, contained a "sanction," or cursing clause, directed against any future violator of the gift, bethought him of a novelty. He made cold perform the effect of fire, and instead of consigning the lawless intruder to "Satanæ lebes," "herebi machæra," or the infernal portion of Judas and all other traitors, he invoked upon him the icy blasts of the glaciers and the hosts of Pennine demons. Nine charters are preserved, and printed in Kemble's Codex Diplomaticus, which exhibit this peculiar curse. They all come within ten years (A.D. 938-946). There is nothing to identify this unknown predecessor of John de Bremble, whose ink froze on the Great St. Bernard in 1188, and whose letter, in Bishop Stubbs's translation, has a conspicuous place in Mr. Coolidge's text.

The reader who follows Mr. Coolidge need not fear being imposed upon by dogmatism. If anything, the author is too diffident. He will not positively say that the original edition of Murray's Handbook (1838) contains the first and true invention of the arrangement by routes which all the guide-books have adopted since. The first Continental guide-book in which that arrangement is known to appear is Richard's (ed. 1840) and the next edition (1843) professed to be "revue d'après Murray." But there were many editions of Richard (originally an adaptation of Ebel), and there is just the possibility that Murray's arrangement occurred independently in some earlier edition not seen by Mr. Coolidge. This possibility is carefully left open. Again at a more recent time Berlepsch's guide-book underwent a sort of bifurcation into two distinct books, of which Mr. Coolidge says, "I cannot explain what seems a very odd proceeding." We have not the books before us, but it seems a safe inference that the relations between Berlepsch and his publishers were broken or dissolved (indeed, a French adapter of the publisher's edition says as much), that there was no agreement restraining either of them from using the old name and materials, and that accordingly two competing recensions of Berlepsch's guide existed side by side for some years. One or two minute puzzles about earlier guide-books remain unsolved. What was the "Schreckhorn" which a writer of 1796 classed with the Stockhorn, the Grimsel, and the Gemmi? His epithet halsbrechend was certainly more appropriate to the Schreckhorn which we now know by that name than to the other three; but he seems to speak of them all as points of view commonly sought by tourists. We need not remind any one who has followed us so far that more than sixty years were still to pass before the Schreckhorn was ascended.

Not less accurate and cautious is Mr. Coolidge's account of Swiss mountain inns and huts. We can confirm from our own memory one date for which he seems to desire more evidence. François Couttet, of Chamonix (dit Baguette, the "père Baltet" of Tartarin sur les Alpes), was still acting as a guide in 1867, but had planned his hotel, and meanwhile occasionally entertained a few travellers in his own house. In 1869 the Hôtel Couttet was open and in working order. The date of 1868 for Couttet's "commencing innkeeper" (why has that good eighteenth-century phrase gone out of fashion?) appears, therefore, to be correct.

The volume is concluded by a monograph on Zermatt, intended to exemplify Mr. Coolidge's method in a particular application. It is a curious piece of minute history, and not too minutely told for so typical a mountaineering centre. We need not, however, dwell further on details. Enough has been said to show that Mr. Coolidge's book is an indispensable addition to every collection of Alpine literature, and an almost indispensable companion to a set of the Alpine Journal. We may be allowed, finally, to concur in the wish expressed by Mr. Coolidge—the wish, we believe, of most English mountaineers—that a new and revised edition of Mr. Ball's Alpine Guide should be produced. In many ways it is still a standard work, and it is by no means too late for a competent editor, or editing committee, to restore its old utility and pre-eminence. But by the end of the century it may be too late.

* Swiss Travel and Swiss Guide-Books. By W. A. B. Coolidge. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

It may be convenient to notice here a volume which we have just received, entitled Annuaire de la Suisse Pittoresque et Hygiénique, and published at Lausanne at the office of the "Bibliothèque Universelle." It is a kind of gazetteer, giving special prominence to health resorts, and also giving, as might be expected, something of a lion's share to the cantons of Vaud and Valais. The introduction contains information about climate and mineral waters, revised according to the latest medical knowledge. There is an appendix on the winter resorts of the Riviera; but the Alpine part is strictly confined to the political boundaries of Switzerland. So far as we can judge, this publication ought to be useful to travellers in search of health, to whom it is chiefly, if not exclusively, addressed. It does not profess to do the work of a guide-book.

MR. SIMS REEVES.*

FIFTY years of artistic life is a suggestive theme for an autobiographer, though the writer be an artist of less repute and popularity than the eminent singer who has compiled the amusing and interesting volume before us. Everybody with music in his soul will read these recollections of an eventful and brilliant career with pleasure, and possibly not without profit. For Mr. Sims Reeves has done more than consider the taste of the general public by providing a varied assortment of good stories. Like Michael Kelly, before him, and other chroniclers of musical times, he does much to gratify natural curiosity by confidences of another kind. He has rightly judged that there are many readers who would gladly learn somewhat of his early musical education, of the means by which his vocal method was perfected, of his original appearance as a baritone, and his development into the foremost tenor of his country. The temptation to draw on the stores of anecdote in his book is only too strong, though such a proceeding would be very unjust both to the author and readers. Mr. Sims Reeves has much to say that is valuable concerning the musical art of the past and the present. He speaks with peculiar authority on such subjects as the operatic stage, oratorios, concerts, and the art of vocal production and training. Old stagers will rejoice in the high estimate Mr. Sims Reeves forms of old-fashioned opera, and the school of great singers that interpreted it; while in his criticism of latter-day music and executants they will find much that is congenial. Those were brave times both for the English and Italian lyric stages when the English tenor met in the world of music rivals worthy of association with him. It is pleasant to note his cordial references to Mario—the princely, magnanimous Mario—and to Rubini—"always my very good friends"—and if towards Tamburini and Lablache his disposition is somewhat different, it cannot be said to be unwarranted. The latter evidently thought, says Mr. Sims Reeves, that a London theatre was the right place for Italian singers, though a leading English tenor was nothing but an interloper in Paris or Milan. The national esprit de corps attributed to Lablache and Tamburini is not likely to become extinct. Mr. Sims Reeves is an enthusiast in praise of the deeds done in his days and the art and artists of the golden prime of Her Majesty's. At the outset of his operatic career the Fates were propitious. The artist could develop his powers naturally and with ample security for their preservation. There was then no conspiracy of composers and managers to ruin the human voice by high-pressure exaction. Long runs were unheard of. There was no tyrannical custom that compelled sopranos or tenors to take an arduous part for six consecutive nights, week after week, with, as Mr. Sims Reeves says, "the absolute certainty of ruining their voices." Then, again, as we are reminded, mere "shouting" was not considered "splendid declamation," and pure vocalization was held in high esteem on the operatic stage. The form of operas in vogue did not, it is true, abound in long-winded declamatory passages. In Italian the operas of Bellini, Donizetti, and Rossini were most popular. In English the works of Bishop, Arne, Shield, Balfe, Sir George Macfarren, and others of the old school still held the stage. It was as the gipsy boy in Guy Mannering, at Newcastle, that Mr. Sims Reeves made his first appearance, in 1839, when just eighteen—an engagement that led to more important undertakings—the baritone parts of Count Rodolfo in the Sonnambula, and Dandini in La Cenerentola. Shortly after, at Drury Lane under Macready, he took part in Purcell's dramatic setting of Dryden's King Arthur, when his refusal to sing the splendid lyric "Come, if you dare" with his back to the audience, as the manager instructed him to do, occasioned a serious disagreement. He attempted a compromise that was both artistic and conciliatory; yet the autocratic manager instantly dismissed him. Perhaps the singer was too easily confounded by this prompt proceeding. That he never forgot it he did not scruple to let Macready know, when he declined to sing at his benefit farewell performance many years after, and rather cruelly reminded him of the incident, making it the ground of refusal.

Like others who had dealings with Macready on the stage, Mr. Sims Reeves was greatly impressed by the vigorous personality of the imperious actor, and relates some extremely characteristic anecdotes of him. When Macready raged Old Drury must have shivered to its rafters. And yet the force of nature in "this passionate man" was not considered by himself sufficient for stage purposes. "I myself have seen," says Mr. Sims Reeves, "two unfortunate supers whose business it was to make faces at him, tread on his toes, kick him, and otherwise provoke him, until he was in a state of exasperation bordering on the demoniac. 'More!' he would growl, as he stood at the wing preparing to make a terrific entry, 'more, you beasts!' until an exceptionally severe kick happening to coincide with the moment for his sudden appearance, he would knock down each of his hired tormentors, and rush upon the stage like a maniac." No one who has seen Mr. Sims Reeves on the stage will be surprised that he was when a boy "enamoured of the smell of the footlights," and determined to adopt the stage and dramatic singing as a profession. Inclination and ability appear to have grown apace as natural allies with the youthful maestro di capella and chief soprano of the North Cray choir. Between his studies under Mr. H. Callcott and Mr. John Cramer, the pianist, and his Wednesday and Sunday duties in the Kentish church there was time enough for much playgoing, and the stage passion was soon confirmed. The account of the musical society of North Cray is agreeable reading. The rector and his sister promoted the interests of the choir, with excellent results, and the choir itself must have been very superior to the average country choir of fifty years ago. The kind-hearted rector would invite the young musician and his two brothers, both of whom lived to develop "genuine tenor voices—not the half counter-tenor voices of the present generation"—to his house in London, where they visited the King's Theatre, and heard all the great singers of the day—Grisi and Persiani, Rubini, Mario, Tamburini, Lablache, and the rest. Referring once more to Tamburini, Mr. Sims Reeves says of him that Ronconi, "both as actor and singer, knocked him into a cocked-hat," though whether this was the veritable opinion of the youthful choir-master, or the mature verdict formed after Parisian experience, is not altogether apparent. One interesting matter intimately associated with the artistic success of Mr. Sims Reeves is clearly set forth in these juvenile experiences of North Cray. The young singer was even then fully convinced of the connexion between perfect phrasing and dramatic expression. "At this time," he writes, "as ever afterwards, I attached the greatest importance to enunciation. To express with appropriate feeling the full meaning of the words was my first aim." With such convictions, so early established, the singer's method already possessed a sound basis, and to master the art of dramatic singing was only a question of time. Eventually at Milan, under Signor Mazzucato, Mr. Sims Reeves completed his course of training, and scored the first of a memorable series of operatic triumphs at the Scala as Edgardo in Lucia. Of this opera Mr. Sims Reeves has much that is interesting to record. Of the many illustrious Lucias with whom he appeared, his verdict is—"all good, and some excellent as vocalists; many charming both as actresses and singers; but only one perfect." Among these were Persiani, Frezzolini, and Jenny Lind; the perfect Lucia being Catherine Hayes, whom the ignorant Irish press confounded with the Newgate Calendar heroine of Thackeray's Catherine. Mr. Sims Reeves rather oddly assumes that the singer was unknown by name to the novelist. Thackeray could scarcely be expected to change his lady's historic name because the operatic lady also owned it. Towards the close of his book the author falls into an old controversy, the question of reducing our concert pitch to the French normal diapason—a reform which he continues to advocate with all the firmness and conviction displayed twenty years ago when he first was active in the movement.

NEW MUSIC.

A COLLECTION of songs has been sent us by the Joint Literature Committee of the Grand Council of the Primrose League, called "The Patriotic Song Book, for use at Primrose League Meetings." So far as it goes, it is a good selection, and may prove very useful. At the same time there are many unfortunate omissions—for instance, one of the most popular songs at these meetings, Lady Arthur Hill's "The Good Old Cause," finds no place in the work. Then, again, we cannot understand why some of the songs are printed with the accompaniments and others with only the treble notes and words. Although there are footnotes to say where the song with full accompaniment can be procured, this omission prevents the work from being complete in itself, and, of course, adds greatly to the expense of music for meetings; in fact, it reduces the work practically to only being a guide-book in many cases. Then "God save the Queen" appears with a most curious feature of a florid introduction, and the setting also is not dignified. We are glad to find an old favourite, but unfortunately rather obsolete, patriotic song reappear, the "Red, White, and Blue."

* My Jubilee; or, Fifty Years of Artistic Life. By J. Sims Reeves. London: The London Music Publishing Co. (Limited). 1889.

"The Lord is my Shepherd," an anthem, sent to us by James Smith & Son, Liverpool, composed by R. Ernest Bryson, is a melodious work, which on first hearing sounds rather tame, but on acquaintance grows on the taste; the contrasting subject, though short, is satisfactory and effective. We also have "Two Songs" by the same composer, and published by the London Music Publishing Company. They are individually called "The Sea hath its Pearls" and "A Storm Wind." They are pretty, and not too much spun out; the last is the better of the two. We regret the first four notes of the opening symphony of the first; for, although strict writing is not an absolute necessity in this class of music, an unfortunate double A and Bb in bass and treble and F# and F# ditto, gives to musical ears a very bald effect, strongly suggestive of consecutive octaves, it not being an octave passage. The same firm of publishers also sends a Sonata by Erskine Allon in G minor, Op. 12. We are always glad to welcome any new music that makes the least attempt at classical form and treatment, and parts of this work are successful. The "Maestoso" at the end of the slow movement is fine and effective, and we like the saltarello-like theme of the last movement, but think the tempo ought to be faster. Some of the themes in the other movements are too slight for the elaborate treatment necessary in the sonata form. Mr. Erskine Allon is more at home in songs and short "Lieder," where the ideas need not be spun out, and he has sent us a charming set entitled "Ten Love Songs," Op. 13. We certainly should advise him to keep for the present to that form of composition; they are, so to speak, terse and pithy, and most of them sparkling and pretty.

We have from Charles Woolhouse two pieces for violin and pianoforte composed by G. Saint George. The first, called "Meditation," Op. 25, has a touching passionate air, to which the long-drawn notes of the violin will do ample justice. Mr. Saint George evidently understands this instrument thoroughly. The "Romanesca" is in perfectly different style, and is full of character and life. The technical difficulty of it is not slight; but, as it is dedicated to Dr. Joachim, we suppose it is written for artists of his calibre. A song by Jacques Haakman, from the same publishers, words by Moore, entitled "The Loving Rose," is pretty, and makes a charming little drawing-room song.

Messrs. Ricordi & Co. send us another song by F. Paolo Tosti, entitled "Tell Them!" which, although certainly not high art in music, has a happy knack of appealing to the feelings, and in many ways is more successful than more ambitious works. Signor Tosti had a peculiar gift in writing this kind of song, which will always be popular.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

GENERAL (once better known as Colonel) TCHENG-KI-TONG (1) is an agreeable writer, who has done a good deal to convince Western readers (if indeed any intelligent persons among them want convincing) that the Chinaman is by no means a kind of partly malevolent and wholly ridiculous mannikin. But we think we like the General's own lucubrations on matters Chinese and European better than his redactions of Chinese stories. They are frequently interesting enough, but the editor admits a great amount of compression and alteration, and this process of compression and alteration has not, we think, improved them. There is, moreover, in them a good deal of the curious inconsequence, as it seems to Western readers, which so often distinguishes Chinese stories, such as those, for instance, in Mr. Herbert Giles's interesting volumes. There is one legend here formidably entitled "Flagrant délit," which we have read twice over with great care, but with the most indistinct idea of what happened, and especially of how one of the characters came to survive after, as far as we can see, all of them had been killed.

M. Edouard Blanc's (2) three stories are of an unusual kind, and would be rather unusually good if the author had more notion of the story-telling art. His first tale, "Le tapis de Salomon," has good points, which are lost, or at any rate not improved, by constant digressions of the most unnecessary kind, and by such observations as that M. Blanc found the Solomon of the Bible uninteresting, but him of Moslem legend delightful. The last, "La recherche du bleu" (not in poor Schaubard's sense), is a fantasy piece unduly prolonged, but still showing no small capacity. The best, however, is "La bitarde," though it also is by no means free from defects of method. The bitarde is an imaginary creature, a "gibier qui," as certain huntsmen of the centre of France frankly admit, "n'existe pas," but which they yet as firmly declare to be capable of drawing the dogs off on a false scent at certain times of the chase. How a Parisian Johnny Raw found the bitarde, or was thought to have done so, in a certain gipsy girl, to whom he restored money that she had lost, and who thereat jumped upon his neck, kissed him, and disappeared, is not exactly well, but strikingly, told; and the story ends with, what is rarest of all in the books of our day, a sound reflection on life:—"Il n'y a que les sots qui gâtent leurs rêves en essayant de leur donner un corps, et leurs souvenirs en cherchant à leur donner une suite."

The migration of the centres of novel subjects from time to time will supply an interesting opportunity some day (perhaps it has supplied one already) for a German monograph. In different times and countries, sometimes in several countries at once, Scotland, Brittany, Italy, and not a few other places, have been the rock which, as Mr. Browning's poem has it, the waves surround for a time, and then hurry off to another. Herr Sacher-Masoch and some other writers have succeeded in making Galicia one of these centres, and Mlle. Marie Poradowska has followed the fashion (3). Her book is well enough worth reading, the most interesting point about it, perhaps, being the evidence given of the popularity, not merely of French, but of such foreign terms as French has adopted. The young lady who confides to a friend that, "as soon as she is married," a certain baron has promised to tell her a delicious scandal, is good; and it is edifying to find a recalcitrant wife asserting that she will go in "le coach," even if she does insist on being conveyed "en dogcart." Thus does Britannia rule not only the waves (except when machinery bursts), but also the land, where, as we trust, her coachmakers are more trustworthy.

We are afraid that M. Delpit (4) is an example of that unlucky, and to the patient painful, process called "falling off." We are not concerned to reconcile his former admiration of "Les dieux qu'on brise" with his present adoration of the "Parisienne du XX^{ème} siècle," who apparently has not much left about her to briser. We can regard with indifference his learned denunciation of the hypocrisy of Britain, where, "in spite of temperance Societies, ladies get drunk like porters." His heroine, "Mrs. Maud Vivian," may have been "connected with the best English families," though we should like better evidence for it than the fact that she imitated the gutter-journalist nomenclature of Mrs. Mona Caird and Mrs. Josephine Butler. English ladies, M. Delpit may like to know, do not call themselves by their own Christian names and the surname of their husbands when "Mrs." precedes. But why should M. Delpit make his hero—a pure French hero, "well-born and loyal"—a very vulgar fellow? At least that is the description which we should give (putting morality quite aside) of a person who, being asked, as M. Edmond Sorbier was, his ideal of womanhood by a woman, should answer as he does.

M. Paul Dys has written a book of some power in Grandterroir (5). The earth-hunger of the French peasant has been depicted for us ad nauseam in more senses than one. The position of such great landlords as are left in France has also been described. But the real hero of Grandterroir is a yeoman-farmer of considerable wealth, who is devoted to his land, and whose soul is crossed by a son who cares for none of these things. The description of the great wheat crops is as vigorous as M. Zola, while it happens also to be clean enough, as French books go. Perhaps some day French writers, as English housekeepers have done, will learn that cleanliness and vigour are not incompatible.

To use a colloquialism, Le besoin du crime (6) is rather a mad book. It would appear to have been inspired by literature of that odd class of which the manuscript which Mr. Pickwick read one night is the best example; and it reads like a nightmare. Things which read like a nightmare are not necessarily bad, but they are usually best when they are short. An exceedingly good short story might have been made out of Le besoin du crime; but in a volume it is rather watered down.

Commandant Stany's book (7) contains some good sketches of the manners and ways of the Ouessant folk, respecting whom, as Dr. Mayo says of the (in some sort) similarly situated inhabitants of Nantucket, "they are all odd people there." But the character sketches are superior to the art shown in weaving them into a book. As for Les passions étranges (8), it has been compared to the work of M. Barbey d'Aurevilly. The spirit of L'ensorcelée has, however, been filtered through La terre, and is considerably the worse for the sieve.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE "Essays on Church History" of Mr. Ernest de Bunsen—Islam and True Christianity (Trübner & Co.)—involve the critical discussion of several extremely abstruse questions of Biblical criticism and the interpretation of prophecy, much of which, happily, may be dissociated from the main object of the volume, which is to establish the relations of Christianity to Islam and the claims of Mahomed to a place in the Universal Church. Any future progress of Islam depends, it would seem, on its reformation in the spirit of its founder, the basis for which is indicated in such doctrinal accord as may exist between the Korán and the tenets of what Mr. de Bunsen calls aboriginal or pre-Paulinic Christianity. To formulate this thesis the author, by a critical process decidedly anti-Pauline, endeavours to sap the whole fabric of orthodox Christianity. Briefly summarized, his conclusions are that Paul was the disciple of Stephen rather than the apostle of Christ he proclaimed himself to be; that after the death of Stephen he was converted to the doctrines of the Essenes; and that those doctrines, as developed by Paul, were not sanctioned by Jesus or the twelve apostles. From the

(3) Demoiselle Micia. Par Marie Poradowska. Paris: Hachette.

(4) Passionnément. Par A. Delpit. Paris: Ollendorff.

(5) Grandterroir. Par Paul Dys. Paris: Perrin.

(6) Le besoin du crime. Par Jules Perrin. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(7) Une faute. Par le Commandant Stany. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(8) Les passions étranges. Par Jean Baleux. Paris: Ollendorff.

(1) Contes chinois. Par le Général Tcheng-ki-Tong. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(2) Chasses à l'impossible. Par Edouard Blanc. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

Ébionite Christians of Arabia, who denied Paul's authority, Mahomed derived those doctrines which Mr. de Bunsen identifies in the Korán with pre-Paulinic Christianity, or the "True Christianity" of his title. The Korán, then, rests on the "foundations of pre-Paulinic Christianity"; for Mahomed entirely ignores Paul and his teaching, while acknowledging Jesus as the greatest of apostles and prophets and the Messiah expected by the Jews. If, therefore, this communion of faith could be recognized by the followers of Mahomed, and realized in practice as in faith, the progress of a reformed Islam would be assured, and something like a religious consolidation of Jews, Mahomedans, and Christians might ensue. Such is Mr. de Bunsen's position. Unfortunately for the practical value of the argument, the author's "pre-Paulinic Christianity," of which he can show but the slenderest historical proof, does not so much as exist, nor has it existed these eighteen centuries past. Christianity as a religious force is orthodox, and orthodox Christianity is based on the very doctrines which Mr. de Bunsen declares to be contrary to those principles of pre-Paulinic Christianity assimilated by Mahomed in the Korán. Nor would the prospect of a reformed Islam be advanced in the slightest degree even if the whole Christian world should become miraculously converted to the anti-Pauline views of Mr. de Bunsen and his school. On the other hand, the reformed Islam contemplated by the author, if carried out solely by Islam, would amount to nothing short of a spiritual transformation or revolution of a religion which, as Sir William Muir well observes, has no "plastic power," and is radically incapable of development through change. Altogether the future of Islam as a religious and civilizing force must be exceedingly remote if it depends upon (1) the disappearance of orthodox Christianity, and (2) the reformation of the most inflexible religious system in the world. For not less than this results from Mr. de Bunsen's process of depriving both systems of all that is characteristic of each in order that we may arrive at an extremely narrow basis of agreement common to both.

A Manual of Politics, by Frederick George Lee (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), is an exposition of what may be termed high Toryism, robust in faith, outspoken and vigorous in tone, and, on the whole, open to the subscription of most Conservatives, as well as likely to strengthen the weak-kneed and confirm the feeble. The Crown, the Church, and the Empire, these are Dr. Lee's watchwords, as he wrestles with a world "gone wandering after the Beast of Liberalism," and "a mad world, my masters!" it appears to be, according to Dr. Lee's outlook. He is wrong, however, in identifying Free-trade with the creed of Radicals, and is himself in a minority among Tories when he denounces its "towering folly and commercially immoral principles."

That the experiences of a hospital nurse at home and in the colonies are worthy of record we have sufficient evidence in Recollections of a Nurse, by "E. D." (Macmillan & Co.) "Sister Emma," the writer, gives an interesting account of her work in Zanzibar, South Africa, and in the military hospital at Suez. Not everybody is aware of the multifarious duties that fall to a trained nurse on active service. It is not all nursing by any means. At Ladysmith, for instance, there was not only food to prepare for the sick, coffee and cocoa to be left at night with the orderlies, when the Ulundi wounded were coming in, but jelly, spongecakes, and other good things to be made. And "E. D." succeeded, it seems, in making spongecakes with moist sugar, and excellent jelly without eggs. Her cheerful little book presents the pleasanter aspect of the profession, and shows that nursing may yield genuine delight in the variety and incidents of travel not less than the satisfaction of work well done.

The third issue of Travel, Adventure, and Sport from Maga (Blackwood & Sons) is a capital collection of stirring narratives or travel by land and sea. The anonymous "Escape of the Republican Exiles from Cayenne" is curiously circumstantial in style, full of interest, and possibly not without some historical value. Who loves excitement may find it in "Two Nights in Southern Mexico," while more recent experiences of travel are represented in Lieutenant Palander's of the voyage of the Vega by the North-East Passage, and Mr. George Macmillan's "Ride across the Peloponnese."

The author of Mother Carey's Chickens, "a book of verse" (Cassell & Co.), is a bard of many moods. His lyrics have a true ring of nature—"The Day Dream" is a pretty conception—and the inevitable sonnets are correct in form, and fairly finished, though their rhyming includes "law" and "yore." Sketches in Verse, by William Dawe (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), treat of well-worn themes—"Actæon," "Hero," and the like—in smooth verse, yet with no marked distinction. More notable are some stanzas "To a Bank-Note":—

Farewell! and is it thus we part,
My much-esteemed and genial friend?

But the humour of the address goes no further. It is certainly not of the kind that is easily sustained. Mr. Crawford Wilson's Pastorals and Poems (Kegan Paul) is a reprint of several volumes of poems, one of which, the pastoral "Lost and Found," was dramatized in 1872 and produced at the Holborn Theatre. In "Elsie" the poet dignifies a pathetic story with grace and simplicity of style; in "Flights to Fairyland" he is alternately grotesque and fanciful, lightsome and whimsical, in the freest way of rhyme, and in metres that suggest at times the study of Ingoldsby.

The practice of printing ancient parish registers in index form is to be commended as convenient for reference, though your true antiquary prefers a literal copy. From Mr. Elliot Stock we have the first volume of such an index—The Parish Registers of Gainford, in the County of Durham—comprising "Baptisms 1560–1784," the names arranged in alphabetical order.

We have received new editions of Mrs. Walford's The Baby's Granamother (Blackett & Hallam), in one volume; Macaulay, by J. Cotter Morison, "English Men of Letters" Series (Macmillan); and Agnostic Faith (Ridgway).

We have also received the new volume, 1888–9, of Proceedings of the Royal Colonial Institute (Sampson Low & Co.); The Journal of Philology, No. 35 (Macmillan); The Task, by Cowper, the latest addition to "Routledge's Pocket Library"; and a reprint of Hood's Epping Hunt, with Cruikshank's illustrations (Glasgow: Bryce & Son).

Messrs. George Beeching & Son, of Upper Baker Street, forward a sample of the "Save-Time Envelope," which combines superior facility of opening with "absolute security from prying eyes." The flap is so cut that only one portion of the gummed edge needs moistening. This is decidedly an advantage to persons whose correspondence is large. Sticklers for symmetry, perhaps, will not at first take kindly to the lopsided appearance of the enclosing flap. For such, and for deliberate people generally, the new envelope was obviously not designed.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,764, AUGUST 17, 1889:

The Maybrick Case.

The Sentence on the General. The Fleet Swannery.
The Tithes Bill. The County Council on its Dignity.
Crete. The Use of Grand Committees.
Egypt. The British Medical Association. Ireland.
The Kensington Commissioners' Report.
A Leading American Case.

The Philosophy of a Commund.

Siam. South and North Devon.

The New School of Oriental Languages. Prohibition in Canada.
Informacon for Pylgrymes.
Cettinje. The World's Wheat Harvest this Year.
National Insurance in Germany.

Songs and Life of an Angler.

Novels. Three American Books. Jane Austen.
Sligo. A Week on the Concord. Epochs of Church History.
The Scottish Art Review.
Old Architecture in South-West Surrey.
Outdoor Sports in Scotland. Coolidge's Swiss Guide-Books.
Mr. Sims Reeves. New Music.
French Literature. New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE. — CHILDREN'S FIREWORKS
on Thursday, August 24, at 8.30.

Amusing Novelties by C. T. Brock & Co. Novel Aquatic Fireworks, from Lake spanned by "Tower Bridge," Superb Illuminations, Saturdays, August 17 and 24, at 9.15.
Admission, One Shilling daily.

A Y R T O N & T H O M A S,
PATENT AGENTS.

Conduct every kind of British, Foreign, and Colonial Business connected with PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.

Mr. H. M. THOMAS, Author of "The True Position of Patentees," being a practical engineer, PERSONALLY SUPERINTENDS the applications in respect of mechanical inventions.

Moderate Terms. No charge for preliminary advice.

Telegraphic Address, "Prolonged, London."

& 10 Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, W.C.

EDUCATIONAL.

OWENS COLLEGE, VICTORIA UNIVERSITY, MANCHESTER.

PROSPECTUSES for the SESSION 1889-90 are NOW READY.

- I.—DEPARTMENT OF ARTS, SCIENCE, AND LAW.
- II.—DEPARTMENT OF MEDICINE.
- III.—DENTAL DEPARTMENT.
- IV.—DEPARTMENT FOR WOMEN.
- V.—DEPARTMENT OF THE EVENING CLASSES.
- VI.—SCHOLARSHIPS. &c. (value £12 to £100 per annum).

Apply to Mr. CORNISH, 33 Piccadilly, Manchester; or at the College.

HENRY WM. HOLDER, M.A., Registrar.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb.
One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates).
The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.
The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks.
Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.
For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.

Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A. Heidelberg.
A. B. CATTY, M.A., Christ's Coll., Camb.
WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.

At the recent Exam. for the I.C.S. a Pupil of Heidelberg College obtained THE HIGHEST MARKS IN GERMAN of all the Candidates.

SANDHURST FURTHER EXAM., August 1889.

Alexander R. C. Rew..... 7539.

Mr. LAWRENCE in London: Oakley Lodge, Fulham, S.W.

TUDOR HALL COLLEGE (for Ladies), Forest Hill,

Sydenham, S.E. Established over Thirty Years.—Principals: Mrs. Todd and Rev. J. W. Todd, D.D. Head-Mistress: Miss Todd (Girton), Cambridge. Professors: Seeley, Churton Collins, Garcia, Diehl, Loman, Dulcken, Larpent, &c.—Gymnasium, Tennis-courts, Swimming, Riding. Full particulars, Photo of Coll., &c., on application.

THE LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1.

The Hospital, which is the largest general Hospital in the kingdom, contains nearly 800 beds, all in constant use. There are wards for Accidents, Surgical and Medical cases, Diseases of Women and Children, and Ophthalmic cases. Special departments for Diseases of the Eye, Ear, Throat, Skin and Teeth, and for Cancer, Tumours, Diseases of the Bladder, Piles, and Fistula. Number of in-patients last year, 8,873; out-patients, 101,518; accidents, 7,456. Surgical operations daily.

APPOINTMENTS—Resident Accoucheur, House Physicians, House Surgeons. Forty of these appointments are made annually. Numerous Dressers, Clinical Clerks, Post-mortem Clerks, and Maternity Assistants are appointed every three months. All appointments are free. Holders of resident appointments are also provided free board. The New College Buildings are now complete, and afford more than double the former accommodation.

Two Entrance Science Scholarships, value £50 and £10, and two Buxton Scholarships, value £30 and £20, will be offered for competition at the end of September to new Students. Sixteen other Scholarships and Prizes are given annually.

Luncheons or dinners, at moderate charges, can be obtained at the Students' Club.

The London Hospital is now in direct communication with all parts of the Metropolis. The Metropolitan, District, and other Railways have stations within a minute's walk of the Hospital and College.

For further information apply personally, or by letter, to

Mile End, E. MUNRO SCOTT, Warden.

ST. GEORGE'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, HYDE PARK CORNER, S.W.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1, with an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS by Dr. T. CLIFFORD ALLBUTT, F.R.S., at 4 P.M.

A Prospectus of the School, and further information, may be obtained by personal application between One and Three P.M., or by letter addressed to the DEAN at the Hospital.

GUYS' HOSPITAL.—ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS.

Two Open Scholarships in Arts (100 Guineas and 50 Guineas) and Two Open Scholarships in Science (125 Guineas and 50 Guineas) are offered for competition on Wednesday, 25th of September and the two following days.
For further particulars apply to the DEAN.

CRONDALL SCHOOL, FARNHAM, Surrey.—Invigorating country life, healthiest in England (see Registrar's Report). Preparation for Public Schools, Royal Navy, &c.; French and German guaranteed; school farm, cricket and football fields, tennis, carpenter's shop riding ponies.—Address, PRINCIPAL.

EXETER SCHOOL.—Parents desirous of obtaining help for their SONS at the UNIVERSITIES, &c., should apply for a Prospectus. There are more leaving Exhibitions than at most of the great Public Schools—viz., 13 close and 18 partly close ones, the value of the former alone being nearly £600 a year. Many pupils have won from £100 to £160 a year in Scholarships.

The New Buildings are on an estate of 25 acres, in a most healthy situation. Terms very moderate.—W. A. CUNNINGHAM, M.A., Head-Master.

CITY and GUILDS of LONDON INSTITUTE for the ADVANCEMENT of TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

ENGINEERING.—The Course of TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION at the Central Institution of the City and Guilds of London Institute is adapted to the requirements of persons who are preparing to become Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, or Chemical Engineers, or to enter manufacturing works.

The next Session will commence on October 1, 1889. An Entrance Examination will be held on September 23 and the three following days.

JOHN WATNEY, } Hon. Secs.
WALTER S. PRIDEAUX, }

Programme and full particulars of Course of Instruction may be obtained on application at the Central Institution, Exhibition Road, S.W., or at the Office of the Institute, Gresham College, E.C.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-

Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils.—41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

PRÉ SOILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life.

Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR.

BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

HILLSIDE, GODALMING, Surrey. (Close to Charterhouse.)

Preparatory for Charterhouse and other Public Schools. A. M. CURTIS, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford. G. GIDLEY ROBINSON, M.A., formerly Scholar of Exeter College, Oxford, and late Assistant-Master of Charterhouse.

RADFORD HOUSE, COVENTRY.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS of GENTLEMEN. Established 1800. Boys received from Six to Twelve years of age, and prepared for College and Local Examinations, which have hitherto been successfully passed by the Pupils of this School. Eight acres of recreation ground.—Apply for particulars to Mrs. and Miss HOUGHTON.

FARM PUPILS.—GENTLEMEN are received on the FARM of the AYLESBURY DAIRY COMPANY, Limited, Horsham, Sussex. 1,400 acres arable and pasture: 400 head of cattle.—For terms and particulars apply to the SECRETARY, Aylesbury Dairy Company, in London, St. Petersburg Place, Bayswater, or Horsham, Sussex.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS and NAVY CADETSHIPS.

An EXAMINATION will be held in September to admit FOUR BOYS at half-fees into the Scholarship Class of a large, very well known Preparatory School.—For particulars address, REV. HEADMASTER, Brown, Gould, & Co., 54 New Oxford Street, W.C.

TO FAMILIES sending SONS to LONDON.—A well-known

FRENCH FAMILY, of good position (Official) offer a very superior HOME to a few GENTLEMEN, with practical instruction in French and German. French always spoken. Most excellent table and service. Billiard-room. Extensive tennis-ground. Liberal terms.—Address, VALMONT, care of Mr. Parker, Chemist, 35 Clifton Road, Maida Vale, W.

GRADUATE and PUBLIC SCHOOLMAN wants TUTOR-

SHIP. Experienced. Classics, Mathematics, French, German, and English. Prepares for Army, Universities, and Public Schools.—Address, B.A., 53 Conduit Street, London, W.

A LADY, who READS to INVALIDS in English, French, or German, has a FEW HOURS at DISPOSAL.—Address, M. F. B., 2 Landridge Road, Fulham, S.W.

THE MASTER of a large SCHOOL recommends a LADY

MATRON, who has been with him five years. A trained nurse, with much experience. Address, Miss HUTCHINSON, 3 St. George's Terrace, South Lowestoft.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.

Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS'

UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES.

Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.
JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1839.—15, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

SCHOOL PIANOS.—NEW MODELS from 18 Guineas. All the latest Improvements. These instruments are remarkable for their beautiful tone, perfect touch, and durability. PIANOS for HIRE, or on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.—W. J. ENNEVER & SON, Manufacturers, 57 Berners Street, London, W.

P. and O. MAIL STEAMERS FROM LONDON TO

BOMBAY, GIBRALTAR, MALTA, BRINDISI, every week.
EGYPT, ADEN, and MADRAS via BOMBAY

CALCUTTA, MADRAS, COLOMBO, CHINA, STRAITS, every alternate week.
and JAPAN, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND and TAS-MANIA, and ALEXANDRIA

CHEAP RETURN TICKETS.

For particulars apply at the Company's Offices, 122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 25 Cockspur Street, London, S.W.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The

COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.

ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

SCHWEITZER'S

COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

PURE—SOLUBLE.

BEST & GOES FARTHEST.

EASILY DIGESTED.

MADE INSTANTLY.

VAN

HOUTEN'S

COCOA.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."

Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."

British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

Dr. PAGET,

SURGEON-DENTIST,

445 STRAND, W.C.

(Facing Charing Cross Station.)

ARTIFICIAL TEETH,

without plates. Perfect imitations of the natural teeth. Artistic, painless, and perfect. Most moderate fees. Consultations free daily.

Illustrated pamphlet post free.

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES,

Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESS' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY. Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician (President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 57 Oxford Street, London, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW

LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.

Annuities.	Loans.	Liberal Conditions.
ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager		12 Waterloo Place, London.
FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,

Established 1836.
LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
INCOME and FUNDS (1888).

Fire Premiums	£615,000
Life Premiums	203,000
Interest	149,000
Accumulated Funds	£3,581,000

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE,

LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.

Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.

Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.

W. C. MACDONALD,	Joint Secretaries.
F. B. MACDONALD,

Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.

Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.

E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.

FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK

ISSUE of £371,320.

(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)

The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK. Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.

Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & Co., 67 Lombard Street.

No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.

Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by Borough Accountant's Office,
Bridge Street, Sheffield,
June 13, 1889.

W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

This pure Solution is the best remedy
for Acidity of the Stomach, Heartburn,
Headache, Gout, and Indigestion.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

The safest and most gentle Aperient
for delicate constitutions, Ladies,
Children, and Infants.

180 Bond Street, London; and all Chemists.

FRY'S

J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."

PURE CONCENTRATED

E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure
Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that
I have ordered it for family use."

COCOA.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR
by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S
CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal Claim to the Public Confidence.

BOOKS, &c.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.

A MONTHLY CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.

Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.

136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

Fep. Svo. price 1s. post-free.

THE SCHOOLMASTER'S CALENDAR: Handbook of

Examinations and Open Scholarships for 1889. Third Year of Issue.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, 4 York Street, Covent Garden.

HURST & BLACKETT'S
NEW NOVELS.

THE TREE of KNOWLEDGE. By G. M.

ROBINS, Author of "Keep my Secret," "A False Position," &c. 3 vols.

BOTH OF THIS PARISH. By ALGERNON

GISSING, Author of "Joy cometh in the Morning." 2 vols.

A CROOKED PATH. By Mrs. ALEXANDER,

Author of "The Wooing o't," "The Freres," &c. 3 vols.

A POOR GENTLEMAN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT,

Author of "It was a Lover and his Lass," "Agnes," &c. 3 vols.

HILARY ST. JOHN. By Mrs. A. PRICE,

Author of "A Rustic Maid," "A Wilful Young Woman," &c. 2 vols.

WITH EVERYTHING AGAINST HER.

By Colonel CUTHBERT LARKING, Author of "Bandobast and Khabar" &c. 3 vols.

LONDON: HURST & BLACKETT, LIMITED,
13 GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,
LIMITED,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.;

241 BROMPTON ROAD, SOUTH KENSINGTON, S.W.;

AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

FOR THE CIRCULATION OF BOOKS.

SUBSCRIPTION from £1 1s. per annum.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists Gratis.

FOR THE SALE OF BOOKS.

Second-hand Copies of all the best Books of past Seasons, at greatly Reduced Prices.

Lists with Prices Gratis.

FOR THE BINDING OF BOOKS.

On the Premises by the best Workmen.

List of Bound Books Gratis.

N.B.—All Lists and Prospectuses Gratis and
Postage Free to any Address.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

NOW COMPLETE.

BRADLEY'S DICTIONARY of MINIATURISTS, ILLU-MINATORS, CALLIGRAPHERS, and COPYISTS, with references to their Works, and Notices of their Patrons. From the Establishment of Christianity to the Seventeenth Century. Compiled from various sources, many hitherto inedited, by JOHN W. BRADLEY, Author of "A Manual of Illumination," "Attavante, Miniaturist of Florence," &c. 3 vols. 8vo. Roxburghe, to Subscribers, 42s.

[1886.]

The Same, Large Paper, Roxburghe, to Subscribers, £3 3s. [1886.]
The first attempt in this difficult Department of Palæography.

"Mr. John W. Bradley, who is already known for his 'Manual of Illumination,' and his account of Attavante, the Florentine miniaturist, has in preparation a Dictionary of Mini-aturists, Illuminators, Calligraphers, and Copyists, from the establishment of Christianity down to the seventeenth century. The work, which is to a great extent compiled from inedited sources, will contain references to the works of the artists named, and also notices of their patrons."—Academy, September 25, 1886.

"This is the second instalment of a book which, when completed on the same scale, cannot fail to be valuable to a large number of students of art and of antiquaries interested in the minor arts and crafts indicated by the title.

"Mr. Bradley's entries are extremely numerous, far more so than the general reader would expect. A minority of them are rich in details, biographical, historical, and critical.

"Historical details have been compiled with zeal and discretion from all sorts of sources, French, German, Italian, and English; while his critical acumen and his technical knowledge combine to make him incredulous, or rather suspicious, of the dicta of writers of the eighteenth century, such as Montfaucon and Halm."—Athenæum, July 28, 1888.

B. QUARITCH, 15 Piccadilly, London.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
London. All the New and Standard Books, Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from
Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London; or Hall Green (near Birmingham).

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates

per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1 8 2
India and China	1 12 6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1 10 6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.—The following NUMBERS of THE SATURDAY REVIEW are required, for which 1s. each will be given, viz.:

1, 2, 15, 25, 56, 59, 73, 75, 99, 112, 130, 132, 133, 174, 452, and 1627 (clean copies)—at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

"MEMORY'S HARKBACK THROUGH HALF-A-CENTURY."

THE RECOLLECTIONS OF
DR. GRETTON.

1 vol. demy 8vo. 12s.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "A DAUGHTER OF THE PEOPLE."

DIANA.

By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK (Mrs. May),
Author of "Godfrey Helstone" &c.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

[Next week.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "WORTH WAITING FOR."

THE SCOTTS OF BESTMINSTER.

By J. MASTERMAN, Author of "A Fatal Error" &c.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "MLLE. DE MERSAC."

MISS SHAFTO.

By W. E. NORRIS, Author of "The Rogue" &c.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "COUNTESS IRENE."

ROBERT LEEMAN'S DAUGHTERS. By
J. FOGERTY, Author of "Lauterdale," "Caterina," &c.

3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "FASCINATION" &c.

PAST FORGIVENESS? By Lady MARGARET
MAJENDIE, Author of "Precautions" &c.

2 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "NELLIE'S MEMORIES."

THE SEARCH for BASIL LYNDHURST.

By ROSA N. CAREY, Author of "Not Like Other Girls" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

A NOVEL COMMENDED BY MR. GLADSTONE

And by DR. GEORGE MACDONALD.

FOR THE RIGHT.

NOW READY, NEW CHEAP EDITION,

Price 3s. 6d.

Mr. GLADSTONE in the Nineteenth Century:—"It is with some confidence that I commend to your readers a work of Karl Emil Franzos, entitled 'For the Right.' Although it is charged with the profoundest moral teaching, it has not the fault—I should say the unpardonable fault—of being a didactic novel. It does not trifle with the reader, so the reader should not attempt to trifle with the book. He ought to be the better for perusing, but if not the better he may be the worse."

GEORGE MACDONALD:—"I have seldom, if ever, read a work of fiction which moved me with so much admiration."

LONDON: JAMES CLARKE & CO., 13 AND 14 FLEET STREET, E.C.
AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

PARIS EXHIBITION.—The FRENCH DICTIONARY

for TOURISTS—BELLOWS' POCKET FRENCH DICTIONARY. 32mo.
with 4 Maps, roan tuck, 10s. 6d.; morocco, 12s. 6d.

"Complete."—Times. "Without a rival."—Spectator. "The most portable."

Also

Scotsman.

TOUS les VERBES.—CONJUGATIONS of all the VERBS,
French and English, with Tables of Weights, Measures, and Equivalent
Values, from Bellows' Dictionary. Second Edition. 32mo. 6d.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.
PARIS: ERNEST LEROUX, 28 RUE BONAPARTE.
AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

Fifth Edition, 1 vol. with Frontispiece by Gordon Browne, 6s.

THE REPROACH OF ANNESLEY.

By MAXWELL GRAY,

Author of "The Silence of Dean Maitland."

"A very good book.....Its tone and its aspirations are very pure and noble."
"The story is well told and interesting."—Daily News. Standard.
"The story is powerfully written and almost too absorbing."—Liverpool Post.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

A NEW NOVEL BY MR. F. MARION CRAWFORD.

SANT' ILARIO.

By F. MARION CRAWFORD,

Author of "With the Immortals," "Greifenstein," "Paul Patoff,"
"Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," "Marzio's Crucifix," &c.

3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Scotsman says:—"The book is full of passages of remarkable power. A reader will find it hard to decide whether this is not the best of Mr. Crawford's novels. Best or worst, it is heartily enjoyable, and will be eagerly read by all who take it up."

THIRD AND POPULAR EDITION, price 2s.

THE PARNELL COMMISSION. — The

OPENING SPEECH for the DEFENCE. Delivered by Sir CHARLES RUSSELL, Q.C., M.P. Carefully Revised by the Author. Third Edition.
Demy 8vo. LIBRARY EDITION, 10s. 6d. POPULAR EDITION, sewed, 2s.

The Daily News says:—"It is, in fact, 'the case of Ireland stated.'.....Sir Charles Russell's was a great speech by a great advocate. It will enrol his name with the names of Curran and Erskine, and Plunket.....We are glad that the outer public who were not privileged to listen to the speech will have now an opportunity of studying the strange and thrilling tale it tells."

EDWARD FITZGERALD.

LETTERS and LITERARY REMAINS of

EDWARD FITZGERALD. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A., Vice-Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

Vol. I. Letters—Vol. II. Euphranor, Six Dramas from Calderon, The Bird
Parliament, The Two Generals—Vol. III. Dramas from Calderon, Greek Dramas, Rubáiyat of Omar Kháyyám, &c.

The World says:—"These letters hold the very pith of all our stammering tongue has tried to say of fiction since the first we began it, and they contain, as we most steadfastly believe, the essence of the novelist's salvation—at any rate of his reader's. But, indeed, there is much else in the volume, very much else, 'the harvest of a quiet eye' in all its ripeness. Many a wise thought on books and men is here, many a humorous one; many a revealing glimpse of the famous men he knew and loved well—Thackeray, Carlyle, Spedding, Lord Tennyson—and many a shrewd, yet never unkindly, judgment on their works. Nature and humanity, the page of life and the page of learning, love and pity, tenderness and fun—all are brought by turn before us as surely they have never been brought since Charles Lamo wrote his last letter."

SKETCHES of RURAL LIFE: Poems. By

FRANCIS LUCAS. Globe 8vo. 5s.

The Scots Observer says:—"Mr. Lucas has touched his verses with a fresh and pleasant feeling of rural England—a sense of the perfume of new-turned land, the wind in the corn, the great refreshment of rain, the friendship of man with those forms of nature among which it is his lot to live and labour and die. His work, indeed, has the rare merit of sincerity. He has felt and seen for himself; and his expression of what it has been his to see and feel is often direct and moving in no mean degree.....It is a pleasure to be afield with him.....Mr. Lucas's material is mostly excellent."

RECOLLECTIONS of a NURSE. By E. D.

Crown 8vo. 2s.

The Daily News says:—"Simple in style and thoroughly interesting. The Nurse is a characteristic nurse of the present day—a follower in the right line of Florence Nightingale; a woman of education who merely resigned the comforts of home and took to a weary, painful, and sometimes loathsome, occupation, because she wanted to do good, and felt that she had a call in that particular direction."

FITZWILLIAM MUSEUM, CAMBRIDGE.

CATALOGUE of CASTS in the MUSEUM of CLASSICAL ARCHÆOLOGY. By CHARLES WALDSTEIN, Litt.D., Ph.D., LL.D., University Reader in Classical Archæology, and Director of the Fitzwilliam Museum. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

* Also an Edition on Large Paper, small 4to. 5s.

THE HISTORIES of POLYBIUS. Translated from the Text of F. HULTSCH. By EVELYN S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A., late Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 24s.

"NATURE" SERIES.—New Volumes.

MODERN VIEWS of ELECTRICITY.

By OLIVER J. LODGE, LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S., Professor of Experimental Physics in University College, Liverpool. Illustrated, Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d.

The Electrical Engineer says:—"So far as electricity is concerned, this is the book of the year. It is, perhaps, from the theorist's point of view the most important that has been issued since Clerk Maxwell's work, and certainly so from the popular, or rather the non-mathematical, standpoint."

TIMBER and some of its DISEASES. By

H. MARSHALL WARD, M.A., F.R.S., F.L.S., late Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge, Professor of Botany at the Royal Indian Engineering College, Coopers Hill. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Scottish Leader says:—"There is no other work in our language in which the various subjects treated are dealt with so methodically and with so thorough a mastery of the underlying laws of botanical science; the book deserves a hearty welcome from all students of sylviculture."

Now publishing, Monthly, 3s. 6d. each. Vols. I. to XI. ready.

WORKS OF CHARLES KINGSLEY.

A New and Cheaper Edition of the more popular of Mr. Kingsley's Books, in 18 vols.
Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. each.

WESTWARD HO!
ALTON LOCKE.
TWO YEARS AGO.
THE HEROES.

HYPATIA.
THE WATER BABIES.
HEREWARD.
YEAST.

POEMS.
MADAM HOW AND LADY WHY.
AT LAST!

PROSE IDYLLS. [September.

* Six other volumes to follow.

Now publishing, Fortnightly, 3s. 6d. each. Vols. I. to XXII. ready.

MISS YONGE'S NOVELS AND TALES.

A complete uniform and Cheaper Edition in 28 Volumes, with all the original Illustrations.

THE HEIR OF REDCLIFFE.
HEARTSEASE.
HOPES AND FEARS.
DYNEVOR TERRACE.
THE DOVE IN THE EAGLE'S NEST.
THE DAISY CHAIN.
THE TRIAL.
THE YOUNG STEPMOTHER.
PILLARS OF THE HOUSE. 2 vols.
THE CHAPLET OF PEARLS.
CLEVER WOMAN OF THE FAMILY.
THE THREE BRIDES.

MY YOUNG ALCIDES.
THE CAGED LION.
LADY HESTER, &c.
MAGNUM BONUM.
LOVE AND LIFE.
UNKNOWN TO HISTORY.
STRAY PEARLS.
THE ARMOURER'S PRENTICES.
THE TWO SIDES OF THE SHIELD.
NUTTIE'S FATHER. [Sept. 2.
SCENES AND CHARACTERS. [Sept. 16.

* Six other Volumes to follow as announced.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

WARD & DOWNEY'S LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

THE NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE VOYAGE OF THE ARK."
FROM the GREEN BAG. By F. M. ALLEN, Author of "Through Green Glasses."

Cloth extra, 2s. 6d.

"For humour of the kind which is not to be classified or described—the humour of paradox, incongruity, shrewdness, grave absurdity, quaintness, and extravagance—the Author of 'The Voyage of the Ark' has no equal, indeed no competitor."—World.

"Mr. Allen has taken up Samuel Lover's place; but he brings new qualities..... It is wild and riotous fun, but it is unmistakable fun."—Nation.

"Truly amusing, and brimming over with good-tempered fun. Mr. Allen has it in him, we imagine, to run Lever close."—People.

"A humourist of a most original type.....Brimful of Hibernian wit.....One can really give no idea of the rich humour of this book."—St. Stephen's Review.

"Infinitely diverting."—Sunday Times.

"Exceedingly droll.....Some of the incidental passages are as rich in their raciness and broad humour as anything we remember."—Manchester Guardian.

"There has been nothing racier in recent humorous literature.....Mr. Allen is at his best, and the little book is full of hearty fun and a ripe humour which has not been put into books since the days of 'Handy Andy.'"—Scotsman.

"From cover to cover there is scarcely a sentence in which the reader cannot find food for a hearty laugh; the broad humour of the sketches is inimitable."

Dublin Evening Telegraph.

"One of the most intensely amusing books we have come across for a long time."—Scottish Leader.

IRISH INDUSTRIES. By J. BOWLES DALY, LL.D. 1 vol. cloth, 6s.

MARRIAGE and HEREDITY; or, Some Aspects of Social Evolution. By J. F.

NISBET. 1 vol. cloth, 6s.

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "COUNTRY SKETCHES IN BLACK AND WHITE," "FROM KITCHEN TO GARRET," &c.
BYE PATHS and CROSS ROADS. By J. E. PANTON. 6s.

"Mrs. Panton knows how to express her delight in the beauties of nature so as to arouse the sympathy of her readers."—Scotsman.

"Very charming and suggestive reading.....Readers who love the things of the country, by reading Mrs. Panton's volume a few pages at a time will certainly derive keen enjoyment from it."—Manchester Examiner.

NEW BOOK OF REMINISCENCE BY THE AUTHOR OF "RANDOM RECOLLECTIONS OF COURTS AND SOCIETY."
COSMOPOLITAN RECOLLECTIONS. 2 vols. 21s.

"A cleverly written book, which is certain of attracting wide attention.....Full of good stories."—St. James's Gazette.

INDOLENT ESSAYS. By RICHARD DOWLING, Author of "Ignorant Essays." 6s.

"We can give a high meed of praise to 'Indolent Essays.'"—Notes and Queries.

"A bright, gossiping volume of literary sketches.....Pleasantly conceived, written in a kindly tone of banter."—Graphic.

A LADY'S TRAVELS THROUGH AUSTRALASIA, CHINA, JAPAN, AND AMERICA.
KALEIDOSCOPE. Shifting Scenes from East to West. By E. KATHERINE BATES.

Demy 8vo. 12s.

"A pleasant, gossiping record of a year's globe-trotting."—Pall Mall Gazette.

TWO NEW BOOKS FOR THE PARIS EXHIBITION.
PARIS by DAY and NIGHT. By "Anglo-Parisian." 3s. 6d.
LIVING PARIS: a Guide to the Manners, Monuments, and Institutions of the People. Exhibition Edition. 2s. 6d.
"A veritable triumph of a guide-book."—Whitehall Review.

NEW NOVELS TO BE HAD AT ALL LIBRARIES
IN TOWN AND COUNTRY.

THE STORY of a MARRIAGE. By L. BALDWIN. 3 vols.

A YOUNG GIRL'S LIFE. By B. L. FARJEON. 3 vols.

"Mr. Farjeon writes so much that the sustained interest of his work is a matter of surprise. His last story, 'A Young Girl's Life,' is as good as anything he has ever done, while it has an evenness and maturity of power that are wanting in some of his earlier works. The story more than once touches that high-water mark of literature where fun and pathos are so near together that it is hard to say where one ends and the other begins. The book, as a whole, has a fascinating interest in the charm of its central character. It will please every one who reads it."—Scotsman.

AT the MOMENT of VICTORY. By C. L. PIRKIS. 3 vols.

"It is a story with a well-constructed plot, which is skilfully and strikingly developed."—Scotsman.

"An interesting story with a very exciting catastrophe at the end."—Pictorial World.

PRINCESS SUNSHINE. By Mrs. RIDDELL. 2 vols.

ROGER FERRON. By Mrs. MACQUOID. 2 vols.

"Some of the stories are full of pathos; others are illustrative of the fruits of worldly success and of true heroism; while others, again, picture with terrible reality crimes of a character more common, perhaps, on the Continent and in America than in this country. The collection of stories thus brought together is a capital one for the holiday season, and the character of them is so varied, that in one or other of the series, if not in all, the reader, however fastidious, is sure to have his or her taste suited."—Scotsman.

COMMON CLAY. By Mrs. HERBERT MARTIN. 3 vols.

"It is pleasant to come across such a book. As a mere tale it is extremely interesting. The novel throughout is rich in material for admiration."—Spectator.

AN ISLE of SURREY. By R. DOWLING. 3 vols.

"The best work Mr. Dowling has yet written, and it is one of which no living author would need be ashamed."—Academy.

HEATHCOTE. By ELLA MACMAHON. 2 vols.

"The characters are decidedly like human beings, and its tone is high and well sustained. The love story is admirably contrived, and will give pleasure to every one who reads it."—Athenæum.

THREE NEW SHILLING STORIES.

HIS OTHER SELF. By E. J. GOODMAN, Author of "Too Curious" &c. [Next week.]

AT the ELEVENTH HOUR. By E. T. PICKERING.

"This is a strange story of a dream and its fulfilment, and the consequences that ensued. It is full of incident, Nihilistic and otherwise, and Mr. Pickering has observed faithfully the two main duties of the writer of a shilling work of fiction. The story never drags, and all ends happily."—Sunday Times.

THE FOG PRINCES. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The House on the Marsh" &c.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE MASTER OF RYLANDS. By Mrs. G. LEWIS LEEDS.

AUDREY FERRIS. By F. GERARD.

EIGHT BELLS: a Tale of the Sea and of the Cannibals of New Guinea. By HUME NISBET. Illustrated by the Author.

THE WYVERN MYSTERY. By J. S. LE FANU.

DESPERATE REMEDIES. By THOMAS HARDY.

NEW THREE-AND-SIXPENNY NOVELS.

RED RUIN: a Tale of West African River Life. By A. N. HOMER.

TARTAN AND GOLD: Stories of Sport and Play. By BYRON WEBBER.

MY SPANISH SAILOR. By MARSHALL SAUNDERS.

A RECOILING VENGEANCE. By FRANK BARRETT.

DIANA BARRINGTON. By B. M. CROKER.

MARVEL. By the Author of "Molly Bawn."

IN JEOPARDY: Stories of Peril. By G. MANVILLE FENN.

IN ONE TOWN. By EDMUND DOWNEY.

NEW TWO-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE NUN'S CURSE. By Mrs. RIDDELL.

MISER FAREBROTHER. By B. L. FARJEON.

A MODERN CIRCE. By the Author of "Molly Bawn."

IN THE FLOWER OF HER YOUTH. By MABEL COLLINS.

ANTONY GRACE. By G. MANVILLE FENN.

A MODERN MAGICIAN. By FITZGERALD MOLLOY.

A BIRD OF PASSAGE. By B. M. CROKER.

NEW SHILLING NOVELS.

SUSPICION: a Strange Story. By CHRISTIAN LYS.

DEVLIN THE BARBER. By B. L. FARJEON.

THE VOYAGE OF THE ARK. By F. M. ALLEN.

DR. BERNARD ST. VINCENT. By HUME NISBET.

A HOUSE OF TEARS. By EDMUND DOWNEY.

PROPOSALS. Being a Maiden Meditation.

SCHOOL BOARD ESSAYS. By EMANUEL KINK.

THE FATAL HOUSE. By ALICE CORRAN.

WHAT WAS IT? By FITZJAMES O'BRIEN.

NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

EAST and WEST. A Magazine for All. Price Sixpence.

CONTENTS OF No. 3.

COSOTTE. Serial Story. KATHERINE S. MACQUOID.

THE SLAVE MARKET AT KHARTOUM. WILLIAM SHARP.

THE DRAMATIC WRITING OF TO-DAY. R. F. S.

THE MOST DISAGREEABLE MAN IN ENGLAND. A Complete Story. W. E. NORRIS.

SOME DUTCH PAINTERS. II. Van Der Helst. THOMAS K. MACQUOID, R.I.

A LANE BETWEEN THE HILLS. C. CLOUGH ROBINSON.

ABOUT GARDEN PARTIES. G. P.

ILL-MATCHED. Serial Story. JEANNE MAIRET.

WARD & DOWNEY, 12 YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London, and Published by WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, August 17, 1889.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,765, Vol. 68.

August 24, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE MAYBRICK CASE.

MR. MATTHEWS has come to what we hold to be the right decision in the MAYBRICK case, and he has come to it on what we hold to be, on the whole, the right grounds. In regard to the first, in the HOME SECRETARY'S order, of the "two questions," Mr. MATTHEWS holds that the evidence clearly proves Mrs. MAYBRICK to have administered arsenic with intent to murder. But he has come to the conclusion, in reply to the other question, that there is reasonable doubt whether the death was actually caused by arsenic. With regard to his first decision, which carries with it the justification for the infliction of penal servitude, there may be gradations of opinion as to the "clearly." But no one who has the faintest notion what evidence means can question that the evidence of the administration was immensely stronger than the evidence of its fatal result, and was much strengthened by the general behaviour of the unfortunate person concerned. We do not refer to her admitted misconduct. No one who is not a happy compound of Pharisee and fool would say that a man or woman, who, in the French phrase, "puts a knife into the contract," is therefore necessarily or even probably minded to put a knife into his or her partner. But the whole tenor of Mrs. MAYBRICK'S conduct, and not merely the fact of her having a lover, was against her. In regard to the second question, the answer to which carries with it the commutation of the sentence, merely attempted murder being now never punished with death, we agree with Mr. MATTHEWS simpliciter.

The length of time which the HOME SECRETARY has taken to make up his mind on the case is due, no doubt, to the thoroughness with which he has investigated the matter. But it gives a certain illustration of the inconvenience which attends the present system. If there were a Court of Appeal (the expediency of which we do not here prejudge), its time of sitting would be certain, and the sentence would be regularly confirmed, or regularly reversed, in regular course, with an almost necessarily sedative effect on agitation on one side and suspense on the other. The irregular retrying by a single official altogether lacks this element of order and certainty. But a decision has been arrived at, and it is to be very much hoped, if not wholly to be expected, that all those persons who retain some reasoning faculty will receive it with as little further comment as possible. Mr. MATTHEWS'S record, both as a lawyer and a public man, despite some unfortunate passages, entitles his deliberate judgment, if not his Parliamentary tactics, to consideration and respect, which this case, like the preceding case of LIPSKI, should greatly increase. Indeed, as has been before pointed out, it is very improbable that much advantage in point of substantial justice would be gained by any alteration of the present system; the advantages would lie rather in the possible disappearance and the certain alleviation of one of the most disgusting periodic outbursts of British folly and indecency. And, whether men agree or disagree with the decision of the HOME SECRETARY, it is fair to remember that even this form of it—the commutation to penal servitude of a sentence of death—is practically, though not logically, defensible enough. It does not mean, as is sometimes said, "We don't know whether you have committed this crime or not, but we will sentence you for another." What it comes to in effect is this:—"We are not satisfied that the evidence convicts you of this crime; but we are satisfied that your conduct is suspicious in the highest degree. From such conduct it is as desirable to deter people as from the demonstrable commission of crime, and you must take the consequences of it."

It is pretty certain that HAROUN-AL-RASCHID (the HAROUN of fiction, and not he of uncomfortable history) would have taken a short way with this matter. He would have let Mrs. MAYBRICK off, and have satisfied justice by hanging several scores of the writers to the newspapers, the speakers at public meetings, and the gutter journalists, taking very particular care not to omit those who have attempted to defame the jury. This last crime (for no milder word can be used) is so abominable a one that, if there is no special hold of the law on those guilty of it, it would be well to arrange one at the first opportunity. Juries have not had altogether a happy time of it in our history. They used to be, in the rougher, but not perhaps the foolisher, days of it, sent to prison if they returned bad verdicts; they were long subjected to a kind of minor peine forte et dure to make them not plead, but deliver a verdict; they are still dragged away from their business, subjected to temporary penal servitude, and bored unspeakably. Per contra, they might at least be protected from the exercise of a disgusting and intolerable inquisition into their private history. It is almost impossible that such misconduct as this and as the attacks on Mr. Justice STEPHEN—who, we are glad to see, approves of the HOME SECRETARY'S decision—should not have prejudiced Mr. MATTHEWS against the person so defended. Indeed, the number of persons who appear to have been able to keep their heads throughout the affair would seem to be very small. Those who said that it was a painful thing to hang Mrs. MAYBRICK, but that it must be done, because otherwise we shall discredit trial by jury, are certainly not among that small number. Trial by jury, we should have supposed, was made for man, and not man for trial by jury. Yet again, the charge against those who, disagreeing with the verdict, yet declined altogether to express conviction of Mrs. MAYBRICK'S innocence, that they ask for "mathematical demonstration," is absurd. To mention nothing else, it overlooks the fact that the principal doubt entertained by these rational doubters, as now by the HOME SECRETARY, was not on the question whether Mrs. MAYBRICK administered arsenic, but on the question whether arsenic was the cause of death. The law which in not its least moment of wisdom declares that you cannot steal from an empty pocket, is surely not outraged by the contention that you cannot poison by arsenic a man who did not die by arsenical poisoning. Yet it must be admitted that, though such arguments for the verdict were but of questionable force, they were half excusable in face of the fact that a great part of the agitation for reprieve has been an avowedly prevaricating agitation, got up by the opponents of capital punishment in general, under cover of protesting against capital punishment in particular. This consideration has been used as an argument against the extension of mercy, but it pretty clearly goes the other way. The strongest argument of those who, as we do, unhesitatingly and uncompromisingly adopt JOSEPH DE MAISTRE'S view of the executioner as a pillar of society, is that the executioner shall only be called in, and is only called in, in cases of sufficient proof. Every case of reprieve on the ground that the proof is not sufficient strengthens, instead of weakening, the case for capital punishment when it is sufficient, and every case of execution on dubious evidence strengthens the agitation for that most mischievous abolition which has made murders in some countries of Europe nearly as numerous as assaults elsewhere. Even the juryman is likely to discharge his duty more rather than less fearlessly when he knows that any mistake of his will be corrected.

The controversy between, or, rather, represented on different sides by, Lord ESHER and Lord BRAMWELL respectively as to the institution and constitution of a Court of Criminal Appeal might be somewhat more profitably discussed. It matters very little whether, as has been kindly suggested, Lord ESHER has so good an opinion of the judge who was once Sir BALIOL BRETT that he can conceive no better President of such a Court than the present MASTER of the ROLLS. It would be as superfluous to urge that the robust school of Liberalism to which Lord BRAMWELL belongs, many as are its merits, made up its bundle of prejudices pretty early, and that objection to a Court of Criminal Appeal was one of them. Both these considerations are extraneous, not to say irrelevant. But we do not think, with Lord BRAMWELL, that Mr. POLAND's authority is decisive; nor do we, indeed, consider that authority in such questions as these depends at all on practice in the Courts, which is quite as likely to prejudice one way or other as it is to qualify. The thing is a case, as the philosopher would say, for the phronimos rather than for the technikos; and the advantage of referring it to a small body of practised judges is that, though judges are not infallible, they are perhaps as often phronimoi as any other men in the kingdom, if not oftener. But, as we pointed out last week, the practical difficulties of such a Court are those which require most discussion. A Court which simply referred the matter to another jury would be unsatisfactory in the extreme, for it would be almost necessary to have a third jury to give the casting vote. A Court which retried the whole case, hearing over again previously given evidence in public, would add one more nuisance to the present three of coroner's inquest, magistrate's inquiry, and trial. But a Court of judges which considered the already given evidence, with power to admit new or select from the old for re-examination, would enormously strengthen the hands of the Home Secretary, with whom the last words would still lie. Those who talk about diminishing the sense of responsibility in juries must have forgotten a certain case at Derby not a thousand years ago. But this and other matters are very well worthy of debate between rational folk as distinguished from "INDIGNANS," "F. R. S.," "A Clergy-man," and the rest. Moreover, very fortunately they are subjects which are not very appetizing to "INDIGNANS." It is impossible not to be rather sorry that Lord BRAMWELL should have confined himself to a dozen lines in the Times and a compliment to Mr. POLAND.

THEATRICALS AT SEA.

THE navy is now well engaged in its third series of manœuvres, and we have some means of judging what their general value and what the particular value of this year's operations are likely to be. On the whole—and we say it with regret—the opinion which must be formed by those who consider them as serious business, and not as shows, cannot be by any means altogether favourable. If it is desirable to supply papers in the dull season with material for columns of correspondence, to enable the amateur of such literature to enjoy the sententious smugness of this "representative" and the candid amazement of that, then they are quite admirable. But this has not been recognized as one of the objects for which naval manœuvres are held. It is supposed that they are gone through yearly in order to test the qualities of the ships and give their officers and crews opportunities for practice. Nothing, therefore, ought to be done which does not serve these ends. It is even more obvious that whatever can be shown to be either useless for war, or superfluous, or impossible, ought to be avoided. As a matter of fact, a great deal is being done which serves no serious purpose; much which, if it ever was of value, has been done and need not be redone; much which it can be shown would never be attempted in real war. It is, of course, certain that you cannot keep a fleet at sea at all without affording opportunities for practice; but in the course of these manœuvres not a little is taking place which is mere private theatricals—excellent things in their place, but not in naval manœuvres. They are an absurd element in what should be serious work, and it is time that they were removed. On former occasions we have pointed out how much there was in the manœuvres which was pure show, and we had hoped that when the novelty of the childish part of the game had worn off officers would drop it. The contrary, however, is what seems likely to happen. It is the childish part which is becoming popular and is extending. For that reason, if for no other, it is time that a protest was made.

A better text could hardly be asked for than has been supplied by the acts and words of Admiral TRYON, whom we always knew to be an able officer, and now perceive to be endowed with that enviable and not too common faculty, a sense of humour. He has just addressed his squadron in these weighty terms:—"In considering the manœuvres, officers will bear in mind that, as in a game of chess the rules of chess prevail, so in mimic warfare the rules alone are our guide; such and such a thing might have been different in real war, but in a peace manœuvre the rules, whatever they are, are our guide." Now this is an allegory which we interpret as follows. Whatever is not according to the rules is not chess. All practice for chess must observe the rules. Even so all effective practice for war must observe its rules. But the manœuvres do not. They include this and that thing which must not be done in war, and ought therefore to be performed in peace with a distinct understanding that they are manœuvres, and not practice for fighting. Argal, the manœuvres are not practice for war, but a game by themselves. This is the Admiral's theory. Now let us see how it has been illustrated in action. There, for instance, is the engagement with the detachment of Admiral BAIRD's squadron the other day. We may stop to remark that, for our part, we decline to believe, on the report of a newspaper Correspondent, that Admiral BAIRD was guilty of the egregious scheme attributed to him—the plan of dividing his forces in front of the enemy, and making "dashes" which could only lead to the isolation of one part of his fleet from the rest. That sort of manœuvre could, of course, only be meant to show how it is possible to violate the most elementary principles of war by land or sea. But to return to our engagement. Three ships of Admiral BAIRD's fleet were cut off and taken by greatly superior force after what was supposed to represent a long action. Well, of course, in real war some of the capturing vessels would have been damaged, and the three vessels taken would, we presume, have been knocked to pieces. In the old days of 18- and 24-pounders line-of-battle ships were scarcely ever taken in a serious action until they were dismasted and riddled with shot. In these days, when shot is weighed by the hundredweight, when ram and torpedo may be used, it is at least probable that any ironclad taken after prolonged resistance would be in need of a very thorough overhaul before she was fit to be used as a war-ship by her captors. This, however, is a consideration for war, and not for manœuvres. So Admiral TRYON made believe that after hours of fire his prizes were as good as new; so he annexed them, re-named them, and added them to his own force. Of course, in the real game, when a ship is taken her own crew become prisoners of war, who would be expected to help to save her in danger of wreck for their own lives' sake, but would certainly be asked in vain either to work her or fight her. It would have been a rather useful experiment for Admiral TRYON's squadron to see how it would be possible in these days of big ships and small crews, of numerous complex engines and a minimum staff of engineers, skilled artificers, and trained stokers, to provide prize crews. If he had credited the Camperdown, say, with several shots on the water-line, damaged steering gear, and half-crippled engines—if he had then despatched her in charge of a lieutenant and a prize crew, with orders to get to Portsmouth as best they could, with a due regard for the defects of the captured ship, and proper precautions against the prisoners who were left on board, that would have been practice. But then it would have been playing at war, and not playing at manœuvres, which is the game Admiral TRYON is engaged on. So, as we said, the Admiral annexed the ships, and proceeded to add them to his own force. My Lords did, indeed, at this moment break in. They apparently thought that their humorous Admiral was allowing his quaint fancy to carry him too far. They have deprived him of those three ships, have sent them back to port, and have thereby upset all his little game. No doubt the Admiral is glad to see that the lesson he has been trying to teach, something after a fashion which would have been approved by FESTE the Jester, has not been wasted.

From the interference of the Admiralty we gather that it really does mean these manœuvres to be practice, and not only gambols such as HATCHWAY and PIPES might have organized for the amusement of Commodore TRUNNION. If so, the department might make their rebuke to Admiral TRYON the starting-point for a drastic and necessary overhaul of the manœuvres generally. Unless these things are to degenerate into a farce, the theatrical element should be severely weeded out of them. By all means let us have all the serious practice we can get. Let us see how quickly and how thoroughly the fleet can be mobilized. If the Admiralty chooses next year to call out the Naval Reserve and concentrate the whole Coastguard—which is precisely what it would have to do in war—by all means let it be done. When the fleet is mobilized, let it practise every kind of manœuvre, make every kind of experiment it can put into a cruise from this to Halifax, or Cape Horn if that is preferred. If the Admiralty likes to try how a convoy could be conducted from the Channel to the Line, we shall think it does well. But all this, and indeed any amount of real practice, can be done without turning the manœuvres into a water frolic. The value of engines, the handiness of ships, the manœuvring skill of captains can be thoroughly tested without silly makebelieve. There is nothing in the way of serious practice the squadrons are now doing which could not be perfectly well done without any admixture of farce. All the world knows very well, and always has known, that an armed ship can bully or plunder an unarmed port or fishing village. These ridiculous “captures” are not wanted to prove the perfectly well known, and they do not help in the least towards showing whether in actual war, time and powder would be wasted on acts of barbarity which could produce no real damage, and would certainly provoke reprisals. In the meantime they do tend to make the manœuvres look absurd, and must tend to persuade the officers engaged in them that their first duty is to make a splash. It is quite unnecessary to spend stores and funds in giving such instruction as that.

ENGLAND AND GERMANY.

THE factions of which the Opposition is formed are many; but a knowledge of foreign affairs, continued interest in them, or any abiding sense of their importance and their intricacy, is not to be found in any one of them. Yet from time to time they break out into opinions absolutely positive and vehemently passionate; and these storms are most to be expected when they are likely to do most harm. If, as is by no means improbable, the new Radical party should gather strength, we may look for as much mischief in this region of affairs as any. Mr. LABOUCHERE has already made himself busy there, and to all appearance he means to take the department of Foreign Office criticism into his own hands. Lord ROSEBURY may not like it, but Lord ROSEBURY is in the House of Lords; he is regarded by most of the other Opposition leaders as suspiciously antiquated; and submission to his control is not to be expected of any of the more eager captains his colleagues in the House of Commons.

At this moment Mr. LABOUCHERE's anxiety is to make out that the Government has pledged the country to participation in the Triple Alliance; that, in effect, this was done some time ago, when Lord SALISBURY induced Italy to join the Alliance by engaging to defend her seaboard in certain contingencies; and that a complete understanding with the German Powers was ratified at Osborne the other day. Further Mr. LABOUCHERE wants to make out that all this has been done in secret and that, while the secrecy is treacherous to Parliament, the policy itself is dangerous and unwise. In considering this attack on the Foreign Office we must take some account of the motive of it. If in France two or three rival factions—Imperialist, Royalist, Boulangist—combine to overthrow the existing Government by way of clearing the ground for all, in this country we have an aggregation of sectional revolutionaries and faddists bent on a precisely similar business. To bring down the Government is the grand preliminary upon which they are agreed; and they would think much less of Mr. LABOUCHERE as a leader if Mr. LABOUCHERE were scrupulous enough to except any possible means of furthering the common end. This attack of his has no other purpose. But of course it does not necessarily follow that there is no truth in his assertions and no justice in his complaints; yet, when these are examined, it will be found that nothing in them redeems his motive from unworthiness.

Suppose it true that at some recent period the Italian Government did receive from HER MAJESTY'S Ministers a promise of defence if their seaboard were attacked by a destructive naval force. It is certain that no such promise could have been given unconditionally, or without regard to the very different circumstances under which such an attack might be provoked or delivered. No English Minister is conceivably mad enough to say to a foreign Power, “No matter how you get into hot water, we engage to pull you out of it.” If Lord SALISBURY's foreign policy is rightly understood, the considerations which would deter sanity in Downing Street from proffering any such engagement have largely determined him to stand out of the compact which is sometimes called the League of Peace. It weighs with him that the formal inclusion of England in the alliance might expose her to the risk of being dragged into conflicts of doubtful origination or contrivance; and it may be taken for granted, we apprehend, that, if any such promise to the Italian Government as Mr. LABOUCHERE talks of does exist, it is guarded against similar dangers. But, according to the member for Northampton, it was to encourage Italy to join the German alliance that Lord SALISBURY promised her the support of England's naval forces in case her coasts were attacked; and therefore the British Government became to all intents and purposes participators in the Central European compact. If so, it is evident that the German Powers do not share Mr. LABOUCHERE's knowledge or his conclusions. They are not of opinion that England has practically placed her naval forces (about all that she could employ to much effect) at the disposal of the alliance. On Mr. LABOUCHERE's statement of the pledge to Italy and the motive of it, that would obviously be the case. But yet we all know that the advantage which, according to him, the German Powers have virtually secured, is just what they have been craving for for years past; and another part of Mr. LABOUCHERE's accusation is that it was granted or extorted a fortnight ago. Now, if he believes that, he must believe that the engagement to Italy (supposing it to have been made) was no satisfaction of German desires; and therefore it might have occurred to him that, considering our enormous interests in the Mediterranean, a firm understanding with Italy, providing for eventualities that might equally arise whether that nation did or did not join with the German Powers, might be thought useful.

But we are not warranted, perhaps, in expecting such subtleties of discrimination from Mr. LABOUCHERE in affairs of this kind; and it behoves us to come shortly to the fact that the whole body of his accusations and insinuations has been explicitly denied. The ground was completely covered when Sir JAMES FERGUSSON said, “The hon. gentleman had asked,” on a previous occasion, “whether certain statements, alleging that HER MAJESTY'S Government had in some way committed themselves to join the Triple Alliance, or to give material assistance to Italy in certain contingencies, were correct. At that time I gave a distinct reply, saying that there were no such engagements and that HER MAJESTY'S Government preserved entire freedom of action in future, in case of any eventuality.” And then Sir JAMES went on to declare that this statement is “still literally correct. HER MAJESTY'S Government is under no engagements to employ the military or naval forces of this country except such as are known to the House, and those engagements are entirely within and consistent with the treaties known to the House.” Mr. SMITH afterwards repeated this declaration with emphasis; and though neither Mr. LABOUCHERE, nor Mr. WADDY, nor Mr. PICTON were appeased by it, the answer was as full as the House has any right to demand. This we should say, even though there did exist some conditional, provisional understandings between the British Government and others which yet imported no engagement to employ the military or naval forces of this country.

Meanwhile, the more serious German newspapers continue to assure their readers that great things were done at Osborne by the EMPEROR. Only a few days ago, for example, the National Zeitung proclaimed that “in the best-informed circles it is believed that an understanding was arrived at assuring an identity of policy between the Powers forming the Triple Alliance and England in European questions, and making provision for all the consequences of this policy.” It is significantly added that it has now become the task of the Powers forming the Peace League “to bring the relations resulting from this fresh combination into harmony with the explicit agreements already existing between them; and this task will probably be completed at Berlin by the diplomatic and military representatives of the Powers concerned.” This is a formidable saying, but there is more than one way of interpreting it, and, however official it may be, it must not be taken as contradictory of Sir JAMES FERGUSSON's assurances. The German press is a diplomatic instrument, and is employed for all the purposes, and with all the methods, that diplomacy justifies and morality condemns. It tells truth and untruth. It exaggerates, it extenuates, as expediency may suggest. It shows false lights, inculcates false beliefs, is not above the business of breeding bad blood (as between ourselves and France, for instance), and, when more serious business has no demands upon it, "flies kites." Kites are flown for countless purposes, small and great; and at present the German Government would very much like to know how the report of a complete understanding between the QUEEN'S Government and the three allied Powers would be taken by the English people. That should be remembered by all who read the flourishing paragraphs translated from official, semi-official, or demi-semi-official German newspapers into the English press. At present, belief in this country may be profitably confined to these things. The German Powers are recognized as the most "natural allies" of England, and will be dealt with as such. It is a matter of demonstration that the smashing of France would be no gain to this country, but much the reverse. No alliance that signifies the "effacement" of France will ever be joined by a British Government as long as a grain of common-sense exists to salt the counsels of the Crown's advisers. The maintenance of peace is another thing; resistance to aggression another thing; or any determined conspiracy to upset the balance of power, which only fools deride.

"UNEKAL."

IT should be unnecessary to explain, to any one who is worthy of receiving the explanation, what the arrangement was which was once characterized by the above adjective. But both the adjective itself and its original application will be admitted to fit most happily the arrangements of the Church of England Temperance Society, as revealed (of course ex parte, and subject to correction) by Mr. T. O. WETHERED in the Times of Wednesday. The inside of the outside sheet of that periodical is not perhaps the place where a literary man, anxious that his efforts should find a wide audience, would care to have them enshrined; but whosoever explores these recesses in quest of Mr. WETHERED's epistle will find himself not unrewarded. Mr. WETHERED, a not unknown person, who quaintly but pleasingly describes himself as "a brewer, a county magistrate, and, I trust, a Christian gentleman" (Heaven send us all no worse designations!), was, it seems, some time ago asked to join the Society in question by its local Secretary. He has, as most of us have, "a desire to promote the cause of true temperance," and though he may, perhaps, have been a little astonished that help should be sought Graia ab urbe, by teetotallers from brewers, he seems to have turned a not unfriendly ear to the application. Mr. WETHERED, however, is a cautious man; and apparently has no aversion to the writing of letters. While, like Sir THOMAS, in Mansfield Park, he "deliberated and pondered," it was hinted to him that the rule of the Society which ordains that its Committee shall represent its two sections—total abstainers and moderate drinkers—in "as nearly as possible equal proportions" was not being observed with the straightforward simplicity dear to Mr. WELLER. Accordingly, Mr. WETHERED wrote to every member of the Committee, got answers from almost all, and found that it was very "unekal" indeed—that the water had it over the rum to the tune of three to one, or sixty to twenty out of eighty-six, the other six refusing or neglecting to give information. But, if some of them declined, others made up for it by volunteered matter. One of the total abstainers encouraged the catechumen by making observations about brewers and "blood-guiltiness"; while another supported the demand of the Secretary for Mr. WETHERED's name and money by politely remarking that he was unable "to see how any one financially interested in promoting drinking habits among our people can consistently join a Society for the prevention of intemperance." Therefore, Mr. WETHERED (whose letter, though excellent, is a little long) came to a conclusion not wholly different from that of his polite correspondent, and declined to join the Society.

We believe, and we have much pleasure in acknowledging, that the Church of England Temperance Society does, in a sort of way, endeavour to avoid the extravagance of some of its kindred bodies. But Mr. WETHERED's letter shows very opportunely what indeed was well enough known before, that intolerance is of the essence of such Societies, and that the MUCKLEWRATHS and MACBRIARS of total abstinence can no more away with the POUNDTEXTS and the MORTONS of moderation than the prototypes of the one could endure the originals of the other. We know what generally happens in such unequal yokings, and which side gets the upper hand. We never, we confess, in such cases greatly pity the moderates, and in this case they are least to be pitied of all. No rational Christian man needs to belong to a Society in order to induce him to practise and recommend abstinence from excess. No irrational will-worshipper of total abstinence will be satisfied with such practice and recommendation. But meanwhile the well-intentioned moderates, though reviled and scorned by their associates, strengthen those associates' position, and might even help to bring about the temporary triumph (it could only be temporary) of the most irrational and unchristian form of folly that ever maintained itself for years in a home of "Christianity and civilization." Mr. WETHERED, who is, as we have said, a cautious man, has looked before he leaped, and refrained from leaping; let now those who have leaped before looking profit by his investigations and leap back.

THE EAST-END STRIKE.

EXCEPT from the point of view of Mr. BURNS, the strike at the East-End is not a dispute in which the onlooker is bound to take sides or feel any especial sympathy for either party. The dock labourers have their labour to sell, and the Companies are bound to buy it on the best terms they can. The strike, like other strikes, is a dispute between buyer and seller, in which both parties have a perfect right to higggle for what they think satisfactory terms. No doubt it must affect the interests of London, as any other quarrel in which many thousands of Londoners are concerned must needs do; but that is only a reason for hoping that the labourers and the Companies will both keep their heads, and not allow anger or any other form of folly to blind them. The good order hitherto observed by the dock labourers supplies a most effective comment on the pretensions of the noisy and menacing mob which collected in Trafalgar Square to represent the London poor. Dock labourers have never been supposed to form the pick of the working class. They are now in a position which has always been found to be irritating, and has occasionally led to violence. Yet though the strikers have, as usual, put pressure on the men who were disposed to remain at work, there has been no talk about lead or bread; and they do not roam about the West-End, howling and smashing windows. If any further evidence were needed that the rabble collected in the West by Mr. BURNS and Mr. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM was a mere stage mob, it is supplied by the East-End strike.

As for the question whether the Companies or the labourers ought to yield, or what compromise they ought to make, it is one to be settled by purely business considerations. It is not the interest of either side to repeat the ruinous quarrel which drove the Thames shipbuilding industry to the Clyde. The labourers would have as much to lose by going to extremes as the Companies. It is equally clear that the Companies have everything to lose by whatever may tend to drive trade still more away from London. But these general considerations do not help much towards the discovery of an acceptable compromise; nor, indeed, is outside criticism likely to be of much value in such a case. The men complain that their pay is poor and their employment irregular. These are undoubtedly evils; but the question is just whether they are not inseparable from most work in the docks. Much of the labour done there requires no skill and hardly even any great strength. Therefore, all who have no resource but their arms and legs flock into it and keep wages down. The irregularity of the employment is equally inevitable, since no possible management can provide that docks shall be at all times equally full, and the weather as well as the movement of trade makes the work fluctuate. It may easily be believed that the Companies, which have been far from prosperous, would be glad to keep wages as low as possible, so as to increase their chance of earning good profits now that the revival of trade and agreement among themselves promise better times. They will be very foolish if they allow this natural wish to lead them too far. Still the fact remains that times have been hard with the Companies, and that they have struggled along, making no profit or very little, but going on supplying employment which was better than none. They may not be able to give much better terms, and in that case, however hard the lot of the men may be, they, like other human beings, must be content to go without that which cannot be obtained. It is beside the question to say that the Companies have brought their troubles on themselves by excessive competition. Very likely they have, but that does not prove them to be in the possession of resources out of which better wages could be paid. Many dockyard labourers are reduced to this hard and untrustworthy form of employment because they had not the good sense, industry, and faculty to acquire a better trade; but these errors and defects of theirs supply no reason why they should put up with poorer wages than they can get by bargaining. The whole question is not one of what people ought to have, or what ought to be done in a really comfortable world, but of what they can get in the world as it is. From the fact that the Companies are offering a slight rise in wages, it appears that they are not indisposed to allow their labourers to share in the general improvement. Whether the rise offered is sufficient is a question which no man who is not intimately acquainted with the affairs of the Companies can possibly discuss with knowledge. But it is at least possible that the labourers may be acting against their own interest by refusing the offers made them. Their advisers, if they are honest, will be very careful not to persuade them to stand out unless they are very sure that better terms are to be obtained. Unfortunately, the fashion in which the strike is extending, and the appearance both of deliberation and aggression in the recent conduct of the men, lead to the conviction that it is not an honest attempt to raise the price of their work, but a labour conflict artificially encouraged by the leaders as an attack on the Companies.

THE GERMANS ABROAD.

THE cold water which the German official papers have been instructed to throw on the amateur fanatics of German colonization is, of course, a liquid not disagreeable to Englishmen, though it would be a very great mistake to overestimate its significance. Even the timidity of Mr. LABOUCHERE, who sees a bear in every bush and a profitable (and therefore hideous) alliance for England in every visitor, need not alarm itself at the prospect of great gain to Mr. LABOUCHERE's country because the North German Gazette has snubbed those about Dr. PETERS. In the first place, it must be remembered that these free-lances of patriotism are not at all to the German official taste, and that the great Mr. WALKER of Derry would have run the chance of quite as severe remarks from any WILLIAM of Hohenzollern as he actually received from WILLIAM of Nassau. Germany is doing her own recognized work by her own recognized officer, in the person of Captain WISSMANN, with due support and countenance from England, and she naturally feels no particular enthusiasm when Dr. This and Dr. That call for the blood of Admiral FREEMANTLE, and spoil sport by urging their own little plans of self-advantage and self-advertisement. It is true that this douche of cool good sense about the difficulty of developing colonial acquisitions and the necessity of concentrating effort contrasts a little oddly with the tone taken not so many years, or even so very many months, ago, when avalanches of telegrams announced day after day that Germany was annexing here, there, and everywhere, and when, in the course of a season or thereabouts, a Power which had just before had not a foreign possession in the world, was found running up its flags in South-west Africa, in Equatorial Africa East and West, in Papua, in Oceania. It was pointed out at the time that Prince BISMARCK was, in all probability, humouring a national fad at the expense of a Power which, for the moment, was not disposed to make difficulties, or even, as in the case of Angra Pequena, to take the least trouble about anything, rather than laying or pursuing a deep plan of policy. It may be pointed out now that he is probably recognizing facts much more than he is making magnanimous sacrifices to propitiate England and harrow up Mr. LABOUCHERE's feelings.

All the same, it is not unsatisfactory to see that one observer of unsurpassed shrewdness, and some part at any rate of a nation which is practical enough when it is not utterly visionary, have discovered the truth about colonization. It is not a very recondite truth, but it is one which nations seem singularly slow to learn, and which we ourselves did not learn till after long and sometimes bitter experience. There is a story—too long and perhaps too well known to tell or re-tell—the point of which is the remark as explaining the failure in the world of a certain young couple:—"Oh, they began with the chicken!" the speaker being a typical French peasant, who had not promoted his own household from cabbage soup to the chicken till late in life. Almost all European nations—down to the latest instance, that of the Belgians on the Congo—have "begun with the chicken," with paper annexations of vast territories, with governors, with constitutions, with Heaven knows what, instead of with making modest settlements, with getting command of trade, with fighting, if fighting be necessary, only with the nearest person who imperatively calls for chastisement, and so creeping on from small things to great. At the Camaroons, which is a very small station, and open to the use of naval force, the Germans have hitherto carried out their plan without any very decided rebuff. At Samoa a very decided rebuff, indeed, has met them. In Damara Land and at Zanzibar they have got themselves into notorious difficulties. Very little has been heard of what they have been doing in the part of New Guinea abandoned to them. A nation with such commercial aptitudes ought sooner or later to be able to colonize fairly well, though appearances hitherto certainly seem to indicate that the German aptitude is rather for trading under other rule than for governing as well as trading. But for the time the truth of old adages has been once more found to be fact, and the CHANCELLOR has had the sense to recognize it. A joyful and a pleasant thing it is when your governing man recognizes fact when he sees it, and perhaps it is a thing not so common as it is pleasant and joyful.

SUMMARY JURISDICTION.

THE famous maxim Summum jus, summa injuria has perhaps been wrongly translated. It may only mean, after all, that summary jurisdiction gives unusual opportunities for going wrong. The newspapers of last Wednesday afforded to those people who read the newspapers at this time of year a double opportunity of interpreting and applying the proverb for themselves. The Saturday Review, which is read all the year round, may perhaps usefully undertake the task of combining the incidents and pointing the moral. Captain CRAWFORD, whose case is the more serious, and shall therefore be taken first, was till lately chief British official in the district of Sulymah, on the western shores of Africa. The Sierra Leone coast is not a paradise for Europeans, and Captain CRAWFORD's health appears to have suffered, like that of so many others, from the climate of this perilous region. We would fain hope that a shattered state of mind and nerves is the best, and the only, though the very inadequate, excuse for the terrible crime of which Captain CRAWFORD has been convicted. The charge against him was that he caused the death of a native servant by "excessive and inhuman flogging." English gentlemen, whatever their faults, are as seldom cruel as cowardly, and soldiers are less prone than civilians to be callous of pain inflicted upon others. The servant whose death Captain CRAWFORD caused had been guilty of theft, which he probably regarded in much the same light as an English housemaid would regard the fault of getting up late in the morning. But he has forfeited his life for it, and that under torture. Some notion of the treatment he must have received may be gathered from the simple fact that no less than seven policemen were indicted with Captain CRAWFORD. They were acquitted, because the Court held that they were only obeying the orders of their superior officer. At Freetown, perhaps naturally, they seem to think more of discipline than of law. But we presume that even there the policemen would not have been exonerated if they had actually hanged the nigger. Captain CRAWFORD has been sentenced to the very mild penalty of twelve months' imprisonment, and it is said that efforts are being made to reduce the term on account of his impaired constitution. It would, of course, be wrong to show as little concern for Captain CRAWFORD's life as he showed for the native's. But it may be hoped that no ground will be afforded for the idea that Englishmen may do as they please at Sierra Leone.

The strange conduct of Lady MACARTNEY is not to be taken too seriously, though we must say that, if Mr. DE RUTZEN had sent her to prison, instead of fining her, she would have had no right to complain. Lady MACARTNEY, whose husband, Sir HALLIDAY MACARTNEY, is secretary to the Chinese Legation, is described by the cautious reporter as a person "of foreign extraction." She has, we believe, been extracted from France, a country which is not usually reckoned as beyond the pale of civilization. But that does not confer upon her the privilege, which she seems eccentric enough to value, of banging English girls about, and pulling down their back hair. She cannot plead, like Captain CRAWFORD, that she is responsible to the QUEEN and to the mother-country for the maintenance of order in a place where order is very difficult to maintain. On the contrary, she lives in Harley Place, Marylebone, where she is free to engage any servants she pleases, and to dismiss them on proper notice. What she has no business to do is to turn them off without a month's warning or a month's wages, and to come to fisticuffs with them when they do not please her. This information she has now acquired at the cost of paying rather more than five guineas, and of seeing her proceedings described in the public press as follows. ANNIE FOLLETT deposed that Lady MACARTNEY "attacked her, caught her by the throat, and "a struggle took place, in the course of which witness "pulled Lady MACARTNEY's hair down her back, and she "disarranged witness's. The struggle lasted for fifteen "minutes," &c. &c. All this was because ANNIE FOLLETT had asked for the opportunity of finding a new situation, to which she was legally entitled. ANNIE FOLLETT, and JESSIE DAVIS, who was "knocked against the hat-stand," are, we trust, not permanently the worse for their little encounters, whereas the African victim is dead. We can easily imagine Captain CRAWFORD's defence. Theft is very common in Sulymah, and this thief had been often caught before, and flogging is the only thing a nigger minds, and if you strike a native he dies to spite you. The moral effect upon human nature of its physical environment can scarcely be exaggerated.

"IRELAND EXPECTS —"

IT is said, with some though not entire truth, that Ireland is a poor country, and a profane member of Parliament might remark that this is doubtless the reason why we have it always with us. The performances of the present week in reference to Ireland are only noticeable because of the extreme illustration they give of the utter absurdity and hollowness of Irish debates. Human nature—Irish human nature—would not be expected, we suppose, to refrain from debating Mr. BALFOUR's salary; so we may confine ourselves to the earlier part of the week. The important proceedings of the Session came to an end when the mismanagement of the Government and the unscrupulousness of the Opposition between them brought about the withdrawal of the Tithes Bill. There then remained nothing but matter in itself purely uncontentious or so little deserving serious contention as the Bill which, owing to Mr. SALT's well-meaning high-handedness in Grand Committee, was subjected to additional debate in the House. As to this all rational men are in agreement. Some Gladstonians triumphantly inform Unionists that not thus will Ireland be bribed. They might have spared their labour, for no Unionist, who is not a kind of lunatic, ever dreamt that it was otherwise. The Light Railways Bill and other Bills of the same kind have been brought in by the Government and supported by the Unionist party merely as part of the duty of endeavouring to govern Ireland for the best, and with the profoundest conviction that some Irishmen (using that word with the common, though rather unfair, connotation of Nationalist) will refuse the gift and be ungrateful, that others (the major part) will accept it and be ungrateful, but that figs are much more likely to be found on the national plant of Scotland than gratitude in a Nationalist. It was equally matter of common knowledge that the English Radicals who pretend to be Ireland's friends would oppose, partly because their friendship does not extend further than taking part in eviction picnics, and partly because the first and last thought of English Radical members in reference to a Tory Government measure is, "Is this a "bad Bill? Vote against it. Is it a good one? Vote "against it ten times harder." The really practical thing would have been for the Opposition to name the number of hours under which it would not let the Bill through, and then for the House to adjourn meanwhile. But we have not reached this state of wisdom, in which, indeed, a Gladstonian Opposition, as at present constituted, could hardly exist.

Monday's example was bettered by Tuesday, and it would be hard to enumerate the number of Irish subjects which received notice, from the delicate question whether the member for Camborne has been (which we should sincerely regret) appointed to a variety of the office created by a certain Oxford undergraduate, to Mr. LEA's wild outburst on the subject of the Irish Sunday Closing Bill. Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE and Mr. MACNEILL put their heads together in order to pave (with a well-known material) the way to a fresh discussion of the thrice and three hundred times discussed CLANRICARDE case, which comes, when all is said, to neither more nor less than this—that Lord CLANRICARDE is one of the unpleasant people who take and give nothing but what they are strictly entitled to take and formally bound to give. Mr. HEALY, with a total disregard of the feelings of Sir GEORGE TREVELYAN, referred to the FRENCH case, Sir GEORGE's connexion with which was so powerfully pointed out by Mr. HEALY's gifted colleague, Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. FOWLER, who seems to be a kind of Home Rule BALAAM, said the handsomest things of Mr. BALFOUR, but laid it down in so many words that "the attempt to "govern Ireland logically must be a failure." It is almost impossible to imagine a greater burlesque of Parliamentary proceedings than Mr. HARRINGTON's grave complaint that the religion of telegraph clerks is not more exactly proportioned to the population of their place of service. But all such things do well enough for the purpose—the purpose of appeasing the wrath of the Freeman's Journal with the slackness of Irish members, and showing with what terrible earnestness the Hibernian legislator would legislate if he were only allowed.

CRETE AND ARMENIA.

SOME of the possibly well-intentioned, but certainly weak-minded, fanatics whose one idea of Continental politics seems to consist in hunting the SULTAN and the Emperor of AUSTRIA out of their respective dominions, were at the end of last week and the beginning of this in a state of comparative happiness about Crete. SHAKIR Pasha would have to come back, the Turkish troops would have to be withdrawn, horrible atrocities would be committed (the atrocity is to this kind of person rather a means to a desirable end than anything else, and he is chiefly grieved when it does not occur or cannot be invented), and Crete would shortly be restored, as a consequence, to the Hellenic Kingdom. It is, of course, impossible to say that these things will not happen; and it is equally impossible to say whether the prophecy of them had anything to do with the curious little Russo-Greek intrigue said to have been attempted. But at present the prophecy seems to be accomplishing itself by contraries. SHAKIR Pasha has been well received, and has at once taken the most straightforward, as well as the most pacific, means of coming to an understanding with the insurgents; the Turkish troops are being strengthened to an extent really commensurate to the difficulty; atrocities, instead of increasing on this account, are diminishing, and the happy restoration of something that never existed would appear to be indefinitely postponed. In reference to this last point it may be observed that the Cretans themselves apparently do not share the ideas of our English Philhellenes and Turcophobes. But whether they do or not, it is pretty clear that the better aspect of affairs in Crete is due to two things. The first is the late, but not, it would seem, quite too late, awakening of the Porte to the necessity of acting vigorously. The second is the way in which the Powers have given M. TRICOUPI a hint, which he has been sensible enough to take, that they do not recognize Greece as possessing any locus standi in the matter. To this may be added, if any one thinks proper, the fact—a pretty certain fact—that the insurrection is wholly unconnected with any Turkish "oppression" whatever, and that, so far as the matter has been one of religion against religion, the Mussulmans have not been the aggressors, and have suffered the most of the two.

The Asiatic centre of disturbance does not seem to be for the moment much more promising than the European, if, indeed, Crete can be called European. Our Turcophobes, failing to respond to the affectionate demand for a few proved facts, hug their Armenian Blue-book in the confidence that few people will look to see what it really contains, talk glibly about "Nestorians" and "Armenians" as if they were the same thing, and produce with triumph a document, whether genuine or apocryphal matters little, in which the SULTAN recommends his officers to maintain the rights and privileges of the Kurds. We should have thought that persons who for the most part call themselves Liberals would have held it as the first principle of good government that everybody's rights and privileges should be maintained; but apparently Neo-Liberalism has changed in this as in so many other things, and Russia is openly implored to step in, that the rights and privileges of the Kurds may not be maintained. It may be hoped, indeed, that the tardy resipiscence which has exhibited itself in the dealings of the Porte with Crete will extend to Armenia also, and that, not content with abstaining from oppression—an abstinence which has been the rule for many years—the SULTAN'S Government will take care not to let things slide in the fashion which gives opportunity to agitators and atrocity-mongers. The experience of the last war showed that the value of the Kurds as irregular troops was very much overrated and their value as regular troops almost nil; while the Armenians, who, on the whole, still prefer the SULTAN to the CZAR, have made some of the best soldiers in the Russian army. It is almost impossible for well-wishers to the Turks to help them if they will not perceive simple facts of this kind; and the mulish obstinacy of not perceiving them does far more harm than "atrocities," which nineteen times out of twenty do not exist, or religious differences, which need make little difference. For the present, however, the failure of the atrocity-mongers to prove their case is almost absolute, and that is something.

THE SCIENCE COLLECTION.

THE moral of the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the Science Collection at South Kensington is briefly this—that, if you have a national collection at all, it ought to be complete, and it ought to be properly housed. Most people will agree with the Committee. An incomplete collection is an eyesore. It is as bad as an incomplete edition. It is the glory of a collection to be complete. To be truly worthy of praise it ought to supply the inquirer so fully that he has no need to go elsewhere. If it does not—if some specimens are missing and journeys must be made to supply them—the scientific, literary, or artistic mind is very properly aggrieved. When the maker of the collection is the State, and when it is of a kind which can be made complete by mere outlay of money and care, grief is replaced by indignation at the discovery of empty places where links ought to be. That when your complete collection is formed, it ought to be properly housed is a self-evident proposition. The Treasury has been suspected of thinking the completion and adequate housing of the Science collection at South Kensington less important than the saving of money. To judge by the composition of the Committee the suspicion was unfounded. The accusation was probably based on nothing more solid than a general estimate of the view and character of the Treasury. In any case that meddlesome department will not be able to justify any future refusal of money by the report of its Committee. It has been recommended to supply 90,000 feet of exhibition space, together with "offices, warehouses, work-shops, or other accessories," and that at an early date. Now the scientific world can begin the long and arduous task of persuading the Treasury to carry out the recommendation of its own Committee.

The department cannot complain that the gentlemen whose opinions it has asked have been exacting on behalf of science. On the contrary, they have shown every disposition to make space by weeding existing collections, or even by removing some bodily. They suggest, for instance, that fish-culture exhibits might be taken away to Plymouth, and are even ready if it were possible to remove the Naval Exhibition to Greenwich. In spite of a certain air of plausibility about the proposition that things appertaining to the sea should be near the sea, we are not sure that we agree with them. A collection, we say again, ought to be complete. South Kensington ought surely, therefore, to have its naval and fishery sections. If it is desirable to have a school for the study of fishery at Plymouth, it ought to be provided with models and specimens of its own. Besides, London is, after all, the head-quarters of study of all kinds, and the inconvenience which would be caused by the removal of the means of the study from it to a provincial town would more than counterbalance whatever gain there might be in the liberation of space for exhibition at South Kensington. We are, therefore, glad that various considerations, such as a strong public feeling and the refusal of the owners of handsome specimens to have them sent away from London, forbid the removal of the naval gallery. The Committee's expression of a willingness to sacrifice a part of the collection may be taken to be chiefly a proof of its disposition to consult that "regard to the financial exigencies which must always be present to those entrusted with the expenditure of public funds." In dealing with other parts of the collection, the Committee shows a real desire to do with the minimum of space and money. It is prepared to see the different sections severely weeded of superfluous specimens; it recommends the use of diagrams instead of models, wherever the drawing will serve the turn; and would retain only such examples of old forms of machines or instruments as are necessary for the purpose of illustrating historical developments. This, beyond all doubt, is the system on which a collection should be formed. With the other suggestions of the Committee—that the sections of the collection should be brought together, housed in a safe way, made accessible, and properly looked after—equally little fault can be found. We end as we began, by saying that a national collection should be complete, and should be supplied with an establishment in proportion to the national dignity. It is stupid, and wasteful too, to throw away money on half-finished things; and that is what is done when funds needed to carry to completion something which has been begun, and to make it safe, are refused.

AMONG THE CHACHĀNS.

THE Kurdish village of Kubur-ul-Beidh, "the Whited Sepulchres," marks the boundary of the Shammar country to the north. As the traveller emerges from the waterless tracts of the great Jazirah plain, he enters once more a land of rivers, and streams, and brooks, a fair and fertile land wasted under the heel of the feckless and reckless Osmanli. Here the Badu guide turns his back on the ploughed and harried soil that owns him not, and sets his face towards the virgin solitudes of his own beloved desert. Six hours' hot and weary ride over the rolling downs, waving fields of yellow wheat, to Nisibin; for supplies are exhausted, and it is not possible to wait to-day for friendly night to throw its cooling shade over our path. The noonday sun blazes on earth and sky—there is nothing hid from the heat thereof. A silent echoing void of flaming heat, so dazzling and brilliant that it weighs upon the aching eyeballs with a sense of blackness of darkness; for the senses seem all confounded, obliterated, under that flood of flame and fire. Nisibin, in Niebuhr's time a wretched village of one hundred and fifty houses, is still the same desolate shadow of what was once "the strong and ancient city of Nisibis, the firmest bulwark of the provinces of the East," until, some ten short years after it had repulsed with loss and ignominy the power of Sapor, it was basely surrendered by the unworthy successor of Julian, flying before the Persian barbarians, as part of the price of "that ignominious peace that has justly been considered as a memorable era in the decline and fall of the Roman Empire." After crossing "the little stream of the Mygdonius" the town, which need not detain us, is entered. It has nothing to show of the triple line of walls and lofty towers which once bid defiance to the hosts of the conquering Shahpur, and held watch and ward on the utmost limits of the Roman Empire. Hassan the muleteer found a brother here, and after many hugs and kisses in true Eastern fashion, the two men fell to deploring the evil fate in store for themselves from the hands of the Chachān robbers whose haunts they were about to enter. The brother was full of the ferocious villany of these Circassian bandits, and finally brought as testimony a number of wretched Kurdish peasants, members of a plundered caravan, who had barely escaped with their lives from the hands of these dreaded robbers. The end was that the muleteer declined to venture himself and his beasts any further into the deserts without an escort, which, he said, could be procured at Mardin, twelve hours' march from Nisibin. Here is a theme for the man who holds that the history and the fate of mighty empires point no moral, bring no wisdom to a foolish generation that prates of "a nineteenth century," as who would say, "Doubtless we are the people and wisdom will die with us!" Where, sixteen centuries ago, Diocletian and his Cæsar Galerius met the ambassador of the Great King, the Persian Narses, and decreed that the city of Nisibis stood inviolate under the shadow of Imperial Rome, a place of arms and of peaceful commerce on the furthest limits of the Empire, and strong in the strength and security of the Roman power in Asia, the land enjoyed a profound and tranquil peace, now, "from beyond the Tigris and beyond the Euphrates, from the gates of Ctesiphon to those of Antioch," a feeble horde of ill-armed and plundering outlaws spreads terror and devastation through the land, and the ring of ruling pashas looks on helpless and indifferent. So much for the march of nineteen centuries of civilization in some of the fairest provinces of Asia.

Unlike Nisibin, the ruins of Dara, magnificent in decay, still remain to attest the former grandeur of that city, "founded by Anastasius and improved by the perseverance of Justinian." On the road, to the left and the right, there are the remains of old castles, blocks of massive masonry hurled in fragments to the ground. At noon the camp is at Dara, by a spring of pure and abundant water, bubbling out of the foot of Mount Masius. Across the valley and over the low, rocky hills run the solid foundations of that impregnable fortress, whose lofty walls and towers are described as monuments of strength and beauty. Within the line of the walls, and under the massive ruins that encumber the uneven ground, is a labyrinth of vaulted chambers and great cisterns, hewn out of the solid rock. It is a barren desert, abandoned to the Kurdish shepherds, who herd their flocks of goats among the ruins; and after nightfall no foot dare tread within the enchanted space, for it is guarded by jinns and horrid demons. Travellers came and drank at the spring and departed—small groups of Kurdish peasants, then a Turkish Zaptieh; but none would tarry longer than need be by the haunted ruins; and at last, yielding to Ali and the Mukāri, the travellers turned their backs regretfully on the ruins of Dara before the shades of night began to gather. Next morning's sun found them toiling up the steep mountain path to Mardin, a city set on a hill, towering aloft at the sheer height of two thousand feet over the level plain, which breaks like a boundless sea at the foot. The narrow streets rise like terraced battlements to the foot of the scarp, precipitous crown of the hill on which stands the ruined citadel. The magnificent gateway of the Masjid Sultan Isa, the most perfect example of Moorish architecture in Asia, lifts its richly sculptured arch aloft over the town, and from its massive terrace and galleries of hewn stone you gaze right down into infinite space, where the boundless desert is lost in the misty horizon. Descend again from that glorious, breezy height, a flight or two of worn steps, and you feel, but hardly see, the hubbub of busy life astir around you. Of all the places where men are wont to traffic and get gain, none, surely, so shuns the light of open day as the fitful, dim, obscure, and vaulted crypts that form the bazars of Mardin. Overhead are the open streets; down here the din of traffic seems to come obscurely muffled and deadened from the bowels of the mountain. "Behold, O Beg!" said the Mukāri's brother, "here are two Chachāns. Dogs and sons of dogs! If we meet them in the desert, our lives are poured out like water. Allah defend us from the filthy scoundrels!" The two Circassians, seated on a shopboard, even among that motley crowd of Asiatics, certainly bore the palm of conspicuous savagery. Their tanned countenances, under huge sheepskin caps, wore a yet more fierce and evil expression by reason of their fair complexions; and their patched and filthy garments spoke utter poverty, or utter recklessness, or both. The wildest Badu of the Jazirah deserts looks an honest man by comparison.

At the khan was a burly Englishman, travelling by the postal route to Samsun. He had been dancing attendance the whole of the previous day at the Serai, and had failed to prevail upon the Governor to give him an escort of a single Zaptieh. He went off railing at the evasive and dilatory Turk; but, as there was not the slightest necessity for giving him protection over a perfectly safe road, there was, perhaps, some excuse for the Turk. Then came another attempt on him. The Deputy-Governor, a capable and friendly Jacobite in frock-coat and fez, ordered in coffee and cigarettes, and said that an escort should be provided if the Mushir could spare the men; "although," he added, "a score of men will not avail you if the Chachāns choose to attack you; they fear neither God nor devil, much less the Osmanli." Presently the Mushir was ushered in with many salaams, and the company rose. His greeting was courteous and kindly, and he said at once that two Zaptiehs were at our disposal at any time we might demand them; and the interview was at an end. Half an hour had done the business for us over which the Englishman referred to had unsuccessfully spent a whole day; and the inference was that the fault, after all, was not with these courteous and kindly officials. Even English travellers in Turkey will find the absence of tact and civility somewhat a hindrance; but, as a rule, the majority of English travellers in the East are Christian gentlemen.

Instead of two Zaptiehs, one only made his appearance. The Mukāri was content, however; Sheikh Mir Chawish of Mardin carried a repeating carbine slung over his shoulder, a cavalry sabre slung at his side, and rode a splendid little Arab cob, his own property. He wore a dark-blue military uniform, a pair of enormous boots, and a gaudy silk kaffieh enveloped his head and shoulders. He was, moreover, a capital companion, full of Arab lore and legend, which he was nothing loth to impart. The party scrambled down the precipitous path in the early morning, and once more found themselves on the broad, rolling desert, with faces set towards the Euphrates. Across that silent plain they rode, a moving speck on the vast expanse, not a moving or living thing beside themselves to stir the solitudes. A ruined and deserted village lay in the path, where was a rough stone tank of excellent water; the inhabitants had died or fled no one knew when or why or how. Chawish said the name of it was Mashkuk, which means, in Arabic, "Shattered." The land is fair and fertile, with streams of running water. Two brawling torrents were crossed in a morning's march, the banks aglow with rhododendrons in bloom. On the second day the travellers turned aside to seek an encampment which Chawish declared to be in the neighbourhood. They found the low black tents spread among the boulders that strewn the foot of a rugged mound. The natives—wild, unkempt, and uncouth—turned out to stare, too stupid or too stupefied to reply to Chawish's cheery greeting. They were neither Arabs nor Kurds, as one might see at a glance; they were Yezidies, that strange race of semi-pagans who worship the Devil (so say the Moslems), and whose visible sign and symbol for their deity is a cock. The girls of the encampment came and sat on the boulders, twirling their little hand-spindles, whispering and giggling; finally, by dint of very cautious approaches, the travellers arrived at speaking terms, and when evening came on, and the men brought in their flocks, had a weird and fantastic gathering by the lurid fire in the headman's tent. Ali vowed that the Devil-worshippers were wizards and sorcerers, whose neighbourhood was uncanny and unsafe. And even the bold Chawish did not attempt to disguise his disgust when it was decided to pass the night in such evil company. Dawn, however, found him and his companions unscathed and alive, wending their way to Wirānshahr, "the Desolate City," whose ruins are a marvel and a mystery.

The very name of the city is lost. The Persian name that it bears only describes the utter desolation that has fallen on its walls of hewn and polished stone, its beautiful palaces and temples; for those graceful shafts and vaulted foundations, the shattered blocks of sculptured masonry, all testify to the former beauty and grandeur of a city that has perished with the power that founded it. The remains are Roman; similar to, but not so massive as, those at Dara; and, like Dara and Nisibis, the city stood by the springs and streams of abundant water. Chawish, unheeding of these monuments of a fallen empire, proposed an immediate visit to the Turkish Mudir, and stipulated that he was to be allowed to conduct the negotiations for a change of Zaptiehs himself. He was to resign his charge here and return to Mardin. The "Serai" was found to consist of a range of half a dozen small and dirty rooms, overlooking the court of a vast enclosure of mud walls. In one of the rooms was the Mudir's brother, a sickly-looking young man, who bade his visitors go to the Bimbashi, in an adjoining apartment. Chawish beat upon the door with the pommel of his sword; and presently a sound of coughing and spitting was heard inside; the door was opened by a Turkish soldier, in a very dirty shirt, who admitted them to the presence of his colonel, still in bed, and then retired to his own couch again. A long conversation in Turkish ensued between Chawish and the Bimbashi; the former not the least abashed, assuming, indeed, rather a bullying tone. On coming out he began to congratulate himself on a good morning's work. "What did you say to the man?" "I said you were travelling on the high business of the English Elchi at Stamboul, and that the English Daulah would make trouble for the Sultan unless you were forthwith provided with a good and sufficient escort. Then the Bimbashi wanted to know why only one Zaptieh, meaning myself, had brought you so far across these deserts. I told him there were six of us, and that I had left the other five behind on the road, intending to rejoin them on my way back to Mardin." "Then you told the man a heap of shameless lies, and I will go back to him at once." "Take my advice, Beg, and leave well alone; you will not get a single Zaptieh here but by cunning and bribery. I know the man and you do not. Besides, would you blacken my face, who have served you faithfully out of the affection I have conceived for you?" And Chawish, not one whit abashed, set off forthwith on his return journey, lest by chance the Bimbashi should too soon discover the trick that had been played upon him.

In the afternoon the two Zaptiehs arrived, fully equipped for the journey. One was a tall, athletic Chachān, or Circassian; his companion, a talkative little Turk from Stamboul; they rode upon mules and carried old muzzle-loading rifles. "If we meet the Chachāns," explained the Turk, "my brother, who is a Chachān himself, and a valiant lion, will know how to deal with them." "And what will you do?" "Have no fears, Effendi; we will defend you or die." There was riding for many hours across a flat, dreary plain, rank with noxious weeds; the swarms of flies stung the poor brutes to madness. At dark a ravine was crossed, with a stream, or small river, the Turkish name of which means "Brook of the Lion." The road ascends over stony and desolate hills, until about midnight, on the summit of the plateau, a halting-place was reached, the name of it in Arabic Kharāba, which signifies "the Ruins." In the moonless midnight a desolate spot. Black against the western sky stood the nameless ruins; neither Mukāri nor Zaptieh would venture within the crumbling walls, the nightly haunt, they said, of ravenous beasts. By the light of the stars there could be distinguished prostrate pillars and ruinous heaps, vaulted crypts yawning, black and cavernous. An ominous hiss or growl coming out of the darkness gave a warning of some lurking foe, and it was safer to return to where the beasts were tethered and the men sitting by the blaze of a cheerful fire. The camping place was here because there was water. The water comes from the unknown depths of rock-hewn cisterns, each with its narrow orifice opening through the solid rock, and made to be closed by its sliding trap of stone, for the grooves were there yet.

It is on the track of Roman armies and Roman Emperors, and it is probable that the marching hosts of Rome used or hewed these cisterns that they might not perish of thirst in crossing this waterless plateau, which stretches from near Edessa to the Brook of the Lion, on its eastern boundary. Or they may be of yet greater antiquity. Suddenly the deep silence of night was broken by a cry, faint and distant, a human voice raised in a prolonged and continuous shout like the cry of a man startled by a sudden peril. The Zaptiehs rose to their feet grasping their muskets; the party sat up and listened intently, but the cry was not repeated, and silence reigned again on the dark and lonely hills.

This district is the ancient province of Osrhoëne, one of the transient conquests of Trajan in the first century. Not until two centuries later was it finally reduced to a Roman province, when Abgarus, the last of its kings, was sent to Rome in chains, and Edessa, his capital, dignified with the rank of colony. Southward of our route lies the track of the ill-fated expedition of Julian when he marched to defeat and death in the distant dominions of Sapor. From Hierapolis on the Euphrates the Roman hosts marched northwards to Carrhæ, which is Haran, where Abraham dwelt when he came from Ur of the Chaldees, and the Harran of the Arabs; then suddenly wheeled to the south, and reached on the third day the banks of the Euphrates again at Nicephorium, which is called by the Arabs Rakkah. Harran lies on the left behind the barren range of Jabal Taktak. But noon brings the summit of a rocky pass, and here are ruins of temple or castle, the former probably, for close by are two empty rock-hewn tombs. The huge blocks of hewn and polished stone are heaped up pell-mell as if an earthquake had shattered the building to its foundations. Beneath the smooth, shelving rock is a magnificent reservoir of water; the Mukâri was let down by a rope into its dark and rocky depths, and sent up bucket after bucket of icy-cold water, sweet but somewhat discoloured, until man and beast had drunk their fill. A road hewn smooth and deep out of the solid rock descends by an easy slope into the valley on the other side. If the testimony of all history did not agree that the famous Temple of the Moon stood at Carrhæ, one might well suppose that these gigantic ruins were the very remains of the old Sabæan shrine. Abraham, travelling slowly, like an Arab sheikh of the present day, may have halted here to water his flocks and herds and followers. He must have passed close by this spot when he departed out of Haran to go into the land of Canaan. The eldest servant of his house, when he came again to his native Mesopotamia with his camels to seek a wife for Isaac, found Rebecca at the well; "and she went down to the well and filled her pitcher and came up," and afterwards drew for the camels. Jacob, when he fled to Padan-Aram, the same home of his mother's father, "found a well in a field"; and "out of that well they watered the flocks, and a great stone was upon the well's mouth"—and the shepherds who came to water the sheep said, "of Haran are we." To one the traveller descends, like Rebecca, by a flight of worn steps, and it seemed, with the Bible records brought vividly to mind, to be no far-fetched conjecture that these might be the very wells which play so important a part in the history of the old patriarchs.

Then came the windings of a long, narrow valley. Solitude reigns supreme in that forsaken desert; not a moving thing is visible. The two Zaptiehs either rode far behind or far ahead, and seemed to have particular objections to riding in close proximity to the caravan. Perhaps wrong was done to the bold fellows by the suspicion that they thus preferred to hold themselves in readiness either for flight or for battle, whichever might seem most convenient, in case the Chachâns should suddenly fall upon the laden mules. At the entrance of a low valley, opening through the hills to the left, was another mass of débris, squared and massive blocks of stone, overwhelmed upon the ground, blocking up the entrance of the narrow defile. Hard by was a deep, oblong excavation in the hard rock, partly covered by slabs of stone laid neatly in their place side by side. The chamber was empty and dry, and the Zaptieh from Stamboul said it had held the gold and treasures of the Rumi long before the Osmanlis came into the country. Five hours later the descent from the stony plateau began. In the green and fertile plain beyond were the long lines of tents of the Syrian fellahin, for the travellers were now approaching the borders of Northern Syria. The swarthy Arab was behind in his native desert, and a fairer race, less free than himself, a patient race that has toiled and worn the yoke of many an oppressor, tilled the soil of the land. Even the tents, plain in the distance, spoke of the change. Many of the tents were white and some were striped, black and white, and no one ever found an Arab under a tent that was not blacker than his own swarthy countenance. The ill-shaped jackets and baggy trousers of the Syrian peasants were a veritable offence, and almost a personal grievance, after the loose and graceful abba of the Arab. And there was the khan, substantial brick and mortar, a visible sign and proof that the desert lay behind. Ali and the Zaptiehs held a noisy colloquy in Turkish with some women in the courtyard. The women were in permanent possession, but gave permission to occupy the gateway. For the first time for many a day the party slept under a roof that hid the shining stars.

The following day Urfa lay in front, extended white and shining under the morning rays, against its background of low hills. Urfa of the Turks, but far-famed Edessa of classic and Christian story; where the cross won its earliest triumphs, and the dark deities of paganism forsook their rival shrine at Carrhæ before the light diffused from her Christian school: where Arian factions strove with the apostate Emperor and felt the weight of the resentment of that oppressor of the Galilæans; and where, centuries later, Baldwin, Count of Flanders, raised the standard against a sterner foe of Christianity, which triumphed, or seemed to triumph, when the short-lived Christian principality fell before the prowess of the father of Saladin. At the gate of Edessa dangers, if not toils, were over. "Well, where were these terrible Chachâns all the time, whom we did not see?" The Turk from Stamboul said something to his Circassian comrade, who replied with brief words and many a fierce and expressive gesture. Then, said the Turk, speaking in bad Arabic, "Effendi, you did not see the Chachâns, nor did I, but my brother, who is a Chachân himself, and a valiant lion, did. They dogged our steps from the first night at Kharâba until we slept at peace within barred and bolted gates last night. Al-hamd-ul-illâh, you are here in safety—for the dread of us was upon these godless prowlers of the desert."

MADAME PUZZI.

THE sense of loss which Mme. Puzzi's disappearance from the world of London—to say nothing of the wider world of music—brings to all who were privileged to call her friend, or even acquaintance, must not here be too much dwelt on, and, indeed, only those outside her family circle who knew her both as teacher and friend can rightly gauge it. Her knowledge of the world was like her knowledge of music, profound, but for all that had not in it one shade of cynicism. Proud with a just pride, without one touch of vanity, she made herself loved and respected, but never feared—as the word is commonly used—by all who were admitted to her friendship. She was the very soul of kindness; but it was a kindness on which none ever dreamed of presuming. Celebrated in Praed's "Good Night to the Season" as "the Toso, So very majestic and tall," herself a prima donna of extraordinary qualifications until she had lost her voice, she became the wife of Signor Puzzi, the greatest of horn-players (his only worthy successor having been M. Vivier), and also, it is believed, no mean diplomatist in a quiet way; and she became also the very first of professed teachers in England of the true Italian method of singing. A lesson from her, with her wide and penetrating knowledge of every detail of true musical and dramatic art, was a thing never to be forgotten. Nor was it less instructive to be in her company at any operatic performance. She had known well the giants of opera, in those old days of opera which Mr. Augustus Harris has lately done so much to revive; but her keen and kind judgment of new-comers was never affected by a desire to glorify the past at the expense of the present. It may be added that her patience, acquired rather than inborn, with faults both in public and private performances was almost inexhaustible. But then she was a great artist. And it is well known, to all who care for the knowledge, that a great artist is far more lenient in judgment than a passable, or even more than passable, amateur; the reason of which is not far to seek. Until within a comparatively short time she continued to take an unflinching and always kindly critical interest in all that was done or sung on the operatic stage or concert platform. "Mamma Puzzi"—one cannot help using the familiar phrase—was a storehouse of memories that extended far beyond the musical and dramatic world, and those memories she was always ready, with her own inimitable wit and humour, to unfold for her friends. In her was the very best of the Italian temperament schooled and controlled by a heart of gold and a will of steel: so that she might deserve a saying of which some will recognize the origin—"There was only one Mme. Puzzi."

Her death must suggest to all but the younger opera-goers the changed conditions of Italian opera and the many vicissitudes it has known during the past sixty years. As a singer, Mme. Puzzi's career began in 1827 at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket, in the part of Agia in Rossini's Pietro l'Eremita. Mlle. Toso, to give her maiden name, was trained at that nursery of famous singers, the Milan Conservatorio. She was young, charming, and beautiful exceedingly when engaged by Signor Puzzi for the London season. This engagement led to another, and before the next season arrived Mlle. Toso became Mme. Puzzi, and the stage she was eminently qualified to adorn knew her no more. For a long period, however, she exercised a constant and beneficial influence on the course of Italian opera in England. Her artistic influence was acknowledged to be in the first rank of authority. Her career as a teacher, whose success was altogether extraordinary, and as a critic, to whom managers were wont to appeal when perplexed by the difficult and delicate task of deciding finally on the merits of young, untried vocalists, is one of the most remarkable in operatic history. A sound judgment in matters artistic is perhaps not wholly developed by education. Nature, probably, has a larger share in its formation than professors of art are willing to concede. Mme. Puzzi's natural gifts were happily matured in one of the best schools of musical training in Europe. Her "singing method," so productive of excellent artists, was based on principles of theory and practice which time has tested and all great singers have approved. The renown of Italian Conservatorios cannot be said to have waned with the waning of Italian opera, and Milan, always in the first rank of schools of music, may justly be proud of the fame acquired by Mme. Puzzi as a teacher. If at present the Italian operatic stage in London is not mainly recruited from Italy, as it was in the flourishing days of Lumley, it is not because great singers are not raised in Italy, but because other countries are more canvassed by the impresario's agents. A very large proportion of foreign stage vocalists are educated finally in Italy. Many, indeed, have been preserved from the evil effects of defective training by a fortunate sojourn at Milan or Naples. What Mr. Sims Reeves has to say on this important question, in his entertaining "Jubilee" volume, is not less weighty now than in his own years of training. The accident of birth may endow a country with the exceptional singer; but it is to Italy, as a rule, that we owe the educating method that makes the singer exceptional.

When Mme. Puzzi made her début at the King's Theatre Italian opera was a great and popular institution. It was dominated by the genius of Rossini, who did more than any other composer to stay for the time the advance of those reforming theories of Gluck which were subsequently to be developed by Wagner and his followers beyond the aims of the composer of Orfeo. Italian opera was genuine Italian opera, "undebased," as old-fashioned people would now say, when the beautiful Mlle. Toso sang for a season in the works of Rossini, Mercadante, and others who were great composers for great singers. Then was the human voice, in a sense, glorified and accorded a significant prominence in the lyric scene. Italian opera itself had, however, recently experienced a mild and salutary revolution. Only some few years before that first appearance of Mlle. Toso in Pietro l'Eremita, Rossini had introduced in Otello that richer musical treatment of recitative which replaced the old recitativo secco characteristic of Italian opera before the prime of Rossini's brief and brilliant reign. The innovation was a prodigious advantage to trained singers and a powerful influence on the art of vocalization. There are still singers among us, and good judges of singing, who regret those old times. Mr. Sims Reeves is eloquent in praise of Italian opera as it then was, and would probably rejoice in the revival of the forgotten operas in which Mlle. Toso charmed the London world of 1827. To lament the loss of that which fascinated everybody sixty years since is appropriate and pathetic on this occasion; yet we cannot profess to be hopeful of the resuscitation of the old traditions. We must be thankful for the ever-delightful William Tell—though we might have it uncut, and gain thereby—and for the immortal Barber. The rest are probably as far from the possession of desire as the charming English operas that were contemporaneous with the Italian stage triumphs of Malibran and Pasta. Only the magnanimous amateur with an opera stage of his own, if such a person exists, can revive the "Ballad Operas" that delighted our fathers. Since those far-off days when Lumley ruled and controlled the fortunes of Italian opera, Mme. Puzzi had witnessed many fluctuations in its course, dark periods of decadence, threatened extinctions, and the promising revival and reconstruction of recent years under Mr. Augustus Harris. Her life has been throughout closely associated with the history of Italian opera in England—first as singer, and afterwards as teacher and critic. In all three capacities she achieved distinction, and in the last two her eminence was notable. That Mme. Puzzi was long regarded as a court of final appeal for bewildered impresarios is excellent testimony to her experience and gifts as a musician. Her advice was sought only to be followed, and her judgment was in most instances signally confirmed.

THE DEVONSHIRE ASSOCIATION.

THE Devonshire Association for the Advancement of Science, Literature, and Art met at Tavistock on the 30th of July in this year. This Association, established on the lines of the British Association, meets each year in some town in Devonshire, in July or August, with a president for the year, appointed for his eminence or competence as a teacher of men. It was established in 1862, when it met at Exeter, with Sir John Bowring as president; and the last time that it met at Tavistock was in 1866, when the president was no less a person than Lord Russell. Among the presidents of the Devonshire Association may be mentioned such men as Charles Kingsley, Anthony Froude, William Froude—appointed president for 1878, when, in consequence of his deeply-lamented death, Sir Samuel Baker took his place at short notice—the Bishop of London, Lord Monckswell, Lord Coleridge, and other Devonshire men.

The president, on taking the chair on the first evening of the meeting, reads an address, which, by the rules of the Association, need not be on a subject relating to Devonshire, though the other papers read by members of the Association on the two following days must be devoted to the elucidation of Devonshire topics. The variety of matter dealt with in the presidents' addresses is as great as the variety in the endowments of the presidents' minds. Last year the Dean of Exeter, the Senior Wrangler of 1839, dwelt on astronomy and other sciences, and enlarged on literature. This year Mr. Huddleston, the Secretary of the Geological Society, gave a geological address on the geology of the Tavistock district and Dartmoor, revealing to the world that geologists differ, and that there are burning questions arising on the evidence respecting the true history of the world's crust offered by the exploration of the rocks. Although there are numerous geologists amongst the members of the Devonshire Association, there has been no geological president, with a geological address, since 1867, when Mr. Pengeley, F.R.S., known to fame as the explorer and expounder of the remains of man and beast found in Kent's Cavern, Torquay, was president, at Torquay. It is not difficult to make the subject of geology obscure to the general public of men and women, members of the Devonshire Association, and when geologists differ, forming themselves into parties, not Whig and Tory exactly, but very human all the same, an outsider feels himself to be very much indeed outside the points of controversy.

The members read papers for two days after the address on exclusively Devonshire subjects. They are limited by the rules to twenty minutes in each case, and the length of papers, with a profusion of small details, notwithstanding this limit is astonishing. Details are strictly scientific, and large views can only rest on a secure foundation formed of such material duly verified. The mass of observers are always collecting facts, from which great minds draw inferences, sometimes of astounding importance. But discrimination in small details is a virtue which appears to be rare, and if facts of no value at all could be distinguished from facts of significance many wearisome hours might be spared to many members of many Associations.

The president's address and the papers read, or "taken as read," many of them being too long for the twenty minutes, are printed and published in a yearly volume of Transactions, and this library of twenty-seven volumes since 1862, some of them bulky enough, contains an extensive collection of Devonshire facts of all sorts, whether indiscriminate or of value some future searcher of records will, no doubt, judge. Antiquaries flourish in this and in kindred Societies who never weary of the smallest of facts raked up from the past, and their habit of gloating on a rough stone cross by the roadside, common enough, one would think, in Roman Catholic times, is an instance of what the human mind will condescend to. Etymology becomes a branch of archaeology in these cases, and is quite consistent with a good deal of ignorance of every language except one, and even that but imperfectly known. The antiquarian spirit is certainly rife amongst the members of these Associations.

There was one paper, contributed by Mr. Radford, of Mount-Tavy—short, well written, and well read—raising a question of vast importance to Devonshire, and of not inferior interest in all cases of rivers and water-supply. A large quantity of rain falls on Dartmoor, which is held by the bogs as water is held by a sponge, and from them slowly drip, even in the driest seasons, the waters that form such rivers as the Teign, the Dart, the Plym, the Tavy, the Okements, and the Taw; in fact, the whole water-supply for more than half Devon, including the fleet and shipping in general at Plymouth. The Duchy of Cornwall, as owners of the Forest, so called, of Dartmoor, claim and have exercised the right to grant these bogs to Companies or other strangers for the purpose of converting them into portable fuel on a large scale. Happily, so far these adventures have proved complete failures, ending on occasion in the Bankruptcy Court. But, if they were to succeed, the sources of the water-supply would be cut off, and an incalculable injury inflicted on large, well-populated districts. If this cutting of fuel were only partially successful, the result would be dangerous floods in rainy seasons and scanty streams in dry seasons, the bogs being, judging from the quality of the water, one of the very best of reservoirs. The commoners of the Forest have exercised the right to cut fuel for centuries; but it has been done on such a small scale that no palpable harm has followed. The whole question of the water-supply of the kingdom and the pollution of rivers is a serious one, and must before very long demand more attention than it has as yet received. The rights of the Duchy of Cornwall and the management by the Duchy office of this property of H.R.H. the Prince of Wales were discussed pretty freely at Tavistock, where various claims were put forward inconsistent with the proceedings of the Duchy authorities and very well worth public attention.

Tavistock is a very attractive and pretty town. It is blest with a duke, the Duke of Bedford, who, with his predecessors, has built public buildings and improved the town immensely of late years. The public buildings, including the Bedford Hotel, were the home for the time being of the Devonshire Association; and after their final meeting on the 1st of August the members were entertained by the townspeople at a conversazione, where there was an exhibition of pictures, minerals, and curiosities. Here Devonshire songs, collected with much pains by Mr. Baring Gould, were sung by a troupe of his selection, including himself, and constituted good examples of Devonshire musical art combined with antiquarian research. Mr. Baring Gould has a theory that these songs have a peculiar Devonshire character; the words of some of them certainly have, and the airs and music in particular have, according to Mr. Baring Gould, a special significance, denoting a very old and primitive musical feeling in the people. On this we shall have more to say when the songs are published.

The Association dine and make speeches, the Association go to garden parties, and, after the serious business has been got through, the Association devote a day, by way of recovering from their labours, to excursions. They visited Devon Great Consols mine, one of the best conducted mines in the West of England, and Endsleigh Cottage, where the Duke of Bedford seeks retirement at times. They visited Brent Tor Church, Lydford gorge and waterfall, and Lydford Castle—where Lydford law was administered, under which prisoners were hanged first and tried afterwards. And they visited Dartmoor, where they inspected the antiquities, Wistman's Wood, and the convict prisons at a respectful distance—not even an Association devoted to science, literature, and art being allowed inside.

The Devonshire Association, with many other similar Associations in the various counties, is doing a great deal of good work; collecting facts annually with most praiseworthy diligence from which may be sifted valuable materials for history by future historians, when the history of the present day can certainly be made more accurate than the history of past times can be made now.

MODERN CHURCH WINDOWS.

OF all the new, or renewed, arts which the great Gothic revival of fifty years ago called into action, none appeared so likely to prosper as the art of the glass-stainer. Two things mainly contributed to foster this hope. One was the more general recognition on the part of artists of the simpler rules of harmony in colour, a recognition chiefly brought about by the publications of M. Chevreul, and perhaps in a less degree by Mr. Redgrave's Manual of Colour. The other was the great improvement in the methods of the manufacture of coloured glass which took place shortly before the Exhibition of 1851, and enabled artists to calculate on the use of glass, not only of every conceivable hue, but in every size likely to be required. By one of those coincidences which make fact so much stranger than fiction, these two new circumstances were destined to injure the art they might have been expected to nourish. To the former of them we owe the preponderance of dark, heavy, almost opaque blue which prevails in the first windows put up in the revived style. We need only point to such prominent examples as may be seen in Canterbury Cathedral and in Westminster Abbey. To the second—namely, the large pieces of the finest ruby and other previously exiguous colours—we must attribute the loss of that great charm of what Winston called "Mosaic." The mediæval artist could find but little of the best glass. That little was expensive, and, moreover, came to the designer in all kinds of irregular shapes. Wishing, naturally, to use as much and waste as little of these precious fragments as he possibly could, he drew his design according to his glass. With us all this is changed. Any design can now be executed in the best colours. The leading has lost its meaning and principal use; whereas in the fourteenth century it was necessary both to conceal and to accentuate certain points in a design which chiefly depended for its success on the materials available and the artist's skill in using them. Now there is no limit, and the leading, as often as not, is a mere make-believe, and has little or no influence on the ultimate effect.

Three courses were now opened to the artists in stained glass. They could, by breaking up their glass into fragments, and then piecing them together, make something which would look a little like old work. Or they could, by the use of enamelling and other devices of their art, make shaded, coloured, and transparent pictures. Or, lastly, they might accept the situation as it stood, and, using the materials at their disposal, produce large, brilliant, and harmonious designs, in which form and shading would be subservient to colour and light. The second of these methods was only pursued in this country on a large scale at Glasgow Cathedral, where the long row of prophets and saints in the crypt might have had an enormous effect upon the future of glass-painting. We say "might have had," but one element was wanting to that consummation. If some very great artist had come forward, giving his whole mind and attention to the work, making the windows of St. Mungo a gallery of the highest art of which glass is capable, his influence would probably have turned the scale universally in favour of transparencies. But no such genius appeared. The windows vary between the depths of commonplace and the exaggerations of ignorance, although they have one thing in common—a constant and uneasy striving for pictorial success never achieved.

The vast majority of English stained-glass painters followed the first course. They attempted, in an innumerable number of cases, so to imitate the art of the old glaziers that their productions should suit the style of the restored edifices for which they were destined. Leading became an end, and no longer a means. The thin delicate lines were thickened, and in nine cases out of ten the artist did not care to inquire on which side of a church or other building his glass was to go. The most flagrant examples of this which we can call to mind are to be found in Westminster Abbey, where the windows to Stephenson and Locke the engineers, although full of the deepest shades of purple and blue, and absolutely without any relief from white glass, are nevertheless on the north side of the nave, while the equally darkened windows in the west aisle of the north transept are in a place where the sun can never have shone since the building of the Abbey. Examples of this sort have done much to bring the whole art of stained glass into disrepute. The designer in the style of which we are speaking makes no invidious distinctions as to the aspect of the window which he is commissioned to construct. In a small volume, Designs of Stained Glass (A. L. Moore & Co.), we are offered many compositions of this kind; but there is not a word to tell whether the glass is intended for the north, south, west, or east side. The result is in many churches a most unseemly and inconvenient darkness, especially about the chancel, necessitating the constant use of altar lights and the gas corona. It never seems to have struck the modern artist of this kind that even the mediæval stainer, of whose work he attempts to make an ostensible pastiche, remembered above all things that a window was intended to give light, that a window with a southerly aspect might be darker on account of sunshine than one looking north, and that in any case a suitable proportion of white glass, whether translucent or not, must enter into every composition of the kind. But the whole subject of what is so falsely called "restoration" is intimately connected with that of window-making, and the too frequent failure of the modern imitative Gothic artist to recover and renew the motives and aims of the mediæval designer cannot be better illustrated than by a survey of the windows in our restored cathedrals, and particularly in that which is nearest to many of us, Westminster Abbey.

Most visitors who are at all conversant with this art will agree with us that, with few exceptions, all the windows which have been placed in the Abbey during, let us say, the last fifty years, might be broken to pieces without the world having sustained much æsthetic loss. We have only to call attention to the Chaucer window, tame, dull, confused, inharmonious, and, above all, never designed for its place in the eastern wall; or to the deep blue windows in the north aisle with their tubular bridges and irrigation works in a north wall where nothing can elucidate the obscurity of their design; or, worse than all, the glass set up by a well-meaning American in the baptistery, to the memory of Herbert and Cowper, which serves to darken completely the few rays of light which ever penetrated this dark corner. There are many examples almost as bad as these, and against these there is hardly more than one window to set, that in the north aisle of the nave to the memory of Brunel. Here the designer has adopted with confidence the modern conditions. As becomes a north window, light is the chief thing sought for, and, apart altogether from the design, the first impression produced on the mind of the unprejudiced critic is that he has just seen a piece of beautiful jewelry in which gold, diamonds, and pearls were set off by an occasional ruby or sapphire. A closer examination shows that the window is not wholly in accordance with its surroundings. Although it exhibits certain Gothic details in pointed and cusped arches, in pillars and panels, the lead work nowhere interferes with the pictorial effect, each piece of glass employed is as large as was needful, and absolute numerical harmony has been obtained by the most sparing use of the brighter colours. The result is that this window entirely kills those about it, and is conspicuous in the Abbey as the only one that gives light. We cannot help thinking that the artist, with whose name we are unacquainted, might have brought his design a little more within the pale of Gothic feeling, and two or three examples might be adduced to show that this would have been possible. It is an invidious task to criticize, even gently, the one good window in the church; but we remember that similarly brilliant effects, with a much more mediæval tone and one better suited to a Gothic cathedral, have been attained in Christ Church at Oxford, where some delicately harmonious, but hardly shaded, drawings by Mr. Burne Jones have been used in the production of exquisite work in the style of which we are speaking—a style only possible under the altered conditions of glass manufacture to which we have adverted. To these may be added a north window in the Chapel Royal, Savoy, where the transmission of light has been a first object. The design is somewhat ascetic, little or no brilliant colouring being admitted; but the combination of tertiary colours is extremely happy and harmonious. Facing it, on the sunny side of the church, is a somewhat similar window; but here, light being sufficient, the artist has not only put in elaborate canopies and other details, but has also introduced a moderate allowance of primary colours. The best example of this particular style, in which, as we have said, the modern material conditions are utilized rather in a mediæval spirit than in a mediæval manner, may be seen in Street's very remarkable church of St. Mary Magdalene, Paddington. Here it would seem that, contrary to the usual and disastrous practice in vogue among architects and their coadjutors glass-stainers, some attempt has been made to combine the architectural features of the windows with the design of the glazing. The only fault we are disposed to find is that the artist, rendered timid by the monstrosities perpetrated by his neighbours, has been a little too sparing of bright colours.

Here and there, scattered far and wide over the surface of our country, are to be found a few windows of modern workmanship and design which the critic can unreservedly commend. But the pattern-book of Messrs. Moore and other volumes of the kind which have been before us at intervals show, not only what are the dominant faults of the window-glass of the day, but also what are the causes of those faults. Mr. Winston, quoting Punch so early in the movement as 1845, thus parodies the Gothic glass-stainer's advertisement:—"Head from a piece of broken window found under a brick-kiln by the Archæological Institute at Winchester . . . right hand from half a bishop picked up after the fire at York Minster; left ditto from the nineteenth figure (counting from the right) in the oriel window of St. Peter's at Rome . . . drapery from the deal boards in Westminster Abbey." Although this was in the earliest days of the Gothic revival, there is not much change. When, say, a country clergyman is offered a window by a parishioner, he has no choice but to write to one of the firms whose advertisements he has received. The question chiefly to be decided is one of cost. This style so much; that so much more or less, as the case may be. "In order to obtain," say Messrs. Moore, "an exact estimate, it is only requisite to send a rough sketch of the window, giving the sizes of each opening." There is not a word about aspect or about the style of other possible windows or decorations in the building. There are no questions raised such as would come first into the mind of an expert on the subject. We order what will become a very permanent and perpetual picture, painted, at a very considerable price, with less care or discrimination than would be displayed by a party of fox-hunters ordering a portrait of their favourite Whip. The price at per square foot is probably the first and last consideration. We cannot throw all the blame upon the glass-stainers. If the public is content with cut-and-dried designs by artists who have not attempted to grasp any of the problems connected with glass-painting, those who carry them out are fully at liberty to reap the advantage. But the question remains, Why should we spend good money on bad art?

REPORTS FROM THE MOORS.

AMONG the curiosities of literature should be ranked the annual reports from the grouse moors in the newspapers. Patient, indeed, must be the reader who steadily wades through several columns of small print entirely composed of such items of information as the following:—"Glenhaggis. On the 12th, Mr. Lombard, Mr. J. M. Lombard, and Captain Raleigh, of the Hundredth Dragoon Guards, bagged 23½ brace of grouse, 2 snipe, and 1 hare. On the 13th the same party shot 17½ brace of grouse, 1 snipe, and 2 hares. Birds plentiful, but wild. No disease." Moreover, these reports are the less interesting because, elaborate as they appear at first sight, they do not contain any returns whatever from many of the most important shootings. Details are, so to speak, wanting where they are wanted, and superabundant where they are superfluous. We were not particularly interested by reading that a gentleman who only killed 8 brace on the 12th began to shoot punctually at 11 A.M., and ceased to do so precisely at 4 P.M.; that he saw "some good strong broods, but not so many on the ground as usual," and that the birds were very wild; or that another who killed 9½ brace on the 12th was "not out on the 13th," and that the aforesaid 9½ brace were "excellent birds"; or, again, that a sportsman who took his keeper, instead of a friend, to shoot with him, and secured a bag of 12 brace to the two guns, "will not shoot" a certain hill "till 20th." The reader begins to wish for any relief from the horrible monotony—that he could find a statement that somebody had shot a friend's favourite setter, or even "peppered" his host; that Mr. Black never hit a feather on the 12th, or that Mr. White was overcome by the heat and the whisky. The reports would be less tedious if we were even told how many cartridges each party fired off in obtaining their given number of birds. It is true that now and then we meet with a little mild variety. By contrast, it was quite an excitement to come upon the words "(Eton boy)" after one name among some shooters on the 12th, and we wept when we read that on the 13th he was "not out." After countless entries of the usual humdrum style it is almost startling to read—"after 2 P.M. it became dark and stormy, and the birds, which sat fairly in the morning, became exceedingly wild," and righteous indignation may be aroused by the fact that "on the 12th, 13th, and 14th"—three whole days' shooting—Mr. Something, of Something, "and party (two guns) killed 9 brace of grouse," and nine only, because "the birds were very scarce and wild, owing to driving on the neighbouring ground." Who can picture to his mind the shame and remorse of the wicked owner or lessee of "the neighbouring ground" on seeing his evil deeds, "in prunt, mon," or the first meeting between the two neighbours after the announcement had appeared? About the most interesting piece of information in the whole return is that on a certain moor "the dogs shot over were one pointer and one colley." A Highland "shootist" requires five lines to record the fact that he and two friends bagged 9½ brace of grouse on the 12th; but he is beaten by one who takes six lines to state that two guns on the same day killed no less than 7½ brace of grouse. There is moral courage in the two gentlemen who report (or possibly some one else may have reported for them) that their joint bag consisted of 3 brace of grouse. One of the briefest of all the returns is required to announce that on the 12th "about 800 brace were bagged" by Lord Ripon's party. Very wise are the makers of moderate bags who confine themselves to reporting that they had "good sport," that they are "entertaining a large party," or that they can send "favourable returns." That "capital bags were obtained" is all we are told as to the quantity of grouse which were killed on a moor than which "few are better preserved," lying within easy reach of a large manufacturing town. We should like to know the exact number in this instance; because, "besides the gunners, there was also a considerable number of on-lookers." "There were also many carriages, breaks, gigs, &c., with smartly-attired occupants, some of them ladies." Details are wanting, again, as to the bags which have been made on "a certain moor in Yorkshire," which the Field hears "has been leased to a person who nets the grouse instead of shooting them." Accurate returns would also be welcome of the number of partridges which have already been shot, more or less accidentally, by grouse-shooters. We will guarantee that the quantity would prove to be, according to the stock phrase, "far larger than is generally supposed," in spite of the fact that the First of September is not yet.

To write with a seriousness more befitting the occasion, we may observe that there has been unquestionably a great deal of disease among the grouse in Scotland this year, and that, upon the whole, both public and private accounts show the season in the North to be a disappointing one, although excellent bags have been made in some districts. In Yorkshire, on the contrary, larger bags have been made than usual; and some very good ones, too, have been reported from Lancashire. Many of the Derbyshire moors were not shot over during the first week of the season; but the returns already sent in from that county have been, as a rule, unsatisfactory. In a vague sort of way, reports come from Wales of "heavy bags"; but we have reason for knowing that these are far from being universal in that principality. From all quarters of this island where grouse are found the news is received that the birds are very wild, and that in most cases they were so even on the 12th; yet on a large proportion of shootings there were a good many broods of little weakly grouse, too evidently the results of late second hatches, and either very early or very late birds have been the rule rather than the exception.

THE HARVEST.

JULY and August have, for the second time in succession, disappointed the hopes of wheat-growers. The seed-time and spring were highly favourable, May and June were all that the farmer could wish for, and at the beginning of July the year promised to be, taken altogether, the best that agriculturists have had in England for a long time past. But as July went on the hopes of farmers began to decline. Heavy rains and high winds lodged the growing corn in many localities, the low temperature checked ripening, and there were reports of the appearance of mildew here and there. August, so far, has not improved upon July, and now, we fear, it must be concluded that the wheat harvest, at any rate, will be far worse than it promised to be five or six weeks ago, and, even if up to the average in quantity, will be poor as regards quality and condition. The lodged corn has in many cases sprouted, and in other places it has not ripened. The high winds in exposed positions have scattered very much of the grain, and the frequent showers have not only delayed cutting, but have often prevented the farmer from gathering in the crop. In consequence the grain is in many instances too soft for milling purposes. The reports which, as usual, have been collected by the agricultural papers and the Times from all parts of the country were made either at the end of July or early in the present month. They are, therefore, we fear, too favourable, since additional damage has been done by the weather of the present month. It will be well, therefore, to deduct something from the estimates founded upon them. They agree more closely than usual that the crop, taken as a whole, is above the average in quantity, the most general estimate being that it will yield nearly thirty bushels to the acre. But more recent information seems to prove that this estimate is too high. It is admitted, indeed, even in the reports to which we are referring, that the crop is a very variable one, good in some places and bad in others. It is admitted, too, that the differences are not confined to localities, but that fields lying quite close to one another often vary greatly in yield, and even the same field sometimes presents remarkable differences. Then, again, the want of hot ripening weather, except for two or three days, throughout the whole of this month has made itself felt, and the area of lodged and twisted corn has been extended. Bearing all this in mind, there appears to be little doubt that the estimate of a yield of thirty bushels to the acre is too high. Further, it appears from the summary of the agricultural returns issued on Monday that the area under wheat is 114,648 acres less than last year, or 4·5 per cent. We must, therefore, deduct from the estimates hitherto published, not only because of the continued bad weather throughout August, but because of the unexpected decrease in the acreage. These estimates were that the total yield would be somewhat between 9½ and 10 millions of quarters. Now the probability appears to be that it will be under 9½ millions of quarters, and possibly considerably under. Assuming that it is as much as 9½ millions of quarters, we have to allow a million of quarters for seed and stock-feeding on farms, leaving only 8½ millions of quarters, or probably less, for the home consumption of the people. The accepted estimate is, that in the new agricultural year beginning with September the total home consumption will be about 26½ millions of quarters. Consequently, we shall probably need to import from abroad about 18 millions of quarters. In quantity this year's production is larger than last year's, and in quality it is also better. But it is to be borne in mind that a large proportion will not be garnered in good condition, and much of it, it is to be feared, will be too soft for early milling. A long spell of hot weather would, no doubt, dry and harden it. Without such weather a large admixture of foreign grain will be necessary. In any case it seems probable that much of the wheat cannot be prepared for market for some time to come, and therefore our farmers will not be able largely to forestall the foreign supply.

The oat crop was saved by the rains of July. And if the weather soon improves, it will turn out to be a full average. But the barley crop, which suffered from the June drought, like oats, and the heavier fields of which were badly laid by the July rains, is decidedly under an average. And in quality, too, it is bad, little, it is to be feared, being fit for malting. Peas and beans are likewise under the average, and potatoes, though abundant in quantity, are suffering from disease. If the rains continue, the disease is likely to spread very seriously, and in any case the quality has deteriorated. On the other hand, the root crops are luxuriant, and the hay crop in England this year is universally reported to be the finest ever remembered. In Scotland and Ireland, too, it was above the average. The second growths of clover and grass are said to be nearly as extraordinary as the first, and are now nearly ready for cutting. Lastly, the hop crop is abundant in quantity, but its character will greatly depend upon the weather. If we get a long spell of bright sunshine the crop will be good; if not it will be mouldy. Upon the whole, then, the present year is likely to prove a not unfavourable one for our farmers. Cattle-farming is a much larger and more important industry than corn-growing, and cattle-farmers have fared well. They have gathered in a splendid hay crop, and they have the promise of an exceedingly good second crop. Besides, all the root crops are good; and, therefore, they will have abundant feeding for their cattle. Even corn-growers are very much better off than they were twelve months ago. Oats and potatoes are decidedly better than last year, beans are about the same, wheat is very much better, and barley and peas alone are reported to be worse than in 1888. These statements refer mainly, no doubt, to the yield; but the quality of all the grains is likewise better than last year, for it will be recollected that the rains came earlier last year than this year, and that the fall was much heavier in July. Corn of all kinds, therefore, was laid earlier, and more of it sprouted or failed to ripen, while the quality of all was more seriously injured. Last year, of course, was an exceedingly bad one. It is cold comfort, therefore, to the farmers to tell them that this is a better season. It is somewhat more to the point to say that, taking all the crops together, it is, according to the various reports that have been laid before the public up to the present, better than either 1886 or 1887, and is probably as good as 1885. Even the wheat crop appears to have been exceeded in mere quantity only twice in the past nine years, while the hay crop has not been equalled for many years past, and the other crops, speaking generally, are quite up to the average of the past nine or ten years. But, as regards corn, potatoes, and hops, we must add that much even yet depends upon the weather. If there is not a speedy change for the better the damage done to the corn crops not yet cut or lying upon the ground will be increased, and the condition even of much that has been gathered in will deteriorate, as drying will not take place. Disease, too, will spread amongst potatoes, and so will mould in the hop plantations.

Taken altogether, the year promises to improve the position of our farmers. Cattle-farmers, in particular, may be congratulated. They have secured a magnificent hay crop, and they have the promise of a good second crop, and of abundant root crops and grass. They can reckon with reasonable certainty, then, upon having cheap and abundant food for their cattle throughout the winter. This of itself is favourable to higher prices. When feeding is scarce and dear many farmers are obliged to sell, and forced sales always cause lower prices. There need be no forced sales on account of the dearness of keep this year; and, therefore, the improvement in trade ought to lead to higher prices. The working classes have ample employment throughout the country, wages have already risen very generally, and are still tending upwards, and, consequently, the consumption of meat ought to increase. And the same applies to butter, cheese, milk, and the like. Cattle-farming, then, in all its varieties, ought to be profitable during the coming autumn and winter. Even corn-growers are better off than they were twelve months ago. Only two of the crops, as pointed out above, are worse than they were last year; and neither is very much worse, while some other crops are decidedly better—particularly there is a great increase in the yield of wheat compared with twelve months ago. The profitableness of tillage-farming, however, depends quite as much upon the condition as upon the quantity. For instance, while foreign wheat was decidedly dearer during the past twelve months than in the preceding twelve months, home-grown wheat was cheaper; and this was because the quality and condition of English wheat last year were exceedingly bad. So much of the grain was unfit for milling without a large admixture of foreign wheat, that millers were unwilling to buy except at very low prices. The quality this year appears to be decidedly better than it was last year, but respecting the condition it is too early to speak yet. Some samples that have been offered in the provincial markets were soft and unfit for milling, but others are spoken of very highly. Were the weather to improve immediately now, it is probable that the condition would be found to be very much better than twelve months ago; but a continuance of bad weather would make the condition worse and worse, and would very seriously injure the portion of the crops not yet cut, and also that still in the fields. Corn-growing, however, does not hold the place it once did, and the disappointment of the corn-growers is more than balanced by the abundance of the root crops that are promised.

HYACINTHS AND DAFFODILS.

THE Journal of the Royal Horticultural Society just issued contains three little articles upon the hyacinth, and as many upon the daffodil, which are very seasonable just now. Annuals are giving out earlier than usual this year, the bulb-sales have begun, and thousands of worthy people are debating—rather helplessly, for the most part—what varieties they shall buy. Information on that point, and on every other connected with the subject, will be found in this little book—history, culture, choice of bulbs, and so forth. Messrs. A. E. Baarnart and J. H. Kersten tell how they grow hyacinths in Holland; Mr. James Douglas, F.R.H.S., regards them “from an English point of view”; while Mr. J. G. Baker, F.R.S., F.L.S., of Kew, lays down the law with authority. Mr. F. W. Burbidge, M.A., F.L.S., M.R.I.A., treats of the narcissus; the Rev. G. H. Engleheart, M.A., F.R.H.S., of seedling daffodils; Mr. Alfred W. Tait, F.L.S., offers some observations on Portuguese narcissi; and the Rev. W. Wilks, Secretary R.H.S., gives his most valuable experience upon the kinds best adapted for general use.

It is commonly understood that the garden hyacinth was brought to Europe by æsthetic Crusaders. We are not compelled to disbelieve this pleasing legend, but there is no evidence. The very earliest mention of the bulb that has been discovered as yet occurs in the Kreuterbuch of Matthiolus, published 1563—the first mention, that is, which may be called specific. Every schoolboy knows that Greek and Roman poets constantly refer to Hyacinthus; but the profoundest scholar does not know what they mean. Probably, after the fashion of poets, they did not mean anything in particular. M. Fée went into the question thoroughly, and he concludes that Virgil, at least, referred to Lilium Martagon, our common “Turk’s Head Lily.” In the herbals of the middle ages, also, Hyacinthus figures, but they certainly include under that heading Muscari and Scilla—three genera and twenty species, at least. Matthiolus states that he received his bulbs from Jacobo Antonio Cortuso, of Padua, and that they came originally from Oriental lands. The plant seems to have found favour in Holland from the first; for in 1576 Matthias de Lobel mentions that six varieties were known, the best, Hyacinthus brumalis, “which, later on, got the name of H. orientalis albus.” This, as many believe, was our “Roman hyacinth,” which certainly has no connexion with Rome; but Mr. Baker feels assured that the latter is derived from one of five sub-species that grow wild in Provence. If so, the famous Hyacinthus brumalis cannot be identified with the Roman hyacinth, since it flowered in December, which no European species could, in Holland. The culture spread fast. In 1612 Swertius engraved six forms, distinct from those of H. brumalis, and we learn that there were many others. Mr. Kersten says that a white variety was raised from seed in 1582, but he does not name his authority. Doubtless both white and red would appear in the course of nature as soon as the bulbs were cultivated freely. There is no record of the introduction of the yellow varieties; we only know from a catalogue of 1767 that there were five single strains of that colour at the date, which had increased to thirty-eight single and eight double by 1788. But the first appearance of lilac has its little story. The Rev. Mr. Bockenhoven found one among a lot of the common red variety, and, recognizing the value of his prize, hung it from the ceiling in a birdcage, out of danger. He raised seedlings from it, and this strain is still one of our best, under the title of L’Unique. Dutch fanciers were long prejudiced against the double flower. Peter Voorhelm, an historic name among florists, always used to nip off the buds of such before they quite opened, until one day he came across a spike which had been overlooked—and was converted on the spot. This happened at the beginning of the last century, and he named his first good seedling Mary, his third, King of Great Britain. The latter sold for 100*l.* per bulb; but there are bigger prices on record; 200*l.* is the largest. In 1734 one large bulb and eight small ones of the Neplusultra, double blue, fetched 133*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* So late as the beginning of this century M. de Faesch paid 83*l.* for a single Rouge éblouissante. England was not “out of it” in the earliest times. Gerard figures the Oriental hyacinth in his History of Plants; but it is a wretched little thing, with only three flowers on the spike. He was acquainted also with a double-blue, and he mentions that “there is come unto us from beyond the seas divers other sorts whose figures are not extant with us.” In fact, Miller ventured to declare that the H. brumalis, already referred to, was derived from H. anglicus; and Peter Hondius remarked, casually, in 1621, that the best varieties came from the East, being far finer than those imported from England; but, of course, the latter also were Oriental. In those early days, however, our forefathers kept pace with the Dutch. Parkinson described eight varieties—white, blue, and red—in 1629, each containing half a dozen sub-titles.

We have not much to learn from the culture of hyacinths in Holland—that is to say, the secrets of value are all known. Neither skill nor care, nor any expense which a responsible being would incur, can make up for the advantages which the Dutch possess. Heer Baarnart says, with pleasant patronage:—“I do not deny, however, that they can be very well cultivated in England.” Heer Kersten:—“The Dutch people do not fear competition in the cultivation of hyacinths, so sure are they of the many privileges which nature has given them in dealing with this particular industry.” Mr. Douglas admits that it may be thought “unpatriotic” to say so, yet he has had English bulbs sent to him for trial against those from Holland, "and the result, so far, has been to convince me that the Dutch-grown bulbs are much superior." Half the earth, at least, there is pure white sand, "so light that whole gardens would be blown away if precautions were not taken to prevent it." All we can do is to choose a deep soil, manure it well, and add sand; also, when planting, lay a little clean river sand under and over each bulb. But in the matter of forcing hyacinths it is admitted that "English nurserymen can very well give a lesson to the Dutch." The system of the latter is quite different, indeed, because a quite different result is sought. They like to see the bloom as dwarfish as it can be grown—that is, close to the pot, which seems a very odd taste to us. There are, at present, about five hundred and seventy acres under cultivation of hyacinths in Holland, which find employment for five thousand men, at least. The flowers used to be thrown away. But during a short time, as everybody noticed, the English markets were swamped with cut bloom. This novelty proved so disastrous to the bulb trade, that it was soon dropped. At length, however, chemists have discovered means to extract the perfume of hyacinths, and the flowers have recovered their value.

The daffodil gives no opportunity for historical excursions, unless we have courage to flounder among the classic poets in general. Many foreign species have been introduced of late, but the bulk of those innumerable varieties which fill page after page of the catalogues are lineal descendants of our own wild species, regenerated by careful gardeners. For this very reason, however, the daffodil, and its twin sister the narcissus, lend themselves especially to inquiries most interesting and important for science. Such an enthusiastic authority as Mr. Burbidge is prepared to trace them up and up to the extinct flower from which "Sternbergia, as Sternbergia, sprang, or to a very similar type." That they were green originally is not to be disputed; a richer soil has turned them yellow; by cultivation we have already induced orange; and red will follow, doubtless. A scarlet daffodil is confidently expected, one day, by Professor Max Leichtlin. The first person on record who made efforts to improve these flowers was Tradescant the elder. His "great Rose" daffodil may have been a sport, as was certainly the double form named after "Mr. Gerard," which that gentleman found in the garden of a cottage tenanted, once on a time, by "a cunning man." But Tradescant raised a double flower from seeds of the "Great Spanish Daffodil" in 1618. Vincent Sion, a Fleming, and "a worthy lover of faire flowers," as Parkinson says, introduced the fine variety which we now call Telamonius plenus. This was in 1620. John Evelyn loved daffodils. He recommended the practice of raising them from seed, because they often produce varieties. It is not to be denied, however, that these charming plants have but short and simple annals. Upon the other hand, there are such a multitude at this day that the amateur is apt to "flounder hopelessly," as the Rev. Mr. Wilks says, amidst the chaos of names. To such unfortunates he, Mr. Burbidge, and the Rev. G. H. Engleheart offer invaluable suggestions.

REVIEWS.

THE PLANTATION NEGRO AS A FREEMAN.*

THE United States have of late years been very naturally so busy in looking back on the remarkable prosperity of their past that little attention has been called to the dangers and difficulties which may be in wait for them in the future. Indeed, their position looks naturally so strong, they are so far away from any possible formidable enemy, and they have been so fortunate in the character of the internal dangers they have had to face, that their feeling of security is intelligible enough. The spectacle of this rather complacent prosperity is perhaps calculated to sharpen the desire of foreigners to point out those perils which Americans appear to underrate. As a matter of fact, however, America has little or no cause to complain of unfriendly foreign criticism. Its dangers, to judge from the little comment made on them, are even less obvious to the outsider than to the native observer. Observed or neglected, however, they are there. The labour question, the strain which will come as the territory fills up, the impossibility—for it will not be much less—of conducting the administrative affairs of a great nation on the haphazard method which has been good enough hitherto, the inevitable struggle with the lawless spirit which prevails in all the States, except a few of the older ones, are all problems which in turn or together press for settlement. More serious, and in all probability more immediate, than any of these will be the danger caused by the presence within the States of foreign nationalities which refuse to assimilate and persist in using the forms of the American Constitution for their own ends. The Irish in the North and the negroes in the South will assuredly compel the Union to deal with them some day.

Under the title of The Plantation Negro as a Freeman, Mr. Philip A. Bruce has written a treatise on the "Nigger Question" of the future. It is contributed to one of those series which seem to be as popular across the Atlantic as here, and it is really a solid piece of work. We think it well worthy of the attention both of those who are inclined to take the usual rose-coloured view of the prospects of the future of the United States, and to those humanitarians who believed, and, as they are beyond the reach of instruction by argument or fact, doubtless still believe, that the emancipation of the negro and his enfranchisement were all that were required to make him as useful a member of the body politic as the white citizen. Mr. Bruce, who writes from Richmond in Virginia, is plainly no admirer or advocate of slavery. He expressly says that his memory does not go back to the times before the war, and he speaks of the injustice of the peculiar institution like a man who has no wish to see it restored. In that respect he shares the view of the vast mass of Southerners. But Mr. Bruce has had the facts before him, and has the very necessary capacity for looking them in the face. He deals with the future of the free black in the South and his influence on the South itself with the thoroughness of a man whose view is not distorted by fanaticism of any kind, whether on the "lost cause" side or the humanitarian. He has the by no means common faculty of seeing that here are certain facts and of looking steadily at what they mean, unblinded by theories as to what they should mean or preferences for a particular meaning. His book would, we think, inspire confidence in any reader endowed with the critical faculty which can judge of the value of work from internal evidence. But it does not stand alone. It is supported by all that has been observed of the negro in a state of freedom elsewhere by competent observers. To put the results reached by Mr. Bruce in a nutshell, he has been led by his experience to much the convictions reached by Sir Spencer St. John after prolonged observation of the free blacks of Hayti. He does not put it in so many words, but it is manifestly his opinion that the freed negroes are steadily returning to a condition of barbarism. Of course the process is not so rapid as it has been in Hayti, and there is reason to believe that it will never be so complete; but it is going on none the less. Mr. Bruce sees the good qualities of the negro—his cheerfulness, his surface amiability, his obedience to a resolutely exercised authority, his kindness to the sick, his faculty for loyalty to a master who is at once just and considerate. These virtues are as obvious to Mr. Bruce, and, indeed, to all Southerners, as they are to any observer of the negro. But, like other witnesses who are not blinded by a preconceived notion, he sees the limitations of the black, which may be summed up in the phrase, incapacity to accept civilization. There is a fundamental ferocity in the negro, an immovable childishness, an incapacity to look before or after, which make him a hopeless pupil. He will not become a civilized being simply because he cannot. To take Mr. Herbert Spencer's illustration, he is a four-fingered glove, and the five-fingered hand will not go into him. It is precisely what any man who can look sanely at facts would expect to hear, though it must be rather shocking to some enthusiasts that the negroes born in freedom are distinctly inferior to those born in slavery. Servitude may have been an unjust discipline, and its faults may easily be pointed out. Still, it was a discipline. It enforced some regard for order, some coherence of conduct, and those trained by it are capable of an amount of regularity and an approach to sustained effort which it is idle to expect from the free-born. These are becoming savages, pure and simple, capable of work only under the pressure of necessity and by fits or starts. Their knowledge, gained in the schools, is mere words. Their religion is utterly without influence on conduct. It is purely emotional, a mere matter of dancing, howling, and nervous excitement, which is as directly produced by stimulants as any other form of intoxication, and is just as little likely to make men honest or women chaste. Indeed the unchastity of the negro women is enormous, and is not regarded as disgraceful by their own people. The young have taken to aimless wandering, and the whole race is standing aloof from the whites. The mulattos are being absorbed into the blacks, and as the pure colour gains ground so the old African character reappears—the character of a people who have no conception of any community except the herd; no regard for the fundamental moral virtues of civilized societies; no religion unless a profound belief in "trick doctors" and a tendency to hysterical yelling deserve the name—in short, all the combination of qualities and defects which have made the negro during the thousands of years in which he has been known, not only incapable of producing a civilization himself, but of standing to the civilization of others on any footing but that of enemy or drudge.

It would be futile to make of this incapacity an excuse for regarding the negro with hatred. He is what nature and history have made him; but what is to be thought of the wisdom of those who removed the restraints which kept him in control? and what must be the inevitable result of this formation in the very flesh of the union of a pure African barbarism? Thirty years ago those who pointed out the abuses of slavery—very obvious and often shocking they were, as none save those who cannot realize the folly of overstating their case will deny—had an easy game to play. When they were told that the alternatives were a modified slavery controlled by the State, which would be as difficult to work as double proprietorships usually are, or the formation of just such a barbarism as is forming to-day, they answered with certain well-known phrases about the ennobling influences of freedom and the elevating effect of responsibility. The facts have given a sufficient refutation of these fine words.

* The Plantation Negro as a Freeman: Observations on his Character, Condition, and Prospects in Virginia. By Philip A. Bruce. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons. 1889.

The black does not want to be ennobled. His idea of freedom is the liberty to revert to the condition of his African forefathers. As for the elevating influence of responsibility, in the use of a vote, for instance, it has been nil. Till the Democratic success in 1884 took place without menacing his freedom he voted for any scamp who called himself a Republican. Now that he feels no longer in danger he is ceasing to care to vote at all, and is, therefore, losing his last connexion with the civilization of the white race amid which he lives. The result of this separation of the races and the return of one of them to a barbarous ancestral type must be in the long run terrible for the weaker. With the abolition of slavery the necessary bond of union between master and slave was severed. The white now endures the black as a necessary evil, but with a very keen feeling that he is an evil and a burden. As the savagery of the coloured freemen increases the distrust of the white will grow too. Mr. Bruce throws terrible light on the relations of the two in a calmly-worded passage dealing with the negro's growing proneness to the crime of rape on white women. "This proneness of the negro," he says, "is so well understood that the white women of every class, from the highest to the lowest, are afraid to venture to any distance alone, or even to wander unprotected in the immediate vicinity of their homes, their appreciation of the danger being as keen, and their apprehension of corporal injury as vivid, as if the country were in arms." Already the whites defend the honour of their women by a Lynch law of dreadful stringency. Of all possible causes of race-hatred none is more effective than this. It must harden the whites into the frame of mind in which a stronger race massacres a weaker one off the face of the earth. As it becomes clearer that the black will not be a useful servant, and must be the essentially barbarous enemy of the civilized race before him, it will be borne in on the superior people that they must end the strain. Unless all human experience is at fault, a collision is inevitable. When it comes the struggle between organization, intelligence, and a valour which is not merely spasmodic or emotional, and mere number can have but one end. The pedants who, relying on phrases and the fatuous belief that "free institutions" are a cause, and not an effect, will have sent the black to slaughter. This, we gather, is Mr. Bruce's conviction at the bottom of his heart. He has no remedy to offer except better education, though he sees that all "education" of the common type has run off the negro without leaving a trace. It is his openly-expressed opinion that the plantation negro is a greater danger than any which threaten the societies of the Old World, and few who can look at facts will differ from him.

NOVELS.*

IT is a sad reflection that not one of the five books before us contains the slightest trace of humour, which even more than mercy blesses "him that gives and him that takes." Moreover, three out of the five would have been left unwritten had their authors possessed the tiniest atom of this greatest of gifts, and the critic would have been spared the unwelcome task of pointing out their shortcomings. But, to use the language of melodrama, it was not to be. Miss Atkinson, however, does not come under this censure. Her story, for the most part, deals with a kind of life from which humour is confessedly absent, and where pathos hardly claims a more conspicuous place—the life of the hard-working, well-to-do, lower-middle classes, in which work and money usurp a position they were never intended to fill, and gradually become the gods of men and women's lives. Peter Holgate, buttermilk, of Liverpool, was in this dreary condition when a little girl of thirteen appeared late one night in his shop, bearing a letter from her dying mother requesting Peter to forget the fact that she had jilted him, and to keep her friendless child. The struggle between old Peter's parsimony and the memory of the one soft spot in his life is indicated both truly and amusingly. The reader is shown his gradual awakening to a more gracious state than the one which he started from, when he thought that a girl could manage with one potato as vegetable to her meat, whereas for a full-grown man an extra half might be necessary, to the moment that he sends Peggy to school to be "made a lady of." Fortunately nature and paternal descent had done much for her in this respect, and seclusion with the two old people did yet more; so that Peggy is not so unfitted as many girls would have been to become the mistress of the country house which old Peter has bought as a place of retirement when business has ceased to charm, not knowing that death would forbid him to enter it. Peggy altogether is a singularly human and attractive young person, with faults and virtues very much what would naturally arise from her bringing up. Loyal and grateful to old Peter and his sister, constant to her friend and political teacher, the Radical and Socialist greengrocer, Thomas

Greenwood, she has yet the sense not to mistake gratitude for love, and declines repeatedly to marry him. When, at the age of twenty-one, after her so-called uncle's death, she finds herself his heiress and ruling at Lyonwood, she proceeds to put Thomas's teaching into practice, to the fury of the county (at first disposed to take her up), and to the despair of her sympathetic but more practical land agent. She pets the poachers, shoots the foxes (or wishes to shoot them), destroys the covers, declines to preserve, and crowns her misdeeds by championing her old friend Thomas as a candidate against the brother of the local duke. Experience and the land agent do something for her, and when we take leave of Peggy she is turning her attention to less unpopular forms of philanthropy in the shape of convalescent homes and delicate girls under her own roof. Of course she marries the land-agent, John Lyon, son of the late owner of Lyonwood, and supposed by himself and his two brothers to be illegitimate. Equally of course he turns out, on the death of the baronet, to be nothing of the sort, although, by an improbable series of events, he is kept in ignorance of the fact for eighteen months by his next brother Gerald. This man, John Lyon, is a far less successful portrait than any of the rest. He is a prig, adding the colonial elements of priggishness induced by a long residence in Australia to those of the English variety. His lazy, unscrupulous brother Gerald, and Gerald's pretty, shallow wife, are infinitely more real; and so are the poor, long-descended, narrow-minded Goodwin family. The Greenwoods, too, are excellent specimens of their class; and there is an admirable scene in which the Duchess and Mrs. Goodwin go to call on Peggy while the female Greenwoods are visiting her. The Duchess is amused, Mrs. Goodwin (who is scheming to marry the heiress and her son) is annoyed, Mrs. Greenwood is proud and delighted, while her daughter thinks it the right thing to turn up her nose at the two ladies. Only Peggy takes the situation as a matter of course, and is quite at her ease. She is always unself-conscious, and ready to laugh at her own mistakes. It must be conceded that, considering all things, her solecisms are few; but perhaps Miss Atkinson intended "Leave go of my hand" to be one of the unavoidable reminiscences of her past life. Miss Atkinson's name is unknown to the public, but she has talent and simplicity, and a good style, and will probably go on and prosper; only we hope she will pause and reflect before she allows herself to be led away by the will o' the wisp of Socialism.

Novels with the scene laid in Italy are not usually found to contain very interesting matter, but Mrs. Woollaston White's Romance of Posilipo is better than its title would seem to warrant. To begin with, she knows well the life of the Bay of Naples and its surrounding towns; and her French and Italian scraps of conversation are invariably correct. This is a virtue that looms large in the eyes of the critic. Then her heroine, Christabel, is pleasant and plausible, and a lady, and her hero not more melodramatic than, perhaps, an Italian has a right to be. There are some pretty pictures of Italian life, especially among the peasantry and fisher-folk, whose existence looks so easy and graceful from the outside. The Contessa Marinetta and her son Basile are of rather a conventional type, and the reader cannot work himself into much interest as to their doings and misdeeds; but Marta, the fisher-girl, friend and swimming mistress of Christabel Burgoyne, Lello, her old duenna, and the coral-workers of the back quarters of Naples, are all drawn by one who has known and loved them.

Tales of a Tennis Party is such an astounding production that it is difficult to know where criticism should begin. However, it may be as well to mention that the title bears as little reference to the "Tales" as they for the most part do to the understanding. So far as there is any meaning in it at all, it is not Tales about a Tennis Party, but tales told by a set of people in a country house, who may occasionally amuse themselves by playing tennis. It is obvious that no one could be expected to know all that was implied by these five words. The tales themselves are of all kinds, and have only one characteristic in common—that it is usually difficult to gather what the narrator is driving at. Some are related in rhyme, some in blank verse. There is one prelude and many interludes, and every one is allowed to say his say:—

There are leaders here—

Our generous host; the great philosopher;
The gallant Colonel, noble as he's brave;
The traveller—he should know—and all the rest, including

The girls in graceful robes,
Less graceful laced in steel to decorous sloth!

Who can parse and explain this last remark? It would beat even a Hindu or Japanese graduate of an English University. The stories are varied in subject. There is the "Colonels," which tells of the death of Gordon—a subject that is better left untouched unless it can be adequately dealt with. The "Poet's," a remarkably brief and weak little tale of a labourer who leaves his wife and goes with his child to live with another woman; the child is ill, the woman nurses him, the man brings the child back, and the mother forgives him—these not very exciting incidents are told in the baldest language, and the reader wonders at tant de fracas pour une omelette. Then there is the "Queen's Tale," which is no tale at all, and the "Traveller's," which appears to be an attempt to tell the story of a picture exhibited in the Academy a few years ago; and, above all, there

* The Web of Life. By Blanche Atkinson. London: George Allen. 1889.

A Romance of Posilipo. By Mrs. T. Woollaston White. London: Eglinton & Co.

Tales of a Tennis Party. By Blanche Dash. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.

Skill Wins Favour. By Mrs. George Elliott Kent. London: Roper & Drowley.

Minnie Hartford. By Mrs. von Kranichfeld-Gardner. London: Trübner & Co.

is the "Host's Tale." This gentleman seems to have taken an ungenerous advantage of his position, and his story occupies more than a third of the whole book. He is evidently unused to the narrative form, and his tale—one of the Arthurian legends—is told in such a confused manner that it is often quite impossible to discover who are the combatants engaged in a particular fight, or why they have apparently changed sides. He is fond of the word "sheery," too, which is one not in common use; "sheery rocks," "sheery the mountain rose." "Utter" is as much in request as in the letterpress to Mr. Dumauiet's pictures; "sooths" is employed as the diminutive for "soothsayers," with rather a curious effect. None of the tales would be easy to read out loud, for the metre is apt to be halting and the style flat. Take, for instance, these lines, chosen at random from p. 142:—

'Sdeath! with a boy; and in Diana's shrine!
He paused—"O schemer! what is thy design?"
'Tis false." And with swift hope he seized that thought.

And these from the page following:—

The gods mock me.
O great high-priest! the green and branching tree,
The new shrine oped, the dream, the augury;
Oh, well, well told, O fool! O mockery!

With these incoherent ejaculations we end our notice.

"Flat, stale, and unprofitable" is the quotation naturally suggested by Mrs. Kent's novel Skill Wins Favour. It is deadly commonplace throughout and though there is not a word of harm in it from the first page to the last, yet if "unprofitable" means all that does not tend to profit, the adjective is amply justified. There is a great deal of scheming and plotting, and one gentleman is so weak as to deny his wife and her son to be legitimate, though he is devotedly attached to both of them, because his sister bullies him when he is dying. The characters bear very elegant names; there are three Damian d'Avonmores, and one Damienne, besides a lady called Isadoré Zerlené. All the Damians, male and female, came in with William the Conqueror—a fact that the very retentive memory of the villagers could neither forget nor forgive. Their language is suitable to their lineage. They say "Blame me not" and "Peace, girl!" "Believe me or not as you list," and call a church a "sacred edifice." The chief offender in this way is the young Miss Damienne, who says to her mother "Ask the drooping floweret what the dew and rain are worth; the prisoner immured in a loathsome cell, what liberty is worth; the criminal doomed to an ignominious death, what life and honour are worth; and, if they all answer 'Nought,' then would I say that my Paul's love is worthless to me." Mrs. Kent has not looked closely enough to her dates, and gets confused in her explanation as to the births of Paul (the third Damian) and Damienne. The whole book is dull, and the title is without a meaning; for it was not as an artist that the hero won the heroine's hand, but as the first young man she had ever met.

Minnie Hartford is irreproachable as to morals, but not interesting in any other way. In England young people do not become engaged after one day's acquaintance, nor is it usual for well-to-do lawyers to resign their position for that of master of a workhouse. It seems a pity that any one should take up time in writing stories so wholly without value.

ENGLISHMEN IN THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.*

NOT a single English book on the Revolution tells us who represented our own country in Cloots's deputation of the Human Race," complains Mr. Alger. As we are not sure that we have read all the English books on the Revolution (we have read a great many), we can neither confirm nor contradict him. Nor are we absolutely prepared to say that we care very greatly who was the particular British tomfool in this particular piece of tomfoolery. But these remarks are made in no spirit of depreciation. Mr. Alger's book, as was almost unavoidable, is desultory to the very last degree; and, though he tries to give it some book-unity by headings such as "Enthusiasts," "Outlaws," "The Guillotined," and so on, these are but cross-divisions at the best, and the book might almost as well, for purposes of reading, and much better for purposes of reference, have been arranged as a dictionary. But we are very glad to welcome it. The author is one of those persons to whom it appears to be a labour of love to get up all that is to be known about a particular subject, however destitute of philosophical unity that subject may be. Their work is constantly valuable to the writer, and by no means always uninteresting to the reader. Mr. Alger's work, in particular, is decidedly interesting, and, in great part, will be more or less novel to most people. Certain persons of English birth or nationality who had to do with the Revolution are, indeed, well enough known after a fashion, though even in respect to them Mr. Alger has been able to fill in, correct, and check the popular notions. He will not let us believe the picturesque legend of Tom Paine—drunken Tom, dirty Tom, deistical Tom, to whose credit it shall nevertheless be set that he was fond of playing at marbles, and voted stoutly against the execution of Louis XVI., to the no small peril of his own life—the legend which tells how Thomas escaped the guillotine by the accident of the door on which was the fatal mark being doubled back. But Tom Paine all men know, and Dr. Moore, and Arthur Young, and Helen Maria Williams, and Mary Wollstonecraft, and (later) Sydney Smith, with that victim of nearly the foulest of even Napoleon's crimes, Captain Wright. The heroic Nesham, or Needham, too, whose descendant so agreeably assured Mr. Carlyle that the sword was not rusted, has been made famous, not, it seems, with absolute correctness, by Mr. Carlyle himself. But there are many others, from the Bastille time to the peace of 1815, who are practically unknown, and of these Mr. Alger gives some curious details. There was Lord Massarene, whom the rioters freed from La Force after he had been imprisoned (for some kind of discreditable pecuniary affair) there and in Fort l'Évêque for eighteen years, living sumptuously on such of his rents as his steward did not embezzle, and marrying a fellow-prisoner's sister. The decrease of comfort in prisons of late is one of the most shocking instances of the increase of man's inhumanity to man. There was that odd person, William Playfair (great-uncle, if we mistake not, of Sir Lyon), who helped to take the Bastille at one time, and at another put "Pitt et Cobourg" on forging assignats. There was a curious company of Unitarians, of whom the above-mentioned Helen Maria was about the most respectable, though there was not an excessive amount of respectability to spare about her. There was Dr. Rigby, the most remarkable event of whose life (next to his hailing the dawn of the Revolution, and being, like the rest of the simple fools who did so, dreadfully shocked when pikes made their appearance with heads on them) was his singular good fortune in having a piece of plate voted him by the Norwich Corporation because his wife gave birth to four infants at once. The infants died; it is not recorded whether the Doctor gave back the piece of plate. There was Captain Macdonagh, who romantically espoused Miss Rose Plunket at a much earlier period and was, sad to say, renounced and lettred-de-cachetted by her when she had a mind to become Marquise de Carondelet. This faithless Rose is not to be confounded with Mary Plunket, Marquise de Chatellux, who also figures in the book. Here, too, shall you read of Gem, alias Ghym, Huskisson's uncle, who had the not wholly painful fate of being imprisoned for some months in the same room with the eminent Grace Dalrymple Elliott. He used to wake her at seven, but only with purpose to "try and argue her into materialism"—an instance of the insufficient reason. There was Grace herself, no better than she should be, and much less veracious, but surely no disagreeable "chamber-dekyn" for a poor captive. Richer and odder than Gem (who was odd and rich) was Robert Pigott, who sold large estates because he thought England was on the brink of ruin, believed in vegetarianism and Graham of the Celestial Bed, considered hats anathema, foregathered with Cloots, and seems to have been as complete a lunatic as ever deserved to be shut up, and was not. Odd, too, if not lunatic, was Mrs. Freeman Shepherd (the French call her Theeman Shephen), who thus soundly "wigged" the sea-green incorruptible for a rather unusual cause:—

"I do not like dissimulation," she said. "I never practise it on any occasion towards anybody, and I do not tolerate its being practised towards me. You have used it, sir, with me; you have deceived me. You made me believe that you accepted for public purposes a small offering, and you have not accepted it. The debtor and creditor account just transmitted to me by my banker, according to his usual custom, proves this."

Robespierre, it appears, had called on her and told her what he intended to do with the money.

"Do not thus distrust the English; do not treat with this humiliating disparagement the stammering accents of good-will of an Englishwoman towards the common cause of all nations. The French were formerly famous for their politeness to the weaker sex, thereby the more sensitive to affront. Alas for us if the Revolution deprives us of this precious privilege. But I claim a juster right: do not to others as you would not be done by."

Space would fail us to mention the twentieth part of Mr. Alger's personages. The most utterly detestable is the Jacobin informer, Grieve, for whom Northumberland may blush, and, whose most notorious deed was the hunting to death of poor Mme. du Barry, the most amiable and guiltless of improper persons. This infamous scoundrel, who boasted that he had been the cause of seventeen guillotined, escaped all punishment, and died at Brussels in 1809. Another ruffian of the same type, but still better known, was the municipal Arthur, who may have been of Irish extraction, but who, Mr. Alger thinks, did not eat the heart of a dead Swiss. If he did not literally do this, he "drank blood" enough in the figurative sense. Kavanagh, the Septembriseur, too, was only of Irish extraction, not of Irish or English birth. But the personage of whom the Emerald Isle has least to boast was John Baptist O'Sullivan, fencing-master, fratricide, and director of noyades:—

Charles O'Sullivan, collector of stamp duties at St. Georges sur Loire, took part in the Vendée rising, and terrible to say, was given up by his brother, John Baptist, for the latter, when himself on trial at Paris, said: "As for my brother, he was with the rebels. He murdered patriots, and wanted to murder me. When he found there was no other hope for him, he came and threw himself into my arms; but he was my country's enemy, I performed a republican's duty and denounced him, and justice pronounced his fate." Charles was guillotined at Angers, December 31st, 1793. He was twenty-eight years of age.

Jean Baptist O'Sullivan was a fencing master like his presumptive grandfather. In 1791 he was sub-lieutenant in a company of volunteers at Nantes. At the end of 1793 the infamous Carrier made him adjutant of Nantes, and he took part in Carrier's atrocities. According to Madame de la Rochejaquelein, John owed his life to his brother, four years his junior, being saved by him when captured by the Vendéans. She adds that after Charles's death he was a prey to remorse, fancied himself pursued by his brother's ghost, and stupefied himself by committing fresh crimes. His wife, a handsome and virtuous woman, reproached him with his baseness. Summoned to Paris as a witness against Carrier, he was himself placed in the dock. It was alleged that, dining with a party of men in a garden, he had boasted that when superintending the "noyades" he would distract a prisoner's attention by bidding him look at something on the shore, and when the man turned his head stuck a knife into his throat. This he denied, but he admitted that he might have said in a moment of indignation that if the "brigands" (royalists) were in his hands he would knife them. In a conversation on muscular strength he was alleged to have said that his brother was stronger than himself, so that the guillotine had to strike twice before his head fell. It was also said that he had boasted of having slaughtered men like sheep with his pocket-knife. Yet he is described as a handsome man, adored by women, and wonderfully dexterous with his sword. One of the forty survivors of a gallant band of 400 men who in June 1792 frustrated a night attack on Nantes, he was acquitted at Paris, like twenty-seven others, as not having acted with counter-revolutionary designs. They were not, however, released, were threatened with a second trial, and were transferred to Angers prison, but were ultimately liberated. O'Sullivan settled as schoolmaster at Buchesne, was highly esteemed there, was a republican to the last, and survived till 1841.

* Englishmen in the French Revolution. By John G. Alger. London: Sampson Low & Co.

Like former inquirers into the same matter Mr. Alger is unable to give us very interesting information, or much information of any kind, about the prisoners interned at Verdun. The liberations from that unpleasant captivity were as capricious as its origin was, and must have added bitterness to those who could not make interest to obtain passports. The whole company would have been remarkable enough—Astley of Astley's and Lord Steyne, Sir Elijah Impey at the end of his life, and Sir Alexander Cockburn in his cradle. But many were let off, and some took French leave (it is to be feared, by breaking parole sometimes). Mr. Alger in his account of the captivity draws on various sources, but especially on Sturt, and also on another book by Lawrence, author of the once famous Empire of the Nairs. Except in cases of attempted escape, the prisoners seem to have suffered more from extortion than from hardship. "They had two clubs, and in 1807 invited the townspeople to a masked ball." But "their Satan," as the late Mr. Mark Pattison would have said, was a certain General Wirion:—

This pork-butcher's son levied blackmail on all indulgences, pleasures, and even vices. James Henry Lawrence, a Knight of Malta, who also escaped, and in the same year published anonymously a "Picture of Verdun," gave full particulars of Wirion's shameless extortions. Permission even to walk out of the town was tarified, much more permission to live in a villa outside. Wirion would coolly ask himself to dinner with his wealthy prisoners. A Dr. Madan also made a handsome profit by certifying to the indisposition of sluggards who shirked answering the early morning roll-call. The captives were a motley band. Some had gone to France to retrench, some to educate their children, a few to study the artistic plunder at the Louvre, others to avoid their creditors or engage in smuggling, others again to establish manufactories. There was no little gambling, on which Wirion levied his commission, but as a set-off there were subscription schools for young sailors and children, and other forms of beneficence. Lawrence speaks of the brutality of his gaolers. A navy lieutenant, Leviscourt, after being on parole in the town for several years, was confined in the citadel. Thus relieved from his parole, he attempted to escape, but was recaptured, threatened with death, and by sentence of court-martial was dragged by gendarmes through the streets, a heavy cannon-ball chained to his leg.

These remarks and extracts, which, in the case of such a book, almost necessarily take the place of criticism, will show the interest of Mr. Alger's volume.

REICHENBACHIA.*

IT is understood that this superb series will be brought to a sudden close in consequence of Professor Reichenbach's death. Subscribers will not be astonished, probably, if the rumour prove true. Though the great botanist contributed little that came under the notice of unscientific readers, his lucid and admirable expositions, addressed to the learned, gave its unique value to the work. The Editors may well think it best to bring the issue to an end rather than choose a successor to the grand authority. In the body of the letterpress also, when need arose, Professor Reichenbach laid down the law in that quaint, elliptical manner which often reminds us of Carlyle. His remarks are brief, and scientific with a vengeance; but no one ever thought them dull. The vivacious individuality of the man gives a certain pungent character to his most abstruse remarks. Funny little quips, interjections, sarcasms which will not bear transplanting from their context, reveal the lively temper which deepest learning could not dim. It is a rule, universally accepted in theory, that the finished scholar knows something of every branch in the study he makes his own, and everything of one branch. Professor Reichenbach fulfilled this ideal condition. All the realm of botany he had conquered before setting up his throne among the orchids. No monarch more jealously guarded his dominion against unauthorized intruders; but the Professor's nature was too large for pedantry. Science admits no compromise; but he never lost sight of the fact that it, like other governments in this world, subsists by contributions from the vulgar, who resent abstruse legislation. Many good and learned men cannot bear this in mind. They would uphold the right though the sky threatened to fall. Professor Reichenbach was at least as zealous as any of them; but he kept rigid orthodoxy for the elect, and gave the public such doctrine as it can digest. There was no irony in the assertion, constantly repeated, under various forms, in this work, that it is folly to insist upon the letter of the law when that letter would irritate and discourage the taxpaying community, so to speak. "So long as the botanist has to serve garden interests he will have to study the ideas as well as the tastes of amateurs. That was Lindley's view, and it is mine." The rule has special application in the case of orchids. We may assert with absolute confidence that no public collection—though it were indefinitely grander than the most enthusiastic could dare imagine—will ever be independent of the amateur. This follows from the very nature of these interesting plants. But as matters stand now, the amateur—with whom we include "the trade" for this purpose—really commands the field. Unrivalled among institutions of the sort as is our own at Kew, particularly in this department, the reports and observations furnished from its own resources bear but a very small proportion to the mass which outsiders enable its authorities to contribute by forwarding specimens for scientific comment. Within the last few weeks a circular has been issued from Kew begging all persons concerned who have it in their power to send duplicates of the extraordinary orchids they despatched to Professor Reichenbach in time past, that his lost herbarium may be reconstituted, so far as is possible. Assuredly, therefore, the feelings of the outsider should be considered when the savant meditates an interference with the conventional order of things. However grand his discoveries, if they be too startling he should not obtrude them on comfortable and self-satisfied—and obliging—ignorance. The truth can afford to wait, being eternal. That is the "view" which Reichenbach, succeeding Lindley, maintained. "I have never endeavoured to force upon amateurs such undoubtedly necessary changes"—necessary for the student, that is—"as the merging the genus Cattleya into that of Epidendrum." All the hair of the genus amateur rises in bewildered dismay at the thought. But there is worse:—"Nor the genus Lælia and Schomburgkia into the genus Bletia." We put no note of exclamation. A line of them would not express the panic of an amiable and blameless class of our fellow-citizens who heard that doctrine gravely propounded. It would unsettle the whole scheme of animated nature for them. A dog with a peacock's tail, a horse with antlers, would enter the domain of the possible forthwith. Therefore do the wise and good reserve such truths for their esoteric disciples.

Doubtless this is the best book on orchids extant; let us still hope it may not be necessary to add, so far as it has gone. The Reichenbachia appeals to all through its wonderful drawings, as absolutely true as human means allow, and most admirable as works of art. Every one is familiar with the costly illustrations attached to several books upon this subject. Though practical students of orchidology may pronounce them false in colour, as a rule, and critics may deny their claim to art, those acquainted with the extreme difficulty of such work will admit them all to be excellent, more or less, under the circumstances. It is the best compliment to Mr. Moon, who executed these drawings, that they require no qualification. Lithography in colour has now been brought to the perfection which can reproduce every tone the artist entrusts to it—and these illustrations are pictures. It is a small class which takes interest in "diagnoses," but one, we venture to think, worthy of all possible regard. In this art—of composing a precise and unmistakable description of a flower in such terms that a student who has no access to the thing described may be able to class and compare it—Professor Reichenbach had no rival. Such a diagnosis is prefixed to the report of every plant figured, together with references to every source of information concerning it which the Professor's enormous erudition could supply. Finally, those special portions of the inflorescence which mark its distinction from kindred blooms are dissected and figured in a series of diagrams. For the letterpress itself no editor is named, but we presume that Mr. Sander takes the responsibility. It gives a brief sketch of the introduction of the plant to civilized mankind; such remarks as seem necessary to supplement the illustration, and a singularly clear statement of the culture. This portion may not seem to require a compliment, but amateurs who depend upon books for their knowledge of the treatment necessary in a given case may well think it the rarest of boons. No one, living or dead, not even the marvellous Roezl, is so well qualified as Mr. Sander to tell the story of the later introductions, since the bulk of our treasures won in recent years are due to his agents, who reported the circumstances to their employer, no doubt. Many will wish that these reports had been more freely quoted. We get no more than hints of stories that might well have been narrated at length. A littérateur who was also a student of orchidology might make a charming volume from the legends of the science. He would find a whole chapter of adventures and emotions, for instance, by tracing up and out the few words granted to the discovery of Cattleya Lawrenceana. It would open effectively, according to the best canons of sensation, in the Reading Room of the British Museum. Thence the scene would shift to untrodden forests of Guiana, where Indians, wild beasts, fevers, shipwrecks, and so forth, enliven a tale protracted over years and oceans, ending in blue fire of triumph at the last. But this romance is summarized so modestly that we quote it only for form's sake. "Some few years ago, while looking at the drawings of Sir Robert Schomburgk in the British Museum, we found a Cattleya that appeared quite strange to us—so beautiful, and so distinct from any we had seen, that our curiosity was excited." A hunt through Sir Robert's published travels followed. In his excursion to the Roraima he mentions the beauty of a certain "Cattleya Mossiæ"; and, after due pondering of evidence, it seemed likely that this was the plant sketched. "Knowing, however, that Cattleya Mossiæ has only been found in Venezuela, we doubted the probability of its occurrence in Guiana, and determined, if possible, to identify it." Thus the tale began. Mr. Siedl was despatched across the Atlantic forthwith to hunt up an incredible flower, upon the evidence of a highly improbable sketch in the British Museum. Month after month he clambered up and down the jungle-clad hills of Guiana, with plenty of adventures to keep him lively, but nothing of the San Graal could he find—that is, of an abnormal Cattleya. But Mr. Sander was not to be beaten. Again and again he packed off the gallant Siedl on a quest which stolid British growers generally regarded as the best joke of the trade. Nothing is told us here of the fine things sent home on these journeys, which comforted the employer under long disappointment, and cheered the wanderer's lonely course—among them, however, were Eucharis Mastersii, Eucharis Sanderiana, and Utricularia Campbelli. And at length perseverance found an ideal reward. Cattleya Lawrenceana offers the fairest possible proof that Sir Robert Schomburgk told the truth and painted it, so far as he knew—proves also that imagination and critical acumen are not always useless in business. In the Orchid-book of the future many such stories will be detailed, with Mr. Sander in the leading rôle generally. Professor Reichenbach paid him a just compliment, the full significance of which is caught only by those acquainted with all the circumstances:—

* Reichenbachia. St. Albans: Sander & Co. London: Sotheman & Co. Berlin: Paul Parey. Paris: O. Nilsson. New York: J. Forstermann.

Bearing in mind the many beautiful and entirely new orchids introduced by Mr. Sander, when we know the history of the re-introduction of Cypripedium Spicerianum, Odontoglossum Harryanum, Masdevallia tovarensis, Lælia harpophylla, Odontoglossum navium, and many others, one cannot help admiring the wonderful energy, sagacity, and strength of character displayed in these undertakings.

In view of the Conferences upon "Orchid nomenclature" which have opened at length, after years of preliminary debate, it is interesting and à propos to mark Professor Reichenbach's despairing tone. Continually through these volumes he suggests, or allows it to be seen, that Science and "The Garden"—in his own phrase—can never be reconciled on the question of orchid names. The former may consent to hold her tongue, but she must not be challenged, or battle will surely ensue. To choose one passage from scores:—

There has been a great deal of controversy respecting the nomenclature of orchids, both by those who are versed in the matter and those who are not. No one seems to be successful in formulating a plan worthy to be followed. Those who are able to perceive the difference between garden and botanical nomenclature will doubtless arrive at the conclusion that it is not possible to bring both into harmony.

The assertion is uncomfortably emphatic; but it will be so much the greater credit to those gentlemen about to make the essay, if they succeed—and a certain comfort if they fail.

FIFTY YEARS ON THE TRAIL.*

MR. JOHN NELSON may be styled the Casanova of the Trail. A more splendid natural ruffian, one more candid, cautious, daring, and diverting, it is impossible to desire. His memoirs are said on the title-page to be by Mr. Harrington O'Reilly, but they are taken from Mr. Nelson's confessions. He frankly remarks that his life has been misspent, and that he would rather say nothing about it. But any casual misdemeanours or excesses of which he may have been capable in the way of business are quite redeemed by his narrative. It is of extraordinary interest to all natural minds, and, we presume, will be found quite unreadable by the devotees of æsthetic pessimism. Mr. Nelson is no pessimist, but rather, like a rowdy Ulysses, has drunk all adventure to the lees, and liked it.

Charleston, Va., saw Mr. Nelson's birth on August 25—"saw" it, but never, we fancy, "went better." His father was overseer of salt-works, and had negroes under his charge. His word always was, "Never fight a nigger; but, if you do, lick him." One day he found John fighting with and being licked by a little black, so the paternal whip whacked John coincidentally with the blows of the little negro, till John, finding a bit of old iron handy, nearly cut his opponent to ribbons with that instrument. Being freely and frequently corrected by a stern parent, John ran away. He was sent to school, and, like Amyas Leigh, knocked down the schoolmaster—in this case, for bullying a girl. His life became a series of Hegiras, till he joined a party of explorers on the plains, where the infinite spaces filled him with a mysterious delight. Mr. Nelson does not voluntarily drop into poetry, but his feelings in the unknown vastnesses and the solitude were distinctly poetical. The Indians, the original dwellers in these free spaces, were his natural allies. He thrust his company on them, declined to leave them, and married an Indian wench after a funny idyl of courtship. The shyness of the bride was purely conventional, and, as soon as Nelson left the camp for some time, she eloped with one of her red kin. Mr. Nelson took this in the philosophical spirit of the Persians. "It is the part of bad men to carry women off, and the part of wise men not to concern themselves about the matter." That he was phlegmatic was fortunate; for most of his successive brides ran away with Indian lovers—a thing discouraging to the vanity of a white. The oddest Indian wife was the lady who carried the ideas of her people too far. The Indians of old, as John Tanner also assures us, practised a frantic generosity. They were as eager to give property away as white folk are to acquire it. They also were great mourners for their dead—a truly savage performance, as any one may see. For are we not civilized? and is it not plain that, day by day, les morts, les pauvres morts, are increasingly neglected? The death of a sister or a mother is resented as a temporary interference with dress and frivolity. "The pace is too good" to linger about the graves of those who fall in the fray. The Indians have different notions. When Mr. Nelson made a new bride presents she gave them all away in an hour. When one of her relations died she went nearly mad, shrieked, gashed herself, and conferred all her husband's property on any one who came near her. She was, in fact, a violently conventional lady, after the manner of Indian conventions.

Mr. Nelson's descriptions of Indian ways and customs are excellent. They keep up the Spartan rite of voluntary cruelty practised on themselves. The Sioux fastened the flesh of their breasts to trees, round which they danced for three days without food or water. Readers of Catlin will remember the similar performances of the now extinct Mandans. No doubt these rites are, in idea, partly sacrificial, partly trials of courage, and rehearsals for the torture stake, to which any brave may be bound, if he falls into unfriendly hands.

One of Mr. Nelson's oddest adventures, as a very young man, was his encounter with a set of psalm-singing migratory Chadbands, whom he met in the plains. "They told me they were Latter-day Saints." One said he was "The Lion of the Lord." "I looked at him in astonishment, but did not say anything further, particularly as I was not in a position to deny his statement." He was Brigham Young! Mr. Nelson felt a kind of pity for these wandering wolves in sheep's clothing, and acted as their guide till they reached the lower end of Salt Lake, which Young decided was the Promised Land. He fancied that the Lake communicated with the Pacific; had there been such an outlet Brigham Young meant to have proclaimed himself King of Utah. Never was there a more romantic Chadband, nor a tub-thumper who did business on a larger scale. Mormonism was, indeed, a sort of caricature of Anglo-Saxonism, combining an unintelligent passion for the Bible with strict business principles and cold-blooded cruelty. Leaving the Mormons, Mr. Nelson's ingenious fancy led him to do a little scalp-hunting. On returning to his tribe he found himself again in the position of Menelaus, and now he married the frantically conventional squaw, whom he deserted when she gave everything he possessed away. He then dealt in furs for a while, and saw the first wars of White and Red in these western parts. He declares that "the whole of the officials were in the swindle from the Chief Commissioner downwards." The Red Men were treated with brutal dishonesty; they resented the conduct of the Yankees, arrows were shot, soldiers were sent, massacre and whisky did the business of the natives. Mr. Nelson took to trapping again, with a gentleman named Hal Gay, and they started a gambling and drinking hell, which they frankly named "The Robbers' Roost." "We built quite a big gambling saloon," says the Barry Lyndon of the West, "in which many a poor fellow lost not only his money but his life." It is fair to add that Mr. Nelson set very little store by either of these commodities, and when he ceased to be a partner in the bank he lost all he had over his own fraudulent euchre or poker. "The Provost-Marshal stood in with us, and would detain the caravans that we might skin the emigrants out of their money either by gambling or by drinking." This was the humour of it:—

Hal would disguise himself, rubbing a lot of dirt in his hair, over his face and hands, and putting on some dirty ragged clothes. Then he went down to the caravan corral, talking to some of the men, and brought them up to the town. He then strolled along to the Robbers' Roost, and invited them in to have a drink. Once in, it was not long before he got them into the gambling saloon, where he began to play, and invariably won by an arrangement he had with the banker, who was in our employment.

Having won a pile, he stood more drinks, and as a result some of the strangers soon started in. He left off then, for the banker invariably gave him a dollar to go and have a drink, saying his luck was far too good, and if he kept on winning all the money, there would be none left for his pals to take away.

I don't say there was any cheating done, but the bank invariably came off the winner.

I attended to the bar whilst all this was going on. That was my department, and pretty busy I was too, for the more they gambled the more drinks I sold.

Finally things became so warm and the shootings so frequent, I had a consultation with my partner, and suggested our clearing out before we got into trouble.

On the whole, this is the least creditable part of Mr. Nelson's confessions, though we may not wholly sympathize with him when he became a Mormon. He accompanied troops to the scene of the Mountain Meadow Massacre, and helped to bury the bodies of the victims. As a Mormon Mr. Nelson distinguished himself by the vivacity of his flirtations, which made it seem better for him to leave the holy community of Latter-day Saints. A good deal of shooting had to be done; and here is an anecdote of an English emigrant. It should be remarked that Slade was a peculiarly abominable kind of Western Bersark who kept the roads in terror by his cruelties:—

An English emigrant drove up to the shanty whilst they were there, and as he was getting down from his waggon, Slade stepped up to the counter, and snatching up a four-pound weight which stood by the scales, heaved it through the window at the emigrant's head, just missing it.

* Fifty Years on the Trail. By Harrington O'Reilly. London: Chatto & Windus. 1889.

This was too much for the Britisher, who was as brave a chap as ever stepped. He turned round, and seeing there were about eight of them, he stretched out his arm, dragged his rifle out of the waggon, stepped into the shanty, cocked it, and presenting it at Slade's head, said:

"You heaved that weight at me. What did you do it for?"

Slade said it was only done in fun, and the others, trying to make peace, apologized for him, and begged the Englishman not to notice it.

He said that if Slade undertook not to bother him again it was all right. This was promised, and I took the opportunity of putting the Britisher in the kitchen with his wife, who was with him.

Mr. Nelson now took service in an unofficial way with the American forces, where he met "a scout named Bill Cody," better known as "Buffalo Bill." One day, on the plains, he distinctly heard a voice telling him that he would be shot, and shot he was presently. He then married a squaw with Christian rites, and may be regarded as quite a domestic character ever since. His best adventure after this was in a prairie fire; the anecdote is as good as Mayne Reid, and true. In fact, the whole book is manifestly veracious, a page out of a volume now closed, at least in America. In Africa, perhaps, there is still verge and space enough for the Nelsons of this world. Mr. Nelson came to London in the "Wild West" show, but he says nothing about his urban adventures in his very diverting memoirs. This, perhaps, is a pity.

BOOKS ON DIVINITY.*

DR. LIDDON'S reputation as a preacher and theologian needs no gilding, and it is hardly necessary to do more than notice the appearance of his Advent and Christmas Sermons. There is, however, one thought that will strike many readers of these volumes which we may venture to anticipate. Those who have listened to Dr. Liddon under the great dome of St. Paul's or in the University Church of St. Mary's, where he is even more at home, usually go away with the impression that they have been listening to a consummate rhetorician. Yet those who read these Sermons will find that there is in them no rhetoric at all, in the common sense of the word. There are no questions, no ejaculations, no anecdotes, no mots or quotations, no gorgeous adjectives. Even when the scene lends itself to, almost demands, what is known as word-painting, the opportunity is used with the severest self-restraint. Let any one compare, for instance, the * Advent in St. Paul's. By H. P. Liddon, D.D., D.C.L., Canon and Chancellor of St. Paul's. 2 vols. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

Christmastide in St. Paul's. By H. P. Liddon, D.D., D.C.L., Canon and Chancellor of St. Paul's. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

On Behalf of Belief. By the Rev. H. S. Holland, M.A., Canon and Precentor of St. Paul's. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

Socrates and Christ: a Study in the Philosophy of Religion. By R. M. Wenley, M.A., Lecturer on Mental and Moral Philosophy in Queen Margaret College, Glasgow; Examiner in Philosophy in the University of Glasgow. Edinburgh and London: William Blackwood & Sons. 1889.

A Manual of Introduction to the New Testament. By Dr. Bernhard Weiss. Translated from the German by A. J. K. Davidson. Vol. II. London: Hodder & Stoughton.

An Exposition of the Epistles of St. Paul. By Bernardine a Piconio. Translated and Edited from the original Latin by A. H. Prichard, B.A., Merton Coll., Oxford. London: John Hodges.

The Prophecies of Isaiah. Expounded by Dr. C. von Orelli. Translated by Rev. J. S. Banks, Headingley College, Leeds. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 1889.

A New Commentary on Genesis. By Franz Delitzsch, D.D. Translated by Sophia Taylor. Vol. II. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark. 1889.

The Writings of Patrick, the Apostle of Ireland. (Christian Classics Series, No. VI.) A Revised Translation, with Notes Critical and Historical, by the Rev. C. H. Wright, D.D., Trin. Coll., Dublin: London: Religious Tract Society.

By-paths of English Church History: Home Missions in the Early Medieval Period. By the Rev. C. H. Hole, B.A., Lecturer in Eccles. Hist. at King's Coll., London. London: S. P. C. K.

Golden Words; or, Maxims of the Cross. Translated and adapted from the Latin of Thomas à Kempis by F. H. Hamilton, M.A. Fourth edition. London: Burns & Oates, Limited. 1889.

Guild Addresses. By the Rev. W. Frank Shaw, B.D., Vicar of Eastry. London: Griffith, Farran, Okeden, & Welsh. 1889.

David, the Man after God's own Heart. A Book for Young Men. By the Rev. H. E. Stone, Nottingham. London: Nisbet & Co.

The Mystic Vine: a Meditation on the Passion of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Translated from the Latin of an unknown Author and Edited by G. J. Eales, D.C.L. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1889.

Is not this the Christ? By the Rev. C. J. Ridgway, M.A., Vicar of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate. London: Skeffington & Son. 1889.

Blankthorpe Parochial Papers on Church Life and Church Work. Edited by the Rev. C. R. Ball, M.A., Vicar-designate of All Saints, Peterborough. London: S. P. C. K. 1889.

The Influence of Christianity on War. By J. F. Bethune-Baker, M.A., Pembroke Coll., Camb. Cambridge: Macmillan & Bowes.

A Catechism on the Church of England: its Constitution, Discipline, and Doctrine. By Dawson F. Chapman, M.A., Vicar of St. Peter's, Preston. London: S. P. C. K.

Easteride Thoughts on the Passion and Resurrection of our Lord. By W. Hay M. H. Aitken, M.A. London: Shaw & Co.

Introduction to the Sacred Scriptures. By Rev. John MacDevitt, D.D., Professor of the Introd. to Scripture, Eccles. Hist., &c., All Hallows Foreign Missionary Coll., Dublin. Dublin: Sealy, Bryers, & Walker. 1889.

Das alte Testament und die christliche Sittenlehre. Von Ernst Fischer, Pastor zu Bessingen. Gotha: F. A. Perthes. 1889.

Biblische Psychologie, Biologie und Pädagogik als die Grundlügen christlicher Erziehung und Selbstzucht. Von Prof. Dr. Karl Fischer, Königl. preuss. Gymnasialdirektor. Gotha: F. A. Perthes. 1889.

sermon on the Last Judgment (Vol. I. of the Advent Sermons) with those of Jeremy Taylor on the same subject (Vol. IV. of his Collected Works), and he cannot fail to notice the extraordinary difference between the two preachers. Taylor goes to work like a painter designing a fresco for a Campo Santo. A thousand terrible or harrowing details are there. His principle is that what we see vividly we believe intensely, and he strikes at the intelligence through the senses. Dr. Liddon addresses himself entirely to the reason; not, it is true, to the eighteenth-century common sense, but to the disciplined reason—reason which has put itself into the proper attitude for this particular subject of thought. Taylor swells over all his banks, like the Nile in flood, and hardly exhausts what he has to say in three long discourses; Dr. Liddon makes his mark in sixteen not large pages. Each topic is handled differently. Why must we believe in a Judgment? Because, says Taylor, it is the great redressing of all wrongs. "It is but reasonable, for the interests of virtue and the necessities of the world, that the private should be judged, and virtue should be tied upon the spirit, and the poor should be relieved, and the oppressed should appeal, and the noise of widows should be heard, and the saints should stand upright, and the cause that was ill judged should be judged over again, and tyrants should be called to account, and our thoughts should be examined, and our secret actions viewed on all sides, and the infinite number of sins which escape here should not escape finally." "If," says Dr. Liddon, "the reason is convinced, first, of the possibility of miracles—and this possibility cannot be denied by a serious believer in a living and moral God—and, secondly, of the truth of the historical fact that Jesus Christ did really rise again from the dead—and St. Paul will tell him that, while the fact was in his lifetime a matter of widespread notoriety, it could not be denied without breaking altogether with anything that could be called Christianity—if, I say, reason be thus convinced that such a miracle as the Resurrection of Christ is historically true, he ought to have no serious difficulty, on the score of reason, in believing the Last Judgment." Here two long arguments are packed into a few lines, and Taylor's whole reasoning appears in the one word "moral." Again, Taylor dwells at great length upon the actual scene of the dread Assize, the terrors that usher it in, the audience, the Judge. In Dr. Liddon's sermon there is scarcely anything of this. The soul even in that awful concourse of all peoples is alone with God, and feels rather than hears its doom. But the tale is told in the plainest language and with great brevity. The difference between the two preachers is immense, and to account for it would need a long treatise on the taste, the mental and moral atmosphere, of the seventeenth and nineteenth centuries. But in what does Dr. Liddon's rhetoric consist? or, in other words, what is the secret of his popularity? for rhetoric is the art of popularity. Partly, no doubt, it is to be found in the style. Partly in voice and manner. Partly in intellectual power. But intellectual power is apt to be fatiguing. What redeems Dr. Liddon—and this is a most important reflection for all clever people who want to do good work in the pulpit—is his grip and practicality. Not a thought is introduced without an immediate bearing on the audience. There is no parade. Everything is real and important; and, so long as this is the case, the preacher does not seem to care how tersely his reasoning may be put or what demands it may make on the hearers' intelligence. He feels sure that they want to understand, and that if what he says is luminously expressed they will understand it. Again, it will be observed in these sermons that intellectual method is never carried too far. The treatment is never exhaustive; a few leading points are selected and driven home. Thus the attention is stimulated and never wearied. Lastly, the secret consists in that which is, after all, the secret of all great oratory—the ethos of the speaker. The light is never dry. Every word is steeped in emotion, all the more pungent from the self-restraint that husbands it. The reader feels, to use Horace's phrase, that "he is walking upon fire." And the emotion is marked by that austerity which, whether in nature, in art, or in human character, men accept as the seal of the highest excellence, though they may themselves be easygoing enough. Austerity is the blending of tenderness with severity, two qualities so antagonistic that their harmonious interaction is always marvellous. Hence it has a high value in persuasion, the rarity of the character reflecting light upon the rarity of the faith by which the character is moulded. Every quack is driven by the necessity of his trade to imitate this character; but it is the special property of Christianity, the only creed that can teach how joy, sorrow, and wrath spring from the same fountain.

Canon Scott Holland's volume is another noteworthy specimen of the teaching that draws people to St. Paul's. From a literary point of view a perhaps not too fastidious critic might find a good deal to dislike in these sermons. The author's rule is never to use one word when five will do as well. A whole page is sometimes filled up with the mere statement of the point to be discussed. The style is spasmodic, and always "on the go." Even in sermons there are passages where the utterance is not naturally choked with sobs; and it is precisely when he is, or should be, on the matter-of-fact level—for instance, in the sermon on the Gospel Witness—that Canon Scott Holland does least justice to his powers. For he has great powers. The sermons on the Resurrection, in which he deals with the two schools of "criticism," one of which regards Christianity as built upon a beautiful human life, rounded off by a great lie, while the other regards it as built, or rather suspended like a vapour, upon the lie itself, are very striking. Canon Scott Holland has a clear perception of the intellectual difficulties of the day, and a distressing sense of the way in which doubts and denials strip life of its beauty and happiness. It is on this side that he makes his attack on the negative scientific attitude. Agnosticism, in his view, is a big name which covers no deep philosophical position. "It only means the mental temper and attitude of an honest and cheerful Englishman, to whom and for whom these burning questions do not practically or vitally exist." Only, it should be added by way of caution, the preacher is not here thinking of those too cheerful agnostics of the luncheon-bar of whom the Bishop of Peterborough spoke some little time ago.

Socrates and Christ is primarily a protest against the tendency manifested by a certain school of writers to elevate the martyr-philosopher into something like an equality with the founder of Christianity. Mr. Wenley begins by taking exception to the statement of M. Havet that "le Christianisme est sorti presque tout entier de l'antiquité hellénique," and to that of Mr. R. W. Mackay that "Christianity added little or nothing to the truths already uttered in the Athenian prison." A great part of the book is occupied in showing how Greek philosophy required to be modified by the infusion of Hebrew ideas, that is by Alexandrinism, before it could become, what Eusebius called it, "a preparation for the Gospel." But the most interesting portion of the work is the conclusion, where Mr. Wenley dwells upon the originality, permanence, and distinctive character of the Saviour's work. He appears to belong to that modern school who regard the person of Christ with great awe and veneration, while treating "preconceived theological opinions" as things that may be set upon one side. It is significant that he speaks of the Saviour as "Christ," not always as "Jesus," regards Him, that is to say, as possessing in some real sense a Divine commission. He goes so far as to say that "Jesus was divine by His clear vision of His own divinity." His special work was that He "set forth in His own person that pattern humanity which, in earlier ages, had only such reality as dreams are made of"; that He "objectified an ideal career," and so on. This is much, for there are those who do not admit it. But, unless Mr. Wenley is content to regard Christianity as a remarkable phenomenon, from the calm indifference of a library chair, he will find himself obliged to go forward or to go back. For what is a perfect life but a Miracle? And what is the good of saying that "our demonstrable knowledge of God must be very specially through the life of Christ" if it must be admitted that "Criticism may—the probability is that it does—reduce direct accurate knowledge of Him to a minimum"? Instead of writing Criticism with a big C, and falling down before it as a sort of divine Omphé, let us write it with a smaller letter, and qualify it as Baur's criticism or Hitzig's criticism. The change is slight, but it will be found to make a great difference. Mr. Wenley's book is one that cannot be read without sympathy and respect. We can only trust that he will not spend his life in "beating about the bush with profound emotion and never starting the hare."

The translation of Dr. Bernhard Weiss's Manual of Introduction to the New Testament, now completed by the issue of the second volume, will be found exceedingly useful by all serious students, and exceedingly embarrassing by all that too numerous crew of facile writers who like to season their graver labours by a little dash of theology. The work is an admirable specimen of the method which German scholars have settled upon as best fitted for the "discipline" of introduction, and gives an elaborate account of the extraordinary vacillations of opinion that have characterized New Testament criticism. Dr. Weiss is perfectly free and outspoken, but his judgment is wise and cautious and his guidance can be trusted. Mr. Davidson has done his work as translator upon the whole very well; but still there are occasional sentences that are obscure and misleading until one turns to the original German. Thus (p. 259) the words "Clement of Alexandria confesses in the most naïve way that he had never heard of such a work" may be taken by a hasty reader to mean that Clement had never heard of St. Mark's Gospel, and the note upon this passage is not well rendered, for "gebeten" does not mean "interrogated." The usefulness of the book would have been vastly increased by the addition of an index.

Bernardine a Piconio, or Henri Bernardine de Picquigny, was a French priest of the Capuchin Order, who lived in the latter half of the seventeenth century. His Exposition of the Epistles of St. Paul (Romans and 1 Corinthians) is a good specimen of the peculiar grace that attaches to French works of devotion. The author does not dwell on grammatical subtleties and passes over many a hard knot. He was well read in the fashion of his age, knew Greek, Latin, and Syriac, and quotes the Fathers with perfect freedom. But all that does not tend to edification is to him as sawdust; his book opens with a very striking prayer, and neither Greek particles nor heresies are suffered to jar the tone of devout meditation that reigns throughout. The work is that of a staunch Romanist, bien entendu; but in these brawling days there are many who will thank Mr. Prichard for making them acquainted with a spirit so lucid and serene.

Other translations on our list are the Prophecies of Isaiah, by Orelli, and the second volume of Delitzsch's New Commentary on Genesis. Far be it from us to find captious fault with works so learned; but if Orelli's book were a commentary on Æschylus no one would tolerate such a translation as this:—"For every boot of the booted ones with turmoil and mantle rolled in blood, this is for burning, for fuel of fire," which might surely just as well have been left in the original Hebrew. The note on this passage is "the verb refers not directly to the noise caused by boots, but to the turmoil of battle, where there is tramping about in boots." We should have more confidence in the Hebraists if they were not quite so heavily "booted," and did not "tramp about" so clumsily on all the tender little humanities that we are weakly attached to. There is always a suspicion that those who cannot render an author's style cannot really understand his meaning. Surely Isaiah had a style. We are not to suppose that the Authorized Version invented one for him.

The Writings of Patrick, the Apostle of Ireland form a volume, tiny in size, but full of interest. The editing appears to have been done with care, the genuine remains are separated from the doubtful, the Scripture quotations have been compared with the Vulgate and the Itala, and the critical and historical notes seem to be scholarly and sufficient. The text adopted is that of Dr. Whitley Stokes and the late Mr. Hennessy, with occasional verifications by the present editor, Dr. Wright. The addition of a short Life of the Saint would have been an improvement, but if the reader is induced by this omission to take up Miss Cusack's Life of St. Patrick, or consult Dr. G. T. Stokes's article in the Dictionary of Christian Biography, or, still better, Ireland and the Celtic Church by the same accomplished author, he will have nothing to regret. Two complaints we may venture to make. The one piece of Greek that Dr. Wright gives us is surely wrong. The original of Patrick's "Curie lesson" (p. 80) ought to be Kύριε ἐλέησον not Kύριε ἐλέεισον. And, if Dr. Wright desired his work to be read by all classes, he should not have trailed his Protestant coat-tails quite so defiantly. The note on the "power of binding and loosing" (p. 124) may or may not be correct, but it was quite uncalled for, and will give offence. Readers of this delightful little book should be allowed to forget the Romanist controversy, and all the absurd legends of a too credulous after-age, and just listen to the Saint himself. His very existence has been doubted by over-ingenious critics, but he has the rare gift of making us see and hear through all the mists of fifteen centuries. Let the sceptic hear and be convinced. "I, Patrick, a sinner, the rudest and the least of all the faithful, and most contemptible to very many, had for my father Calpornius, a deacon, a son of Potitus, a presbyter, who dwelt in the village of Bannavem Taberniæ (Dumbarton?), for he had a small farm hard by the place where I was taken captive. I was then nearly sixteen years of age. I did not know the true God; and I was taken to Ireland in captivity with so many thousand men, in accordance with our deserts." Six years he worked as a slave. But one night a voice cried to him in his sleep, "Behold, thy ship is ready." "After this I took flight . . . and I came in the strength of the Lord, who directed my way for good; and I feared nothing till I arrived at that ship. And on the same day on which I arrived, the ship moved out of its place, and I asked them that I might go away, and sail with them. And it displeased the captain, and he answered sharply with indignation, 'Do not by any means seek to go with us.' And when I heard this, I separated myself from them in order to go to the hut where I lodged. And on the way I began to pray. And before I had ended my prayer I heard one of them, and he was calling loudly after me 'Come quickly, for these men are calling you.' . . . And we sailed immediately." Some years after this escape Patrick had his famous vision "in the Britains with his parents." He heard in his mind the voice of those who dwell near the wood of Foclut (in Mayo), which is close by the Western Sea. "And they cried out thus, as if with one voice, 'We entreat thee, holy youth, that thou come and henceforth walk among us.' Yet he did not obey the call for many years, till he was "almost worn out." This is as real and vivid as anything in history. We trust these extracts may tempt our readers to desire better acquaintance with a famous but little-known saint.

We have also received By-paths of English Church History, an interesting but rather too fragmentary series of sketches of the great Anglo-Saxon missionaries, with some useful notes on the rise of the parochial system, by the Rev. Charles Hole; Golden Words (fourth edition), translated and adapted from the De Imitatione by Mr. Hamilton; Guild Addresses, by the Rev. W. F. Shaw; a modest volume of addresses on the Life of David, by the Rev. H. E. Stone, of Nottingham; The Mystic Vine, a translation, or rather adaptation, of a devotional treatise that has sometimes been printed among the works of St. Bernard of Clairvaux; Is not this the Christ? by the Rev. C. J. Ridgeway; Blankthorpe Parochial Papers, a useful and suggestive little collection of essays on parish management, edited by the Rev. C. R. Ball; The Influence of Christianity on War, by Mr. J. F. Bethune-Baker; A Catechism on the Church of England, by the Rev. D. F. Chapman; Eastertide, a volume of Sermons by the Rev. W. Hay M. H. Aitken; Introduction to the Sacred Scriptures, a popular Roman Catholic Manual of the subject, by Rev. John McDevitt, D.D.; and two little German books by Ernst and Karl Fischer, the first of which deals with the morality of the Old Testament, while the second insists upon the adaptation of revelation to the spiritual nature of man. The authors write with a full appreciation of the bearing of modern science upon Christian ethics, and find much to commend in Mr. Drummond's work. Their German is clear and easy, and English readers will find much to interest and instruct them.

THE RUTLAND MSS.*

BELVOIR CASTLE has, as was expected, proved singularly rich in historical manuscripts; and this volume, which we owe to the kindness of its late and its present owner, and to the industry and skill of Mr. Maxwell Lyte, the Deputy-Keeper of the Records, and of those who have worked at it under his direction, is full of delightful matter. The preface affords a notable example of the good results which often arise from the visit of an expert in manuscript work to the seat of one of our historic families. Mr. Lyte tells us how he discovered a large collection of valuable documents lying half forgotten in a lumber-room, and how he was led to make a visit to the stables of the castle, and there found a loft the floor of which was covered with old papers lying in confusion and piled to a height of three or four feet. As he came upon three manuscripts of special interest—one a holograph letter of Lord Burghley, and another a letter of Charles James Fox—in about half an hour, he saw that the contents of the loft were worth overhauling, and they now form the principal part of the materials noted in the Calendar, of which the first instalment is given to us here. All the papers in this Calendar will for the future be safe from rats and other enemies, for the Duke of Rutland has had them treated with all possible care and respect. It would be difficult to improve on Mr. Lyte's introduction to this volume. Short as it is, no one can want a better guide to the choicest bits in the text. At the same time, the reader should work through the Calendar for himself if he wishes to enjoy it to the full.

The Calendar begins with some letters relating to the Vernons, whose estates in Derbyshire passed to the Manners family. Several of these letters are from the Duke of Clarence, the brother of Edward IV., and refer to the war of 1471. On March 30 Clarence wrote to Henry Vernon urging him, as he had done in previous letters, to join him against Edward, the "late King," and a few days before the Earl of Warwick also sent him a letter to the same effect. Warwick's letter is given in facsimile; it presents us with the only extant specimen of his writing, for though the body of the letter is in another hand, the signature is his, and so also is the postscript—"Henry I pray you flayle not now as ever I may do ffor yow." Clarence, who changed sides early in April, wrote from Tewkesbury on May 6, two days after the battle, bidding Vernon join him in King Edward's name, and announcing that Edward, "late called Prince," was among those "slayn in playn bataill," which is strong evidence against the story current in the next century that the Prince of Wales was assassinated after the battle by Clarence and Gloucester. In 1485 Henry VII. commands Vernon to join in putting down the rebels in the North, who with "Robyn of Riddisdale, Jak St . . . , Thomolyn at Lath, and Maister Mendall for their capteyns," were confederate with the Scots. This letter, which is of nearly the same date with one on the same matter from the Duke of Suffolk to John Paston, throws a curious light on the popular movements in the North. Vernon, by that time a Knight and Controller of the Household of the Prince of Wales, received a request from the King in 1492, when war with France was imminent, that he would "lene unto us the somme of Cⁱⁱ," secured on the "half quinzame payable at Martilmas next commyng." The papers relating to the Field of the Cloth of Gold and other matters which have already been printed by the Camden Society (Rutland Papers) are briefly noticed, and references are given to the Society's volume. Two or three documents are concerned with the suppression of the monasteries. One contains the valuation of the priory of Warter, in Yorkshire, granted to Thomas, first Earl of Rutland, the representative of the founder. This valuation, which is not in the Monasticon, gives some particulars about the church and other buildings of the house. A letter from Thomas Cromwell speaks of a friar, who used the "deceitful art of magic and astronomy." The superstition of a later generation is illustrated by the depositions with respect to an accusation brought in 1591 against a surgeon of Burton-on-Trent of bewitching one of his neighbours by means of a wax-figure "of a mayde with a garlande on her hedde and a flower in her hande." Henry, the second earl, was Lieutenant in the North in 1549, and we have the lists which were drawn up for him of the towns on the Scottish frontier occupied by troops, and of the beacons in the county of Northumberland. Complaints occur of the evil doings of the foreign mercenaries employed by the Ministers of Edward VI. At Morpeth the Italians killed Lord Dacre's deer, and were otherwise so troublesome that "thinhabitantes do rather mynde to leave the towne and seek other dwellinges then to susteine such intollerable unquietnes and misordre." Affairs in Germany at the time of the Peace of Passau are well described in a paper addressed to "Your Grace." Among the few notices of public events in Queen Mary's reign is a curious proof of the lawlessness of the North. The Earl of Westmorland relates how "the Rokesbyes, the Bowssies, the Wicliffes," with their adherents to the number of three hundred or more, set on him at a horse-race—"on thors rynnunge day"—on Gaterley Moor, intending to "trap" him to please the Duke of Northumberland. In 1563 the Earl of Rutland received a long letter from Randolph, describing how the Queen of Scots opened her Parliament, attended by "the four virgins, maydes, Maries, damoysselles of honor, or the Quen's mignons, cawle them as please your honour, but a fayerrer syghte was never seen." At this time, Randolph says, Elizabeth and Mary were on familiar terms, and letters, "wrytten in whole sheetes of paper with their owne handes," constantly passed between them. Several letters are full of gossip about Elizabeth's Court. The marriage of the Earl of Oxford with Anne Cecil "caused great wypping, waling, and sorrowful chere" among the young ladies "that hoped to have hade that golden daye." In a letter of 1576 the Court is said to be "as full of malice and spite as when" the Earl of Rutland left it. The Queen had been angry with Mary Shelton for her wish to marry, and had "telt liberall bothe with bloes and yevill wordes." Sir Philip Sidney, writing in December 1583, shortly after the discovery of Throgmorton's plot, describes Elizabeth as "troubled with suspicions which aryse of some illmynded subiectes towards her."

The fourth Earl of Rutland died in 1588, only a year after his succession to the earldom, and left his wife and children badly off. His son and successor, Roger, was at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and his tutor, John Jegon, afterwards Bishop of Norwich, reported well of him in a letter to his mother. In this letter Jegon asks for more bedding for the Earl's attendants: "We have but one bed besides his lordship's, and we have now four daily waiters to lodge." The young Earl's sister, Lady Bridget, was appointed one of the Queen's maids of honour, and for a time gave her royal mistress much satisfaction; but she got into a sad scrape by marrying a Mr. Tyrwhit, and was for a short space committed to the custody of the Countess of Bedford, while her husband was put in prison. We have a bright account, written by Robert Cecil, of how the Armada sailed up the Channel, and Drake captured the galleon of Don Pedro de "Lulaghe" (Valdez); he speaks of the "great magnanimy of the Queen, who was not a whit dismayed." The next paper is a "Briefe Declaration" of the Spanish disasters up to 28th July. Earl Roger was involved in the rebellion of Essex, but not being "any of the complotters," and "lyke a lamb drawn in among them," got off with a short imprisonment and a fine. There are several notices of persecutions suffered by the Roman Catholics. Among these is a pamphlet on the life and death of Thomas Colwell of Feversham, which contains a curious and highly probable story about the reconciliation of Henry VIII. to the Princess Mary, and the behaviour of the little Lady Elizabeth. The execution of a priest named Barkworth in 1601 is told with horrible details; others suffered with him, one of them a woman. A letter from the Earl of Shrewsbury to his brother, dated 5th November, 1605, gives a circumstantial narrative of the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot, and the arrest of "one Johnson," as Guy Fawkes called himself. In 1609 there was a general opinion that "a milder course would be held" with Roman Catholics; and we are told that James was not displeased with Cardinal Bellarmine's answer to his book. This, no doubt, refers to the King's Premonition to all the Most Mighty Monarchs, which was written in answer to Bellarmine's reply to the Apology for the Oath of Allegiance. A short report of the debates in the Commons, in November 1610, on the proposed Contract is of some value. Under 1621 we have a schedule of wages of "artificers, handycraftsmen, labourers, and servants," in Lincolnshire, assessed by the Justices of the Peace. By far the most important of the papers relating to the reign of Charles I. in this volume is the Diary of George, seventh Earl of Rutland, during the King's expedition against the Scots in 1639. He gives a minute account of the refusal of Lords Say and Brooke to take the military oath proposed by the King, and makes it evident that the nobles generally disliked Charles's proceedings. Rutland considered the oath ambiguous, and desired that the King would interpret it, and he made a decidedly chilling answer to the request that the lords would pledge themselves to contribute each a certain force to the army. The lack of discipline among the King's troops is illustrated by the conduct of the Earl of Northumberland, who, when displeased at being ordered to march in the rear, bade his "Cornett and Trumpett to plucke of their cullers." The second Scotch war was regarded with general dislike, and Sir Francis Fane records how the Devon troops rioted, and how, while the Court of Sewers was sitting at Wisbeach, some two hundred soldiers, thinking that the Bishop of Ely was in the court, beset the doors, crying out "Give us Wren, that damned Bishop Ely; wee will have him, or else fyer the towne and cutt the troats of all the Commissioners." The present volume goes down to May 1641, and the Report will occupy two volumes more.

CLASSIC TALES.*

THE publishers of this series have given no account whatever of the source from which it is reprinted, and it has not been without some little difficulty that we have traced the origin of these Classic Tales. The introductory papers, which are prefixed to the work of each novelist represented, were contributed by Leigh Hunt to the Monthly Repository of Theology and General Literature in the course of 1806, and reprinted in five little volumes in the next year. As far as we are aware, they have remained almost unknown for the last eighty years; and they form one of the most obscure sections of Leigh Hunt's work. They were scarcely worth reprinting, we must confess. Leigh Hunt was only two-and-twenty when they were published, and, though his style was already fluent, his knowledge was extremely limited, and his taste immature. Although he does not seem to have thought it worth while to make even an allusion to Classic Tales when he was composing his Autobiography, we may trace, towards the end of the first volume of that entertaining memoir, indications of the line of reading which produced the essays. We may even trace, in the manner of the latter, the influence of the Connoisseur of Bonnell Thornton and Colman, which, in 1806, was giving Leigh Hunt "all the transports of a first love." He tells us also of the very great impression made upon him at this time by Voltaire; and it is interesting to compare the little essay here called "Thoughts on some of Voltaire's Romances" with the eloquent pages on the same subject which Hunt published in 1850. In 1806 Leigh Hunt was not able to read French, and it was doubtless in the translation which is here reproduced that he studied both Voltaire and Marmontel. If he had been acquainted with the original he would have noticed that the version of Marmontel, although written in graceful English, was full of extraordinary blunders. The present publishers might, we think, have subjected their reprint in this matter to some revision. The Voltaire is much better done, and is, we fancy, that translation to which Franklin put his name, and which Smollett is reported to have supervised.

* Historical MSS. Commission. Twelfth Report, Appendix, Part IV. The Manuscripts of His Grace the Duke of Rutland, preserved at Belvoir Castle. Vol. I. London: printed for Her Majesty's Stationery Office by Eyre & Spottiswoode.

* Classic Tales, Serious and Lively. Collected by Leigh Hunt. 5 vols. London and Edinburgh: William Paterson.

The Voltaire volume contains Zadig, Micromegas, The Huron, and five or six of the smaller stories. Hunt's prefatory essay is not profound, but it is sympathetic and just. At a time when it was certainly not the fashion in England to deal generously or even fairly with Voltaire, the young publicist, who was nothing if not independent, does not scruple to place the Frenchman at the head of all modern wits. Curiously enough, he is more sparing in giving praise to L'Ingénu than to any of the other tales, condemning the character of the Huron as inconsistently drawn, and as essentially untrue to life. This is the more odd because of the extraordinary personal interest which Leigh Hunt was, a little later on, to take in this character, which he came to consider, as readers of the Autobiography will recollect, an almost inspired prophetic portrait of himself. But in his analysis of Zadig, which he describes as the most perfect romance of its kind in Europe, Leigh Hunt falls into a strange species of commendation. "Voltaire," he says, "never falls into the common error of novelists, who, in their eagerness to amuse, forget the proper season for instruction; his characters are always happy or miserable as they are virtuous or vicious." This last clause is an astounding comment on the attitude of the author of Candide towards human vicissitude, and it might have occurred to any one less optimistic than Hunt that even in his favourite Zadig the personages were not always happy or miserable according as they were virtuous or vicious.

The second of these little volumes gives, of Johnson, the whole of Rasselas and some episodes from the Rambler; of Henry Mackenzie, Louisa Venoni and La Roche; and of Sterne the conventional fragments of Le Fevre, Maria, and Yorick. The essay on Johnson as a novelist is not a happy effort. In the first place, to say that Rasselas is "filled with a black and useless melancholy" is so exaggerated as to be practically incorrect; and the only passage in the essay which is worthy of preservation is the following, which, although the sentiments are trite enough, is expressed with remarkable grace, and in a spirit highly characteristic of its author:—

They who are generally at ease with life feel every little grief an enormous burden, which they must endeavour to lighten by complaint; they, on the contrary, who are continually unfortunate will be less willing to talk of what is at the same time so common to themselves and so disagreeable of communication to others. The deepest sorrow, like the deepest stream, is the most silent: little cares, like brooks made by sudden rain, are alike noisy, shallow, and fugitive.

In 1806 it was the fashion to express enthusiasm for the mild and unassuming Mackenzie, whose talents had just been rewarded by Government with a lucrative post. Yet, when Leigh Hunt tells us that he knows no two little narratives so interesting as La Roche and Louisa Venoni, he seems to carry too far the prevailing weakness for the softest of the disciples of Sterne. At the same time, it may easily be admitted that the elegance, the gentlemanly sensibility of Mackenzie are in this day underrated, as they were soon, when Leigh Hunt wrote, to be eclipsed by the truth of Jane Austen and the romantic vigour of Walter Scott. When the reader opens Louisa Venoni, and finds that afflicted object resigned to the torpor of melancholy, from which she is only to be aroused by a hand-organ, "of remarkably sweet tone," playing Swiss airs in the street, when she flings herself on to the pavement to embrace the remarkably unpleasant organ-grinder, who "throws off a tattered coat and a black patch," and is her own implacable papa, who has selected this extraordinary disguise and profession in order to soften the pangs of his paternal resentment, then that reader is inclined to say that all this may be pretty, but that it is hardly natural or "unaffected." Mackenzie, if he is read at all, should be studied on the broader canvas of The Man of Feeling. Hunt's essay on Sterne is the best of those here reprinted. It enters with acumen into the antagonistic qualities of Sterne's work, and distributes blame and approval in a judicious degree. It is to the Sentimental Journey rather than to Tristram Shandy that Leigh Hunt, with a pre-science of modern opinion, is inclined to give the preference. It is very odd that he is able to see the faults which disfigure the writings of this great man, and yet has nothing that is not polite to say of the infinitely inferior but analogous Mackenzie. But, perhaps, the reason of this is to be found in the fact that when the essay was published Sterne had long been dead, while the sensitive Man of Feeling was still alive.

One whole volume is dedicated to Marmontel and a selection of eight of his once celebrated Contes Moraux. The modern reader may be amazed at the tone in which Leigh Hunt speaks of these productions, until he recollects that in 1806 Marmontel was but recently dead, and still at the height of his reputation. It cannot be said that Contes Moraux are unfairly represented in the specimens given. A critic who desired to indicate the most favourable instance possible of Marmontel would probably invite the student to a perusal of "The Shepherdess of the Alps." If he desired to exemplify the Oriental manner of the writer, he would point to "Soliman II.," and each of these tales occurs in the selection before us. In his comparison of Goldsmith with Marmontel—a comparison which is intended, on the whole, to redound to the glory of the French writer—Leigh Hunt is singularly blinded by prejudice or by the fashion of the moment. When he mentions, as the peculiar excellence of Marmontel, his exact fidelity to life and his accurate imitation of nature, he shows himself curiously at fault. The stories of Marmontel have graces of their own. The characters are like groups of pale Dresden china come to life, and they pursue their balanced avocations with an elegant suavity which it is, in some moods, agreeable to observe. As pieces of writing the tales are delicate, well balanced, and refined. But they and the figures which move in them are of the extreme order of artificiality. Take "The Shepherdess of the Alps," for instance, which we shall not attempt to deny is a pleasing specimen of literary artifice. What could show less fidelity to life, less imitation of nature, than the mode in which this exquisite creature of noble birth is discovered by the Marquis and his lady, or the extraordinary avocation which she selects, or the peculiar transports of the son of the Marquis (founded on the mediæval tradition of sudden love at the sight of a picture), or than the pastoral manner of their wooing? Mr. Ruskin, it is true, with that occasional acuteness which makes his elusive expressions of literary opinion so tantalizingly valuable, has said that the sayings and thoughts of Marmontel's personages "deserve extreme attention, for in their fine tremulous way, like the blossoming heads of grass in May, they are perfect." This is, in a measure, true; but to appreciate the fine tremulousness we have to admit the purely artificial atmosphere in which such strange winds of emotion blow. The imitation of his predecessors, too, can generally be traced in Marmontel. His "tremulous" characters in their delicacy are coy and cold descendants of Crébillon, and most of the great sentimental story-tellers of the preceding half-century added something to his style. "Friendship put to the Test" owes not a little to the Ingénu of Voltaire, and we may see how Marmontel used ideas created by greater men, if we compare the character of Coraly, the sentimental East Indian ingénue, with that of the Huron. The great fault of Marmontel is, that he is cold. Among the principal French novel-writers of the eighteenth century he is the most chilly, the least impassioned. The story of "Lauretta" appears to us to be the best of the Contes Moraux, than which no book ever boasted a more absurd name. If there be an author who is neither moral nor immoral, and in whom the idea of morality in its didactic form produces neither approval nor distaste, but only simple indifference, it is Marmontel. A sublimated politeness is the highest virtue known to him, and this, balanced by the artificial instinct of honour, will be found to form his universal inspiration.

What Leigh Hunt liked in Marmontel he seems to have liked still more in Hawkesworth, who, nevertheless, we must confess to thinking a much less important writer. His essay on Hawkesworth is one of the worst in this whole collection, from the critical point of view. We simply know not what Leigh Hunt meant, even at the age of twenty-two, when he congratulated Hawkesworth on purifying English taste of the "empty pomposity and fantastic bombast" produced by the influence of Rasselas, or when he praised him for substituting his "own characteristic manner" for styles previously in vogue. Hawkesworth, a genial man and a careful writer, was a mere satellite of Johnson, and it would have surprised and scandalized him to have seen what Leigh Hunt writes about him. Those who like to consider Hawkesworth's claim to the lofty position here suggested for him may read Almorán and Hamet before they consent to place its author above Johnson, or even on a rank with Brooke or Mackenzie.

The mention of Brooke reminds us that he shares with Goldsmith one volume of this series of Classic Tales. It is not necessary, however, to enter into detailed criticism of the very slight essays prefixed to these selections. On the whole, we cannot think that the present reprint was a judicious one. To Leigh Hunt, at any rate, it is manifestly unfair to bring forward juvenile and undigested essays written before he became a critic, and of which there is some reason to believe that he was ashamed.

ELECTRIC LIGHT FOR THE MILLION.*

ELECTRIC-LIGHTING has now reached a point at which it has become important that a general, and as far as possible untechnical, knowledge of its mode of production, of its cost, and of its appliance should be possessed by the public. In all writings on scientific subjects there are words which at first are apt to frighten the uninitiated. And for those minds which soar to the regions of belief on a dogma such as "Electricity is life," it may be hard to descend to the hard-and-fast rules and facts of rigid science. Yet when these persons are about to receive electricity in their houses, turned thereinto by a tap, and measured (and paid for) by a meter, it is at least desirable that they should know as much about it as about water or gas. We all in our youth learnt by heart some horrible tables called Weights and Measures. Most of us know still in a vague sort of way what a gallon is; all of us probably the meaning of a cubic foot. Even the most stupid housewife has a notion of what a pound avoirdupois comes to in beef or mutton. The number who can understand the relations between these measures is smaller; but they can always refer to their pocket-books for their facts. Still fewer, however, know that the uncouth words which they meet with in electrical writings are only the corresponding measurements for that so-called fluid. Watts, volts, and ampères are words which convey naturally no meaning to the mind; and yet, for all practical purposes, they can be understood as easily as pounds and gallons. Mr. Guy has unfortunately only given the bare statement of the relationship between the three, and has confined himself to saying that "pressure is expressed in volts" and "quantity in ampères." To those unfamiliar with the subject these definitions are absolutely unintelligible, and will probably only serve to confuse. And yet, if any reasonable man is anxious to have an installation in his house, they are words which he ought to understand, for how else can he read intelligently the engineer's report?

It is an astonishing fact that there are many people of education who do not grasp the principle of conservation of energy. It is not to the unfortunate seekers after perpetual motion and finders of quarters in lunatic asylums that we refer. It is to the gentleman of parts and learning, the scholar and man of business, who is prepared to blunder headlong into the most extreme absurdities. If an ore contained only twenty per cent. of metal, the man who believed that he could invent a process by which he could extract twenty-five per cent. from the same ore would be regarded as scarcely fit to manage his own concerns. And yet we have seen intelligent men make the same blunder over questions of energy. A gentleman who had taken a not unimportant part in the government of this country was anxious not long ago to install electric light into a country house which he was then completing. He sent for an expert, with a view to obtaining an estimate of the cost of erection and working, mentioning the fact that he had water-power close by. To his amusement, rather than to his astonishment, the expert found that the water-power consisted of a small trickling stream, with a slight fall, capable of giving in the twenty-four hours about a tenth part of the energy required for the proposed number of lights. "But," said the owner, "can we not dam it up?" For a long time he could not be brought to see his blunder. At last the expert hit upon an analogy. "Suppose," he said, "you had an income of 12,000*l.* a year, and you were to spend nothing for eleven months, would that enable you to live at the rate of 144,000*l.* a year?" The worthy owner saw that this would not be so. "How then," continued the expert, "can you expect a stream of water to behave differently to a stream of gold?" The landlord was dimly convinced of the truth of this reasoning, when a brilliant idea flashed across his mind. "I know," he said hurriedly, lest his invention should occur to the mind of the expert, "a way to get over that difficulty. There is a much greater supply of water in the well than we need. Why should we not have a larger pumping engine, and pump the water up here, so as to have sufficient for what you require for electricity?" After that the expert gave it up.

What the author of the book before us has not realized is the essential ignorance of educated mankind on electrical matters. Many of his explanations go either too far or not far enough. To the "uninitiated," for whom they are intended, they will give no greater satisfaction than a conjurer gives to his audience when he explains one piece of sleight-of-hand by another. To the initiated they are useless. Thus there is a description of a dynamo which would be absolutely meaningless to the ordinary individual. What could he understand of the following? "The armature is an iron core, also wound with wire, and is keyed on to a spindle and rotated between the poles of the field magnets, which are fashioned to a curve concentric with that of the armature; in rotating the armature wires are made to cut through the magnetic lines of force which stream across the gap between the poles." This is not even very scientifically worded. But putting this aside, it would put the intelligent "uninitiated" into a hopeless fog, and this quite unnecessarily. It would not have been difficult to give a description of the action of a dynamo, and of why it produces an electric current, which would have given a fairly clear idea to any ordinary man—as clear an idea, at any rate, as he has on the subject of a steam-engine—and this without talking about magnetic lines of force at all.

But, while we cannot congratulate Mr. Guy on his success as a popular explainer of scientific phenomena, we are glad to be able to say that the portions of his little book which refer to the statistics of cost are carefully collected, and will prove useful to all who are weighing in their minds the introduction into their premises of electricity for lighting. Strangely enough the use of electricity as a motive power is not touched upon, which lessens the completeness of the book considerably. For this branch of the subject will in the future be as inextricably bound up with the other as the use of gas for cooking is bound up with its use for lighting. The specially interesting calculation to many consumers will be that as to the choice, for a private installation, of a steam-engine or a gas-engine as a motive power for the generation of electricity. The author's view is that for quantities over forty-horse power—i.e. for a larger number than four hundred sixteen-candlepower incandescent lamps—it would pay to use a steam-engine, and for a smaller number a gas-engine. This conclusion would, of course, vary somewhat according to the relative local prices of coal, gas, and labour.

The author gives fuller statistics on the subject of arc than of incandescent lighting, which seems scarcely to be in accordance with the professed aim of the work. For it is certain that ninety-nine out of every hundred consumers will use incandescent lamps only. An arc light in an ordinary town house gives one a fizzing sensation even to think of. Nor is he to be specially complimented either on the amplitude or the accuracy of his facts as to central station lighting. It is difficult, of course, to lay down definite figures. But he certainly ought to have given some very wide margins for contingencies. Coals for most central stations in London will cost much more than sixteen shillings a ton, and five per cent. is a most absurdly small allowance for rent, taxes, and depreciation on property, the bulk of which is machinery. It would be very interesting to know, too, where it would be possible to procure two fifty-horse power boilers and three engines with fittings, foundations, and the buildings to hold them complete for 1,150*l.* However, in spite of many faults, this little book will be of use to many inquirers. And we can recommend the many masters of houses who are hesitating in their minds what to do on this question to invest sixpence in its purchase.

PAPERS FROM PUMP-HANDLE COURT.*

THIS brochure consists of a series of short sketches which originally appeared in the pages of Punch, and which relate divers incidents in the career of a hypothetical briefless barrister. They are for the most part marked by quaintness and originality, with touches of satire as delicate as it is inoffensive; and, except that some good points may perhaps be missed by those happy ones who have had no personal experience of either law courts or chambers, they cannot fail to win the heartiest appreciation. Occasionally, however, possibility is overstrained, as in "The Suspicious Brief Bag," where Mr. Briefless, not once, but repeatedly, mistakes his own clerk for a detective, whom he imagines to be dogging his steps out of doors. This is not only like the immortal gruel "thin," but, as the gruel was not, "too thin." Such imperfections are, however, few and far between, and the majority of the sketches exhibit no small humour and imagination.

Perhaps the best of the series is "My First Appearance in a Diabolical Character," in which Mr. Briefless recounts his ecstatic emotion on being asked to "devil" for an absent friend. The idea of rehearsing his forensic eloquence before his own family may not be very original; but certainly that of bringing up all his sons as solicitors, in order that they may supply him with briefs later on, may fairly claim that credit. The incidents in Court, the solicitor's precocious junior clerk who, "in spite of his budding youth, had more law in his little finger than I possessed in my whole body," the "unearthly howl" which conflicting emotions caused him to emit when addressing the Court for the first time in his life, and the humiliating collapse of his maiden attempt, are all touched in with the hand of an artist.

GERMAN LITERATURE.

A NEW volume of stories by Ludwig Anzengruber is a noteworthy event for all German-speaking people. It is not necessary—indeed it is perhaps not possible—to attempt, within the space at our disposal, an adequate definition of this complex genius, and of the charm lent by the comfortable Southern dialect discoursed by his personages to the crisp and vigorous style of the foremost living "Volksdichter" of the Fatherland. Anzengruber's inspiration comes direct from the fount, and glows with richness of local colour. So deep has he drunk of the source nearest to him, that we may well content ourselves with what he has found there—truth as old as the world and as young as the day. These village tales (1), like those which were pub-

* Electric Light for the Million: a Handbook for the Uninitiated of Concise Practical Information on Electric Lighting and its Cost. By Arthur Frederick Guy, Associate-Member of the Institution of Electrical Engineers. London: Simpkin, Marshall, & Co. 1889.

* Papers from Pump-handle Court. By Arthur A'Beckett. London: Bradbury & Co.

(1) Wolken und Sonn'schein, gesammelte Dorfgeschichten. Von L. Anzengruber. Berlin und Stuttgart: Verlag von W. Spemann.

dished in 1885, like the powerful dramas which have long been popular in Vienna, the Pfarrer von Hirschfeld, the Meineidbauer, the Kreuzelschreiber, the Tochter des Wucherers, and others, in which he has not hesitated to tackle many a religious and social problem, are written with a purpose. That this is so without detriment to their literary form is a merit peculiar to their author. Perhaps because the purpose is more apparent than it used to be, we find in none of these latter ones a humour quite so subtle as that of the Gottüberlegener Jacob of 1885, nor a problem to solve so grim as the one which puzzled der alte Hubner (of the same series), although Gottverloren, with which this new book opens, runs the latter close. Meanwhile it interests us none the less for being half solved by the genial Pfarrer, with his amused pity for those who believe that "the Lord God drags Satan about by a chain to frighten people and worry all living things," and his conviction that "Christianity will soon be in as bad case as that sick hack Medicine, if unwilling folks are to be escorted to church by the beadle . . . there are plenty of hypocrites going, and no need to drill any more." This excellent parish priest is but one among the innumerable characters of a book which abounds with living creations. Those who turn its last page part regretfully from Fritz-Poldl, the returned convict, in the Heimkehr; the braggart Zirmkofer, in the Schatzgrübler, who holds his breath in admiration of the imaginary landscape where his imaginary encounter with the Evil One happened; the stern young peasant Veit, of Bösen Sprichwörtern, who would hobnob with none but the little hunchback tailor, and who delighted in the latter's nightly fiddle-playing—"for what matters an occasional slip of the bow if the whole is honestly meant?"—the happy little maid Sannerl and the Hermit in the delicately humorous Märchen; the ill-fated little wife Pauli in Wissen macht Herzweh; and from Krautschneiderjokl and Simmerlsephin in Nit gehn than that's. All these people stand out in relief from a crowd not less real than themselves, and from a narrative that is as admirable in form as in conception.

The Eastern travels of Frau Buchholz (2), in the interest of the stocking trade in particular and of civilization in general, are hardly on a par with her previous exploits. It is beginning to dawn upon us, by the light of this fifth volume, that Frau Wilhelmine, like many other domestic favourites, is very well in her proper place. Away from Berlin her occupation is gone. Not even our pleasure in such plums of wisdom as her views on fatalism, her adaptation of Darwin's theory to the future of the Egyptian "buffalo," and her discovery, through the use of Bädker's Arabic, "that you can never be too careful with foreign languages," can blind us to the lamentable fact that her patriotism is maudlin in Egypt, and her bathos intolerable in Jerusalem. It is quite a relief to leave her at the end of her journal no further away from home than Vienna, even if the return journey be accomplished in such leaps as land her (from Constantinople) at the Castle of Pelesch.

The Berliner Novellen comprised in Moderne Stoffe (3) are of the grimy and depressing order to be gleaned on the pavement, or rather in the gutter, of every large city by any writing person so uncomfortably minded. It is not our province to dispute an author's choice of subject, we are only concerned with his treatment of it. Mr. "John Henry Mackay" avers that to the hero of Existenzen he owes his own capacity for reading the "Truth of Life" athwart what he vaguely defines as the "Veil of Fine Words." We decline to strive for a glimpse of this much maligned Truth through the spectacles of so illogical and good-for-nothing a poseur as Mr. Paul Jordens, the aforesaid hero. We neither find in his lucubrations nor in the discovery of Marl Braun (in Nur eine Kellnerin)—that "Hate is the only true instinct of the human heart"—any justification, in form or matter, for the dedication of the first story to "All Idealists," and of the second to "All Realists."

"The art of the ancient historians is still unsurpassed; every imitation of them must lack the magic fragrance of their primordial originality." We quote from the opening chapter of Herr Welzhofer's accurate, lucid, and concise "History of the Greeks till the Time of Solon" (4). The writer is at his best in passages treating of prehistoric Aryan nomadism, philological conjecture, and the simple statement of authenticated historic facts. He is less happy when he endeavours to point a moral. The schoolboy of our youth and of all time, the schoolgirl of the period, will scarce suppress a smile at sight of the Teuton Clio, with Herr Welzhofer for her prophet, drawing starched skirts around her on the approach of long-robed Helen. "Eine befremdende Erscheinung." Well, perhaps; but that is not the way Greek genius has taught us to look upon her.

Professor Kuno Meyer's "Syntax" (5) (Parallel Grammar Series), intended rather to supplement than to supplant the teacher, shares with other works of the same edition the advantage of presenting, in as brief a space as possible, the chief features of the language to which it is a guide.

(2) Frau Buchholz im Orient. Berlin: Freund & Zeckel.

(3) Moderne Stoffe. Zwei Berliner Novellen. Von John Henry Mackay. Leipzig: Baumert & Ronge.

(4) Geschichte des griechischen Volkes bis zur Zeit Solons. Von Heinrich Welzhofer. Gotha: Friedrich Andreas Perthes.

(5) A German Grammar for Schools. Part II. Syntax. By Kuno Meyer, Ph.D. Parallel Grammar Series. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

NEW MUSIC.

MESSRS. ORSBORN & TUCKWOOD send us Book 22 of the "Vesper Voluntaries" for the organ, harmonium, or American organ, by D'Auvergne Barnard. It is a good collection of easy and taking pieces for general use, evidently written for moderate instruments and performers; but, to suit these entirely, ought there not to be some indication of the stops to be used? The marches and sustained melodies are the most successful in the work. The "Minster Echoes," Book 13, is also a series of voluntaries for the organ alone, is edited by King Hall, and is for more advanced players. It is quite satisfactory in all ways, there being nothing to complain of in the full directions given about the stops, swell, &c. "Musical Fragments," Book 31, is a Waltz Album, with many enjoyable but not very original values. They would all be pleasant to dance to, but D. Pecorini's "Mine for ever" shows the most inventive power. "Danse Majestique," by E. Boggetti, reminds us of an old-fashioned gavotte adapted to the modern style, and pleases us much. The "Imps' Revel," danse caractéristique, by Theo Bonheur, is singularly unequal in merit. The first subject is capital, quaint and characteristic; but the second subject, or kind of trio, is very tame and commonplace. "Old Nobility," by Allan Glyn, a "Graceful Danse," answers to its description; but something more is wanted to render it a little less monotonous. Henry Pontet's humorous song, "To-morrow will do," has decided elements of popularity, without being vulgar. "When shall we meet?" by Oscar Verne, is a taking song, well worked up; and "The Trooper's Vision," by Edward St. Quentin, is a very spirited song of the patriotic type, well suited for Primrose meetings and popular entertainments. M. Piccolomini's "Salva nos, Domine" is a religious song of the conventional type; it has, however, decided merit, and appeals to the pathetic side of human nature.

Messrs. Reid Brothers send us a long list of music, amongst others a "Method" for the pianoforte edited and fingered by James Robinson. We regret to say that we do not think it a good method; beyond a page or two of the most elementary instruction and a few finger exercises, it is only a collection of commonplace tunes well known to all barrel-organs, set in the poorest and baldest way, suited neither to give technical knowledge nor to promote good taste in music. We had hoped that the revival of good musical instruction so much helped by the College and Academy of Music and many other institutions of the kind, had inspired a desire for a more thorough grounding in elementary music elsewhere. Six duets for ladies' voices, also by James Robinson, leave much to be desired; they are only suited to those brought up on the "Method." His cantata for young voices called "The Secret" is a happier effort; it is necessarily very slight, but bright and sparkling. "Little Red Riding Hood" is ditto. It is an operetta for juveniles. There is nothing very original in either; but they contain pleasing tunes in swinging, easily caught rhythm, suitable for quite young people. A march by H. Hawkins, called "Amphion," is disappointing. The first subject is decidedly good, with an old-fashioned ring about it—alas! the second subject, or trio, is trite and uninteresting. "The Lyric," by the same composer, is nothing very remarkable, but is decidedly pretty. "Salamanca," a Spanish valse by William Bettridge, has a certain national flavour about it which makes it more original than a great many vales sent to us. Mr. Gerard F. Cobb's music to "Look before you leap" is charming—so simple, and yet out of the common. He is more at home in this song than in "Mary Queen of Scots," a more dramatic attempt. "A Hundred Fathoms Deep," by W. H. Jude, might be effective for a singer who has rich deep notes, and "Come to me," by Walter Wadham, although suitable enough to the words, is monotonous.

We have received from the London Music Publishing Company the "Royal Persian March and National Hymn," by Churchill Sibley; the March is poor, but there is some character in the Hymn. "The Queen of Beauty," waltz, by R. L. Sevenoaks, is bright and good for dancing, as likewise is "Ma Chérie," by Percy M. Hewitt.

"The East Indian," by Jaques Haakman, published by Charles Woolhouse, is a pretty simple song, with a nice flowing accompaniment.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

WHETHER it is wise to open a book of essays, most of which are devoted to what may be called permanent subjects, with a preface occupied in great part with General Boulanger we rather doubt; but the Duke de Broglie (1) ought to know his own mind by this time, and has right enough to declare it. Perhaps it is possible to discover both in this preface and in the concluding article of the volume—the address delivered at a dinner of the Union Monarchique two years ago—some evidences of that want of practical spirit and of ability to discover where the nail will go and where it is no use driving it which have so long excluded from politics one of the ablest public men of France. Certainly if these two documents speak the Duke's real mind, it is impossible not to wish that he had seen it more clearly and worked for it harder and more decisively between 1870 and 1877. The musty old truth Post est occasio calva never applied with more fatal force to any political party, or bundle of parties, than to the Monarchists of France during that period, hampered as they undoubtedly were by their chiefs. Another purely political paper is the letter to the Moniteur on annual and permanent budgets, which is somewhat more than a year old. On the other hand, there are numerous pieces of all dates from 1870 to the other day (the Duke holds that 1870 marked so great a gulf in the thought of Frenchmen that what came before and after it should be kept apart) which have a less temporary bearing. There are, to begin with, two long papers dealing with the Duke's special subject—the diplomacy of the last century, notably in reference to the Seven Years' War—there are some reviews, such as one on M. d'Avenel's book on Richelieu, and another on M. Duruy's view of Constantine; there are divers addresses to Societies, from the great Academy itself down to a body with the terrible title Société générale d'émulation (the Devil-take-the-hindmost Club, may we translate it?) All, it is needless to say, have M. de Broglie's note—a note which must rejoice the very soul of Captain Galton—of clear, narrow doctrinairism in thought—a doctrinairism capably fitted for slipping along in the calm administration of a stable Government, but not helpful to a pilot in extremity. And all also have his note of form—a form of very considerable excellence.

(1) Histoire et diplomatie. Par le Duc de Broglie. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

We have nothing very remarkable to chronicle in the way of novels this week. M. Gabriel Ferry (2) has written, not unconstructively, about two great novelists—Balzac and Dumas—but in this case the driving of fat oxen doth not necessarily confer fatness. Indeed, in so far as we remember his own previous novel, Les deux maris de Marthe, Les exploits de César is not an improvement. César is a kind of minor Numa Roumestan, who is a cabotin by profession as well as by nature. His neglected wife has a friend (at first in all honour), who is himself a sculptor of neglected genius. The rest who knows not? But M. Ferry has lost what chances he had by making the virtuous Raymonde become unvirtuous at last in an apathetic and uninteresting kind of way, and “suiciding” the sculptor as a final solution of the knot. This is the art of a schoolboy. There is much more pathos in M. Paul Meurice's Songe de l'amour (3), as well as much better writing. But here, too, we have an unnecessary tragedy of termination. The supposition that because a “curtain” is necessary in drama it is necessary in the novel is natural but delusive. The time of the book is thrown some forty years back, which admits an agreeable freedom from present mannerisms of style, and the opening sketch of the critic George Giroux, “G. G.,” is vivid, and recognizable with no great difficulty. Les fiancés de Radegonde (4) avoids the fault of these two books, and contains some fair studies of character, but is perhaps a little lacking in interest of story.

Among the educational books we have before us a Théâtre de la jeunesse, by Mrs. Hugh Bell (Longmans), a collection of very well written little dramatic sketches, the only objection to which is that the tone of their satire is rather over children's heads, or at least ought to be so. Another reading-book (for we suppose Mrs. Bell's plays are meant to be read as well as acted) is a fresh collection of About's stories—the “Jumeaux de l'hôtel Corneille” of course leading off—by M. A. P. Huguenet. The notes constantly intrude on the province of the dictionary, and that not too happily. It may be true—though the statement has difficulties—that “the French heraldic vocabulary was brought to England by the Normands [sic] and is still used, the spelling of some words having been slightly altered”; but, though a “Normand” may know what “you bear quarterly or-gules” means, we don't think an English herald would, and “green” in English heraldry is (at least regularly and usually) “vert” rather than “sinople.” Two books which may be useful are Dr. Thum's and Mr. Whitfield's Grammar of the French Language of Business and Concise French Commercial Reader (Hachette). But we do not care for the Hamiltonian arrangement of the first, and Dr. Thum's argument that the verb is an inferior part of speech, because long telegrams often contain not a single verb, is an alarming, though amusing, hint as to the language of the future. The books are printed in Germany, with the result of some inconveniences. We write “domicile,” not “domicil,” in English.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

SIXTEEN years have passed since Miss Amelia B. Edwards wrote that pleasant record of a ramble in the Dolomite country, Untrodden Peaks and Unfrequented Valleys (Routledge), and now, in a second edition, the accomplished author finds there is little to modify in her narrative, and nothing to add except a few notes for the tourist and climber of to-day. The peaks are more familiar, and those that do not absolutely defy the climber are more trodden; the valleys are decidedly more frequented by tourists than when Miss Edwards visited the district, in some sort as a pioneer, and received the honours of a first ascent by reaching the summit of the Sasso Bianco of Monte Pezza. There are now roads where there were rough bridle-tracks; new inns, or improved, replace many of the old hostelryes; new railroads make Cortina of easy access from Venice by way of Conegliano, and branch lines connect Belluno, Feltra, and Bassano with the trunk line from Verona and Venice. By the Austrian survey the heights of many of the Dolomite peaks are now accurately determined. All these changes are duly recorded in the foot-notes of the new edition and the improved routes marked on the excellent map. The means of locomotion are also greatly extended, and on several roads diligences are regularly run. Whether the traveller enters the marvellous land, so graphically depicted by pen and picture in this volume, by way of Venice, or Botzen, or Brunecken, he will find the rough routes of old made tolerably easy now. And, with the certainty of better food and accommodation than were attainable in 1873, he will find, as Miss Edwards says, no change in the primitive people and country. Here and there the “improver” has been at work. At Pieve di Cadore, for instance, the curious fountain with the statue of St. Tiziano sketched by Miss Edwards no longer stands on the little grassy plateau in front of the birthplace of Titian. But there is little more of the kind that calls for notice. And, like the country, the book remains what it was, both in narrative and incidents. We have re-read it with all the old pleasure it gave us when it was new.

It might well be considered superfluous to write a book “to prove and illustrate the statement that marriage and divorce in the United States are in an unsatisfactory condition.” This is a mild expression of a notorious fact. It is the object, however, of a remarkable volume—Marriage and Divorce in the United States (Philadelphia: Lippincott)—written by the Rev. D. Convers. The extraordinary diversity of the marriage law in the United States has given rise to an extensive literature. Not long since the subject was exhaustively illustrated, and the plea for a uniform inter-State law powerfully urged in a book by Mr. and Mrs. Thwing entitled The Family. Mr. Convers follows similar lines in illustrating by facts and figures drawn from the law reports and statistics of the States the extreme variability and laxity of the law, and the evils that spring therefrom. “Confusion worse confounded” is the result of this system. Lax in one matter, strict in another, is the rule; Maryland alone requires a religious ceremony to make marriage valid, though any one with a “conscientious scruple” has only to travel from that State to Washington to appease his conscience. South Carolina, again, is the only State that absolutely prohibits divorce. Elsewhere the law varies from the comparative strictness of New York to every conceivable degree of laxity in the remaining States and Territories. The scandalous enactments of Utah, and the “omnibus clause” of Connecticut and some other States, have, it is true, been repealed in recent years; yet more than enough remains in the conflicting statutes still in force to be a prolific source of confusion and evil. This, at least, must be admitted, even by those who do not entirely sympathize with the views of the writer of this able little book.

The poems of Mr. Francis Lucas, Sketches of Rural Life (Macmillan & Co.), suggest two distinct manners of poetical treatment. In one the poet recalls the poetry of English rural life represented by Bloomfield and Clare. He continues the tradition, as it were, and enlarges the meaning of Keats's verse “The poetry of earth is never dead.” In the other he falls into artifices, admires the Muse like any Augustan, and sings of “Scarborough, bright Hygeia's loved abode.” His “Woodman” and “Ploughman” are racy and individual. “Hedger and Ditcher” is a not less vigorous sketch of one of the humbler description of agricultural labourers. There may not be much poetry in laying field-drains, but Mr. Lucas vivifies the scene and dignifies the occupation by many a happy touch. He makes the picture live by his effective realism:—

And now, from the black north again,
The blast comes howling by,
About the stackyards in the lane
The flocking small birds fly,
And the wintry day is waning wan
Along the western sky.

The influence of Longfellow is more than suggested in Mr. Arthur Wentworth Eaton's Acadian Legends and Lyrics (New York and London: White & Allen), though it is not, as might be surmised, discernible in Mr. Eaton's ballads of the early French settlements in America. We are reminded of the author of Evangeline by poems that celebrate nothing Acadian, by the pretty stanzas, “The Angel Sleep,” for instance:—

When the day is done and the shadows fall
Over the earth like a dusky pall,
Then from the unknown, silent deep Rises the beautiful Angel Sleep.

In “Foundry Fires,” again, we feel that Longfellow has a true disciple in Mr. Eaton when, after a striking description of a forge in full blast, he calls upon the “forgemen of the nations” to “keep the world's great fires alight,” till stars fade, and faith and knowledge widen, and so forth.

The Year Book of Commerce (Cassell & Co.), edited by Kenric B. Murray, is a new statistical book of reference for business men, compiled under the authority of the London Chamber of Commerce, and a development of the “Statistical Section” of their Annual Report. The work, contributed by many well-known writers, English and foreign, supplies in convenient form a general survey of the world's trade, based on the most recent official data available. The relative position of the great commercial countries is clearly indicated, the course of any one trade in any part of the world is easily mastered, and the method of tabulation, combined as it is with a good index and an excellent introductory survey, is admirably succinct and sound. Altogether, the new venture will be valued by all who consult it.

(2) Les exploits de César. Par Gabriel Ferry. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(3) Le songe de l'amour. Par Paul Meurice. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(4) Les fiancés de Radegonde. Par Adrien Chabot. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

Mr. George L. Mélio has compiled an illustrated Manual of Swedish Drill (Sampson Low & Co.), based on the system of the late Petter Henrik Ling, poet, fencing-master, and physiologist, who founded the Royal Gymnastic Institute of Stockholm, and reaped many honours during a life of much wandering and many vicissitudes. His system of physical training seems to be tolerably well known in England, for it is practised at Newnham College, the London Board schools, and by the Young Women's Christian Association. Mr. Mélio's diagrams suggest a pretty severe series of exercises. If the School Board teachers, in fact, put their pupils through all the stages of the ten lessons here illustrated, those philanthropic souls who cry aloud for more recreation are somewhat hard to please. Drill, after lessons, though not so good as play, is yet a form of play, and decidedly beneficial.

The photographer being much abroad at this season will doubtless read and profit by the excellent remarks of Mr. H. P. Robinson on "Instantaneous Photography" appended to the second edition of Picture-making by Photography (Hazell, Watson, & Viney). "Very quick exposures" have their use, as Mr. Robinson admits, but the instantaneous process is far more generally abused and is of little value in artistic photography.

We have received the County Councillor's Directory for England and Wales ("Contract Journal" Company, Limited); The A B C of a Healthy House, a useful little handbook of sanitation, by Mr. R. W. Boyd (Boyd & Son); and a sixpenny edition of Sheridan's Plays (Dicks)—all the plays, it may be noted—in readable type, with illustrations and Leigh Hunt's essay.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW Bill of Contents will be forwarded every Friday Evening by post, prepaid, to any Newsagent in Town or Country on application to the Publisher.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had in Paris every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse); also at Le KIOSQUE DUPERRON, Boulevard des Capucines, and Le KIOSQUE MICHEL, Boulevard des Capucines, by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may likewise be obtained in Paris every Saturday of Messrs. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,765, AUGUST 24, 1889:

The Maybrick Case.

Theatricals at Sea. England and Germany.

"Unekal." The East-End Strike. The Germans Abroad.

Summary Jurisdiction. "Ireland Expects —"

Crete and Armenia. The Science Collection.

Among the Chachans.

Madame Puzzi. The Devonshire Association.

Modern Church Windows. Reports from the Moors.

The Harvest. Hyacinths and Daffodils.

The Plantation Negro as a Freeman.

Novels. Englishmen in the French Revolution.

Raichenbachia. Fifty Years on the Trail. Books on Divinity.

The Rutland MSS. Classic Tales.

Electric Light for the Million. Papers from Pump-Handle Court.

German Literature. New Music. French Literature.

New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—GRAND and NOVEL FIREWORKS, on Saturday, August 24, at 8.45, by C. T. Brock & Co. The Great Fiery Sea Serpent; Neptune rising from the Ocean, drawn by Sea Horses; the Niagara of Fire; Aerial Bouquet of Violets and Ferns; Pyrotechnic Bicycle Race; Screen of Diamond Sparks; Salvo of Signal Rockets; Volleys of Great Shells; Aerial Mèlange of Fiery Scorpions, Cobras, and Snakes, &c.—One Shilling Day.

TOUR in the MEDITERRANEAN.—The ORIENT COM-PANY will despatch their large full-powered steamship "CHIMBORAZO," 3,847 tons register, 3,000 horse-power, from London on the 25th of September, for a Thirty-eight Days' Cruise, visiting Lisbon, Gibraltar, Algiers, Palermo, Naples, Leghorn, Genoa, Nice, Malaga, and Cadiz.

The "CHIMBORAZO" is fitted with the electric light, hot and cold baths, &c. Cuisine of the highest order.

Managers..... F. GREEN & CO., and ANDERSON, ANDERSON, & CO., Fenchurch Avenue, London, E.C.

For terms and further particulars apply to the latter firm, or to the West-End Agents, Grindlay & Co., 55 Parliament Street, S.W.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK. ISSUE of £371,320.

(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)

The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.

Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.

Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & CO., 67 Lombard Street.

No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.

Under the Trust Investment Act, 1889, recently passed, this Stock is an available investment for every Trustee who is not expressly forbidden by the instrument creating his trust to invest in Corporation Stock.

Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by Borough Accountant's Office, Bridge Street, Sheffield,
August 16, 1889. W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.

SCHWEITZER'S

COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

VAN HOUTEN'S
COCOA.

PURE—SOLUBLE.
BEST & GOES FARTHEST.
EASILY DIGESTED.
MADE INSTANTLY.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."
Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."
British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

FRY'S

J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."

PURE CONCENTRATED

E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that I have ordered it for family use."

COCOA.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR
by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S
CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal Claim to the Public Confidence.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London. Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES.

Prices from 40 Guineas upwards. JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

CADBURY'S COCOA

IS ABSOLUTELY PURE

A few of the many Good Reasons why Cadbury's Cocoa enjoys such World-wide Popularity.

It is guaranteed to be Pure Cocoa.

It is made instantly with Boiling Milk or Water.

It is not reduced in value by the addition of Starch, Sugar, &c.

It is specially rich in flesh-forming and strength-sustaining principles.

It contains all the delicious aroma of the Natural Article without the excessive proportions of fat.

It is a delicious, nutritious, digestible, and comforting beverage suitable for all seasons of the year.

It is a gentle stimulant, and sustains against hunger and bodily fatigue.

In the whole process of manufacturing Cadbury's Pure Cocoa, the automatic machinery employed obviates the necessity for its being once touched by the human hand.

PARIS DEPÔT: 90 FAUBOURG ST. HONORÉ.

A NEW INVENTION. CHANGES COLOUR AND DEVELOPS OZONE IN WATER.
Patent Rights protected throughout the World.

Salt Regal

SUPPLIES A REFRESHING, APPETISING, EFFERVESCENT DRINK.

SALT REGAL is a high-class Antiseptic Salt, possessing hygienic properties hitherto unknown to Science. A grateful cooling cup, developing Ozone (the principle of life). Will cleanse the mouth, clear the throat, sweeten the breath, and maintain a natural condition of the system. Corrects all the impurities arising from errors of diet—eating or drinking. Salt Regal has the special property of purifying the water in which it is mixed.

Extract from Professor NORMAN TATE's Report.

"There is an element in this compound not found in other compound effervescent Salines that I have examined. The ingredients used are free from impurities and injurious substances."

"THE QUEEN."

"Salt Regal, which we have already mentioned to our readers, has rapidly risen in favour. It is a pleasant, cooling, and refreshing draught."

"COURT CIRCULAR."

"On account of its antiseptic qualities, a dire foe to fevers and kindred diseases."

Extract from Report of Dr. B. H. PAUL, F.I.C.

"20 Victoria Street, Westminster, London, S.W.
"As the result of careful analysis of Salt Regal, I certify that it is in every respect a well-made preparation. The general character of Salt Regal renders it admirably adapted for domestic use, and especially so in Tropical climates."

Dr. GLENCROSS says:—

"Pleasant and easily retained. I think it will prove a great favourite."

Dr. SODEN says:—

"It is particularly adaptable in the cases of children."

Dr. McCORMICK says:—

"Should have been known long ago."

Mr. WM. SWITHINBANK, M.R.C.V.S. says:—

"My children are very fond of it. The best I have ever used."

Mr. LESLIE CROTTY (Carl Rosa Opera Co.) says:—

"Invaluable to the community at large. Its effects are marvellous."

Colonel D. WILKIE, H.M. Indian Army, Ashbourne, says:—

"I duly received the bottle of Salt Regal and approve of it highly."

SALT REGAL is sold in Bottles (hermetically sealed), price 2s. 9d. It cannot be imitated and stands alone. Be careful to observe Salt Regal is a delicate white powder, but it turns the water to a beautiful Rosa Pink; unless it does this it is not genuine, and its sale should be at once reported to the Secretary of the Salt Regal Co. A real Royal Patent—Not a Patent Medicine. Patent Rights protected in every civilised country. All London and Provincial Wholesale Houses regularly stock it.

SALT REGAL WORKS, LONDON and LIVERPOOL.

If Salt Regal is not procurable from the nearest Chemist, a Postal Order for 2s. 9d. addressed to the Manager, Salt Regal Works, Liverpool, will bring a Bottle by return of Post.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.

The SESSION of the FACULTY of MEDICINE will commence on October 1. Introductory Lecture at Four P.M. by Mr. R. J. GODLEE, M.S., B.A., F.R.C.S. The Examinations for the Entrance Exhibitions will commence on September 21. Scholarships, Exhibitions, and Prizes of the value of £800 are awarded annually. In University College Hospital about 3,000 In-Patients and 135,000 Out-Patients are treated during the year. Thirty-six Appointments, eighteen being resident, as House-Surgeon, House-Physician, Obstetric Assistant, &c. are filled up by competition during the year, and these as well as all Clerkships and Dresserships are open to Students of the Hospital without extra fee. Prospectuses, with full information as to Classes, Prizes, &c. may be obtained from the College, Gower Street, W.C.

JOHN WILLIAMS, M.D., Dean.
J. M. HORSBURGH, M.A., Secretary.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb. One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates). The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, cuckoo, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating. The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks. Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition. For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.
Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A. Heidelberg.
A. B. CATTY, M.A., Christ's Coll., Camb.
WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.
At the recent Exam. for the I.C.S. a Pupil of Heidelberg College obtained THE HIGHEST MARKS IN GERMAN of all the Candidates.
SANDHURST FURTHER EXAM., August 1889.
Alexander R. C. Rew..... 7539.
Mr. LAWRENCE in London: Oakley Lodge, Fulham, S.W.

THE MASON COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.

SESSION 1889-90.
FACULTIES OF ARTS AND SCIENCE.
The NEXT SESSION COMMENCES on Tuesday, October 1, 1889.
A Syllabus, containing full information as to the various Courses of Instruction, lecture days, and hours, fees, scholarships, &c., is published by Messrs. CORNISH, New Street, Birmingham, price 6d.; by post, 7d.
Further particulars may be obtained on application to the SECRETARY, at the College.
GEO. H. MORLEY, Secretary.

PROFESSORSHIP of MODERN LITERATURE and ENGLISH LANGUAGE at UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LIVERPOOL, VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

CANDIDATES for the Chair are requested to send in applications (with testimonials) on or before October 5.
Residence to commence in January 1890. Endowment, £375 with two-thirds of fees.
For particulars apply to REGISTRAR, University College, Liverpool.

TUDOR HALL COLLEGE (for Ladies), Forest Hill,

Sydenham, S.E. Established over Thirty Years.—Principals: Mrs. TODD and Rev. J. W. TODD, D.D. Head-Mistress: Miss TODD (Girton), Cambridge. Professors: Seeley, Churton Collins, Garcia, Diehl, Loman, Duleken, Larpent, &c.—Gymnasium, Tennis-courts, Swimming, Riding. Full particulars, Photo of Coll., &c., on application.

THE LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1.
The Hospital, which is the largest general Hospital in the kingdom, contains nearly 800 beds, all in constant use. There are wards for Accidents, Surgical and Medical cases, Diseases of Women and Children, and Ophthalmic cases. Special departments for Diseases of the Eye, Ear, Throat, Skin and Teeth, and for Cancer, Tumours, Diseases of the Bladder, Piles, and Fistula. Number of in-patients last year, 8,873; out-patients, 101,518; accidents, 7,456. Surgical operations daily.
APPOINTMENTS—Resident Accoucheur, House Physicians, House Surgeons. Forty of these appointments are made annually. Numerous Dressers, Clinical Clerks, Post-mortem Clerks, and Maternity Assistants are appointed every three months. All appointments are free. Holders of resident appointments are also provided free board. The New College Buildings are now complete, and afford more than double the former accommodation.
Two Entrance Science Scholarships, value £60 and £10, and two Buxton Scholarships, value £30 and £20, will be offered for competition at the end of September to new Students. Sixteen other Scholarships and Prizes are given annually.
Luncheons or dinners, at moderate charges, can be obtained at the Students' Club.
The London Hospital is now in direct communication with all parts of the Metropolis. The Metropolitan District, and other Railways have stations within a minute's walk of the Hospital and College.
For further information apply personally, or by letter, to Mile End, E. MUNRO SCOTT, Warden.

WOLVERHAMPTON GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

The HEAD-MASTERSHIP will become VACANT at Christmas next by the retirement of THOMAS BEACH, Esq.
It is provided by the scheme that the Head-Master shall be a Graduate of some University within the British Empire and not necessarily in Holy Orders.
His emolument will be derived from three sources.
(1). A Fixed Stipend of £200 a year.
(2). Capitation Fees at the rate of £3 a year for each boy in the senior department, and £1 a year in the junior department.
(3). From Boarders. The school buildings provide a house for the Head-Master, in which he will be required to reside, and accommodation, including fitting and furniture, is also provided in the house for thirty boarders or thereabouts.
There are three Exhibitions of £60 a year from the school to the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, each tenable for three years. The school has been highly successful for many years past.
Candidates for the appointment are invited to send their applications, with testimonials, to Messrs. NEVE & CRESSWELL, Solicitors, Wolverhampton, on or before the 17th day of September next.
The Election will be made on the 1st day of October next.
The Head-Master will be required to enter upon his duties at the close of the Christmas holidays.
It is particularly requested that no personal application be made to the Governors.
All letters may be addressed to the above-mentioned Clerks, marked W. G. S., from whom Copies of the Scheme for the Management of the School may be obtained for seven stamps.

ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, ALBERT EMBANKMENT, LONDON, S.E.

The WINTER SESSION of 1889-90 will OPEN on Tuesday, October 1, with an Introductory Address, at 3 P.M., by Mr. WILLIAM ANDERSON, F.R.C.S.
TWO ENTRANCE SCIENCE SCHOLARSHIPS, of 125 guineas and £60 respectively, open to all first-year Students, will be offered for competition. The Examination will be held on September 25, 26, and 27, and the subjects will be Chemistry and Physics, with either Botany or Zoology, at the option of Candidates.
Scholarships and Money Prizes of considerable value are awarded at the Sessional Examinations, as also several Medals.
Special Classes are held throughout the year for the "PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC" and "INTERMEDIATE M.B." Examinations of the UNIVERSITY of LONDON.
All Hospital Appointments are open to Students without extra charge.
The fees may be paid in one sum or by instalments. Entries may be made separately to Lectures or to Hospital Practice, and special arrangements are made for Students entering in their second or subsequent years; also for Dental Students and for Qualified Practitioners.
A Register of approved Lodgings is kept by the Medical Secretary, who also has a list of local Medical Practitioners, Clergymen, and others who receive students into their houses.
Prospectuses and all particulars may be obtained from the Medical Secretary, Mr. GEORGE RENDLE.
E. NETTLESHIP, Dean.

CRONDALL SCHOOL, FARNHAM, Surrey.—Invigorating

country life, healthiest in England (see Registrar's Report). Preparation for Public Schools, Royal Navy, &c.; French and German guaranteed; school farm, cricket and football fields, tennis, carpenter's shop, riding ponies.—Address, PRINCIPAL.

ST. MARY'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, PADDINGTON, W.

The WINTER SESSION begins on October 1, with an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS by Dr. MAGUIRE, at 4 P.M.
ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, one of £105, and FIVE of 50 guineas, of which two are specially open to Students from Oxford and Cambridge, will be awarded by Examination on September 26 and 27 at 10 A.M.
The Hospital has 231 beds, with well-appointed special departments for Diseases of Children and of the Eye, Ear, Skin, and Throat. Eight resident appointments in it are open to students without expense or charge.
The School is replete with all the requisite laboratories and appliances for the study of Anatomy, Physiology, Chemistry, Pathology, Bacteriology, and Hygiene, and the course of teaching both in the hospital and the school provides complete preparation for every examination and degree.
The RESIDENTIAL COLLEGE is under the care of the Warden, Dr. LUFF.
The Prospectus, to be obtained by application to the School Secretary, contains full information as to the Scholarship Examinations, as to the Annual Prizes and School Scholarships, the course of study, and the Special Classes for the higher University degrees.
HERBERT W. PAGE, M.A., M.C., Cantab., Dean.

CRYSTAL PALACE EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS.

THIRTIETH SESSION, 1889-90.
THE HIGHEST EDUCATION IN ART, SCIENCE, AND LITERATURE.
For LADIES: I. The School. II. Junior Section. Opens September 30.
GENTLEMEN: SCHOOL OF PRACTICAL ENGINEERING.
NEXT TERM September 9.
I. Mechanical Course. II. Civil Engineering Division. III. Colonial Section.
SCHOOL FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF ESTATES. September 1.
Prospectuses in the Library, Byzantine Court, Crystal Palace.
F. K. J. SHENTON, F.R.Hist.S.
Superintendent Educational Department.

ST. GEORGE'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, HYDE PARK CORNER, S.W.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1, when an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS will be delivered by Dr. T. CLIFFORD ALLBUTT, F.R.S., at 4 P.M.
The following ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS will be offered for competition in October:—
1. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £125, for the sons of Medical men who have entered the School as bona fide first-year students during the current year.
2. TWO SCHOLARSHIPS, each of £50, open to all students commencing their studies.
3. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £90, open to all students who have entered the school during the current year, and who have passed the Cambridge 1st M.B. since October 1888.
4. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £85, for students who, having been signed up for or previously passed the Oxford 1st M.B. or the Cambridge 2nd M.B., have entered the School during the current year.
The following Exhibitions and Prizes are also open to students:—
The William Brown £100 Exhibition; the William Brown £40 Exhibition; the Brackenbury Prize in Medicine, value £32; the Brackenbury Prize in Surgery, value £32; the Pollock Prize in Physiology, value £18; the Johnson Prize in Anatomy, value £10 10s.; the Treasurer's Prize, value £10 10s.; General Proficiency Prizes for first, second, and third year students, of £10 10s. each; the Brodie Prize in Surgery; the Acland Prize in Medicine; the Thompson Medal, and Sir Charles Clarke's Prize.
All Hospital appointments, including the two House Physicianships and two House Surgeonships, are awarded as the result of competition, and are open to the students without additional expense of any kind.
Clerkships and Dresserships, and all the minor appointments, are given without extra fees. Several paid appointments, including that of Obstetric Assistant, with a salary of £100 and board and lodging, are awarded yearly upon the recommendation of the Medical School Committee.
The new Physiological Laboratories and Class Rooms are now open.
Prospectuses and fuller details may be obtained by application to
THOMAS WHIPHAM, M.B., Dean.

EXETER SCHOOL.—Parents desirous of obtaining help for their SONS at the UNIVERSITIES, &c., should apply for a Prospectus. There are more leaving Exhibitions than at most of the great Public Schools—viz., 13 close and 18 partly close ones, the value of the former alone being nearly £600 a year. Many pupils have won from £100 to £160 a year in Scholarships.
The New Buildings are on an estate of 25 acres, in a most healthy situation. Terms very moderate.—W. A. CUNNINGHAM, M.A., Head-Master.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils.—41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR.

BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

RADFORD HOUSE, COVENTRY.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS of GENTLEMEN. Established 1800. Boys received from Six to Twelve years of age, and prepared for College and Local Examinations, which have hitherto been successfully passed by the Pupils of this School. Eight acres of recreation ground.—Apply for particulars to Mrs. and Miss HOUGHTON.

MENTAL and MORAL SCIENCE.—FIRST-CLASS MAN in above subjects seeks ENGAGEMENT for LECTURES or TUITION in or near London.—Address, ACADEMICUS, Post Office, Weybridge.

FARM PUPILS.—GENTLEMEN are received on the FARM of the AYLESBURY DAIRY COMPANY, Limited, Horsham, Sussex. 1,400 acres arable and pasture; 400 head of cattle.—For terms and particulars apply to the SECRETARY, Aylesbury Dairy Company, in London, St. Petersburg Place, Bayswater, or Horsham, Sussex.

TO FAMILIES sending SONS to LONDON.—A well-known FRENCH FAMILY, of good position (Official) offer a very superior HOME to a few GENTLEMEN, with practical instruction in French and German. French always spoken. Most excellent table and service. Billiard-room. Extensive tennis-ground. Liberal terms.—Address, VALMONT, care of Mr. Parker, Chemist, 35 Clifton Road, Maida Vale, W.

TO PATRONS of EDUCATION.—Some private persons in a position to assist in FOUNDING a COUNTRY HIGH SCHOOL for GIRLS invite LOCAL SUPPORT from the Clergy of any health resort or other centre of population, also offers of transfer.—Write Q.C., May's Advertising Offices, 162 Piccadilly, London.

PREPARATION for ENTRANCE and SCHOLARSHIPS at PUBLIC SCHOOLS. A few VACANCIES for next Term.—Apply to HEAD MASTER, care of A. & A. W. Brown, 4 Little George Street, Westminster.

TO HEADS of COLLEGES in or near London.—UNIVERSITY EXAMINER and PROFESSOR of CLASSICS of long experience is prepared to give LECTURES on Ancient History, Philosophy, Literature, &c., or teach Languages.—Address, "D. LITT.," Office of "Saturday Review."

SCHOOL PIANOS.—NEW MODELS from 18 Guineas. All the latest Improvements. These instruments are remarkable for their beautiful tone, perfect touch, and durability. PIANOS for HIRE, or on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.—W. J. ENNEVER & SON, Manufacturers, 57 Berners Street, London, W.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.
ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION.

Established by Royal Charter, A.D. 1720.
7 ROYAL EXCHANGE AND 43A PALL MALL, S.W.

Marine, Fire, and Life Assurances have been granted by the Corporation for more than a century and a half.
Funds in hand exceed £3,500,000.

NATIONAL PROVIDENT
INSTITUTION.FOR
MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE.

See New Prospectus, page 17, for particulars of ENDOWMENT-ASSURANCE POLICIES
combining
LIFE ASSURANCE at MINIMUM COST
with provision for old age.
48 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW

LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.

Annuities.

Loans.

Liberal Conditions.

ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager

FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary

12 Waterloo Place,
London.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,

Established 1836.

LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.

INCOME and FUNDS (1888).

Fire Premiums £615,000

Life Premiums 203,000

Interest 149,000

Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE,

LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.

Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.

Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.

W. C. MACDONALD

F. B. MACDONALD

Joint Secretaries.

Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.

Subscribed Capital, £1,300,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.

E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.

THREE per cent. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per cent. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

FOR THE DECORATION OF THE HOME

visit THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Gallery,
74 New Oxford Street, W.C. A noble display of Copies of THE GREAT MASTERS, framed
and unframed.

The Chef-d'œuvres of THE NATIONAL
COLLECTIONS of London, Paris, Rome, Dresden,
St. Petersburg, Madrid, &c. &c.

Catalogue of 186 pages, Sixpence, post-free.
A descriptive Pamphlet free by post on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY.

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES,

Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous
Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESS' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY.
Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician
(President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 57 Oxford Street, London,
W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

Dr. PAGET,
SURGEON-DENTIST,
445 STRAND, W.C.
(Facing Charing Cross Station.)

ARTIFICIAL TEETH,
without plates. Perfect imitations
of the natural teeth. Artistic, painless, and perfect. Most moderate fees. Consultations free daily.
Illustrated pamphlet post free.

SHOPPING BY POST.

Before purchasing their DRESS MATERIALS elsewhere, Ladies are requested to write to
HY. PEASE & CO.'S Successors for a box of their New Patterns of

DARLINGTON DRESS FABRICS.

Which include the celebrated Gold-Medal Merinos, Cashmeres, Cross-Warp Serges, and an immense variety of new goods for Autumn wear.
The Patterns are sent free on approval by return of post to any address in Town or Country.
Telegrams: "SUCCESSORS," DARLINGTON.
HY. PEASE & CO.'S Successors, THE MILLS, DARLINGTON.

BENGER'S FOOD
FOR INFANTS,
CHILDREN AND INVALIDS.

GOLD MEDAL, HEALTH EXHIBITION.

EXTRACT FROM PRIVATE LETTER.—"The infant was very delicate; our medical adviser ordered your Food. The result in a short time was wonderful; the little fellow grew strong and fat, and is now in a thriving condition—in fact, 'the flower of the flock.'"

BENGER'S FOOD is Sold in Tins, at 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 5s., and 10s., by Chemists, &c., everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED BY ALL WHOLESALE HOUSES.

GOOD MORNING!

Have you used

PEARS' SOAP?

BOOKS, &c.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.

A MONTHLY CATALOGUE OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.

Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.

136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
London. All the New and Standard Books, Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates

per annum, paid in advance:
Any part of the United Kingdom	£1 8 2
India and China	1 12 6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1 10 6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from
Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London; or Hall Green (near Birmingham).

Now ready, price 6s. 6d.

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY CALENDAR for the Year 1889.

Cambridge: DEIGHTON, BELL, & Co. London: GEORGE BELL & SONS.

Just published.

ECONOMICAL, DAINTY, and PRACTICAL
DISHES,

With the use of LIEBIG "COMPANY'S" EXTRACT OF MEAT.

Compiled by EMILY CORFE.

London: LIEBIG'S EXTRACT OF MEAT COMPANY, Limited, 9 Fenchurch Avenue, E.C.
Post free on application.

Reported Government Scheme for dealing with the West of Ireland.

With Map, 1s.; by post, 1s. 2d.

DONEGAL, with SUGGESTIONS for the IMPROVEMENT and DEVELOPMENT of the CONGESTED DISTRICTS of IRELAND. By J. H.

TUKE.
London: W. RIDGWAY, Piccadilly; NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY, Whitefriars.
Dublin: HODGES, FIGGIS, & Co. And all Booksellers.

PARIS EXHIBITION.—The FRENCH DICTIONARY

for TOURISTS—BELLOWS' POCKET FRENCH DICTIONARY. 32mo.
with 4 Maps, roan tuck, 10s. 6d.; morocco, 12s. 6d.

"Complete."—Times. "Without a rival."—Spectator. "The most portable."
Also Scotsman.

TOUS les VERBES.—CONJUGATIONS of all the VERBS,
French and English, with Tables of Weights, Measures, and Equivalent
Values, from Bellows' Dictionary. Second Edition. 32mo. 6d.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

PARIS: ERNEST LEROUX, 28 RUE BONAPARTE.
AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION.

Fifth Edition, 1 vol. with Frontispiece by Gordon Browne, 6s.

THE REPROACH OF ANNESLEY.

By MAXWELL GRAY,

Author of "The Silence of Dean Maitland."

"A very good book.....Its tone and its aspirations are very pure and noble."
"The story is well told and interesting."—Daily News. Standard.
"The story is powerfully written and almost too absorbing."—Liverpool Post.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

"MEMORY'S HARKBACK THROUGH HALF-A-CENTURY."
THE RECOLLECTIONS OF DR. GRETTON.
1 vol. demy 8vo. 12s.

READY THIS DAY.
AN IRISH COUSIN. By GEILLES HERRING
and MARTIN ROSS. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "WORTH WAITING FOR."
THE SCOTTS OF BESTMINSTER. By
J. MASTERMAN, Author of "A Fatal Error" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.
"Mr. Masterman's story is throughout fresh and interesting. The freshness is due to his skill in sketching Anglo-Indian life. The interest is heightened by the ingenuity with which he weaves into his plot an episode of thrilling adventure. The characters are real men and women. They are firmly drawn and their oddities and humours are hit off with a touch at once light and rapid, and free from all tendency to caricature."—Observer.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "Mlle. DE MERSAC."
MISS SHAFTO. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of
"The Rogue" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.
"Mr. Norris is a pleasant writer, possessing a knowledge of society and a pretty humour which is neither hackneyed nor vulgar. All these qualities are to be found in his latest book, 'Miss Shafto,' which is his best bit of work for some years."—World.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "COUNTRESS IRENE."
ROBERT LEEMAN'S DAUGHTERS. By
J. FOGERTY, Author of "Lanterdale," "Caterina," &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.
"Mr. Fogerty recovers in this novel much of the old power which made 'Lanterdale' the novel of the season nearly twenty years ago. His present venture is strong in both branches of the fiction-writer's art—description and character-drawing. From the time when we are first introduced to the heroine to the last glimpse we obtain of her, Muriel Leeman, the elder of Leeman's two daughters, is limned with rare skill and individuality.
"This novel is very strong; human emotions and passions are dealt with in a manner that commands admiration and assent; and, in style, the work is infinitely superior to the vast majority of present-day novels, having much of the charm which distinguished the literary offspring of the older writers of fiction."—Academy.
"There are many touches of humour in the narrative and much freshness in the style. The contrasted pictures of life, character, and society in Ireland, Holland, and the Western States are well done."—Scotsman.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "FASCINATION" &c.
PAST FORGIVENESS? By Lady MARGARET
MAJENDIE, Author of "Precautions" &c. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "NELLIE'S MEMORIES."
THE SEARCH FOR BASIL LYNDHURST.
By ROSA N. CARRY, Author of "Not Like Other Girls" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

ILLUSTRATED, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

THE NEWBERRY HOUSE MAGAZINE.

A Monthly Review and Family Magazine for Churchmen and Churchwomen.

CONTENTS FOR SEPTEMBER.

By Professor SAYCE, M.A., LL.D.—LETTERS FROM PALESTINE BEFORE THE AGE OF MOSES.
By the Rev. H. G. DICKSON, M.A.—THE DUTY OF ENGLAND TO WALES AND HERSELF.
By HOMERSHAM COX, Esq.—THE PUBLIC WORSHIP ACT AND ITS RESULTS.
By the Rev. CANON BENHAM.—SHUT UP IN HIS OWN PRISON. A Story.
By ESMÉ SMART.—AN AUTOGRAPH BOOK.
By Professor A. VAMBRÉY.—DERVISHES. Personal Recollections.
By the Rev. T. S. LEA.—AN ISLE OF THE SEA.
By Miss WORDSWORTH.—WOMEN AND SUNDAYS.
By the Rev. S. BARING GOULD, M.A.—RECENT DISCOVERIES IN CHRISTIAN ARCHEOLOGY IN ROME. Part I. (Continued.)
By an "OLD CRUIER"—CHRIST'S HOSPITAL FIFTY YEARS AGO. II. Reminiscences Domestic and Religious. (Illustrated.)
By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY and H. HERMAN.—THE BISHOP'S BIBLE.
By HELEN MILMAN.—"BOY." A Story for the Young. Continued. (Illustrated.)
CONFERENCES ON CHURCH QUESTIONS—NOTES ON THE PSALMS—SERMON OUTLINES—INSTRUCTIONS ON THE CREED—SEQUENCE FOR S. MICHAEL'S—CALENDAR—ILLUSTRATED TEXT—BIBLICAL QUESTIONS—CURRENT EVENTS—FORTHCOMING MEETINGS—CORRESPONDENCE—REVIEWS.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH, NEWBERRY HOUSE, LONDON.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE. No. 83.—SEPTEMBER.

CONTENTS:

THE BELL OF ST. PAUL'S. Part II. Chaps. 19-22. By WALTER BESANT.
TROPICAL EDUCATION By GRANT ALLEN.
THE ROUT OF THE ROOKS By NINA F. LAYARD.
TAUTOGA AMERICANA By EDWARD M. CHAPMAN.
A SURPRISE PARTY By Mrs. ALFRED W. HUNT.
AT THE RIVERSIDE By Rev. M. G. WATKINS, M.A.
MRS. FENTON: a Sketch. Chaps. 4-6 By W. E. NORRIS.
AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

Just published, post 8vo. cloth, 2s.

ALGERIAN HINTS FOR TOURISTS. By CHARLES E. FLOWER. An Appendix to the Guide-Books, telling just what to see and how to see it, with latest information about Hotels, Railways, Diligences, &c.
London: EDWARD STANFORD, 26 & 27 Cockspur Street, Charing Cross, S.W.

NOW READY, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

SEPTEMBER NUMBER.

CONTENTS:

LONDON MOCK PARLIAMENTS. JOHN LILLIE. With 11 Illustrations drawn by Harry Furniss.
AMERICAN ARTISTS AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION. T. CHILD. With 20 Illustrations.
A LITTLE JOURNEY IN THE WORLD. A Novel. Part VI. CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER.
THE RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT IN FRANCE. M. EDMOND DE PRESSENSÉ, Senator.
THE PENDRAGON TRIAL. A Story. LYNDE PALMER.
KENTUCKY FAIRS. JAMES LANE ALLEN. With 11 Illustrations. Drawings by T. de Thulstrup.
JOE GILFILLAN. A Story. JOHN ELLIOT CURRAN.
THE OLDEST AND SMALLEST SECT IN THE WORLD. Rev. JOHN F. HURST, D.D.
JUPITER LIGHTS. A Novel (Conclusion). CONSTANCE FENIMORE WOOLSON.
HOLY MOSCOW. THEODORE CHILD. With 15 Illustrations, drawn by T. de Thulstrup.
&c. &c.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON, SEARLE, & RIVINGTON, LIMITED,
ST. DUNSTON'S HOUSE, FETTER LANE, FLEET STREET, E.C.

On Monday next (Sixpence), New Series, No. 75.

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For SEPTEMBER.

Containing "THE BURNT MILLION," by JAMES PAYN, Author of "By Proxy" &c. &c. Chaps. 10-13—"FRESH-WATER FISHES"—"A TRIO OF FIENDS"—"A FORTUNE ON FOUR LEGS"—"A BORDER HILLSIDE"—"HONOR VICTIS," and "THE COUNTY," Chaps. 33-36.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE.

Monthly, 6d.

ATALANTA.

Edited by L. T. MEADE and JOHN C. STAPLES.

Contents of the SEPTEMBER Number:

FRONTISPIECE.—GOING A MILKING. From the Picture by ALICE REEVE.
MISS SHAFTO. Serial Story. Chaps. XLIV.—XLVII. W. E. NORRIS. Conclusion.
A BRIEF ACCOUNT OF HOW WE ASCENDED THE PEAK OF TENERIFE. Commodore A. H. MARKHAM, A.D.C. Illustrated.
AFTER SEVENTEEN CENTURIES AND A HALF. Professor CHURCH.
MOONRISE IN ITALY. From the Picture by W. H. J. BOOT.
AT THE ZOO—THE OSTRICH. C. LLOYD MORGAN. With an Illustration.
THE EAST NEUK. Poem. Lady LINDSAY. Illustrated.
THE STORY OF A SPRING MORNING. Serial Story. Chaps. IX.—XII. Mrs. MOLESWORTH. With Illustrations by M. Ellen Edwards.
THE TWO FLORAS. A New Guinea Sketch. HUME NISBET. With Illustrations by the Author.
"ATALANTA" SCHOLARSHIP AND READING UNION—
XII. MATTHEW ARNOLD AS A POET. EDWARD DOWDEN.
&c. &c.

LONDON: HATCHARDS, 187 PICCADILLY, W.

Now ready, price 1s.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY for SEPTEMBER.

CONTENTS:

The Isthmus Canal and American Control. Stuart F. Weld.
The Gold Heart. Harry P. Robinson.
Phryne's Test. Margaret J. Preston.
James Wilson. Frank Gaylord Cook.
The Begum's Daughter. XVI.—XVIII. Edwin Lascelles Bynner.
La Nouvelle France. Eben Greenough Scott.
The White Rose Road. Sarah Orne Jewett.
The Secret. W. R. Thayer.
Americans at the First Bastille Celebration. J. G. Alger.
The Day of Rest. Charles Worcester Clark.
Voodooism in Tennessee. S. M. P.
Flowers and Folks. Bradford Torrey.
It Seems but Yesterday. Julie M. Lippmann.
The Tragic Muse. XXIV.—XXVII. Henry James.
The Black Madonna of Loreto. Katharine Hillard.
Abbott's Greece.
Mr. Winter on Dramatic Criticism.
Villari's Savonarola.
The Contributors' Club.
Pictorial Poor Relations—A Word about Words—From a Window: a Genre Study.
Books of the Month.

London: WARD, LOCK, & CO., Salisbury Square, E.C.

New Volume of Smith, Elder, & Co's Popular 2s. Series.

Ready this day, fep. 8vo. boards, pictorial cover, price 2s.

A LIFE'S MORNING.

By GEORGE GISSING, Author of "Demos," "Thyrza," &c.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER, & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE.

Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A SHEAF OF SONNETS.

By J. M. W. SCHWARTZ,

Author of "Nivalis: a Tragedy" &c.

"To our mind these noble poems are quite up to Rossetti's mark.... This beautiful little book reminds us once more of the masses of waste ability which are to be found in our country." Vanity Fair. "A poet of no mean degree. Perfect gems. Should be read by all who love refreshing pure poetry."—Northern Whig. "A book in which those of poetic temperament will delight. Grand thoughts, nobly and gracefully expressed."—Liverpool Post. "Dignity, power, and felicitousness of expression characterise his verse."—Graphic. "Admirably constructed, gracefully written, these sonnets contain a wealth of poetic thoughts." Liverpool Courier.

REMINGTON & CO., HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

A NEW NOVEL BY MR. F. MARION CRAWFORD.

SANT' ILARIO.

By F. MARION CRAWFORD,

Author of "With the Immortals," "Greifenstein," "Paul Patoff,"
"Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," "Marzio's Crucifix," &c.

3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.

The Athenæum says:—"The plot is skilfully concocted, and the interest is sustained to the end. As a story of incident the book leaves little to be desired. The various events, romantic and even sensational, follow naturally and neatly, and the whole is a very clever piece of work."

The Scotsman says:—"The book is full of passages of remarkable power. A reader will find it hard to decide whether this is not the best of Mr. Crawford's novels. Best or worst, it is heartily enjoyable, and will be eagerly read by all who take it up."

ENGLISH MEN OF ACTION.Monk. By Mr. JULIAN CORBETT.—NEW VOLUME.The following Volumes in the Series are ready. With Portraits.
Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. each.General Gordon. By Colonel Sir WILLIAM BUTLER.Henry the Fifth. By the Rev. A. J. CHURCH.Livingstone. By Mr. THOMAS HUGHES.Lord Lawrence. By Sir RICHARD TEMPLE.Wellington. By Mr. GEORGE HOOPER.Dampier. By Mr. W. CLARK RUSSELL.

* * * Other volumes are in the press and in preparation.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE

For SEPTEMBER, Profusely Illustrated, price 6d.; by post, 8d., contains:—

1. PORTRAIT OF A LADY. After VAN DER HELST. Frontispiece.
2. THE BETTER MAN. By ARTHUR PATERSON.
3. GLAN CONWAY. By GRANT ALLEN. With Illustrations.
4. HOMERIC IMAGERY. By W. C. GREEN. With Illustrations.
5. SANT' ILARIO. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.
6. CUPID AND CAMPASPE. By J. LYLE. Illustrated.
7. COME, SWEET LASS. From Pills to Purge Melancholy, 1699. Illustrated by Hugh Thomson.
8. ET CÆTERA. By H. D. TRAILL.

* * * A New Volume of the ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE begins with the OCTOBER NUMBER. A Prospectus, giving full details of several new changes in the Magazine that will come into effect in that Number, and containing a list of the prospective arrangements made for the ensuing year, may be obtained of any Bookseller.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE,

For SEPTEMBER, price 1s., contains:—

1. MAROONED. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Chapters 31-33.
2. CEFALÜ. By E. A. FREEMAN.
3. A REAL WORKING-MAN.
4. ON AN OLD BOOK. By S. J. WEYMAN.
5. RHYMES AFTER HORACE. By OFELLUS.
6. CAPTAIN ANTONIO RINCON. By Mme. DARMESTER.
7. THE ETHICS OF PESSIMISM.
8. KIRSTEEN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT. Chapters 4-6.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Just ready, price 1s.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR SEPTEMBER, 1889:

1. SIR CHARLES DANVERS. By the Author of "The Danvers Jewels." Chaps. 17-20.
2. AMBITION.
3. THE COURT OF VIENNA IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.
4. THE SAILOR'S DANCE.
5. A FEW MUSICAL NOTES.
6. THE WATCHERS.
7. ACHILLE.
8. IN CAREW CASTLE.
9. ARMINELL. By the Author of "John Herring." Chaps. 36-40.
10. CHARLES WHITEHEAD.
11. THE CHURCH OF SAN SERVIN AT TOULOUSE DURING PENTE-COST.
12. PAUL'S SISTER. By the Author of "Near Neighbours." Chaps. 22-24.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

NOW READY, price One Shilling.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE.

SEPTEMBER, 1889.

CONTENTS:

- DANGER AHEAD. Frontispiece. (Safety in Railroad Travel, p. 328.) From a Drawing by M. J. BURNS.
- ALEXANDRE DUMAS. ANDREW LANG. With a Portrait, drawn by J. Reich after a Photograph from life; and with a figure from the monument by Doré in the Place Malesherbes.
- TO THE DANDELION. ZOE DANA UNDERHILL.
- NEPIGON RIVER FISHING. A. R. MACDONOUGH. Illustrations by Herbert Denman and J. G. Woodward.
- LOST. CHARLES HENRY LUDERS.
- IN THE VALLEY. Chapters I-III. (To be continued.) HAROLD FREDERIC. Illustrations by Howard Pyle.
- YOUTH AND TIME. DUNCAN CAMPBELL SCOTT.
- THE PLACE OF THE FITTING-SCHOOL IN AMERICAN EDUCATION. GEORGE TRUMBULL LADD, Professor in Yale College.
- NIGHT WITCHERY. W. HAMILTON GIBSON. Illustrations by Mr. Gibson.
- OUT OF NEW ENGLAND GRANITE. T. R. SULLIVAN.
- SAFETY IN RAILROAD TRAVEL. H. G. PROUT. With Illustrations.
- THE MASTER OF BALLANTRAE. XI. ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. (Begun in November, 1888. To be concluded in October.)
- DROUGHT. A. LAMPMAN.
- THE SMALL ARMS OF EUROPEAN ARMIES. W. W. KIMBALL, U.S.N. (U.S. Inspector of Ordnance.) Illustrated.
- THE DOMINO. EDITH M. THOMAS.
- THREE DREAM HEROINES. JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

FREDERICK WARNE & CO., 15 BEDFORD STREET, STRAND, LONDON.

WARD, LOCK, & CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.* * COMPLETE CATALOGUE, comprising upwards of 3,000 different Volumes, post free on application.THE MINERVA LIBRARY OF FAMOUS BOOKS.

Edited by G. T. BETTANY, M.A., B.Sc.

Strongly and neatly bound in cloth, TWO SHILLINGS EACH, with cut or uncut edges.Each Volume contains a BIOGRAPHICAL INTRODUCTION, or CRITICAL and EXPLANATORY NOTES elucidating the Text.

In calling attention to the MINERVA LIBRARY OF FAMOUS BOOKS, the Publishers believe that it will be found to possess several characteristics of special excellence. Instead of being confined to a fixed number of pages, the volumes of the MINERVA LIBRARY will average in number from 400 to 600, according to the extent of the book. Thus the size of the volumes will admit of the inclusion in one volume of all but the most lengthy works.

Each volume will contain an introduction by Mr. G. T. BETTANY, M.A., B.Sc., in which a biography of the author, or critical and explanatory notes, will start the reader in sympathy with the author and his work. In some of the books additional elucidations and illustrations of the text will be given, and in others side-notes will indicate the subjects of the paragraphs.

Another feature by which many volumes of this Series will be marked will be the insertion of ILLUSTRATIONS, not only in the text, but in SEPARATE PLATES. Thus an illustrated library will be procurable by every one at the lowest possible cost.

VOLUME I., FIFTH EDITION, now ready, price 2s.

CHARLES DARWIN'S JOURNALDuring the Voyage of H.M.S. "Beagle" Round the World.

With a Critical Introduction, Portrait, and Illustrations.

" 'The Minerva Library,' the new venture of Messrs. Ward & Lock, has made an excellent start.....No better volumes could be chosen for popular reading of a healthy sort than 'Darwin's Journal of Researches during the Voyage of the Beagle,' and Borrow's 'Bible in Spain.' The paper is good, the type is tolerable, the binding is in excellent taste, and the price is extremely low."—Athenæum.

VOLUME II., SECOND EDITION, now ready, price 2s.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

With a Critical Introduction, Portrait, and Illustrations.

"This series, which is edited by Mr. G. T. Bettany, is neatly bound, well illustrated, and nicely printed."—Graphic.

VOLUME III. now ready, price 2s.

BORROW'S BIBLE IN SPAIN.The Journeys, Adventures, and Imprisonments of an Englishman, in an attempt to circulate the Scriptures in the Peninsula.

By GEORGE BORROW,

Author of "The Gipsies of Spain."

With a Biographical Introduction and Illustrations.

"Lovers of good literature and cheap may be commended to 'The Minerva Library' edition of 'The Bible in Spain,' edited by Mr. G. T. Bettany. This is an excellent reprint, with neat binding, good type, and fair woodcuts."

Saturday Review.

VOLUME IV. now ready, price 2s.

EMERSON'S PROSE WORKS.The Complete Prose Works of RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

With a Critical Introduction and Portrait of Author.

" 'The Minerva Library' will be hailed with delight, we are sure, by all readers."—Weekly Times.

* * Other important Volumes are in active preparation.

VOLUME V. just ready, consists of GALTON'S SOUTH AFRICA.The Narrative of an Explorer in Tropical Africa: being an Account of a Visit to Damara Land in 1851.

By FRANCIS GALTON, F.R.S.

With a New Map and Appendix. Together with a Biographical Introduction by the Editor.

Containing also

VACATION TOURS IN 1860 AND 1861.By Sir GEORGE GROVE, FRANCIS GALTON, F.R.S., and W. G. CLARK, M.A.

The issue of this, the first Cheap Edition of this famous book, is rendered additionally valuable by Mr. GALTON'S careful Revision, and his preparation of an Appendix, bringing up the History of Damara Land and its Exploration to a recent date.

* * Orders now received by all Booksellers.

LONDON: WARD, LOCK, & CO., SALISBURY SQUARE, E.C.

CLARENDON PRESS NEW AND STANDARD BOOKS.

NEW BOOKS.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

A GRAMMAR of the RUSSIAN LANGUAGE. By W. R. MORFILL, M.A., Oriel College, Oxford. With Reading Lessons.
"The author's object has been to give a concise and clear analysis of the word forms and syntax of the Russian language."

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

TERTULLIANI APOLOGETICUS ADVERSUS GENTES PRO CHRISTIANIS. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. H. BINDLEY, M.A., Merton College, Oxford.
"The Editor has endeavoured to meet the wants of young theological students."

Just published, extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

SCOTT'S MARMION. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by THOMAS BAYNE.
"Uniform with Prof. Minto's Edition of 'The Lay of the Last Minstrel.'"

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

CHAUCER.—THE LEGEND of GOOD WOMEN. Edited by Rev. W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D., Professor of Anglo-Saxon, Cambridge, Editor of "An Etymological Dictionary of the English Language," "Piers the Plowman," &c.
"A companion volume to Chaucer's Minor Poems, by the same Editor."

THE OXFORD EDITION OF THE VULGATE NEW TESTAMENT.

Just published, 4to. stiff cover, 12s. 6d.

NOUUM TESTAMENTUM DOMINI NOSTRI IESU CHRISTI
 LATINE Secundum Editionem Sancti Hieronymi ad Codicum Manuscriptorum Fidem Recensuit IOHANNES WORDSWORTH, S.T.P. Episcopus Sarisburiensis in Operis Societatem Adsumto HENRICO IULIANO WHITE, A.M. Societatis S. Andreae Collegii Theologici Sarisburiensis Vice-Principali Partis Prioris Fasciculus Primus Euangelium Secundum Mattheum.

A NEW GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON.

Just published, small 4to. cloth, 12s. 6d.

AN INTERMEDIATE GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. Founded upon the Seventh Edition of "Liddell & Scott's Greek-English Lexicon."
This Abridgment of the Oxford Greek Lexicon has been undertaken in compliance with wishes expressed by several experienced School Masters. It is an entirely new work, and it is hoped that it will meet their requirements.

FOR LONDON UNIVERSITY B.A. EXAMINATION, 1890.

Just published, crown 8vo. paper boards, 3s.

TWO of the SAXON CHRONICLES PARALLEL (787-1001 A.D.), with Supplementary Extracts from the others. A Revised Text. Edited, with Introduction, &c., on the basis of Professor Earle's Edition, by C. PLUMMER, M.A., Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford.

NEW EDITION OF CLARENDON'S "HISTORY OF THE REBELLION."

6 vols. crown 8vo. cloth, £2 5s.

CLARENDON'S (EDWARD, EARL of) HISTORY of the REBELLION and CIVIL WARS in ENGLAND. Re-edited from a fresh collation of the original MS. in the Bodleian Library, with Marginal Dates and Occasional Notes, by W. DUNN MACRAY, M.A., F.S.A.

NEW VOLUME OF THE TRANSLATIONS OF FOREIGN BIOLOGICAL MEMOIRS.

Just published, 8vo. cloth, 16s.

ESSAYS upon HEREDITY and KINDRED BIOLOGICAL PROBLEMS.
 By Dr. AUGUST WEISMANN, of the University of Freiburg. Authorised Translation. Edited by E. B. POULTON, M.A., F.L.S., Tutor of Keble College, Oxford, SELMAR SCHÖNLAND, Ph.D., and A. E. SHIPLEY, M.A., F.L.S., Fellow and Lecturer of Christ's College, Cambridge.
"Uniform with 'Memoirs on the Physiology of Nerve, Muscle, and of the Electrical Organ,' Edited by Professor J. Burdon-Sanderson."

GERMAN AND FRENCH CLASS BOOKS.

THE STANDARD HISTORY OF GERMAN LITERATURE.

A HISTORY of GERMAN LITERATURE. By W. SCHERER. Translated from the Third German Edition by Mrs. F. C. CONYBEARE. Edited by F. MAX MÜLLER, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. cloth, 21s.
"The best introduction to the study of German literature available in our language. It is systematic, comprehensive, catholic, and modern."—Pall Mall Gazette.

A PRIMER of FRENCH LITERATURE. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A. Second Edition, with Index. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s.
"An extraordinary achievement in scholarship."—Athenæum.

A SHORT HISTORY of FRENCH LITERATURE. By the same Author. Third Edition, crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.
"It is in many ways a masterpiece."—Athenæum.

LANGE'S GERMAN COURSE.

THE GERMANS at HOME: a Practical Introduction to German Conversation, with an Appendix containing the Essentials of German Grammar. By HERMAN LANGE, Teacher of Modern Languages, Manchester. Third and New Edition, 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

GERMAN COMPOSITION. A Theoretical and Practical Guide to the Art of Translating English Prose into German. By HERMAN LANGE, Teacher of Modern Languages, Manchester. Second and New Edition, 8vo. cloth, 4s. 6d.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE GERMAN MANUAL. A German Grammar, a Reading-Book, and a Handbook of German Conversation. 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

BOOKS for the OXFORD LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1890.

CÆSAR.—DE BELLO GALLICO. BOOKS III.—V. (For Schools.) With Notes and Maps. By CHARLES E. MOBERLY, M.A., late Assistant Master at Rugby School. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.
"Stands high among the best classics we have met."—Saturday Review.

XENOPHON.—HELLENICA. BOOKS I. and II. With Introduction and Notes by G. E. UNDERHILL, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Magdalen College, Oxford. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 3s.
"It is long since we have seen a more thorough piece of work. The notes are clear and to the point."—Academy.

EURIPIDES.—MEDEA. With Introduction and Notes by C. B. HERBERDEN, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Brasenose College, Oxford. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s.
"Will be found useful. The notes are practical and to the point."—Spectator.
"All that an edition of this play should be."—Oxford Magazine.

LIVY.—BOOK XXI. With Introduction and Notes by M. T. TATHAM, M.A., Balliol College, Oxford, Assistant Master at Westminster School. Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.
"A thoroughly good school-book."—Saturday Review.
"The book contains a vast quantity of good work, and we can heartily recommend it."—Journal of Education.

PLATO.—THE APOLOGY. Edited, with Notes and Introduction, for the Use of Schools, by ST. GEORGE STOCK, M.A., Pembroke College, Oxford; Editor of "Plato: Meno." Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth limp, 2s. 6d.
"A better edition could not be placed in the hands of the student."—Schoolmaster.

A CLASS-BOOK of ELEMENTARY CHEMISTRY. By W. W. FISHER, M.A., Demonstrator of Chemistry in the University of Oxford. Crown 8vo. cloth, 4s. 6d.
"The book is of sterling value."—Nature.

EUCLID REVISED. Containing the Essentials of the Elements of Plane Geometry as given by Euclid in his first Six Books. Edited by R. C. J. NIXON, M.A., Mathematical Master, Royal Academical Institution, Belfast. Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.
 Sold in Parts, as follows:—Book I., 1s. Books I. and II., 1s. 6d. Books I.—IV., 3s. Books V. and VI., 3s.
"We heartily recommend the book to the attention of schoolmasters."—Journal of Education.

BOOK-KEEPING. By Sir R. G. C. HAMILTON, K.C.B., and JOHN BALL, Co-Examiners in Book-keeping for the Society of Arts. New and Enlarged Edition. Lamp, 2s.
 Ruled Exercise Books adapted to the above, 1s. 6d.
"Specially selected by the Commissioners of National Education, Ireland."

SHAKESPEARE.—KING HENRY the FIFTH. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, LL.D., D.C.L. Extra fcp. 8vo. stiff covers, 2s.

CHAMISSO'S PETER SCHLEMIHL. School Edition, with English Notes, Biographical and Literary, Introductions and a complete Vocabulary. By EMMA S. BUCHHEIM. Extra fcp. 8vo. [Nearly ready.]

STANDARD BOOKS.

THE OXFORD EDITION OF BOSWELL'S JOHNSON.

BOSWELL'S LIFE of SAMUEL JOHNSON, LL.D., and JOURNAL of a TOUR to the HEBRIDES. Edited, with Notes, &c., by G. BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L. 6 vols. medium 8vo. leather back, cloth sides, with Illustrations, £3 3s.
"An edition which, for splendour, accuracy, and completeness, excels that of any other English classic."—Westminster Review.

A HANDSOME GIFT-BOOK.

THE WIT and WISDOM of SAMUEL JOHNSON. Selected and Arranged by G. BIRKBECK HILL, D.C.L., Editor of the Oxford Edition of "Boswell's Life of Johnson." Tastefully printed in crown 8vo. cloth elegant, gilt top, 7s. 6d.
"An extremely interesting book."—Globe.

AN INTRODUCTION to GREEK SCULPTURE. By L. E. UPCOTT, M.A., late Scholar of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, Assistant-Master in Marlborough College. Crown 8vo. cloth, 4s. 6d.
"A very excellent epitome of the subject."—Saturday Review.

NEW EDITION OF HOOKER'S WORKS, REVISED BY DEAN CHURCH and PROFESSOR PAGET.

THE WORKS of that LEARNED and JUDICIOUS DIVINE, MR. RICHARD HOOKER. With an Account of his Life and Death by ISAAC WALTON. Arranged by the Rev. JOHN KEEBLE, M.A. Seventh Edition. Revised by the Very Rev. R. W. CHURCH, D.C.L., Dean of St. Paul's, and the Rev. F. PAGET, D.D., Regius Professor of Pastoral Theology, Oxford. 3 vols. 8vo. cloth, 36s.
"It ought to be on the shelves of every clergyman's library, and ought not to remain there."—Church Quarterly Review.

CONCISE ETYMOLOGICAL DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE. By W. W. SKEAT, M.A. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.
"Mr. Skeat's larger dictionary has established his title to the gratitude of all scholars; and of his smaller dictionary we can only say that it is not less useful and valuable."—Saturday Review.

THE LAW and CUSTOM of the CONSTITUTION: a Statement of the Law relating to the Existing Legislative and Executive Institutions of this Country, with Historical Explanations. By Sir W. R. ANSON, Bart., D.C.L., Warden of All Souls' College, Oxford.
 Vol. I. PARLIAMENT. 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.
 Vol. II. THE EXECUTIVE, to follow.
"An excellent exposition of a very difficult subject. To students the work will be invaluable."—Times.

THE ELEMENTS of JURISPRUDENCE. By T. E. HOLLAND, D.C.L., Professor of International Law, Oxford. Fourth Edition, demy 8vo. 6s. 6d.
"Decidedly the best text-book we have seen on the subject."—American Law Review.

A HISTORY of ENGLAND, principally in the Seventeenth Century. By LEOPOLD VON RANKE. Translated by Resident Members of the University of Oxford, under the superintendence of G. W. KITCHIN, D.D., and C. W. BOASE, M.A. 6 vols. 8vo. cloth, £3 3s.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY of ENGLAND, in its Origin and Development. By WILLIAM STUBBS, D.D., Lord Bishop of Oxford, late Regius Professor of Modern History, Oxford. Library Edition. 3 vols. demy 8vo. £2 8s.
 Also in 3 vols. crown 8vo. each 12s.

SEVENTEEN LECTURES on the STUDY of MEDIEVAL and MODERN HISTORY and KINDRED SUBJECTS. By WILLIAM STUBBS, D.D. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. cloth, 8s. 6d.
"Of altogether exceptional value."—Times.

HISTORIA NUMORUM. A Manual of Greek Numismatics. By BARCLAY V. HEAD, Assistant-Keeper of the Department of Coins and Medals in the British Museum. Royal 8vo. half-morocco, 42s.
"The most comprehensive work on Numismatics which has appeared since Eckhel's days."—Classical Review.

A HISTORY of ENGLISH SOUNDS from the EARLIEST PERIOD. With full Word-Lists. By HENRY SWEET, M.A., Editor of "An Anglo-Saxon Reader" &c. 8vo. cloth, 14s.
"A work thoroughly worthy of Mr. Sweet's well-known ability and scholarship. It will probably long continue to be the most perfect existing handbook of English phonology."—Athenæum.

THE PILGRIMAGE to PARNASSUS. With Two Parts of the Return from Parnassus. Three Comedies performed in St. John's College, Cambridge, A.D. 1597-1601. Edited from MSS. by Rev. W. D. MACRAY, M.A., F.S.A. Medium 8vo. bevelled boards, gilt top, price 8s. 6d.
"No discovery of the kind has ever been made of greater value and interest."—Guardian.

SHAKESPEARE as a DRAMATIC ARTIST. A Popular Illustration of the Principles of Scientific Criticism. By R. G. MOULTON, M.A., Cambridge University (Extension) Lecturer in Literature. Second Edition, crown 8vo. 5s.

MR. NEWMAN'S EDITION OF THE "POLITICS." THE POLITICS of ARISTOTLE. Edited, with Introductory Essays and English Notes, by W. L. NEWMAN, M.A., Fellow of Balliol College, late Reader in Ancient History, Oxford. Vols. I. and II. 28s.
"A work of the first magnitude of its kind. May prove the definitive edition for a long while to come."—Oxford Magazine.

BY PROFESSOR JOWETT, M.A. ARISTOTLE.—THE POLITICS. Translated into English, with Introduction, Marginal Analysis, Essays, Notes, and Indices. Vols. I. and II. Vol. I. containing the Introduction and Translation. Vol. II. Part I. containing the Notes. 21s.
"The most agreeable and helpful English version."—Pall Mall Gazette.

PLATO.—THE DIALOGUES. Translated into English, with an Analysis and Introduction. New Edition, 5 vols. £3 10s.

PLATO.—THE REPUBLIC. Translated into English, with an Analysis and Introduction. Third Edition, 12s. 6d.

THUCYDIDES. Translated into English, with Introduction, Marginal Analysis, Notes, and Indices. 2 vols. 32s.

FULL CLARENDON PRESS CATALOGUES sent free on application.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,766, Vol. 68.

August 31, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE STRIKE.

IT is necessary in reviewing both the strike of this week and the very considerable mass of matter written about it to distinguish between the real and the sham. The second will be found on examination to bear a respectable proportion to the first. It is tolerably clear that no small part of this "immense strike," this "unprecedented movement," or whatever else it may be called by reporters well stocked with adjectives, is neither more immense nor more unprecedented than many sudden popular emotions. There is about it a large element of the revivalist meeting or of those apparently unaccountable popularities earned by theatrical performances or financial speculations which do not, to the unaffected spectator, appear in the least better or worse than scores of others which passed almost unobserved. Turning out on principle has been very much of a fashion for a week. The thing has become big because accident and puffing, combined with summer weather and comparatively slack times, have set going one of those imitative manias to which human nature has been observed to be liable during some six thousand years. As a matter of course the papers have lent their aid. Profiting by the goodness of Providence to the press in the silly season, they have made the most of such excellent material for copy. Deep has answered to deep, tub-orator to newspaper reporter, and there has been a loud reverberation of noise about the greatness, the novelty, the serious significance of the strike. Naturally the strikers on principle have heard all this roared by the tub-orator and duly echoed by the press, with the sense that they are doing something very novel and deserving of the attention of Europe. It is a pleasing excitement to hear of London threatened by famine or darkness—better than naval manœuvres by far; for, after all, the striker on principle is taking part in the show. There is, perhaps, less excuse for the newspapers which repeat this nonsense, and the so-called friends of the people who listen to it, without pointing out that the first to suffer by famine will be the poorest, and that the loss of gas will be most grievous to those who can least afford to pay for candles. As it is, the East-End shops which sell in small parcels are sending up their prices. Coal has more than doubled, to the injury, in the first place, of those who buy it by the "hundred," and not of those who buy it by the ton. The stopping of deliveries of Australian meat and of flour are already producing exactly similar consequences on the food supply of the poor.

It would, of course, be the extreme of folly to deny that there is much in the strike which is serious enough. At this moment the dock labourers and their case make the least part of it. These men are undoubtedly entitled to make the best terms for themselves they can, and to refuse to work except on conditions satisfactory to themselves. Nobody denies this—but the right of the Companies to work on terms satisfactory to themselves is equally clear; and if the men do not choose to take the best terms they can get by free bargaining, they ought to be expected to look out for more acceptable work elsewhere. Of course their right to starve if they choose is beyond all question. If they will not do this, then they must do the work they can get. They must not expect to have work provided for them on their own terms, in defiance of the state of the market and the nature of things. In our mealy-mouthed times this may seem to some a brutal way of stating the case; but it is the fact, and in the long run no good comes to anybody or anything, to humanitarians and philanthropy no more than to others, by blindness to facts. What, however, constitutes the exaggerated, but still real, gravity of the strike is, that means, active and passive, are being used to put pressure on the Dock Companies, in order to make them grant terms not made necessary by the nature of things and the state of the market. We do not speak of the picketing and intimidation of workmen, though in spite of Mr. MATTHEWS's wire-drawn distinction they have gone on. Such things are more or less common to all strikes, and have been worse in other cases than in this. What is better worth noting here is, that the pressure is largely exercised indirectly—which everybody knows—and, what nobody seems to care to say, is being made effective by the weakness, cowardice, and selfishness of other men of business who do not or will not see that their interests are bound up with those of the Dock Companies. Among them there is a marked inclination to get out of the immediate difficulty by weak concession and, what is worse, a mean disposition to throw the whole blame on the Dock Companies, and to call upon them to make concessions at their own expense for the general good. No great industry ever cut a more undignified figure than the shipowners of London do at this moment, with their combination of whining complaint that the Companies will not pay the men and quiet them, their nervous assertion that they cannot support any increase in the dock charges, and their threat to make a dock for themselves just after they have filled the papers with their condemnation of the excessive combination of existing Dock Companies. Yet if the Companies cannot pay more and are compelled to do it, one of two things must happen—either they will become bankrupt, or they will increase their charges. The shipowners have, to be sure, a third suggestion—namely, that they should be allowed to run the docks for their own benefit—which is, we take it, a very pretty example of the readiness of some hawks to seize the moment when other hawks are in a net for the purpose of picking out their eyes. Perhaps the most characteristic incident of the strike occurred on Wednesday, when "about a thousand men marched via Woolwich, Plumstead, Abbey Wood, and Belvedere to Erith, in order "to bring out the coal-porters" of a firm engaged in business there. In this case the men employed were contented, quite ready to go on working, and even apparently full of fight. It was the employers who yielded. After a long wrangle they "agreed that no more unloading of coal "should take place in their wharves until the dispute was "settled," and they gave "10s. for the men to drink their "health, and 5*l.* towards the funds." This, too, be it observed, was after the loyalty of their men had stood firm against cajolery and threats of a visitation from Mr. BURNS and thirty thousand more, and of ducking in the river. If this is how intimidation is met, is it wonderful that intimidation takes place?

What it has all come to mean is made sufficiently clear by the conspicuous activity of Mr. BURNS and by his language. Whatever movement he joins becomes at once Socialistic, if it was not so before—and he has been very busy, he and Mr. H. H. CHAMPION, speech-making, letter-writing, negotiating, and, as we observe with pleasure, running to and fro "in a brougham," grand as CUFFY. Whither Mr. BURNS would guide the movement, if he has a chance, he has frankly explained. When they had got what they wanted, he said on Wednesday, "then they would consider "other movements." In fact, there is to be a general movement, for which the dock labourers have only supplied the excuse, and to which they may very conceivably be sacrificed. Unions have before now prolonged strikes at the expense of starvation to poorer fellow-workmen for their own selfish ends. The accounts given by eye-witnesses at the end of the week of the growing misery of the dock labourers themselves and the obstinacy of the Union men convey the impression that this situation has been almost reached already. On all hands it is becoming clearer that the strikers on principle are now, whatever may have been their intention at the beginning, making demands on their own account, and will stand out for them. It is idle to tell the dock labourers that they ought to have this or the other of their demands. They will get what they can get, and no more. If the Dock Companies do stand out, which they have quite as good a right to do as the workmen, and are much better able to do, and if that tendency to return to work which is noted already is hastened by downright starvation, of which there are already signs, no small part of the blame for the misery endured will rest on the cheap philanthropists who have prated during the week about what the men "ought" to have. Mr. BURNS's words may well be weighed by those employers who feel disposed to use the Dock Companies as the traditional tub to the whale. They also deserve the attention of those who are asked to show active sympathy with the dock labourers in the present phase of their struggle, which is not by fair bargaining to secure better terms from the Companies—for they have been conceded—but to dictate terms by violence. Such a movement deserves no patronage, whether it takes the form of leading articles or of Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON's subscription for the women and children. It was the duty of the men to support their wives and families themselves by honest work. They should not have struck without providing for the necessity, and whoever helps to relieve them of the burden interferes to prolong unduly a cessation of work which has ceased to be excusable, and has become a nuisance and, to some extent, a danger to the community.

ARMENIAN ATROCITIES.

THE Duke DE BROGLIE told the world some years ago how a French King amused himself by maintaining an elaborate secret diplomacy quite independent of, and sometimes not by any means working in harmony with, the recognized representatives of France. The system has not seldom commended itself to monarchs as well as to their Ministers; but we do not remember a much more curious instance of its results than the letter which Mr. GLADSTONE sent to the Daily News of Tuesday last concerning the alleged "atrocities" in Armenia. Parliament was still sitting, and it might be thought that, if Mr. GLADSTONE, a member of Parliament, had to bring before the Government and the public something which, as he seems to think, authorizes a demand according to treaty for the suppression of outrages and the condign punishment of villains, his place in the House would be the fit place for making the statement. Mr. GLADSTONE, however, sends that statement instead to the Daily News, with a complimentary reference to the way in which that journal engineered the atrocities in Bulgaria thirteen years ago, and with the very curious guarantee that "it is furnished with particulars of times and persons and proceeds from a source which has every presumption of trustworthiness." That is to say, it is a "piece," both in the common and the diplomatic sense, of the secret diplomacy of Mr. GLADSTONE, and is brought forward to strengthen the vague and weak charges which, after many months, the same journal has just received from its Correspondent in Tiflis. It may be observed, in passing, that Mr. GLADSTONE's news, such as it is, is not very new, that if there is one place from which true accounts of events in Armenia are not likely to be received, that place is Tiflis, and that the late Mr. MCGAHAN—who, whatever may be thought of the use made of his inquiries by Mr. GLADSTONE and others, was a bold and faithful inquirer—did not effect his "discoveries" at a Russian town, under the comfortable patronage of the nation which had to gain by a general belief in what he "discovered."

It is part of the "wicked charm" (to use the phrase of a historian about a not dissimilar matter) of this atrocity-mongering that it is impossible to bring criticism to bear on its facts and fictions without being accused of callous indifference to suffering on the one hand and crime on the other. The attempt to disprove a charge is represented as an attempt to palliate the crime charged, and the prisoner's advocate is represented as the criminal's apologist. But to be frightened off by this would argue as little discretion as valour. We must take the liberty of repeating, for the tenth time at least even on this occasion, that mere lists of crimes, however handsomely they may be furnished with names and dates, are not things on which any reasonable charge can be based. The omnium gatherum of atrocities which the Daily News' Correspondent has had sent to him at Tiflis, and which he sends on without even such a vague voucher for its genuineness as Mr. GLADSTONE's, consists of accusations, in part extremely weak, and always unproved. An Armenian travelling from Alashgerd to Erzeroum with his nephew disappeared. Their bodies were found, and nobody has been punished. Something not wholly unlike this occurred in the peaceful Isle of Arran the other day; but we do not know that the SULTAN has been advised to make representations to Queen VICTORIA. Elsewhere a Bey "compelled his servant woman to turn Mussulman that he might marry her." Does even Mr. BRYCE think that we ought to move earth and heaven about this? There are worse things in the réquisitoire than this, no doubt; but almost all, if not all, little exceed the ordinary incidents of frontier brigandage in a wild and imperfectly policed country. Mr. GLADSTONE's cases are fewer but heavier, and more elaborately described. By far the longest story is, but for one ugly detail, not too credibly related (we do not think it is in accordance with Mahomedan etiquette for a brother to outrage the girl he is carrying off to be the other brother's wife), almost exactly identical with, and not worse than, the rough abductions which were once so common in the Highlands of Scotland and in Ireland, and the most notorious of which is the famous case of ROBIN OIG. This and the other crimes, in all of which MOUSSA Bey is concerned, are undoubtedly matters for an inquiry, in order that they may be authenticated in some less perfunctory manner than Mr. GLADSTONE's, who indeed seems to touch the whole matter gingerly, like a man who has made one tremendous coup with a card, and half fears to play it again. But it may just be observed in passing that there is not a word about bride-boiling in them.

We so far agree with Mr. GLADSTONE—an agreement so rare that we always like to make the most of it when it exists—that we have great regard in discussing these matters to the treaty rights which England possesses in reference to them. Reference to these rights in Mr. GLADSTONE's mouth is, perhaps, a little bold. The instruments by which they are chiefly conferred are instruments which Mr. GLADSTONE and his party condemned unsparingly, which they hastened to make a dead letter when soon after their conclusion they came into power, and the full carrying out of which they affected, and still affect, to regard with horror. But this matters little. We are well aware that, with persons so slippery as atrocity-mongers, inquiry is a difficult game. If MOUSSA Bey were to produce the clearest alibi in all the cases against him, they would be certain that, if it was not MOUSSA Bey, it was somebody else; that, if it was not on the 10th of July, it was on the 9th of June, and that, if it was not at the "village of Dabavank," it was at "the village of Vabadank." The spirit of him who saw beansacks as men hanging is always with the atrocity-monger, and to convince him is as impossible as to attempt it is futile. But it is all but certain that these things are being regularly got up as an excuse—not necessarily or immediately to be used, but ready for use if necessary—for the intervention of Russia; and it is therefore extremely desirable that every means should be taken to find out the truth. Nor do we perceive what harm can be done by the inquiry. If the charges are false, they will, no doubt, continue to be falsely urged; but the lie can be driven down the throat that utters it each time of utterance. If they are true, to anything like their full extent, no harm can come of proving them true which would not also come from their inevitable effect in estranging the population from Turkey and throwing it into the arms of Russia.

Probably most people who possess a somewhat wider knowledge and a somewhat better judgment than the amiable fanatics who believe these things, as well as a sense of decency superior to that of the (we trust, few) scoundrels who echo and propagate without believing them, would expect to find that, as a whole, they are neither true nor false. "Some truth there is, but dashed and brewed with lies." The manners of the Kurds are unlikely to have softened very materially since the time when Sir HENRY LAYARD, a good way to the south of Bitlis, nearly broke his neck in catching sight of a certain mountain platform, paved with Nestorian, not Armenian, bones. And at all times and in all places blackmail, robbery, and abduction, with too frequent murder and outrage, have resulted from the juxtaposition of fierce and warlike highlanders with more pacific races, even if there are no religious differences to exasperate the enmity. But it is impossible to see what interest the SULTAN can have in protecting MOUSSA and his like, and it is quite certain that it is his interest to protect the Armenians. The talk of the Atrocitarians (they are all but a regular sect, and may as well have a regularly formed name) about "a systematic policy, having for its object the expatriation of the Armenians," is an instance of the frantic silliness of the true believer in all such fictions. It is the kind of thing to commend itself to a rather dull member of a Home Reading Circle who had been reading about the expulsion of the Moriscos. To begin with, there are about a million Armenians in Armenia, and at least half as many in other parts of the Turkish dominions. You cannot easily "expatriate" a million and a half people in these days, even if they happen to be your best-paying, most industrious, and most generally useful subjects. But, now that the Porte has been effectually waked up to governing in Crete, it is very desirable that it should have a little jogging in the Armenian direction. When the Atrocitarian is set going, he is perfectly unscrupulous and sometimes rather dangerous: and Mr. GLADSTONE has set him going now.

THE FUTURE OF PARTIES.

IT is still a great country this, and we have a vast deal to be proud of. But from the natural mutation of things there are variations in what we boast of most, and at the present moment our Parliamentary institutions are less frequently chosen for celebration than they used to be. Contrary to recent expectation, the House of Lords is no less glorious to the general view; but as for the House of Commons, to which the other was related as a kind of moon—this, the central sun of our Parliamentary system, has waned, and is waning very much indeed. Proud of it we were immeasurably, and there was hardly an intelligent foreigner anywhere who did not contemplate it with a like feeling to that which afflicts our American visitors when they gaze on Windsor Castle or the Abbey church of Westminster. But the foreigner may envy us less now; and it is to be feared that the present temper of the English people is such that they do not care if he does. They have lost their own pride in an assembly once truly named august—look up to it less, look down upon it more, and take only an occasional superior interest in its proceedings. Possibly this is not a lasting change. A day may come when the House of Commons will regain the attention and respect which it has certainly lost, even within the time of this generation; but, if so, there must be a return to it of the greater minds that strove together in its walls when men like Sir GEORGE LEWIS were accounted second-rate, and also a return of the courtesy and dignity by which HEALYS and TANNERS were chastened into decency and stifled into silence. The cant against the customary laudation of old times will still be repeated; but it does not avail to show us either the existence or the prospect of any such set of men in the House of Commons as were diminishing on both benches at the date of Mr. DISRAELI's last leadership and the beginnings of Mr. GLADSTONE's transformation. A glance at the composition of Cabinets nowadays suffices to reveal at once the whole extent of the change; and when the House of Commons is scanned for new men rising behind the ranks of dwindling competency, how many do we see? and what is their promise?

The question has been asked a hundred times, but never with more point than at this moment. We have just come to the end of a Session which in one particular, and that of the highest importance, is more remarkable than any other since the Peel party was formed, and far beyond that in point of significance. It has, indeed, come to an end but little regarded, though that end has not only been peace, but peace with the honour of an exceedingly flattering, and yet not at all untruthful, QUEEN'S Speech. And yet, unless we misread the signs of the times, before many months are out this Session will be looked upon as marking the date of a distinct and momentous change in the currents of party politics. Because Mr. LABOUCHERE is Mr. LABOUCHERE, the muster of a New Radical party behind him loses much of the significance that properly belongs to it. But what it portends is better understood when we observe that this party was not formed for a special occasion or a temporary purpose. Some appearance of that kind it had for a little while, but never to the eyes of the two or three who had been regarded as Mr. GLADSTONE's heirs. They, who had been long exercised as to the future guidance of the Opposition Radicals—as to whose hands it should fall into, the line to be taken, and so forth—perceived at once that a determinate settlement of those questions was intended by the mutiny. Their own idea had been that nothing could be done while Mr. GLADSTONE remained at the head of the party; but these others—these others did not choose to wait. Suspicious of what seemed to them the weakness and hesitancy of Mr. GLADSTONE's nearer colleagues, they pushed to the front, in virtue of a fine discrimination and a courage accordant therewith. They saw that the time had come when Mr. GLADSTONE himself might be put aside by any set of men who insisted on the immediate embodiment of the New Radicalism; and this they determined to attempt offhand. Mr. GLADSTONE obviously understood the full meaning of the move at once; the very remarkable conduct of Mr. MORLEY at the time, and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's "attitude" then and since, show that they were equally aware of its significance. It is too soon to say that Mr. GLADSTONE has succumbed to the unexpected intimations of his Radical following in the House of Commons when the Royal Grants Bill came up, and the complete acquiescence of the whole body of Advanced Radicalism in the country. But, to all appearance, Mr. GLADSTONE is strongly disposed to retire. Meanwhile, he may endeavour to renew the glories of his celebrated Bulgarian campaign; but he will soon learn that they cannot be repeated. By the time Parliament meets again, preparation for the next general election will have commenced, and then his choice must be made. He will either compete with Mr. LABOUCHERE and Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT in the denunciations and the promises of an organized New Radicalism, or he will seek the retirement already pointed out to him. In either case, in any case, we have not to wait for Mr. GLADSTONE's disappearance to witness the beginning of what was always expected to follow upon that event. The New Radical party, Socialist in its principles, revolutionary in its aims, has been definitely formed; and as soon as the programmes for the general election are formulated it will be seen in full swing, probably with Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT, Mr. MORLEY, and other hesitants at its head.

If we are right, the consequence will necessarily be the reformation of what is now the Ministerial party on a broader basis and in closer array. That certainty leaves little to be feared; but yet something depends on the men on either side. When this point is considered, it is obvious at once that the advantage is all one way. In the face of such an opposition as might be organized, and probably will be organized, on out-and-out Radical-Socialist principles, we may expect that the party now called Unionist will become more closely fused; it will be strange if it loses any of its vigour, and nobody doubts that there is far more character, more weight, more sheer political capacity in its ranks than Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT and Mr. LABOUCHERE can muster between them. If at the close of the Session we look down the ranks of the combatants, it is easy to see who have been the losers. Clearly, the heart is out of the Irish party; and, if they have cost the Gladstonian Liberals much, they have rendered nothing back, not even a debater, generally useful—though that may be remedied in future. Of Mr. GLADSTONE's English captains, not one has gained ground this Session. Indeed, it may be said that all have slipped lower, with the sole exception of Mr. LABOUCHERE, whose advancement is made at the expense of men who never dreamed of coming into competition with him. At the end of another Session nobody thinks better of Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT's political character, or his competence, than at the beginning of it—neither of Mr. MORLEY's; worse rather. The TREVELYANS and MUNDELLAS are but fading forms. The new men of that side are persons like Mr. STOREY; and, though Mr. ASQUITH has not put himself forward much, in him the Radicals have a stronger man than some that are better known. On the other side no such decadence appears anywhere; for, of course, we are not to reckon Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL. The well-earned authority of the Unionist leaders remains unimpaired, if it has received no fresh illustration; and, while it certainly seems as if Mr. CHAMBERLAIN had drawn further from friendship with revolutionary doctrine, the one "new man" of real importance in the House of Commons shines on the Conservative benches.

This being so, we may await without much misgiving the opening of that new and stirring chapter in English politics which will probably start with the preparations for the next general election. According to this calculation, once more we shall have two parties in the State—two new parties as strongly opposed as any that have been seen in this century; and, if so, the House of Commons will again become extremely interesting before long. Possibly the animations of the conflict may draw out a variety of "talent" on either side of which there is no present promise; and that at least will be well.

SAUCE FOR THE GANDER.

THE great name and the illuminating ideas of Dr. IBSEN are now public property. The magazines have been full of his name and his fame; the vision of The Doll's House has not been wasted. Many a once-happy wife and many a not ill-contented husband have been induced to reflect on their condition. Had they any right to be so tranquil? have they not been ingloriously sacrificing themselves to each other and to their children? Dr. IBSEN's heroine made a fuss, and fled from her domicile because she had been too indulgently treated, lapped in cotton-wool, as it were, and cradled into ignominious comfort. Here is one of woman's wrongs, quite a new wrong, and a very common sort of misery. Thousands of women, awaking from their stupor, have brooded over this and left their homes. True, they are expected to return after the holidays, but mortal expectations are frequently deceived. The discomforts of seaside lodgings, the disgusts of travel, may remind them of all that they endure at home in the way of petting and pleasure. They may be braced to follow NORA HELMER's example, and not only to shut the door after them, but to slam it. This, of course, is all as it should be, and as thoughtful women would wish to have it. But what of men?—of married men? According to an ancient saw, what is sauce for the goose (like Dr. IBSEN's heroine) is sauce for the male bird also. Husbands, too, may desire to develop themselves, apart from the trammels of the family. Many a husband has long felt that he is treated as a mere doll or toy, a mere child and plaything. He has allowed himself to be called by endearing but puerile nicknames, much as the suffering NORA was named a "lark," a "squirrel," and so forth. If this be ruinous to feminine development, it is also destructive to masculine dignity and nobility of spirit. Some day or other a husband's heart will burn at being styled "BOBS" (his name is ROBERT) or "TOMMY," whereas he was christened ALEXANDER. Then he will reflect that he is positively dandled and coshered like a babe in arms. The pages of his new books are not for him, as if he, forsooth, were not fit to be trusted at large with a paper-knife. He has been permitted to smoke in the drawing-room—a practice that saps the Spartan virtues at the foundation. When he has mislaid a book or paper, he has been allowed to sit and grumble till somebody found it, just as if he were a spoiled infant. When he has been sulky, soft answers have been returned to him. His wife has pretended not to like oysters, that he, the pampered and enslaved minion, may have these costly delicacies more abundantly. With hateful cruelty breakfast has been brought to him in bed when he was tired. The respected aunts of his wife have been estranged and neglected because, forsooth, they bored him. The children have been prevented from shouting all over the house that he might dwell in the quiet of an Oriental harem. His intellect has been enfeebled for lack of the bracing atmosphere of eternal contradiction. He has never been disciplined by the ceaseless remark, "Don't do this," or "Don't do that," whatever he may happen to be doing. His brain has been narrowed to the ideas of a clique, because his friends, and nobody else, have been welcomed to the house. He has not been taught to suffer and be strong, nor been compelled to take the most dismal dowager of his guests down to dinner. His wife has not chosen her women friends for their uncompromising plainness (as more earnest ladies do), her intimates have not been all over thirty years and twelve stone avoirdupois. The demoralizing partner of his existence has had jolly young ladies for friends. She has allowed him to read his letters in peace, not interrupting him with intelligence about people in whom he is not interested. She has not expected him to know all about the BROWNS and SMITHS of her virginity. She has not scolded him for being extravagant, nor bothered him for money, nor made him go to evening parties, nor to social entertainments between four and seven. He has actually been kept ignorant of what goes on in his own house when knowledge would be irritating and useless. In fact, he has been kept in cotton-wool. His wife has not regarded marriage as a stern and bracing discipline, as a true woman should. She has stifled his unselfishness and pampered his indolence.

After a course of IBSEN in the magazines, after Mr. ARCHER, Mr. SYMONS, Mr. LORD, Mrs. AVELING, many, many a husband must awake to a knowledge of his lost estate. He has been in a "Doll's House"; he has been the chief Doll. That husband has only one course before him, if the partisans of Mrs. NORA HELMER are right. We do not say that he must exhibit his new stockings to his lady friends, as Mrs. HELMER did to the gentlemen of her acquaintance. Such close imitation might be servile. But he must, he really must, sit down and scold his wife in good set terms, call her a stranger, denounce her system of pampering him, rush out of the house, and never come back any more. The law may call this Desertion. A fig for the law! What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

And yet it may be doubted whether, with all her provocations, man will imitate woman as she is in the gospel of IBSEN. It is hard "to kiss and clip him till he run away."

THE QUEEN IN WALES.

IN ordinary circumstances it would not be necessary to take much notice of HER MAJESTY's visit to North Wales. It is not the first by hundreds, and it may be hoped that it is far from being the last, of such visits to different parts of her dominions—visits which have been, and we trust will be always, the occasion of a genuine display of welcome from the inhabitants. The Royal progress of olden times, despite its burdensomeness, was pretty generally popular; and the Royal progress of modern times, which is not burdensome at all, is more popular still. To private persons a holiday spent in the presence of indefinite thousands would not be a very delightful thing. But those who have to say C'est mon métier à moi d'être roi get accustomed to it, and perhaps like it. It is certain that those whose business for their part is to be subjects seem to like their share in the amusement very well. Perhaps the only thing to be regretted in the whole matter is that the improvement in the weather, which began on Monday, did not come in time for the proceedings at Wrexham and elsewhere.

One little matter, however, differentiates this visit of the QUEEN's from most—perhaps from all—of recent years. Since the Chartist times, at any rate, there has been no whisper of disloyalty on any such occasion within the three seas (it is not easy to make out the traditional fourth in the case of a triangular island) which bound Great Britain. The recent visit to Wales will have two distinctions in history. It was remarkable for the fact of such whispers being raised—which was unfortunate. It was also—which was fortunate—remarkable for the complete rebuff given to the silly discourtesy of the agitator who took upon himself to dictate to his fellow-countrymen. Because some of the neighbours of a certain Mr. GEE, of Denbigh, are expected by the law to carry to others of Mr. GEE's neighbours money which has been entrusted to them by a third set of Mr. GEE's neighbours for that purpose, and because Mr. GEE does not like the occupation of the persons thus entitled to the money, he suggested to his Nonconformist brethren that they should dissociate themselves from the welcome to the Sovereign, and is even said to have hinted that HER MAJESTY might think herself lucky if she were not hissed—a suggestion which, on the parallel of Pump's Case, a lawyer of the old school would have no great difficulty in construing into treason. We do not take things so seriously now, and the chapter of modern accident has visited the self-appointed Public Orator of Little Bethel with a punishment perhaps more annoying, if less physically painful, than lash and branding-iron, gallows and hangman's knife. Little Bethel, though too often an unluckily narrow and ill-informed place, is not such a bad place after all; and it had not the slightest intention of being rude to a lady, disloyal to a Queen, and ridiculous to a nation by obeying Mr. GEE's directions. We must wait till some one takes the trouble to translate the Baner's next issue before we know what the "King of Wales" (vice Sir WATKIN dethroned, we suppose), as the flatterers of an obscure provincial journalist with a certain gift of the gab term him sometimes, has to say to this. But there are certainly few occasions more annoying for a leader or would-be leader of men than when he says Go, and they go not, Come, and they come not, Do this, and they do it not.

Let it be sincerely hoped that this is not the last snub which awaits the pinchbeck particularists of this kind who have been stirred up by Mr. GLADSTONE's attempt to burn the national house in order to roast his own pig. And it will very much conduce to this happy result if a little more attention is paid to the harmless, as distinguished from the harmful, fancies of Welshmen and other local aggregations. The people who, in the words of that man of undoubted loyalty, Sir AMYAS LEIGH, would "die for the least hair of the QUEEN's royal head, God bless it, but could live very well till "Doomsday without ever setting eyes thereon," may laugh at those of a contrary way of thinking. But it takes all sorts of men to make a kingdom as well as a world. And the art of kingcraft depends upon nothing so much as upon consulting, within proper limits, the tastes of all these sorts.

HAYTI.

"EST-ce que vous prenez ces gens au sérieux?" was the question put by a French diplomatist to Sir SPENCER ST. JOHN, after some solemn function in Hayti. Sir SPENCER seems to have found the question difficult to answer in the affirmative. It is very hard, in fact, to take Hayti seriously. The revolutions of that remarkable State always seem to suggest the performance of the Badians who got into trouble at a certain Dignity ball with Lieutenant TERENCE O'BRIEN. There are, to be sure, reasons why this view should be a trifle inadequate. White races have given instances of revolutions not more intelligible than those which periodically convulse what was once a great French colony. Then these obscure shindies have some gravity for the foreign traders who have business to conduct and property to lose in the midst of the black apes of white follies. English, French, and American war-ships have a good deal of work thrown on them by the strife of Count MARMALADE with Baron LEMONADE, or of the successors of the nobles who gathered round the throne of His Majesty FAUSTIN I. For such reasons we cannot afford to treat these chronic rows with entire indifference. If they could be considered in themselves they would be altogether comic. There is about them an air, as it were, of niggers out for a holiday—gibbering, dancing, grimacing, or butting one another, when spluttering drunk, with their woolly heads. Such things would be purely laughable, whenever they did not get bestial enough to become disgusting, if it were not, as we have already said, that the interests of a few civilized human beings were concerned in them.

The last uproar, which has ended in inflicting the society of General LÉGITIME on the officers of a French man-of-war, is as unintelligible as its forerunners. What were he and General HIPPOLYTE fighting for? Probably for the control of the spigot of such taxation as there is in Hayti. One savage in a flashy French uniform has got the better of another, and that is all as far as they are concerned. But there are other people concerned more or less closely, and as regards their share something is to be said. What are the white civilizations immediately around it to do with this resurrection in the New World of the lowest kind of African savagery? It is not a clean martial manly barbarism, such as we have had to shatter in Zululand—the best the black man has ever done for himself. It is a dirty, cowardly, and withal bestially ferocious barbarism of the Lower Congo kind. There is Voodooism, the worship of the serpent, cannibalism, and filthy cruelty in abundance among it, and a foul, squalid satisfaction with idle barbarism. A more amusing spectacle to the disinterested onlooker who has been sickened by "jaw" about the ennobling influences of freedom could not have been imagined by the most cynical satirist. Here are a people who have been slaves and who are free, who have acquired as much of a European language as enables them to chatter the formulas of European speculators to all lengths and breadths. At the end of it all they have almost completely reverted to the condition of their naked ancestors who were marched on board the slave ships by those other ancestors of theirs who were clothed in a flint-lock musket, a cocked hat, and a bottle of rum. Whatever there is in them which is not Congo savage is what was flogged into them by the French planters, the most ferocious slave-masters ever seen. The only use they have made of their freedom has been to return to their starting-point—and to return a little spoilt. It would be absurd to compare what they have done in their seventy years of freedom with the history, say, of the kingdom of Uganda. In Uganda, at least, there has been some kind of stability, a code of laws of a sort, an established dynasty, some approach to coherence and order. In Hayti there has been nothing but endless butting matches between Count MARMALADE and Baron LEMONADE, General LÉGITIME and General HIPPOLYTE. The end of it all will be curious to see, for the question we put above must be answered some day—not at once, perhaps, but sooner or later. To England and France it does not perhaps much matter. All they can have to do is to send a punitive expedition under the provocation of some particularly outrageous piece of robbery. But for the United States it has a peculiar interest. Hayti is the finished and full-blown example of what emancipation accompanied with enfranchisement has prepared for the Southern States. The Ku-Klux and the known readiness of the Southerners to shoot have hitherto assisted the ennobling influences of freedom; but even they, though they may keep General LÉGITIME and General HIPPOLYTE at their proper work of cane-cutting, cotton-picking, and tobacco-drying, cannot make them civilizable beings. How this is to be done, and what will be the consequences of, first, not doing it, and, secondly, not removing the unteachable savage whom they have armed with a vote, are problems which the United States may consider. In the meantime they may fix a thoughtful eye on the Republic of Hayti.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

IT would scarcely be fair to quarrel with Mr. BRADLAUGH for repeating the old and, in a way, sound commonplace about the lateness and scantiness of the attention which the House of Commons gives to the chief recognized discussion of Indian affairs. As in the case of other commonplaces, there is a great deal to be said on both sides. If the measure of time and attention were taken as the measure of the importance, according to the best part of the opinion of the House, of the subject; if it were taken as the deliberate judgment of that House that Mr. O'BRIEN's breeches, or Mr. CONYBEARE's entomological experiences, or the ineffable brutality of Mr. BALFOUR deserved days of talk, while the Empire of India deserves minutes, then things would certainly be very wrong indeed. But this is notoriously not the case. And, on the other hand, it is the case that matters, especially matters affecting colonies and dependencies, have not invariably gone the better in proportion as the House of Commons, and especially the House of Commons as it has been latterly constituted, has spent more time on them. There are other occasions on which the affairs of India can come and do come under cognizance; the details of this particular statement are always known long before to any one who cares to inquire about them; and few things can be imagined at once more lugubrious and less profitable than a field-night occupied by the regular Indian bore and the regular Radical faddist. It should be remembered that it was a discussion in the House of Commons which not many months ago resulted in immensely increasing the number of men in the Indian army laid up with loathsome diseases.

There was and could be little that is new in the jeremiads of Mr. BRADLAUGH, of Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL, and of that latest scourge of the House of Commons, Mr. MACNEILL, and there could not be much more novelty in the apologetics of Sir JOHN GORST and Sir RICHARD TEMPLE and the rest. When Mr. MACNEILL talked about India being "administered for the benefit of English middle-class families" (it used to be the English aristocracy, and the one was as true as the other) he talked nonsense, which ought to earn him high promotion in the Parnellite party. But Mr. MACNEILL is an honest kind of nonsense-maker (this, it is true, might interfere with the promotion we have suggested), and, as in the case of all honest nonsense-makers, there lay behind the falsehood which his folly taught him a modicum of truth. The yearly history of the financial state of India is the most signal example known, or ever likely to be known, to man of a stupendous and almost, if not quite, successful wrestling with the facts of the universe. No Oriental people is nowadays rich enough to afford the kind of administration which Western notions think necessary. Some European nations attempt the problem, and meet with endless deficits; some boldly or indolently decline to attempt it, and rub along in a kind of compromise between native and European methods, or (in perhaps the single instance of the Dutch) try native methods almost purely, and make a handsome profit. We, with endless groanings and the expenditure of all our experience and wits, just manage it, as a rule, and only just. Until quite recently we neglected everything else to do it. Luckily of late, indeed of the latest, years the first need of India, that of defence against invaders, has for the first time been cared for. But this has necessarily thrown heavy expenses on her, the arrangements of our Constitution unfortunately not allowing the expense to be put, according to the ingenious suggestion of one of Mr. BRADLAUGH'S colleagues in another matter, upon the statesmen who might have anticipated the danger and did not. But the need has been or is being met, and India is not crushed. If the taxation seems to bear hardly on articles which European custom exempts, it must be remembered that there is little else to tax. And perhaps unexpected comfort may be received from the perusal of Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL, who is not generally regarded as a comfortable man. If so determined a grumbler and one so intimately acquainted with his subject can find nothing worse to complain of than Sir GEORGE found, things cannot be so very bad after all.

THE LAST OF THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

IT seems to have been the desire of the Admiralty that the Naval Manœuvres should end in perfecting whatever has been most absurd about them. If that was the intention of my Lords, it was most effectually carried out by Lord GEORGE HAMILTON'S answer to Sir G. CAMPBELL last Tuesday. The FIRST LORD was asked whether naval officers were to be encouraged to revive "the old practice of laying towns in ashes," and whether he would not consider "the expediency of introducing into modern warfare the more merciful rules that prevail in land warfare." To this Lord GEORGE replied that he had heard of indemnities being demanded under threats, and thought it a practice which ought to be given up. It appears, then, that sea-ports are to be visited, and surrender or indemnities demanded without the threats—which would be precisely the perfection of absurdity. Saving the reverence of Sir G. CAMPBELL, indemnities are demanded in land war with threats, as the FIRST LORD told him. If they were not, they most assuredly would not be paid. One does not pay indemnities for love of the enemy's beaux yeux, but for fear of worse. But they are demanded by a force which has won all along the line, and is in no fear of retaliation. Their absurdity in the manœuvres lies in this, that no Power would scatter its ships along an enemy's coast, where they might be crushed, for no more sane purpose than to provoke reprisals by proceedings imitated apparently from the illustrious MORGAN. War is not made, except among savages who cannot reason, by burning outlying villages and looting small towns. Civilized peoples know the danger of being caught when scattered by a united enemy a great deal too well, and they begin by breaking up the enemy's fighting forces and capturing his arsenals. Then they levy indemnities at their leisure. In our manœuvres, however, the rule seems to be to begin where the real thing leaves off.

The other lessons of these manœuvres are more valuable than the demonstration of the great truth that, if you have to deal with a people as defenceless as the Spaniards were in Central America, you can do what the buccaneers did at Panama. The greatest, the most fruitful, and withal the most exasperating, of the truths they have served to enforce is the unhappy state of officers and men doomed to fight in and with instruments invented by the scientific mind, which remembers everything except human nature. When all is said and done, ships are meant to be guided across the sea and guns to be used in action by men. If officers and crews cannot live with something like the security and comfort of a convict, they break down. If guns cannot be moved by the arms of gunners when their machinery gets out of gear, then they are no more use than so many quakers. Now it seems to have been the cherished aim of shipbuilders to construct vessels, big and little, which are absolutely uninhabitable in bad weather. We hear of battle-ships which are all awash whenever they get into a capful of wind, so that the men have to be kept down below till they choke in the fetid air, and of little ships in which you can neither sit nor stand, walk or lie down, eat or sleep, till on the third day madness seems imminent. Scientifically they are beautiful; only unfortunately a special superhuman race, combining the qualities of the skilled artificer, the fish, the bat, and the dormouse, are required to handle them. The breakdown of the Anson's electrical firing gear shows what might be the fate of men dependent at a crisis on machinery. When she took Aberdeen, as they call it, she could not have fired so much as a blank cartridge out of her great guns. Thanks to Mr. WILLIAM CAIUS CRUTCHLEY, Lieutenant R.N.R. and master of the s.s. Kaikoura, we have also had an opportunity of seeing what capture of a merchant steamer means in manœuvres. The Kaikoura sighted the Arethusa eight miles off, and bore down to have a look at her. When she was a mile off she was told she was captured, and thereupon steamed off at moderate speed, followed by the Arethusa, which did not gain a yard. On the very reasonable grounds that in war-time he would not be quite fool enough to bear down on a war-ship till he knew she was a friend, and that, if the Arethusa was to have taken him she should have done it on her own merits, Captain CAIUS CRUTCHLEY refused to consider himself captured. We hold him to have been thoroughly right in his view—but, then, what is the value of all these captures of merchant ships by the A fleet and the B fleet? What, indeed, has been the strategical and tactical value of the manœuvres at all? Unless they are to become as idle as ever can have been the drillground practice of troops on shore, it is time that this question was thoroughly thought out. Admiral BAIRD'S very instructive order containing his late plan of campaign would supply the text.

LORD ADDINGTON.

ONE more of a rapidly diminishing class of public men has been added to the majority in the person of Lord ADDINGTON, or (for, as in the case of other new-made peers, it seems more natural to call him so) Mr. HUBBARD. To his private friends the loss will be very considerable, though a man who had reached the age of eighty-four hardly has many left of those friends who feel such a loss most acutely. But even to those who did not know Mr. HUBBARD personally, and who may never have thought of him as a very important politician, his death should be the occasion of a somewhat special regret. For he was, as has been said, a member, and in a way a representative member, of a class which, as its members die off, is by no means being filled up in the same proportion with new men. No one, probably, would have selected Mr. HUBBARD during any part of the long period when he still bore that name as a politician of very extraordinary ability. He did not even enter Parliament very early, and he meddled comparatively little with what are specially called politics, though he was a staunch Conservative. Nor did he, as some men do when they get into Parliament, take up some crotchet which has nothing to do with their own knowledge and experience. The subjects with which Mr. HUBBARD'S name was generally connected were mostly subjects with which he was almost as professionally qualified to deal as a lawyer with legal matters; and subjects on which, it may be added, his professional knowledge did not pass—as professional knowledge often does—into professional prejudice. His views on the Corn Laws were not those which prevailed; but he did not enter Parliament till the question had been settled for some years. His views on the currency were less crotchety than those of most persons who venture upon that proverbially dangerous subject, and may be said to have proceeded from the soundest possible standpoint—the standpoint that, whatever you may choose to say, you never can make fifteen shillings worth a sovereign, or buy a sovereign for fifteen shillings. He was one of the staunchest lay supporters of the Church of England and of religious education—indeed, there was in these respects no more prominent member of the House of Commons during the last thirty years, except the late Mr. BERESFORD HOPE. But the subject with which Mr. HUBBARD'S name was most closely connected—the Income-tax—illustrated best of all the value of his services and of the services of men like him. He did not get his way; and the best and most impartial opinion has always been divided on the question whether it would be well that his scheme, or something like it, should be adopted. But it was and is noticeable, in the first place, that that scheme was as far as possible from being the scheme of a rich man who wants riches to escape taxation, and, in the second, that it was the scheme of a man practically acquainted with business and finance.

It must be admitted that the prospects of new men of this kind appearing in the House of Commons are not very good. That the best class of men of business are as impartial, as cool-headed, as ready to devote their talents, if not their genius, to the service of the State as ever is a comfortable belief which we should be sorry to discourage. Let those who hold that the standard of general morality and public spirit "in the City," at least the highest part of the City, has not improved of late be regarded if anybody pleases as merely specimens of the usual croaker. But, whether there are or are not men of this kind ready for the constituencies, it is, unfortunately, but too certain that the constituencies are less ready than they were for such men. It may be that this is only another instance of the general law of change; but that does not make it less a fact. "We never know the value of a thing till we are going to lose it in six weeks," said somebody. And it may be very much feared that the class of politician of which Lord ADDINGTON was a sterling, if not a brilliant, example is in danger of such a tardy realization of its merits.

THE REVOLVER AT HOME AND ABROAD.

LAST month the House of Lords ordered a return to be prepared of the laws and regulations in European countries with regard to the carrying of arms by private persons in populous places. Lord SALISBURY at once addressed a Circular to HER MAJESTY'S representatives on the Continent, and their replies have now been published in the form of a Parliamentary Paper, which shows that we enjoy a proud pre-eminence, at least on this side of the Atlantic, in the privilege of bearing weapons without serving in the wars. The history of legislation on the subject in France is curious and amusing. It seems that in 1835 the manufacture and sale of arms, not being of the regulation pattern for the army and navy, was made free. Thereupon it was assumed by a nation of duellists that they might go with pistols in their pockets as much as they pleased. But in so reasoning our Gallic fire-eaters reckoned without their Courts of Appeal. These tribunals, first at Paris and afterwards at Nîmes, held that a Frenchman may indeed now make arms, and sell them, and buy them, and keep them as much as he likes, but that he has no more right to appear with them in public than he had before. Accordingly, he is remitted to a variety of prohibitory enactments, of which the foundation is a decree issued by Louis XV. in 1728. In this document the King of France and Navarre strictly forbade the use of "daggers, knives in form of daggers, whether pocket-knives or knives attached to guns, bayonets, pocket-pistols, sword-sticks, loaded canes, with the exception of those which are merely bound with iron at the end, and other weapons of offence, concealed and secret." The first NAPOLEON in 1806, Louis PHILIPPE in 1834 and 1837, and the third NAPOLEON in 1859, substantially confirmed the ordinance of the Well-beloved. It was not Lord LYTTON'S business to inquire how far the law is enforced by the Republic. But the judgments to which we have already referred show that it is not a dead letter. In Germany there appears to be a good deal more freedom in procuring and employing means of offence. No one in Prussia may appear armed at a meeting, with the thoroughly German exception of the police. But the ordinary law is now contained in the Imperial statute of 1878, which was passed after NOBILING'S attempt upon the life of the late Emperor WILLIAM, and which enables the Federal Council to punish even the possession of arms "when the movements of the Social Democrats are attended with danger to the public peace."

In Russia they do things with a sweet simplicity which may well be the envy of surrounding nations. The sceptical philosophers who doubt whether the caprice of a despot can be regarded as law may be invited to study and to dissect the following sentence from Consul MICHELL'S Report:—"According to the laws of the Russian Empire, the carrying of weapons of every description in populous places by all unauthorized persons is unconditionally prohibited." Of course the CZAR may authorize anybody to do anything, and there perhaps lies the blot which a disciple of AUSTIN would hit. But in Russia they would at least make short work of the fools who brandish revolvers in the streets, and of the respectable tradesmen who sell pistols to schoolboys at the rate of five shillings apiece. Even in Turkey the law is strict, and indeed comprehensive, in its terms. But Sir WILLIAM WHITE feels himself compelled to add that "the regulations are not carried out in their entirety, though many police officers are fairly vigilant in the matter." The newer and less settled States of Europe occupy, of course, a peculiar position. In Bulgaria, indeed, "every one who wishes to travel armed must have a permit." But in Montenegro things are very different. That little Principality is, as Mr. WALTER BARING says, a nation of soldiers. Every man goes armed to the teeth, and any one to whom a rifle has been served out must carry it if he wanders more than a short specified distance from his home. Mr. BARING does not take a gloomy view of this free military display. He cannot say that it "really tends to inconvenience." "If," he cheerfully observes, "a Montenegrin has a six-barrelled revolver in his belt, he knows that his neighbour is similarly provided. Consequently, it may be said that all start fair." Even in Montenegro, however, there is not absolutely free shooting. "Of late years restrictions have been placed on the indiscriminate firing of pistols in towns at certain seasons, but the rules are not very strictly observed." It only remains to add that licences for carrying arms are required in Italy, Greece, and Spain.

TECHNICAL OBSTRUCTION.

THE third reading of the Technical Instruction Bill in the House of Commons was only achieved on Thursday morning, after repeated attempts on the part of an exceedingly small section of Radical members to impede the passing of a measure supported by a very large majority; and, if the House of Lords had not shown its usual good sense, a very useful measure might have been delayed. Technical instruction may be dear to Mr. PICTON and Mr. CHANNING, but technical obstruction appears to be something dearer. As amended Sir W. HART DYKE'S Bill embodies an admirable settlement of the chief source of contention between the adherents of the Voluntary system and the Board schools. It invests the "local authority," a body necessarily representative of all parties, with the power of levying rates for purposes of technical education. On the second reading of the Bill this compromise was accepted by the majority of both sides of the House, and was further strengthened by the adoption of Mr. MATHER'S amendment by the Government. The "conscience clause" introduced is far-reaching enough to satisfy what are somewhat ironically called the religious scruples of everybody not entirely enslaved by the narrowest sectarian jealousy. But this was not enough for Mr. CHANNING or Mr. PICTON, or the dozen other friends of education, who for "local authority" in the first clause of the Bill would substitute "School Board." The injustice of Mr. CHANNING'S amendment is almost transcended by its absurdity, and it is satisfactory to see that it was defeated by eighty votes to twenty-six. The aims of the opponents to the measure were only too clearly revealed all through the three nights' debate. It was, as Mr. A. O'CONNOR said, a "School-Board Opposition." Mr. CHANNING struck at the sound representative character of the Bill by an amendment that would give the School Boards the monopoly of providing technical education. There is no ground whatever, as members of their own party assured them, for the fears expressed by Mr. CHANNING and his friends, that the Bill favoured unduly any one educational party. Their opposition was one of the worst examples of obstruction the Session has yielded, and the record of it will make the country sick as well as sorry—as Mr. GOSCHEN suggested when referring to the tactics of Mr. PICTON. At the very beginning of proceedings on Monday this ardent advocate of technical education moved to report progress, and was supported on a division by only eighteen to ninety. It was in vain that Mr. PICTON was appealed to by his own party not to waste the time of the House, and to accept the good a wicked Tory Government had provided. The member for Leicester was incorrigible, and he remained so to the end. Five pages of amendments, not one-third of which affected the spirit of the Bill, and the prospect, subsequently completely realized, of numerous motions for the insertion of new clauses, could not deter Mr. PICTON. Time was precious, and the opportunity for wasting it not less precious. Naturally enough the example was contagious. After two divisions on amendments, Sir WILFRID LAWSON again moved to report progress, and was defeated by ninety-two to twenty-one, and the discussion of Clause 1 dragged heavily till extinguished by the 12 o'clock rule. On Tuesday it again occurred to Mr. PICTON, after a manly and forcible appeal by Mr. GOSCHEN to common sense and common decency, that the best thing he could do, as a friend of education, was to report progress. On this occasion his following was reduced to fifteen, and the subsequent musters of the Opposition, dividing on amendments either frivolous or notoriously obstructive, were equally insignificant. The success of the Government, thoroughly deserved, no doubt, was largely due to the tact and firmness shown by Mr. GOSCHEN and Sir W. HART DYKE, and the extremely scant support accorded to the leading obstructionists by their own party.

Possibly, also, the majority of Liberal and Nonconformist members felt they would risk too much by opposing legislation which they knew to be both popular and opportune. They were little likely to be misled by the testimonials in the form of School Board resolutions from Leeds and Spalding, from Manchester and Bradford, in condemnation of the Bill, which certain members considered weighty enough to justify tactics however paltry and opposition however fanatical. Perhaps even the Opposition, excepting always Mr. PICTON, firm seated in the affections of enlightened Leicester, may have been somewhat shaken by Mr. McLAREN's opinion that the existing Parliament would not pass a better Bill. It is also likely enough that they may have been visited with uncomfortable visions of unfriendly constituencies. School Board resolutions, after all, have little meaning, however strongly they be worded. They may readily be unmade at the next election by a disgusted constituency. There is an excellent prospect, indeed, considering the widespread and genuine demand for technical education in the country, that the attempt to wreck a measure which received the assent of so large a majority of all classes of politicians will not be forgotten by true and enlightened friends of education. Everything was done in the way of legitimate concession by the Government to facilitate the passing of the Bill. It may even be thought by many that, in their laudable anxiety to carry the measures, they went a little too far in conceding one or two points. On the whole, however, the Government are to be congratulated on the Bill. Some years have elapsed since the House resolved that a national scheme of Technical Instruction was desirable, and a great impulse was thus given to the endowment and building of Technical Institutes in various parts of the country. The success of schools of manual training in America and elsewhere has stimulated similar enterprises in England. If it had not been for the obstacles created by the bitter opponents of the "Voluntary" system, who magnify the "religious difficulties" that beset the question of rate-aided education, a measure of Technical Instruction might have become law before now. Sir W. HART DYKE's is the third Bill dealing with this important subject framed during the present Session. Like many useful Acts, it is based on compromise, which, though it cannot cause "educationists" to cease from rage and from imagining many vain things, is substantially sound and well considered. Another merit of the Bill is the broad and comprehensive definition of Technical Instruction comprised in its fifth clause, by which all descriptions of industrial workers, not excluding agricultural labourers, are included in the benefits it is hoped will ensue from its operation.

THE LATEST MARE'S-NEST.

THE last Irish debates of the Session have had some interest, though not quite so much as some newspapers—with the MAYBRICK case gone, the naval manœuvres over, and the strike (as the great American language would say) "weakening"—endeavour to make out. Mr. SHALOONY and Mr. MCSHEENY—we beg pardon, Mr. O'BRIEN and Mr. GILHOOLY—have gone to BALFOUR's Bastille, after protesting that no living advocate should represent them, and then being represented by Mr. HARRINGTON, after blustering in the usual manner, and after failing to excite any interest abroad or much at home. The head tyrant of the Bastille has observed, in his ambiguous manner, that there can be no fear of Mr. O'BRIEN's little weaknesses not being attended to, because the gaol doctors are so thoroughly acquainted with his constitution—a harmless remark, but one not ill suited to madden an Irishman who has a dim idea of its bearing. Mr. SEXTON, upon whom Mr. BALFOUR has also bestowed compliments, has distinguished himself by complaining—as, perhaps, no mortal being but an Irish member of Parliament or a Parisian municipal would complain—that Archbishop WHATELY is allowed from his grave to corrupt Irish youth and distort the true principles of "rint" by teaching that, if a landlord retains his property, but is not allowed to let it freely, he will cultivate it himself. But the event of the week—some would have us believe of the Session—has undoubtedly been the CHIEF SECRETARY's half promise of something like concurrent endowment to a Roman Catholic University in Ireland—a half promise which was received with smiles by the Parnellites, with shrieks by the Radicals, with solemn head-shakings by some wiseacres, and with cries of "Tory Home Rule" by others.

The incident and its consequences are not uninteresting; but their instruction goes in a different direction from that in which the shriekers look. There is nothing terrible in such an endowment as appears to be proposed or foreshadowed here either to Toryism or to reason; and assuredly there is nothing that savours less of Home Rule. On the contrary, the measure is exactly the sort of thing which a strong central Government, and a strong central Government only, can give to a country where the jealousy of parties is so keen that neither is likely to concede it to the other. It is not a good thing, no doubt, that those who are imbibing the highest education of a country should be penned off into little sects and divisions, each with its feeding-bottle, instead of sucking the kindly breasts of one Alma Mater in company and in peace. But they will not do this in Ireland, and there's an end of it. For this being impossible, the only other alternative—the alternative which the English Radicals prefer—is the system of rigid secular education which is leading to the same disastrous and iniquitous results in Victoria and in Paris—the system which degrades toleration into the most odious intolerance; and under the name of comprehension excludes with the rigour of the Index. There will be much to say when the details of any Government proposal of the kind are known. For the present the vague outlines of that proposal are not in themselves matter either for congratulation or for censure. But what is really interesting, of course, is not the proposal itself, but the prospect of a new split in the Gladstonian-Parnellite party. Mr. WALLACE and Mr. ROBERTSON, who threatened this, are not very important persons; but there is a considerable fraction of the Radical party which really cares nothing at all for Home Rule, while it cares very much for its own pet aversions to such things as "denominational education." It has again and again been observed by all competent critics of politics that there is no real union between the Parnellites and the Gladstonians, and it evidently needs but little to bring this out more fully. Meanwhile, the taunt about governing Ireland by Irish ideas is even sillier than most such taunts. So long as the Irish ideas are unobjectionable in themselves, and so long as it is the Government of Great Britain and Ireland, and not a party in Ireland itself, which governs by them, no one that we know of, except the English Radicals, wants to govern Ireland by any others. The supposition that Irish ideas necessarily include, and hardly extend further than, the abrogation of the sixth, eighth, ninth, and tenth Commandments, and the establishment of an impracticable Dualism, may be left to those English friends of Ireland who choose to entertain it.

THE SESSION.

THE Session, which has ended later than was hoped this week, has been mainly complained of because, unlike most of those of recent years, it has approximated to what a Session ought to be—businesslike, and free from disturbance. In this as in some other cases virtue has been found to be dull. The training of the last nine years has apparently formed a strong taste for political stimulants, and there are many palates which do not feel at all unless they are supplied with exceedingly pungent food. To these critics, who prove the truth of Sir Henry Maine's theory that constitutional government is largely valued because it is the most amusing of all methods of conducting national business, the Session has given but little gratification. What excitement there was at the beginning—and it was but little—was supplied by one of those Irish debates which are becoming stale beyond the power of words to describe to everybody except Irish members, and somewhat tiresome even to them, to judge by their general languor during the last six months. At the end some stir was caused, first, by the ferment set going in the Opposition against the vote for the Prince of Wales's children; then by a very gratuitous check which the Ministry brought upon itself, and then by the spasmodic exertions of the Irish members, stirred into activity by a whip applied by the Nationalist press. Even this triple alarm failed to rouse the Opposition to complete wakefulness. The central bulk of the Session, devoted to a National Defence Bill which was too popular to be safely opposed with energy, and Scotch Bills which were wisely left to Scotch members, had sunk them too deeply into slumber.

One memorable event of Parliamentary history has, however, been contemporary with the Session—the death on the 27th of March of Mr. John Bright. Since Mr. Bright did his last and his greatest service to his country by throwing his powerful moral influence on to the Unionist side he had taken little active part in political life. His health made it impossible for him to exercise his unrivalled oratorical faculty as he would certainly have wished to have done. When he intervened it had lately been by means of those letters of inimitable laconic force which are in form the most valuable, and in substance not the least valuable, part of the Unionist controversy. While he lived, however, his reputation, his influence in the country, and his personality weighed heavily on the House of Commons. By his death it was made the poorer by the loss of the name of one who had formed a unique place for himself among Englishmen. The House did itself honour by recording its loss in a manner worthy of the most generous traditions of Parliamentary warfare. Men of all parties spoke as they should have done of a member who, though closely limited, was within his limitations a statesman of commanding ability, of stainless sincerity, and the possessor, in a degree to which none of his contemporaries did more than approach, of that oratorical faculty which is such a magnificent instrument of power in a country governed largely by discussion. For that one night of the Session at least the House of Commons was all the most severe judge could have asked it to be.

The Queen's Speech, with which the Ministry met Parliament on the 21st of February, did not indicate any intention to attempt to carry a large list of measures. A Bill to provide for making a serious addition to the navy during a series of years, Scotch Local Government and Irish Industrial Bills, Bills to facilitate land transfer and the collection of tithes, and a Bill to effect a recoinage of gold, made up a list of measures which it was not unreasonably hoped an industrious Parliament might carry in a normal Session. Experience has shown that the hope was too complimentary to the Houses, and some of these Bills have been lost, or have not even struggled far enough to secure the distinction of being killed in a regular way. The Session began very well. The debate on the Queen's Speech was not dragged to more than twice the necessary length. Mr. John Morley did indeed move an amendment on the 25th of February condemning in the well-known way the whole administration of Ireland, but though the incident of the Pigott letters, then fresh and now as good as forgotten, seemed to be in his favour, the debate fell flat. Mr. Morley's speech was notable, first, for his obvious belief that the discovery of one Irishman's forgery and clumsy mendacity was an argument in favour of other Irishmen once his friends and patrons; and, secondly, for his assertion of the doctrine that the bad management which led to the murder of Inspector Martin at the arrest of Father McFadden entailed on the Government a moral complicity in the murder. The theory would seem to be that whoever does not sufficiently guard the Irish against their unfortunate tendency to brutal murder is a sharer in their guilt. After lingering till the 1st of March, the debate ended in a majority of 79 for the Ministry. The Pigott letters and their remarkable history belong to the Special Commission, with which we have happily nothing to do here; but they led to one Parliamentary scene which is too typical to be omitted. On the 22nd of March the Separatist Opposition thought fit to make an attack on Sir Richard Webster for his conduct as counsel for the Times. This attack was made in a manner for which Sir Richard had some reason to feel thankful. The question whether he had not remembered too much that he is a lawyer and too little that, as Attorney-General, he is also a politician and a man of the world, was entirely overlaid by acrid personalities and attacks on his professional conduct. Sir Richard Webster defended himself against the first, and the unanimous verdict of his profession has defended him against the second. A comic element was introduced into the debate by the perplexity of the Separatist lawyers, who found themselves between the devil of the Caucus and the deep sea of professional loyalty. Their efforts to escape, either by logic-chopping, for which they were laughed at, or by running away, for which they were soundly trounced by their employers, brought a large element of farce into an episode which would otherwise only have been vulgar in a stupid way.

In spite of delays of this kind the Session began fairly well. In March, it is true, we were threatened with great solemnity. Those Radicals who have uneasy qualms when they look forward to the day when Mr. Gladstone will no longer be there to cover their natural exiguity with his umbrella, formed a party, with tellers and everything handsome about it, and with Mr. Henry Labouchere as leader. They announced, with the vehemence of a fiend in a pantomime, that they were going to torture the Ministry in a very dreadful manner. Everything was to be stopped by debate and the resources of obstruction till a Cabinet which had forfeited all right to confidence had been driven to surrender to the fifty odd Radical members who were quite sure they had the country in their pockets. All this terrible parade was followed by an almost nervous anxiety to keep the peace; and, when the new Radical party did take its coat off, it was for the purpose of wrestling a throw with its own late revered leader Mr. Gladstone. In the meantime the Ministry attended to business.

Lord George Hamilton's Naval Defence Bill was introduced on the 7th of March. He asked Parliament for 21,500,000*l.*, to be spent in seven years. During this time the Admiralty, being in this way made sure of its grants and able to look ahead, will undertake, in addition to the rearming, refitting, and adapting to modern conditions of older vessels, the construction of seventy new ones. This addition to the existing fleet is to consist of seventy vessels—eight first-class and two second-class battle-ships, and sixty cruisers, ranging from powerful boats of 7,300 tons to torpedo gunboats of 735 tons. Though this proposed increase of the navy is hardly a fourth of what experts had repeatedly declared to be the necessary minimum, it was received by them and by the country as sufficient. Admirals who had publicly declared that at least forty battle-ships and two hundred cruisers would be required to enable the navy even to approximate to the adequate discharge of its duties in war, expressed themselves satisfied with the scheme of the First Lord of the Admiralty, and hastened to say so in the most emphatic manner. The country was not more exacting than its admirals; and the House of Commons was satisfied with what pleased the country. It was from the first clear that Lord George Hamilton's demand for 21,500,000*l.* in seven years would be granted. If there was any doubt whether the money would be spent exactly as he promised, or produce just that number of ships—and for different reasons there was, and is, doubt on both these points—it was at least certain that the grant would lead to a necessary and material addition to the navy. The resistance to the Bill on the part of the regular Opposition was never more than half-hearted. The merely fanatical or obstructive opposition represented by Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. Illingworth, or Mr. Henry Labouchere was energetic enough. These politicians employed a good deal of time in explaining that the surest way of avoiding fighting is to be unarmed, and to run away—that the nation's money is too sacred to be spent on the nation's business—or that a powerful fleet would probably be used by Tory peers to oppress the cause of human freedom. In addition to mere chatter of this kind—the folly which the House of Commons endures as the price to be paid for the security that no opinion shall be suppressed—there was no serious opposition to the Bill. Some politicians, among whom Lord Randolph Churchill found himself in the course of his devious movements, affected great fear lest the House of Commons, by voting—as it had often done before—a sum of money for a term of years, should be thought to have weakened its control over the national expenditure. To say that these fears were removed by the arguments or assurances of the Government would be absurd—for the sufficient reason that they were only assumed for purposes of business, and neither force nor logic can remove that which does not exist. If, however, there were any persons in the country who seriously thought that Parliament could part with its control over the national expenditure, could bind itself in future Sessions, or could bind its successors at any time, their fears should have been removed by Mr. Goschen. That the time of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and of the House should have been wasted in demonstrating a self-evident proposition is a sufficient indication of the character of the opposition to the Naval Defence Bill. A great many words, and not a little time, had to be wasted in assuring the House of Commons that it could not cease to be the House of Commons. Nobody except the fanatics denied that the navy required to be strengthened or asserted that the First Lord of the Admiralty was asking for too much. The Bill might have been dismissed in a week. As a matter of fact, however, it was only read for the second time by a majority of 141 in a house of 413 on the 7th of May. After that its progress was rapid.

The Scotch Local Government and University Bills, which with the Naval Defence Bill represent the substantial work of the Session, were introduced early in April by the Lord Advocate. An attempt, in which there was more than one element of absurdity, was made to discount the Government's measures by Dr. Clark, who moved that the alleged neglect of Scotch business could only be corrected by Scotch Home Rule. This effort to turn the House from the discussion of practical benefits for Scotland to the consideration of a revolutionary measure, which could only have stopped all other legislation, was not well received by the Scotch members themselves, and was rebuked by Mr. Gladstone, who found it premature. Mr. Robertson, the Lord Advocate, was allowed to continue the work of giving Scotland that control over purely local affairs which Dr. Clark held to be impossible without a disruption of the national unity. The Local Government Bills were three in number—one main one and two subordinates. The first establishes County Councils, which will possess the powers and do the work of the old Commissioners of Supply (the body corresponding to English Quarter Sessions), and which will be elected by the ratepayers for three years. This body will contain no members answering to the aldermen of English Councils, and its ex-officio members will be the Lord Lieutenant, the Sheriff, and the Convener of the Commissioners of Supply. The country gentlemen are protected from injustice in the imposition of rates, and the police are left where they are at present, according to the very efficient Scotch system, under the control of the Sheriff. The subsidiary Bills provided for the reorganization of the Parochial Boards—a matter which not even a Scotchman can understand without laborious previous training—and the formation of special Committees, to consist of one Scotch judge and two assessors, to whom all private Bills for Scotland shall be referred after the second reading in the House of Commons, and at whose recommendation they are to be read for the third time. The Local Government Bill ran its prosperous course during the latter part of June, after the withdrawal of the Sugar Convention Bill, and in the course of July, when the rapidity and ease with which business advanced in the House aroused a feeling of pleased surprise after so many years' experience of a very different state of things. The explanation of this novelty was simple. It was felt that when Scotchmen applied themselves to their own business, they would stick to business, and there was little temptation or desire on the part of members representing other portions of the kingdom to interfere in what interested Scotchmen and what Scotchmen were alone able to discuss adequately. The University Bill ran its course by the side of the Local Government Bill. It establishes Courts in each University and a Scotch University Committee of Privy Council to which the government of these bodies will belong. In two respects the Government has not satisfied all critics in Scotland. It has not entirely abolished tests, but has only appointed a Committee to inquire into and report on their complete abolition, and it has not shown as much generosity in the matter of grants of money as was thought desirable.

An infinitely greater amount of feeling was aroused by the Royal Grants Bill. The announcement, towards the end of June, that the Queen and the Prince of Wales had approved of the engagement of the Princess Louise of Wales to the Earl (now Duke) of Fife at once stirred up the unmannerly opposition which is always made to any grants to the members of the Royal Family. It was certain that a vote would be asked for the Princess, and equally certain that it would be given; but it was also only too certain that an ungracious opposition would be offered. The Ministry was becomingly anxious to avoid a vulgar wrangle to the utmost of its power, and endeavoured to disarm all that part of the Opposition which could be induced to show some regard for the character of the House of Commons. It was not wholly unsuccessful. When, on the 2nd of July, Mr. Smith moved for leave to introduce the Grant Bill to provide for the eldest son and daughter of the Prince of Wales, he was met by the demand on the part of the Opposition for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the whole question of Royal grants. It is undeniable that this Committee had been promised by both parties on previous occasions. This was, however, neither a seemly nor a convenient opportunity for its appointment. But, as the Opposition was resolute, and the subsection of the Opposition organized by Mr. Labouchere suddenly shook off the torpor of months, and threatened obstruction, the Ministry yielded. This concession satisfied Mr. Gladstone, who very properly took occasion to point out that, at no period in the history of the present dynasty, when the Royal Family was large, has the Civil List been as low as it is now. This might, indeed, have appeared a good reason for voting the grant now asked for, and leaving the discussion of the Civil List to a period when it must needs be considered as a whole. The Ministry did, however, well to be contented with what it could get. On this occasion was the first sign of that split in the Opposition which has been the liveliest incident of the Session. The parasitical organism (we hope this scientific language is appropriate to the times) which counts Mr. Labouchere as its chief was not satisfied. It grumbled, and put up Mr. Bradlaugh to move for an instruction to the Committee which would have authorized a singularly insolent intrusion into the Queen's private affairs. Mr. Bradlaugh's motion was defeated by 313 to 125. When, on the 9th July, Mr. Smith presented the list of the Committee, which had been drawn up in agreement with Mr. Gladstone, the Radicals revolted altogether. They objected to the list because they did not know enough about it, and then because they knew too much about some of its members—as, for instance, that Sir A. Campbell was not a sufficiently good Scotchman, and that Mr. Chamberlain was a Tory. Mr. Labouchere made Mr. Bradlaugh's motion over again; and at one period of the evening 136 Radicals found themselves voting against Mr. Gladstone. The Ministry finally carried its list. On the recommendation of the Committee the Ministry decided not to ask for a special grant for the children of the Prince, but for an allowance to himself of 36,000*l.* a year, out of which he is to provide for his children. The sum had originally been 40,000*l.*, but was reduced at Mr. Gladstone's instigation. It was also the opinion of the Committee that the Houses should recognize the Queen's claim for grants for her grandchildren, and acknowledge that Her Majesty by not pressing her right had withdrawn a demand she was justified in making. On this point there was a division in the Committee, and then a somewhat curious subdivision in the Opposition. Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Morley opposed the recognition of the Queen's claim, and drew an alternative clause to the effect that the precedents did not show clearly what the claim really was. When this was rejected by the majority Mr. Gladstone decided to support the Ministry. Mr. Morley, not uninfluenced, perhaps, by voices from Newcastle, elected to join Mr. Labouchere in a general resistance to the grant. On the 26th July the Bill was read a second time. A majority of 282 rejected Mr. Labouchere's motion against going into Committee, which received, however, the support of a discreditable large minority (116). On Monday Mr. Morley, who had not directly supported Mr. Labouchere on the Friday, brought forward an amendment of his own which nobody but himself has been able to distinguish in meaning from the other, and was supported by a minority of 134 votes, from which it appears that his personal following consists of seventeen. The Government, which was vigorously supported by Mr. Gladstone and a majority of the Parnellites, had an immense superiority in argument and debating power, but the minority was unexpectedly large. The meaning of this increase in the number of those who think that rebellious flunkeyism and zeal for liberty are synonymous is not obscure. It is obvious that a large section of the Radicals, if not all, are rapidly approximating to the Continental type, and it is not to be denied that the Opposition is in a process of ferment. The resistance to the Royal Grants Bill had, as it was conducted, much the air of one of those internal struggles by which an American Convention, or a Conclave, decides which of its members is to be candidate for the Presidency, or to be Pope. If that was its meaning, the result must be unpleasantly surprising to some members of the party, for the figures in the divisions would seem to show that, if Mr. Gladstone is not deposed already in favour of Mr. Labouchere, the reversion of his office is set apart for that politician.

In the very last days of the Session the Ministry carried a Technical Instruction Bill, which was fiercely opposed by a section of the Opposition because it seemed, in their opinion, to trench on the supremacy of the School Board, but was forced through with the consent of an overpowering majority of the House. This same section of the Opposition has experienced a yet more severe shock by Mr. Balfour's announcement of the Ministry's intention to consent to the establishment of a Roman Catholic University in Ireland.

The Ministry has been far from equally fortunate, and, it may be added, has not always deserved equal fortune with its smaller measures. With them it has suffered a succession of checks not individually of much importance, but such as taken together do something to weaken the authority of a Cabinet. In addition to measures which were crowded out, one Bill was thrown out in the House in which a Unionist Government is strongest, one was withdrawn in consequence of unpopularity in the country, and one was wrecked by sheer mismanagement in the House of Commons. It was Lord Halsbury's Land Transfer Bill which was slain by the House of Lords. This was one of those measures to facilitate the transfer of land of which all men and most lawyers speak well, and for which, to judge by the little effective interest they inspire and the trifling practical effect they produce, nobody really cares. It was introduced in the Lords and reached the third reading, and appeared safe so far, when its rejection was moved by the Duke of Beaufort on the 24th of June, and only avoided by a majority of nine in a very full House. This check was soon turned into a defeat, and the Lords threw the Bill out altogether. If their action was tardy, it was intelligible, for the measure threatened changes in the method of transfer of land which were not acceptable to those who transact the business at present, and it proposed to assimilate real to personal property in a way which could not be pleasing to the great landed proprietors. The defeat of the measure was displeasing to those who think the Lords have no right to take an independent course in a matter in which they are particularly interested; but if the Upper House did an unpopular thing, it was justified by the indifference of the country. The nation, which is supposed to be anxious to promote the transfer of land, and to be quite eager to abolish "primogeniture," heard of the loss of the Bill with serene indifference. The fate of the Sugar Convention Bill was also in its way an illustration of the hollowness of some popular demands for legislation. The Cabinet would certainly seem to have been justified in the belief that there was a strong demand in the country both for the arrangement made with foreign Powers for the abolition of Sugar Bounties and for legislation to carry that arrangement into effect. But when the Bill was brought in, and a belief, very ill founded on fact, arose that it would raise the price of sugar, it became at once the object of clamour, by which the Opposition, hitherto utterly languid on the subject, hastened to profit. Those at whose request the Cabinet had acted became apparently entirely indifferent to their desired measure. At least they made no sign, and the Government, finding it had to deal with the certainty of vehement opposition, and could not rely on any general support in the country, withdrew the Bill in the middle of June. It could do this without discredit, since the measure would not have taken effect for two years. If, therefore, the popular demand for the Sugar Convention Bill is as solid as it is vehement in expression, it may be re-introduced next Session.

The third Ministerial check, the loss of the Tithes Bill, was more manifestly the result of bad management. A general measure to make the recovery of tithes a less laborious and less irritating process had been drafted by the Cabinet before Parliament met. It was promised in the Queen's Speech, but nothing was heard of it for months. At last when August was begun, and the end of the Session seemed not unlikely to fall after many years on the traditional Twelfth, Mr. Smith announced that the Cabinet had decided to carry a measure dealing with the so-called Tithe War in Wales, as preliminary to a wider Tithe Bill to be carried next Session. This Bill was to have replaced distraint as the sole means of recovery of tithe by summary process in the County Court, and it left the obligation for the payment on the farmers. Two classes of opponents were at once aroused by the Bill. The partisans of Welsh Disestablishment were, as they impudently confessed, annoyed at the prospect of the loss of a "lever" which they found useful, and were therefore committed to resist a measure which would reduce the opportunities for dramatic scenes. Another and a more respectable form of opposition was to be expected from those members of the House, among whom were not a few Conservatives, who wished to see the burden of the tithe laid directly, and not as it is at present, indirectly, on the landlord; a rule which the Ministry had itself accepted in the draft of an earlier Bill. It was from them that the destruction of the Bill came. On the 12th of August an amendment to this effect was moved by Mr. Grey, a Conservative member, and only defeated by a very narrow majority (145 to 141). The Government then amended its Bill to satisfy this opposition. When, however, the amendment was moved the Speaker ruled that the change was so great as to constitute a new measure; that it could not therefore, according to precedent, be allowed; and that the Government must begin again. On the 16th of August this was clearly impossible. The Bill was withdrawn, and the Ministry will now have to see that the Welsh clergy are properly supported in the use of the one means they possess for the recovery of their dues. It has been punished for its ill-management by having to submit to the penance of receiving the compassionate patronage of Sir William Harcourt, to whom the leadership of the Opposition fell for that unlucky week. At the same time a Superannuation Bill—a large measure dealing with the Civil Service, which certainly deserved discussion, and had been introduced when it could not be discussed—was withdrawn.

The share of Ireland in the Session is, when compared with that of recent years, insignificant. The Irish members have secured a field night or two—as when, for instance, Mr. O'Brien called the attention of the House to a matter of importance, which turned out to be the outrageous conduct of the police, who would not allow Mr. O'Brien to be taken out of their hands by a noisy mob. On this and a few other occasions they have repeated their general charges of brutality, and such of their particular accusations of misconduct as had not been quite worn to rags by overhandling. It was noticed, however, that these traditional methods of patriotic warfare were used during the greater part of the Session with unwonted sobriety, and even ceased to be used at all during the latter part of June and the whole of July. The conduct of Irish members began, in fact, to approximate quite closely to a decent standard of manners. At the close of the Session there has been, under the stimulus of inquiries in the Nationalist press whether the Irish members had forgotten the purpose for which they were brought into Parliament, a temporary revival of their old style. Mr. Harrington, among others, has displayed himself in the usual taproom manner; but even this was only a temporary flicker. It lasted just long enough to remind the House that the Irish are there, and are the same sort of persons they always were, and then died down. The Irish Drainage and Light Railways Bills have been mainly opposed in the Grand Committee on Trade by a section of the English Radicals, who professed dislike to them on economic grounds, and a very minute minority of Irish members, who chose to display an austere disinclination to accept English money. Heterodox the Bills are from the economic point of view; but all parties have agreed to give up orthodoxy in Irish affairs. It is agreed by everybody, except Radicals when a Unionist Ministry is in office, that in Ireland, at least, public money must be advanced to start and support what we should expect in England to be the work of private enterprise. The end of the Light Railways Bill was enlivened by the wrath of Mr. Storey. He had been somewhat summarily silenced in the Grand Committee on Trade by the Chairman, Mr. Salt, and appealed to the Speaker. Mr. Peel was of opinion that the amendment which Mr. Storey had not been allowed to introduce in Committee was legitimate; but he could not interfere with the authority of the Chairman. Mr. Storey was therefore compelled to wait for the reappearance of the Bill on report and take his revenge then. He did so, and contrived to make the third reading of the Bill one of the fighting nights of the Session; but it passed. At the close of the Session the Government passed with little difficulty a Bill making the notification of cases of infectious disease by medical men, which has hitherto been enforced by private Act in many large towns, compulsory in London at once, and compulsory in other towns at the discretion of the local authorities.

The Budget was introduced by Mr. Goschen on the 15th of April. It showed a surplus of 2,798,000*l.* available for the extinction of debt, and was in most respects acceptable. The necessity of providing for the Naval Defence expenditure threw a burden on the Consolidated Fund which did not allow the Chancellor of the Exchequer to remit taxes. On the contrary, this charge, and the effects of the transfer of Excise dues to local revenue, compelled him to find more money. This he did by imposing a new tax of 1 per cent. on all estates, real or personal, of over 10,000*l.* left by will—the most easy to pay of all taxes—by an additional Beer-duty, and by the transfer of 1,000,000*l.* of the money saved by redemption of Debt. Mr. Goschen made a very effective defence of his financial policy, and the Opposition had no more telling charge to bring against him than took the form of ironical and unfounded praise for the introduction of the principle of graduated taxation of property.

A private Bill which was very excellent in intention, but might have done some unkindness to the poor of London unless it had been amended, was the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Bill, brought in by Mr. Mundella. Along with many excellent provisions for the protection of children against cruel or careless parents, it contained one clause, largely dictated by ignorance or prejudice, which prohibited their employment in theatres while under ten years of age. This clause actually passed both Houses, but was on report amended by the proviso that the Lord Chamberlain should have authority to license certain theatres. It was generally recognized that in this form the Bill gave theatre children all necessary protection.

But Private Bills which have come to nothing have been rather exceptionally common during this Session. In March the Lords had to extinguish the well-meant Black Sheep Bill of Lord Carnarvon. This measure, which was apparently designed to silence those critics of the House of Lords who do not attack it because it is a House of Lords, and may therefore be passed over with indifference, by giving the House power to expel the few members of the body whose lives are discreditable, was rejected by the Lords, who saw that a privilege of peerage dependent on the goodwill of other peers would be something very different from the right by which they sit at present. Some two months later their Lordships performed with more than the decision they have occasionally displayed their yearly duty of rejecting the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill. In May Mr. Labouchere illustrated the futility of such Bills as Lord Carnarvon's by moving the abolition of the Lords altogether. He amused the House of Commons, and was defeated by a majority of 201 to 160. The only serious thing about the debate was the evidence it afforded that there are 160 members of the House of Commons who are light-hearted enough to think of producing a revolution by a casual vote. In May also Mr. Milvain found the support of a majority of 68 (194 to 126) members of the Commons for a more rational proposal to inflict the deterrent punishment of flogging on some classes of violent criminals who are at present safe from any but the less feared sentence of imprisonment. The vote remained as a sign of the distinct, though not yet very powerful, reaction against the excessive humanitarianism of the last generation. In the same month Mr. Dillwyn moved the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales, and Mr. E. Robertson the Disenfranchisement of the Universities. Mr. Dillwyn, though defeated in the House by a majority of 53 (284 to 231), secured the adhesion of Mr. Gladstone, who was consequently suspected by some old friends of accepting Disestablishment as a sop to keep Wales quiet on the Home Rule question until its agitation for that boon would be more convenient than it could be now. Mr. E. Robertson secured the support of that Radical hundred and twenty or thirty who can be relied on to vote for anything which will diminish the power of education and property. After May the Government inroads on the time of private members put a stop to all individual attempts at legislation.

Foreign and Colonial affairs have not received any great share of the attention of Parliament. Lord Carnarvon, indeed, gave rise to a debate on Egypt in the Lords which ended, and could only end, in leaving things where it found them. We remain in Egypt till a stable Government is established; no stable Government can be established except by us, and we will not take the measures required to make Egypt safe from attack from the South. Even if we did, it might still be necessary for us to remain to keep it safe; and in the meantime we must needs stay there to prevent things from getting worse—a compromise which, if it arouses the fury of foreign critics who cannot see that half measures due to sheer unwillingness to appear aggressive have often served England well in her own despite, has the merit of leaving our hold on the road to India secure. The Western Australia Government Bill, which has excited no little opposition by handing over the possession of a considerable part of a great continent to a handful of colonists, has occupied the Lords, but was withdrawn in the Lower House. The peremptory measures by which the Portuguese Government has put a stop to work by an English Company on the Delagoa railway have necessarily been noted in Parliament, but as yet the question has not taken a form which makes discussion in either House effective. The only debate on foreign affairs—if it can be called a debate on foreign affairs—in the House of Commons was moved by Mr. E. Robertson during the license of May. This active Scotch member, fresh from his efforts to disfranchise the Universities, moved a vote of censure on the Government for not sending a representative to those French celebrations of the Revolution of 1789, which were attended by no representative of the European monarchies. Whatever importance the discussion had was due to the intervention of Mr. Gladstone, who, after severely snubbing Mr. Robertson and acknowledging that the Ministry had taken the line which his own was prepared to take, pleased the students of his always interesting character by proceeding to argue that what would have been becoming neutrality in him was disrespect to the French Republic in a "Tory" Ministry. The vote of censure was defeated by 283 votes to 199, and the minority, reinforced by one other member, made themselves ridiculous by sending a protest to the President of the French Republic, which he had the good sense not to receive.

The usual tardy reading of the Indian Budget, accompanied by the usual complaints that Parliament had not been asked earlier to attend to matters which it does not profess to understand, and would in any case not discuss, ended that part of the business of the Session which was not almost purely formal. Parliament rose with the knowledge that a very fair amount of work had been done, that the Opposition had not only begun to split, but goes off carrying in it a wedge, dexterously inserted by Mr. Balfour, which will in all probability split it yet further.

GROUSE-HAWKING.

"A FALCON towering in her pride of place" is the proper creature wherewith to kill a grouse. Shooting-men, no doubt, experience a thrill of delight when their first victim of the "Twelfth," whirring up in front of their favourite setter, drops dead on the heather forty yards from their gun-muzzle. There is pride and joy when the driven pack, speeding down wind at express pace, is decimated by the crack of your breechloader as you wait in ambush for the decisive moment. But what are these gratifications to the triumph of the falconer, when his own hawk, waiting in the clouds above, following his signals at that immense height, comes down like a thunderbolt upon the fast-flying covey, and with a stroke like lightning dashes one of them headlong to the ground? If you measure the merits of a sport by the difficulties which it overcomes, assuredly you will give the palm to this ancient branch of it. The very fact that so few men now are found to indulge in it attests, like a score of other signs, the truth of the explanation given by James I., that for lazy men hawking is too arduous and vexatious a business. In order to succeed in any department of it, and much more in game-hawking on the moors, you must have the very best dogs, the very best horses, the best hawks, and, one may add, the best men. Given all these, and the scene is as pretty as the mind can well devise. A broad expanse of nearly flat moorland. In the background a line of horsemen, one with a hooded hawk on his gauntleted left fist. In the foreground, three or four hundred yards ahead, a trusty pointer or setter quartering the ground. Presently his pace slackens, his gaiety tones down into seriousness, his body from nose to tail becomes more rigid at each step, and at last he stands stiff and motionless, as if petrified, at the dead point. Meanwhile the line of cavalry has drawn bridle, and the bearer of the hawk has put down his head as if in act to kiss the plumed hood. This is only to slacken one tie-band of it, while his right-hand fingers pull the other. As the dog comes to his dead point, off goes the hood, and from the fist held aloft the falcon springs into the air. As she mounts steadily upwards with lusty strokes of her broad wings, she is the only moving thing in the silent scene. The motionless pointer forms the centre of an irregular circle round which she works in her upward journey, now taking a long swing down wind, and again breasting the air with quick, resolute beats of her pointed wings. Every man's eye is upon her, and the only sound heard is the low voice of the falconer begging you "not to hurry her." Up she goes till the streaked bars of her breast and under-plumage become black in one uniform shade; up again till the fine outline of her shape is lost, and only by the buoyancy of her movement and the regular strength of her soaring curves can she be known from lark or swallow. Round and round now like a black speck in the sky she swings with hardly moving wings. She has got to her "pitch"; she is in her "pride of place." Now is the time. Bits and bridles jingle; the heath gives out a hollow thunder as the horsemen dash in, and with a loud shout from them the covey starts up fifty yards from the dog's nose. Now look up. The speck above no longer circles round. It grows blacker and harder to the eye as it glances sideways for a space like a shooting star. A flash comes from it as the sun catches the tip of one wing; and then, in one long oblique line of descent, is seen that marvellous coup, the swiftest movement of any living creature, the "stoop" of the true falcon. The accumulated impulse of a fall from a thousand feet brings the pursuing peregrine down within a few yards of the ground, twenty or thirty paces behind the escaping covey. With that tremendous impulse upon her she is going four times as fast as they, although grouse never fly faster than when the falcon is behind. In another second she will rush past them with the whizzing sound of a dozen arrows all together. In one convulsive effort each grouse swerves from the blow. But peregrines can swerve too, and as the pursuer dashes past often a fluff of feathers marks the place of the fatal stroke, and a victim with broken wing or broken back topples headlong over and rolls dead or senseless on to the heather beneath. Sometimes, of course, the "shift" of the grouse is successful, and the baffled peregrine, speeding by without striking her sharp talons into the intended victim, has to shoot up aloft again, raising herself with the momentum, still unexpended, of her first stoop. It will be half a minute or more before she has got to her "pitch" again; and by that time the grouse, with their full pace on them, will be near half a mile away. A second stoop may be more successful, or a third may yet be needed; but, if this fails, the quarry will be pretty sure to have gained a place of safety—the steep side of a burn perhaps, the shelter of tall gorse bushes, or anything that will hide its head from the view of the destroyer. Meanwhile horses gallop, and riders are thrown on the rough ground. The trained hawk, angry but thirsty for blood, gets up again to a new pitch. Beaters are improvised, and every effort is made to turn out the grouse from his retreat. A second flight may again occur, with equally doubtful result; but of all stoops the most dangerous is usually the first, and the main efforts of the experienced falconer are directed to ensuring its success.

To accomplish this what an infinity of pains and patience is needed! Such a falcon as that which has just been described is the product of many weeks of almost incessant care. Her obedience and docility must be combined with boldness and high courage; her keenness for the quarry must be made consistent with that exuberant strength which comes only from high feeding. She must be hungry without being thin, bloodthirsty without being savage, tame without being mean-spirited. A thousand dangers and mischances menace and impede the falconer who ventures on the moors. Ill-conditioned falcons, instead of mounting aloft, will hang about near the ground, at a height from which it is impossible for them to get up with their fast-flying quarry. Others will go aloft indeed, but not in the right place, and will be soaring about at a good height a quarter of a mile to leeward when the grouse get up and, skimming rapidly up-wind, fairly outstrip the best efforts of their enemy. Then comes the whole tribe of troublesome hawks, which "check" at unlawful quarry—which, being sent aloft to "wait on" over the dog, catch sight of a stray rook or wood-pigeon a long way off, and, without more ado, set off in pursuit—only to be recovered, perhaps, by a two-mile ride at full gallop, or by a two-hours' search, or even by a weary trail after them on foot, at daybreak next day. Some peregrines which have made excellent practice at rooks won't take any notice of game, and even refuse to eat a grouse when offered them for dinner. Then you have the youngsters, which are ready enough to fly at game if they could only catch them, but which, by bad luck or stupidity, always have their heads turned the wrong way when the grouse get up, or which don't like the wind or the rain, and, having failed to catch at their first three or four chances, become ill-tempered and wild, and are put by their owners on the list of ne'er-do-weels. Grouse may not be the most intelligent of birds; but they are, at all events, pretty well aware what are their best tactics when a hawk is in the air above them. If this hawk is a wild one, they are usually safe enough; for all they have to do is to sit still and wait till the broad circling sweeps of his easy flight take him far over the horizon. The only chance which a wild hawk has of taking game birds is when some shepherd, or tourist, or sportsman puts them up under him; for, until almost trod upon by some human being, no grouse or partridge in his senses will ever rise of his own accord. With the trained hawk, of course, it is quite another thing. The very object of her "waiting on" over the heads of the men and dog is that they may do for her the important work of flushing the quarry. And even then nature or instinct teaches the youngest grouse his best and most skilful tactics. There is always a time when the falcon, in circling round, has her head turned down wind, and away from the dog. Then is the time to make a bolt for it. And, with a sagacity surprising to see, the golden moment is seized, and a dash is made at best speed for the nearest place of shelter. It is the habit of the grouse when walked up to head down wind, as by this means he gets quicker away. But if a hawk is above, this rule is reversed. Just as the hare has a better chance when going uphill, so the grouse or partridge knows full well that he can go faster up wind as compared with his foe than if he makes to leeward. Consequently the object of the falconer is to make his falcon wait on to windward, and drive the grouse down wind—difficult things to accomplish, unless your pointer is first-rate, and also used to the business.

That hawks should still be trained to kill grouse regularly is thus some credit to their owners, who, in the abundance of shot guns, and in the host of enemies whose hand is against them, find obstacles innumerable, from which their ancestors were free. And the success attained to in late years has been remarkable. There are at least two trained peregrines now alive which have killed over fifty grouse in a single season. These two are both, curiously enough, "eyesses," and not "haggards"—that is to say, they were taken as nestlings from the eyrie, and not captured in the adult state after they had learnt to prey for themselves. Probably there are half a dozen "haggards" or "passage-hawks" which have slain for their masters over thirty in a season. The killing capacity of each kind of hawk—"eyess" or "passage"—depends mainly on the height of the "pitch"; and as, from the spectator's point of view, the beauty of the chase depends on the speed of the stoop, your high-mounting falcon is not only the most deadly, but affords the finest sight. By-the-bye, the "tiercel," or male peregrine, as distinguished from his much larger sister the "falcon," makes no good figure on a moor. Though he, too, can tower in as proud a place as she, neither the weight of his body nor the strength of his talons is sufficient to strike down or clutch so robust and heavy a bird as an old grouse. Clutching, indeed, or, in falconer's phrase, "binding to," the quarry, which is the proper mode of attack against a heron, rook, or kite, is by no means an artistic manœuvre on the moorside. The speed of the flight is so great, and the stroke so sudden and violent, that an attempt to hold on to the victim when struck would almost dislocate the leg of the striker, or at least throw her headlong forward over her prey. Accordingly the disabling blow is usually dealt in passing, with the strong hind talon, which is so trenchant as to break wing, ribs, or back, and even occasionally to decapitate the sufferer. The body of an old grouse, cut over by the falcon's stoop as he went down wind, has been known to strike the heather and bound forty-five feet from it on to the place where the coup de grâce was administered by the victor. Game hawks are rewarded for their exertions, when successful, by being allowed to demolish the head and neck of their quarry; and if by any chance you should happen to dine with a falconer on his moor, you will be edified by seeing his grouse come headless to the table.

THE NATIONAL ARTILLERY ASSOCIATION.

THE Volunteer Artillery do not succeed in attracting the same public attention as their comrades in arms, the Rifle Volunteers; chiefly, perhaps, owing to the fact that they are necessarily smaller in numbers. But the importance of their rôle in case of invasion is, man for man, much greater. It is, therefore, with great pleasure that we note that, in spite of the most adverse conditions of weather, the shooting this year has been, on the whole, better than that of previous competitions. The exact value of artillery in modern war has been a subject of controversy of a peculiarly ardent nature during the last few years. And in this particular case this controversy has been embittered, not only by the abolition of some batteries of the Horse Artillery, but also by recent acrimonious discussions, both in the public prints and in the sacred walls of the Royal United Service Institution, between soldiers and sailors. These wrangles, although they may serve an ultimate purpose, and may help to thrash out the problems of complete defence, meanwhile cripple the action of willing Governments. For they produce, first of all, a feeling of doubt in the public mind whether the money, which they are asked to give, will be wisely or uselessly spent. Every one who has ever been connected with the management of any business depending upon engineering skill for its success has been brought face to face with the necessity for deciding on the relative merits of schemes submitted by independent and equally brilliant experts. They are all honestly anxious to further the interests of the concern. They all know their subject within limits. They all wish to do their best by their employers. And yet they tell opposite stories, give opposite opinions, attribute the meanest motives to those who differ from them; in fact, do their best (unconsciously and honestly) to bewilder the judgments of those whom they wish to serve. This sort of thing is bad enough when the decision lies with half a dozen educated men. But, unfortunately, in the case of our defensive armaments it lies, indirectly at least, in the hands of some millions of half-educated men. And it is upon the enthusiasm of the best of these that the existence of our Volunteer force depends.

At the present moment there is a very distinct danger to be feared that the public will indulge in a false security owing to the increase in the navy. The English cannot, as a rule, look all round a subject and form a calm judgment. Whatever side has been presented with ability last forces itself upon our national attention, to the exclusion of other and equally important considerations. The prolonged discussions which arose out of the Naval Defence Bill, the inspection of the fleet by the German Emperor, and the interest excited by the Naval Manœuvres have given colour to the idea that, if we only spend a little more on our fleet, we shall have no need for any other defences at all. And, unfortunately, this idea has been fostered by ill-considered speeches and letters made and written by men who apparently stand in the position of authorities in naval matters. The effect of much that has been said during the last few months must be very discouraging to all Volunteers, and especially to those who belong to the Artillery branch of that service. In fact the only logical conclusion to be drawn is in favour of the absolute disbanding of the whole force. The argument, roughly stated, is that, if we had a perfect fleet, we could never be attacked successfully, and that, therefore, the money spent in land fortification, including garrisons, &c., ought to be spent on ships. The fallacy is ingenious. For no one can deny that, if you live on an island and have an unassailable fleet there, you will not be assailed. But when are we likely to have this perfect fleet? If every penny spent on the army were to be handed over for the next ten years to the navy, should we be nearer the result of a perfect fleet? Is such a thing as an invincible fleet a possibility? It is so on one condition only—that no foreign nations have any ships of war.

That, unless our fleets were either in the Pacific Ocean or beaten, invasion would be a risky game to play, no one can deny, as things stand at present. But the risk would be enormously reduced by the abolition of the Volunteers. It is their existence, in fact, which would enable the fleet to have a comparatively free action. For were they not there, a strong navy would, in time of war, be forced to hang about for purely defensive purposes. It is certain that, at whatever value the Volunteers may be put, they would prevent an enemy taking the first train to Charing Cross, and bivouacking that night in the House of Commons. In other words, the certainty that resistance of an organized character would be offered by a large body of men more or less trained in the use of arms of various kinds, and to a considerable extent accustomed to discipline, would prevent the landing of any but a strong expeditionary force. The difficulties of landing and the dangers of discovery are thus in the first place enormously increased. The progress inland, even if not checked by defeat, would be rendered slow. And meanwhile either by improvising such methods as our vast naval resources suggest, or by recalling distant ships, the local command of the sea might be recovered, and the enemy's line of communications severed.

But, without going further into the detail of this much-vexed question, the point of encouragement for the Volunteer Artillery is this. The organization which they possess, the guns which are now by slow degrees being issued to them, the forts which are being erected for their occupation—all these things are not the work of faddists. Admiral Colomb may write epigrammatic and popular appeals to have the money now being spent on fortifications, guns, and garrisons spent on ships. His statements and his arguments, being plausible, may catch the ear of unthinking persons. But the money is spent on works and men, on a scheme which has the joint sanction of the best naval and military experts in this country, after careful joint consideration. In the opinion of the Admiralty and War Office alike, the Volunteers, or some paid substitute for them, are a necessary part of any national scheme of defence founded on a careful survey of all the political and physical conditions likely to enter into any possible scheme of invasion. Had the plans, as at present worked out, been due only to the Military Intelligence Department, there would have been good reason for attaching great importance to any protest against them from the sailor's point of view. But it is absurd to suppose that the Naval Intelligence Department was so unlike the rest of humanity as not to be slightly biased in favour of its own branch of the services. It would not, therefore, naturally lean in favour of an expensive system of land defence. And yet the training of Volunteer artillery and infantry, the provision of arms, and the construction of forts are part of their scheme. Let Admiral Colomb, if he chooses, raise technical discussions in the proper places. But it is a distinctly unpatriotic action to throw cold water on the enthusiasm of those who are sacrificing time and money to fit themselves for their place in that plan of defence approved by the authorities of his own branch of the service.

It is, therefore, strongly our advice to those artillerymen who earned so thoroughly the praise given by Colonel Nicholson last week not to allow their belief in the importance of their work, and in the necessity for their careful training, to be affected by the careless generalizations of one-sided writers. They may rest assured that their value is fully recognized by those whose responsibility forces them to weigh with minute care all the elements of the problem. And they may be sure that every step forward in the skill which they can only acquire by constant and assiduous training is making them better citizens and more useful soldiers, in view of an actual possibility.

THE RISE IN THE BANK RATE.

THE Directors of the Bank of England on Thursday raised their rate of discount to 4 per cent., and very wisely, for the position was becoming dangerous. The influences acting upon the money market this year have raised the value of money in London earlier than usual, and they are likely to gain strength as the weeks go on. First among those influences is the improvement in trade, which, by augmenting the volume of business being done all over the country, and by raising wages and prices, renders necessary a larger coin circulation throughout the United Kingdom than at times when trade is less active. Holiday-making and harvesting are still further just now drawing upon the supply of money in London, and by-and-bye the usual autumnal demands for the English provinces and for Ireland and Scotland will make themselves felt, and they are likely to be much larger this year than for several years past. In all these ways it may reasonably be assumed that the outflow of coin and notes from London will be so large as very greatly to reduce the reserve of the Bank of England. But that reserve is already so low that a considerable further reduction would raise apprehension in the money market. As we have been explaining, the improvement in trade has drawn very considerably upon the supply of loanable capital in London. And over and above this there has recently been a large export of gold to Paris. If, therefore, the home demand for gold should be increased by a foreign demand, it is feared in the City that the effect upon the money market might be so great as to check the improvement in trade. There are regular demands of various kinds for foreign countries that usually come upon us in the autumn, and of course they will come upon us this year as in the past. They, however, could be met without serious inconvenience, were it not for the danger that special large demands may spring up. On Wednesday gold amounting to 400,000*l.* was withdrawn from the Bank of England for Brazil, and it is reported that more is to follow. Then, again, there is the fear that a large amount may be required by the Argentine Republic. The paper currency is there so greatly depreciated that the Government has for some time past been doing all in its power to attract gold. The Finance Minister has failed, and, in consequence, has resigned office. But his successor, we may be sure, will try new methods, and it is possible that he may be more successful. More serious still is the danger of a large gold drain to New York. Quite recently a considerable amount of gold was sent from New York to London and Paris, and at the same time, owing to a revival in trade throughout the Union, there has been a considerable outflow of coin and notes for the interior. Within the past couple of weeks harvesting operations have increased greatly this outflow; and, as harvesting becomes general and the crops are being sent to market, the demand for more coin and notes will become more imperative. In consequence of all this the surplus reserve of the New York Associated Banks has fallen below half a million sterling. If the surplus reserve should disappear altogether, the Associated Banks would have to stop lending and discounting. Rates of interest and discount might, in consequence, rise so high in New York that a large demand for gold might spring up in Europe. This week, it is true, the Secretary of the Treasury has been buying bonds very freely. His purchases, it is estimated, will transfer from the Treasury to the market over two millions sterling, and it is to be presumed that he will go on buying as long as the danger of stringency exists. His purchases may so relieve the market as not to render necessary gold imports from Europe. But, on the other hand, they may not be sufficient, and all who are engaged in the London money market must keep this possibility before their minds.

Fortunately there is not at present that over-eager competition in the outside market in London which so often aggravates the danger of such a situation as just now exists. The outflow of coin and notes from London to the provinces which has been going on all through the year has been mainly at the expense of the outside market. Bankers all over the United Kingdom usually keep employed in London the surplus balances which they cannot use profitably in their own districts. When, however, trade becomes more active in their own districts, they immediately order their agents in London to send back to them a portion of these surplus balances. Thus, though the coin is taken out of the Bank of England, it is really taken from the deposits of the outside market. In this way the funds at the disposal of the outside market have been greatly reduced, and they have been still further reduced by the completion of the conversion of Consols. As New Consols are under par, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not been able to complete conversion by increasing the issue of Two and three-quarters per Cents. He has paid off the Unconverted Three per Cents partly by borrowing from the Bank of England, but very largely by the issue of Treasury Bills and Exchequer Bonds, which have been taken nearly altogether by the outside market. At the present moment the Treasury Bills actually in circulation exceed those in circulation at this time last year by nearly 8½ millions sterling, and a new issue already announced will raise the excess to about 8¾ millions sterling. As we have said, the additional Treasury Bills are being taken chiefly by the outside market, and the money paid for them, therefore, has been transferred from the outside market to the Bank of England. Owing to this and to the drain upon its resources due to the improvement in trade, the outside market is not nearly so well supplied with loanable capital as it usually is, and, therefore, it has not been able to continue the over-keen competition which often defeats the efforts of the Bank of England to raise the value of money in London. On the contrary, the outside market almost immediately followed the lead of the Bank of England when the latter raised its rate of discount from 2½ per cent. to 3 per cent. And in the early part of this week the rate of discount in the outside market was actually higher than the published official minimum rate of the Bank of England. In the expectation that the Bank Directors would on Thursday raise their rate, bill-brokers and discount-houses on the three preceding days had been taking bills either at 3¼ per cent., or sometimes even at as much as 3½ per cent., or else at 3 per cent., coupled with the condition that, if the Bank rate were raised, there would be an additional charge made. This greatly simplifies the task of the Bank of England, for it makes it reasonably certain that the advance of the Bank rate on Thursday will be promptly followed by an advance of the rate in the outside market. In other words, it gives the control of the whole London money market to the Bank of England, and enables the Directors of that institution, therefore, to take whatever measures may be necessary to protect their reserve, by warding off large demands for gold. The only effectual measures which they can adopt are such as will raise the value of money in London high enough to make it profitable for capitalists of every nationality who have money already in London to continue to employ it here, and also to make it profitable for capitalists to bring money from other countries where it is cheaper to London, where it is thus made dearer. And in the present condition of the outside market it is reasonably certain that the Directors of the Bank of England can do this if they act promptly and energetically.

The task of the Bank of England is by no means easy. It has to make the value of money high enough to prevent a large foreign drain of gold, and at the same time not so high as to disturb trade at home. Whether it can do this obviously depends upon the strength of the foreign demand, and the possibility of diverting that demand to some other market. For example, it is possible that, if there were to be a serious crisis either in Buenos Ayres or in New York, gold might be taken from London, if it could not be obtained anywhere else, even though the Bank of England rate were 5 per cent. As regards Buenos Ayres, he would be a bold man who would venture a very confident opinion as to what may happen. But respecting New York there seems little danger of a serious crisis. The United States' Treasurer, who speaks with exceptional authority, is reported to have said on Tuesday that a crisis is not to be apprehended, that the banks everywhere outside New York are stronger than usual, and have fewer bad and doubtful debts. In New York, it is true, the banks' reserves are very low; but then the Secretary of the Treasury can increase their funds very largely. Even after paying out a couple of millions sterling for the bonds bought this week, he ought to have about 2½ millions sterling still at his disposal, and presumably he can increase that sum by the issue of silver certificates. The transfer of four or five millions sterling from the Treasury to the market may not be sufficient to prevent high rates of interest and discount, or to prevent a demand for European gold. But it ought to be sufficient to prevent a crisis. Turning now to the second point, the possibility of obtaining gold elsewhere than in London, we would observe that the Bank of France holds more than 50 millions sterling of the metal, over 9 millions sterling more than it held at this time last year. Obviously it could part with several of those millions without inconvenience to itself or danger to any French interest. The foreign demand, then, may be diverted from London to Paris by prompt and efficient action on the part of the Directors of the Bank of England. There would still, of course, remain the home demand, which is expected to be very large this year. That demand, however, being prompted by trade requirements, will not inconvenience trade, and it is to be recollected that the stoppage of the issue of new half-sovereigns, and the increased issue of silver coins, will tend to some extent at least to diminish the pressure upon the London market. If the 4 per cent. rate is made at once effective, and if it attracts much gold from Paris, it may not be necessary to do more till October. But if gold does not come from abroad, and the danger of foreign demands continues, measures ought at once to be taken to strengthen the Reserve. Any hesitation now will make the difficulty greater by-and-bye.

MUSKETRY INSTRUCTION IN INDIA.

THE retention of fire-control over sections and groups of men, even when advancing to the attack, is the great unsolved question of modern battle tactics. Fire-discipline is becoming more and more the military problem of the day. And, so far, we fear that but little progress is being made in England towards its solution. True, the Hythe musketry regulations have been simplified and improved of late years, and a really excellent chapter on Tactics as influenced by fire has been transcribed from the works of Captain Mayne into the new infantry drill-book; but this is not enough, and, as far as practical results are concerned, we appear to remain very much at a standstill. For at an Aldershot field-day do we not continue to see battalions going through the form of an attack, although no definite objective has been pointed out to them by their commanding officers, whilst company and section leaders aggravate the evil by giving their men the most varied and scattered marks on which to fire? Do we not still perceive the men themselves entering into the general unreal spirit of the proceedings, and not only failing to adjust their sights carefully to the named distances, but too often contenting themselves with the delivery of those ragged volleys which, in so far as injury to the enemy is concerned, are merely so much ammunition thrown away?

But there is balm in Gilead. Our military advisers are, when released from the petrifying influences of Hythe, quite capable of developing a real originality in matters of musketry instruction. Captain C. B. Mayne, R.E., a second edition of whose valuable work on Infantry Fire-tactics we recently reviewed at some length, has given us an admirable résumé of the work of others in this field; and, although he has not gone beyond general principles in his own deductions, and has refrained from formulating any precise recommendations for our guidance, he has yet shown us, all too conclusively, how much we have to learn. And now, in the latest Indian papers, there appears an order by Sir Frederick Roberts, sanctioning a really original departure, whereby the annual musketry course of the native army, hitherto modelled upon that of the British soldier, is modified with an object, or rather with a series of objects, which we cannot do better than quote:—

- I. To afford increased opportunities of practice to officers and all subordinate section-leaders in the control and intelligent direction of fire.
- II. To train the men, as a body, to deliver with precision and effect rapid collective fire, with as small a sacrifice of proficiency in individual marksmanship as possible.
- III. A closer assimilation between practices executed by the soldier in peace-time and the actual conditions of field service.
- IV. Reduction of the range work now executed by officers of the native army.
- V. Simplification of musketry returns and consequent diminution of clerical labour.

Such objects are certainly well worth striving for, and we believe that the revised musketry course in question has in a great measure secured them to the native army of India. The great feature of the scheme lies in the increased importance which it gives to collective or battle practices, together with their entire separation from practices intended merely for instruction in individual marksmanship. If we compare the revised Indian course with the present English system, we shall see that the rock upon which Hythe has split is its weak compromise between exercises for drill and for actual battle, as a consequence of which drill practices are much less instructive than they might be; whilst battle practices are limited to a certain number of the field practices only. Instruction should be as simple as possible, and nothing beyond a lesson in straight shooting under favourable circumstances should, as a rule, be attempted. Therefore the target should be large and conspicuously marked with a black bull's-eye, in order that the recruit or soldier may see exactly the point he must endeavour to hit, and exactly the amount and direction of his error. The Indian target is of the Wimbledon pattern, and is excellently adapted to this purpose. On the other hand, the target introduced by Hythe purports to represent a human being, which gives the soldier no definite point to distinguish, so that, as it is impossible for him to aim at the precise centre of the object, it becomes extremely difficult for him to trace the exact cause of his deviation therefrom. It has already been noted that the home army has no battle practices beyond certain of the field practices which are common to both the British and native army, in so far as the smaller amount of ammunition granted to the latter permits them to practise. But it is the introduction by the Indian authorities of the new collective battle practices as a part of the regular course carried out on the rifle range which constitutes the great difference between the two systems. This portion of the training of the native army is to have special importance attached to it, and it consists of section volleys, rapid section volleys, and rapid independent practices, which begin at 800 yards and terminate at 200 yards. The target represents a parapet or shelter-trench covered with smoke, and is painted khaki or dust colour, a narrow band being left white at the top to serve the double purpose of making the object clearly distinguishable and causing the men to aim low. For, as hits upon the white count nothing, the orders that aim must be taken with a full sight at the bottom of the target will necessarily be obeyed. The practice is, in fact, thoroughly realistic, and its results count in the figure of merit by which the position of a regiment as regards proficiency in shooting is to be determined. An important point much insisted upon by Sir Frederick Roberts is that the method of aiming until now alone recognized is thoroughly unsuited for purposes of collective fire. It is pointed out that exercises of this description require a quick aim, retention of aim, and instantaneous action on the word "Fire!" the reason given being that "it is outside the power of the individual to determine at what uncertain moment he may be called upon to release the trigger. For if, at the word 'Fire!' he has not yet settled his aim, or, having settled it, has lost it; or if, through force of habit, he has pulled the trigger without orders on first acquiring aim, a loss of power and effect will be the inevitable consequence. The last error is especially pernicious, as it has been conclusively proved in practice that the premature fire of one man will vitiate the general results in a degree altogether out of proportion to his own good or bad shooting. In fact, individual accuracy cannot compensate for a 'ragged' volley, and in those collective practices, the importance of which is now being insisted on, exactitude of aim must always be subservient to punctuality in obedience to the word of command." Fire-discipline, on the other hand, demands all this on the part of the men, combined with a complete decentralization of command on behalf of the subordinate leaders; and we are not sure that the very best part of the course now under review does not lie in the fact that it provides practice in peace-time for those native officers—havildars and naiks—who alone, and it may almost be said unaided, must perforce carry out the work of fire-control in the last and decisive phase of the actual battle.

Considerable as have been the advances recently made in England, they do not include anything of this sort. Here we are still groping away at individual marksmanship, with its precise, pottering aim, and very slow, gradual pressure of the trigger, not seeing that such methods are inapplicable to collective fire and absolutely antagonistic to that fire-discipline which we all profess to have so much at heart. Hythe may succeed in training a large proportion of soldiers to fire accurately at the black coffin on a background of snow which passes for a "figure target"; but it is doing nothing to increase the fire-discipline of the army. This, it may be added, will never be learnt upon ordinary field-days, when blank ammunition gives no opportunity whereby section commanders may judge of the practical results of their directions and commands. Besides this great variation in the principle upon which the revised course is to be conducted, there are several minor modifications introduced therein which we are inclined to consider useful and practical. One of these is the substitution of percentages for averages as a gauge of merit. The advantage is obvious, for at a glance any one can tell the shooting value of a practice if it is put down as a percentage, whereas under the existing system this can only be ascertained by a comparison between the average and the highest possible score, a piece of information not always available.

Judging distance has also been remodelled upon a more reasonable basis, and only section commanders, men likely shortly to rise to that position, and a few private soldiers who have shown a special aptitude for this part of their training, are henceforth to be exercised. The time thus economized may, it seems, be profitably devoted to making the small number attending the drill actually, instead of partially, efficient; and whatever our system of fire-discipline may be, it is certain that henceforth the bulk of a regiment will have no occasion to judge distances for themselves, except at those final phases when a fixed sight covers all the intervening ground. Space does not admit of our taking up any of the other points raised in these important instructions, but we are sure enough has here been said to induce those who are interested in fire-discipline and musketry to study the matter for themselves.

AMONG THE DUST OF EMPIRES.

HE who on the dawn of a brilliant day in May finds himself on the summit of the great upland plains which roll their sweeping slopes of green towards the valley of the Tigris will see at Samarra the bourne of such pilgrims as may have been left sleeping in the Khan at the little town of Beled. In the dim morning hours such a traveller will have passed many a crumbling ruin of the good old times of the Beni Abbas, rising ghostly and silent on the desolate hills. Soon he arrives at the massive arches of the beautiful bridge Harba, with its inscription in old Kufic cut in high relief across the line of arches on each face of the bridge. There are not many remains of Abbaside magnificence left in this war-trodden region; and none which speaks so eloquently of the golden prime of Islam as the bridge which survives in solitary beauty in the midst of the desert. The glorious, undulating plain is traversed by the ruins of old canals, straight and endless lines reaching from one horizon to the other. Their waters came from the Tigris in its deep valley below the plateau, and they testify to an astonishing amount of engineering skill and expenditure of labour in their construction. Across the plateau runs the line of the old Median wall, which extends almost due south from the Tigris above the ruins of Opis, and rests at its southern extremity upon the great canal of Saklā-wiyeh, at the ruins of the sacred Babylonian city of Sipphara, a length of just fifty miles from river to river. The Arabs call it Sad-un-Nimrud, or Nimrod's embankment. He is the father of all that is great, or strange, or ancient in this country unto this day. The broad, forsaken plains lie bare and burning under the blazing sun. The heated air grows tremulous, and the refracted rays have lifted the far horizon between earth and sky so that a vast and shining sea seems spread between. Far down the slope to the north a distant tower stands lonely, and lofty, and prominent. Turn aside to explore, and you find an ancient and solitary Masjid perched on the very crown of the bluffs facing the deep valley of the Tigris. What a place of prayer on that lonely height when the cry went sounding over the depths, La Illāh ill-Allāh! No call to prayer is heard now, for there is none to heed it. The stupendous excavation of an ancient canal, cleft deep and clean through the rocky hills, shows the painful labour of toiling human hands. But where is the race that once filled these barren deserts with the hum of busy life? The wanderers rejoin their lagging beasts at the entrance of a great ruined city. For the greater part of an hour one may ride through the broad central street from one gate to another. The walls lie four-square, flanked by frequent bastions; the bricks have weathered to solid masses of clay as hard as stone; and nothing is left above ground by which the hasty traveller might hazard a conjecture as to name or date of that great silent city. It is known among the Arabs by the name of Istabilāt, and lies on the verge of the plateau. Away in the distance the Tigris shone like a thread of silver laid on the misty plain, and the golden domes and minarets of Samarra rose glittering through the mellow haze on the further shore. Down on the river bank, where one rests in a peasant's hut, a struggling and vociferating troop of Persian pilgrims crowd into the boats until the gunwale is level with the rushing stream, and the brawny Arab boatmen with much strenuous effort bring their living freight safely to shore at a point half a mile lower down the river.

Samarra is the spot (according to Shiah tradition) where the twelfth Imām rests securely in his secret place until the time when he shall appear as the conquering Mahdi and lead the hosts of Islam to victory and dominion. To Gentiles it has a deeper interest as being the place where, fifteen centuries ago, the Emperor Julian fell mortally wounded by a Persian arrow. Six centuries later it was the capital of the Beni Abbas Khalifs of Baghdad, and the great Moorish gateway to the north of the town is about all that is left of the Palace of Motassam Billāh, the eighth despot of that dynasty. Three years before the visit we are describing our travellers had ridden for hours through the vast extent of ruins which line the Tigris bank, and had wondered at the utter desolation that had come to pass where the Arabs have named the land Sarrā man rá, Samarra, or, "the heart of him rejoiced that beheld it." The riders rested with the dull and kindly peasants. They knew nothing of, and cared nothing for, the forgotten glories of their race and name, and but dimly felt or hoped a way out of present toil and trouble. Meanwhile the stranger's gifts were tangible and certain, and he was therefore welcome.

On the morrow the travellers rode due north, and passed in the grey dawn the crumbling ruins of the Abbaside Palace of Ashik, or "Love's Abode." They came down to the Tigris bank again, where was an encampment of Dthaleim Arabs, and spent the burning mid-day hours under the black tents. Opposite on the further shore was the white dome of Imām Dura, the tomb of some old Moslem saint—an ancient place, for Polybius tells us of the fortified town of Dura as playing a part in the wars of Antiochus against the Medes and Persians. Somewhere about here Jovian brought the broken and harassed remnant of the Roman army across the river, on the fifth day after the death of Julian. And it must have been hard by that the ten thousand Greeks, abandoned and betrayed a thousand miles from their native shore, set out with such dauntless courage on that march which lives for ever in the pages of Xenophon. Some have told us that this was the spot where Nebuchadnezzar raised the golden image which he "set up in the plain of Dura in the province of Babylon." It may be so; names often cling for ever in these countries, where Arabic succeeded Babylonian, sister tongues of one family. What bygone ages live in this tract of desert, where a few nomads pitch their tents! The Arabs will give you of what they have to give—sour milk, a little butter and cheese; but the great busy world of to-day comes not near them, or touches them hardly closer than the remote ages among the dust of which they dwell. That evening the old town of Takrit lay before the party, perched on the steep and rugged bank of the old river. Darkness was closing over the lonely and silent desert, and the town seemed dark and silent as the grave. The Arab hostess of three years before rose up hastily, with wondering ejaculations of welcome, and let her guests enter the courtyard, where they rested with great content under the open sky. Nothing was changed. It is here that "changes never come," and if that be an element of bliss this country ought to be blessed. Takrit is the birthplace of Saladin, and had a bishop of the Christian Church of the East for long ages, whose throne was set up in the church the ruins of which still stand on the border of the rocky ravines just outside the town. The party arrived, worn and weary, at close of day, to ride out again into the stony desert at dead of night.

And now the first breath of the refreshing khamzin was wafted across the path from the north; at first a breath, steady and persistent, stirring the heated air; then a breeze, which blew with strong and steady force across the face of the desert, driving the dust in long, low-lying clouds and yellow columns, which went scudding and whirling over the bare mounds and along the winding valleys. The sonorous Arabic of the poet's satire rose to the mind as the storm-driven desert dust lashed spitefully at faces and eyes:—

Sad remnant of a race are we, and wear
Upon our brows the marks of cruel fate,
Outworn with toil, with feeble feet we fare,
Like men who at the wine do tarry late.
Shelter we sought within a place of prayer,
The tempest drove us forth with angry gust,
And all around us, whirled from everywhere,
Spread blackest pall of desert sand and dust.
No place, my friends, for such as we to stay,
So pack the beasts and start while yet 'tis day;
Nor wonder that the winds are rude, for they
But give the greeting every guest receives that comes by Siwār's way!

Siwār was a Persian, and Mutanabbi had cause to remember the churlishness of the race. Down on the river-side meadows of Karnina the Jabburs gave the travellers the more hospitable Arab welcome whereon they made themselves at home in the Sheikh's tent, and for the remainder of the day sat on the ground in the centre of a great crowd of Arabs. These simple folk respond readily enough to the one touch of nature that makes the whole world kin. Next day the Sheikh rode with the party, who turned their backs on the Tigris and began again to ascend the desolate plateau. To the left a rolling plain, on the right the rugged precipices and gorges of the Mākhul range, a continuation of the Hamrin range on the other side of the river which foams and roars in the rocky channel between. From the summit of the white and burning rocks that overhang the little oasis of Belalidj one looked for the distant towers of Al Hathr westward across the desert, and could just distinguish the faintest outline of the ruined walls. But the summer heat was too advanced to risk the long detour through a waterless desert to reach the solitary and mysterious ruins of the old Parthian city. Then came the crossing of the mouth of the Valley of Hell, Wadi Jahannam named of the Arabs, and there was haste to escape from the glare and heat of the naked glittering rocks in that ill-omened gorge. The Jabbur Sheikh led the way through precipitous ravines to the bed of the Tigris valley. But the mules were lost to view, and, after long scanning the horizon from the summit of a rocky pinnacle, one saw them like specks in the distance wending their own way to Sherghat, and who knows what prowling bands of Badawin may be lying in wait among the solitary mounds? "To Sherghat, O Sheikh, as hard as you can go; look out for Shammars, and intercept that fool of a muleteer if there be danger!" Away dashed the Sheikh down rock and ravine. Soon he stood out in relief against the sky on the top of the great mound and waved his spear, his signal that the coast was clear, then disappeared on his way to meet the mules. The others followed, and rested under the shadow of the wall of Sheikh Fartan's fort awaiting the caravan. Utter silence and solitude brooded over thirty centuries of desolation.

The great mound rises in massive terraces of brick above the Tigris, a hoary monument of almost fabulous antiquity and the days when Nimrod went forth into Asshur and builded Nineveh. The ruins may be those of Asshur (Gen. x. 11, margin), or possibly of Calah; the Arabic name of Kalaah Sherghāt may be a distant echo of either name. The mound slopes towards the Tigris; and behind, fronting the plain, the walls of brick rise up sheer, enormous, Titanic—huge square bricks, each one a load for a man. High up on the summit of the mound is a tower, in which a dark, narrow, vaulted passage has been uncovered; and all round the tower are huge heaps and excrescences that cover who knows what secret chambers and treasure-houses of primeval lore and legend in sculptured stone and graven marble. The party camped in the shadow of the mountain of brick, and realized, more than among the ruins of Babylon and Nineveh, the vast resources of naked human strength at command of these giant builders of old and the daring might of that towering ambition the tragic story of which is so briefly told. "Go to, let us make brick and burn them throughly. And they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar. And they said Go to, let us build us a city, and a tower whose top may reach unto heaven: and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth." That night a soaking, drizzling rain covered the surface of the desert with a sodden, sticky coating of mud. It seemed best to creep into a thicket of low bushes, and clear a space for a fire. But the dripping brushwood would not burn, and there was nothing for it but to sit shivering in wet rugs and waiting for day. At an Arab encampment further on, a halting-place during a frightful downpour of rain, there was a sudden alarm of prowling Shammars, and every man rose up from his place with gun or spear; there was a rush to horse, and away went the Arabs at headlong speed in the direction of the grazing camels. They returned across the plain, driving the camels before them with whoop and yell and waving of spears, wheeling and circling on their sure-footed little steeds. They drew up at last at the Sheikh's tent, which soon held the usual idle, gossiping, curious, coffee-drinking crowd. The Sheikh, a fine, stalwart young Arab, rode in company through the lovely slopes and hollows of the Wādi Kasab, or Valley of Reeds. The air was heavy with the sulphurous odour of the "slime pits," deep hollows in the desert filled with pitchy black bitumen.

Crossing the rugged verge of the plateau again, where from the crest of the ridge the broad Assyrian plains rolled away beneath, and in the background beyond the river the mountains of Assyria rose in terraced masses, our party gets down to the Tigris Valley once more. Across the river the great mound of Nimrud rises out of the level, one more of the buried cities of that old world whose beginnings were at Babel; the crumbling ruins of whose pride and magnificence have yielded their long-buried lore, to tell those of our own day what sort of men they were who raised these gigantic structures, how great, relentless, fierce, and proud, and bloody, until God's wrath fell upon them, and scattered them and their pride with the desert dust that is blown about their forgotten graves. The rude hovels of Hammām Ali, clustered at the foot of another great mound that hangs sheer over the river, were haunted by a wretched company, whom misery and disease and poverty had brought to the hot sulphur baths, in hope of relief or of alms. Later on, when the autumn heat has scorched the white streets of Mosul until they flame and glow with the breath of a fiery furnace, the jaded townsfolk will gather here to the cooler air of the desert and open river, and bathe themselves in the black and steaming waters of the hot springs, just as, doubtless, the old Ninevites used to come in the far-off centuries. One can picture the curled and jewelled Assyrians of the city, their brawny limbs relaxed and languid from the steaming bath, lounging on those breezy terraces that overhang the broad reach of their noble river. To-day a guard of half a dozen ill-clad and unpaid Turkish soldiers exact a grudging tribute on behalf of their Government from all who come to try the healing virtue of the hot springs.

At last, on the morrow, one looks down on a scene which might well repay the weary traveller for days and nights of desert toil. There lie the great mounds of Nineveh, and there is Mosul shut up within its encircling walls. Between the desolate mounds of the Assyrian city and the walls and minarets of the Moslem town the Tigris rolls its rapid flood, unchanged, unceasing, as it rolled in the dawn of history, when the sons of Noah began to get themselves a name upon the earth. Eastward across the scene the rocky range of the Jabal Maklub, with its Syrian convent of Mār Mati, shuts in the Assyrian plains, and eastward and northward the higher range of the Kurdistan mountains rises up peak beyond peak against the heaven of blue. Of Nineveh, buried and wellnigh forgotten, these huge mounds bear not a record on their crumbling surface. The bowels of them have yielded their treasures; but to read the tale they have to tell you must seek the sculptured record on the walls of modern galleries by the distant Thames. Ruin lies piled upon ruin in this land at every step. The dust of crumbling empires is blown about by every breeze; the sadness of desolation is in the air and weighs upon the spirits; one can almost hear "the wild beasts cry in their desolate houses and dragons in their pleasant palaces." One might say that even "the common law of Asiatic dynasties, the unceasing round of valour, greatness, discord, degeneracy, and decay," was at last played out, and that the sterile soil, unfit to nourish a valiant race, bore only the encumbering growth of humanity run to seed. This was the spot whence the great Zenghi, his greater son Nur-ud-din, and Salāh-ud-din, probably of the same great race, went forth to retrieve the fortunes of Islam, and shed a lustre even over the brood of the Osmānli which seven centuries have not dimmed. Nineveh, it seems, was yet the mother of heroes. Twelve hundred years ago, too, what a stirring and awakening among the old Assyrian heaps when Heraclius met the Persian hordes of Chosroes, and long before that brief December day had closed the Persian host fell shattered to pieces before the might of Rome, and the name of Nineveh flashed out once more from the darkness of forgotten ages! But desolation is in her thresholds. Only the strong hand of an imperial race, determined to make and to hold a peaceful empire secure from plunder and oppression among the shattered wreck and ruin of plundered Asia, can restore peace and plenty to wasted lands such as these. The highway to India lies through these regions; who holds Western Asia holds a gate to conquest or to power in lands in which, if she is wise, England will suffer no meddling with her destiny.

AN ILL-ADVISED GOVERNOR.

A SOMEWHAT elaborate review of the whole subject by Lord Herschell, and a statement by Lord Cross in the Upper House, on Wednesday, mark the termination of a protracted scandal in Bombay, which will certainly not enhance the reputation of the Governor of that Presidency. Lord Cross, indeed, was obliged to qualify his official commendation of the Governor's general administration by admitting that he had been ill advised in one particular course. Ill advised was, perhaps, a more felicitous expression than the speaker intended; for Lord Reay seems to have had some evil genius at his elbow to whisper perverse counsels to him at every turn. The history of the whole business is a good example of how a Governor, even if he is actuated by the highest motives, ought not to do things. And Lord Reay undoubtedly displayed considerable moral courage and independence in attacking Mr. Crawford—a high official who enjoyed great prestige and popularity. After a preliminary blunder as to the mode of procedure to be directed against Mr. Crawford, a strong Commission was appointed by the Government of India to inquire into the case. The report of the Commission fully justified Lord Reay in having moved in the matter. It disclosed a state of things existing round Mr. Crawford which could not have grown up but for his reckless impecuniosity, and Mr. Crawford was removed from the service—a decision which no one has questioned. But the Commission exonerated Mr. Crawford from the charge of personal corruption. And the Government of Bombay had got it into their heads that somehow or other Mr. Crawford was blacker than he was painted and personally corrupt. Instead, therefore, of accepting the Commission's Report, the very ill-advised Governor immediately proceeded to retry the finding in an academical armchair manner; a measure which not only revolted the ordinary British dislike of seeing a man trampled on when he is down, and exposed Lord Reay to an unfortunate suspicion of vindictiveness against Mr. Crawford, but also argued little respect for the Commission, or for the superior authority which he had solicited to appoint it. However, the Bombay Government had in the end to learn the impropriety of exceeding their functions, but not until a good deal of bad blood had been excited.

Naturally, therefore, the outcry was all the louder when it dawned upon people that, in order to secure evidence against Mr. Crawford, the Government had entered into some very questionable engagements. Native officials had been induced to come forward and acknowledge the giving of bribes to one Hanmatrao, who represented himself as Mr. Crawford's agent in selling official patronage, by a promise of immunity from the results of their disclosures. And it appeared that this immunity did not mean pecuniary compensation or guarantee against a criminal prosecution, but the actual retention of the offices which in certain cases they confessed to have obtained by corruption. It was obvious that the continued enjoyment of office by these discreet gentlemen was entirely opposed to every principle and maxim of English policy. Their removal was at once demanded; but Lord Reay either could not or would not see the justice of the demand. There was no knowing where things would have drifted to, when, just at this juncture, as an Elizabethan dramatist or Mr. Browning might have said, "in steps me Law." Legal proceedings being instituted against one of the peccant native officials, a judge of the High Court, Mr. Jardine, was obliged to remind the Bombay Government that a well-known statute of George III., which had been specially extended to India, absolutely prohibited the continuance in office of any official convicted of corrupt trafficking. The reminder must have been unpleasant for an ill-advised Governor, who presumably must have entirely overlooked the statute in question. Indeed, the Bombay Government appear to have stoutly contested the evident applicability of the statute to India; but we gather from Lord Cross's statement that the Home Government can have had no doubts on the matter. Here, then, was an awkward position. The Government of Bombay had pledged itself to keep certain officials in their places, and the said officials were disabled by statute from remaining in employment.

If, then, the Bombay Government were not to be entirely thrown over, and it must exercise a very bad effect for any Government in India to break its pledges, some expedient had to be devised to reconcile its undertakings as far as possible with the statute. The Indian Secretary accordingly announced to the House that he means to steer a middle course. Those officials in the Crawford case who confessed to gross and palpable bribery are to go. There is no help for it. But those who did—and, as Lord Herschell pointed out, a large number undoubtedly did—pay bribes under extreme pressure, in order to avoid the supersession or degradation with which they were menaced or fancied they were menaced, are to be more leniently treated. They are to be declared not to come within the scope of the statute at all. The arrangement is not altogether a satisfactory one, and involves a certain straining of the law. But it is the only way of getting over the difficulty, and must be thankfully accepted as closing a disagreeable incident.

REVIEWS.

A REVIVED POET.*

IN one of his novels Mr. Walter Besant draws a poet who tried, and failed, some time in the Fifties, and who lingers on, not trying in public any more. Somebody, to please this poet, intercalates a sham page of laudatory notice in a copy of the Saturday Review, and the good-natured trick is successful. Mr. Gerald Massey tried, as a poet, some time ago, and perhaps it would not be unfair to say that he succeeded about as much as the other minor poets—that is, not very much. But now he is revived, and in two neat pocket volumes of his "Lyrical Life." We sincerely wish that we could praise him as heartily as the sham Saturday Review praised Mr. Besant's minstrel. But we are compelled to admit that Mr. Massey's two volumes leave us with the most profound esteem for his heart, but not with a very high opinion of the distinction of his genius. It might be unfair or unkind to say that Mr. Massey reminds us of an inoffensive and amiable Mr. Robert Buchanan. There is, however, the same fluency, the same mastery of the manifest, the same ease in the obvious, the same sort of creditable approach to success. But it is all infinitely more amiable and suave and kindly, so that we really like Mr. Massey's Muse, and are confident that she often brings pleasure and consolation.

Mr. Massey innocently furnishes the critic with a prose preface about himself and his works and ideas. Fun might be made of this preface with its artless complacency. But this industry of fun-making is really too easy work. Mr. Massey informs the world and the ages that he is English to the heart core, which is true, and that he was a Home Ruler (like Mr. Gladstone, Sir William Harcourt, and the rest) thirty years ago. He also explains that "his faith in future life is based on facts in nature," by which we understand him to mean spiritual manifestations. He "has ample testimony that his poems have done welcome work, if only in helping to destroy the tyranny of death." This is a large triumph, and we congratulate Mr. Massey. He adds that, in spite of this really remarkable achievement, "I see myself referred to at times as a poet who has not fulfilled the promise of his early work!" (The note of exclamation is Mr. Massey's.) How unkind! and who has been thus referring to Mr. Massey? It cannot have been the Saturday Review, which is quoted as a journal that praises Mr. Massey's "rising strength and indomitable vigour." Mr. Massey cannot say we did it. With a certain genial indiscretion Mr. Massey publishes an extract, which we are rather sorry to read, from a private letter of Mr. Matthew Arnold's. Mr. Massey might leave that form of advertisement to another class of artists; the letter was probably not meant for publication. However, we are lingering too fondly over Mr. Massey's advertisements and his preface, in which he speaks of Woman's Suffrage and kindred matters.

As to Mr. Massey's verse, it is almost anything that is good; but, as a rule, is not often poetry. Why it is not poetry most critical readers will feel, and it might be a useful exercise to put the feeling into explicit words. Take Babe Christabel, in the metre of In Memoriam: it is full of pretty things. For instance, the mother of the child is written about in this way:—

How she had throbb'd with hopes and fears,
And strained her inner eyes till dim,
To see the expected glory swim
Through the rich mist of happy tears.

This is pleasingly stated; but the swimming glory and the rich mist of happy tears are Tennyson at second hand.

All night, beneath the cottage eaves,
A lonely light, with tremulous Arc,
Surged back a space the sea of dark,
And glanced among the shimmering leaves.

Pastiche! But the original owner of rich mists of happy tears would scarcely have said

They never saw a wee white shroud,
Nor guessed how flowers will mask the grave.

The "wee" shroud is a wrong note, and the flowers masking the grave are an example of the most ordinary commonplace. And so it is throughout. The sentiments are excellent and kindly; the versification is fair and fluent, but the metaphors are a little mixed; the ideas are outworn, "common is the commonplace." Yet it is highly probable that verse on this level does charm and console people whom higher poetry can hardly reach; and, so far, the work deserves esteem, and from its admirers gratitude. "Cousin Winnie," as it is more familiar, and does not aim so high and has not a manifest original, is really a better piece. Mr. Massey's allegorical strains, such as "The Youth and the Angel," with the lady who was "lip-luscious," are not all devoid of platitude of the honest Teutonic variety. An angel took a walk with a young man, the youth's taste was offended by a dead dog, and the angel's by the lady who was lip-luscious, and had delicate tinkling feet.

* Gerald Massey's Poems. London: Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co. 1889.

Turning from domestic sentiment (in which, we think, he is most at home) Mr. Massey writes about ancient Egypt, a topic which he has also treated with more energy, we think, than judgment or scholarship in prose:—

Strike the Ap-Ap monster breathless, break his bones, in pieces hew
The coils he rings them with who voyage to the Aah-en-Ru.

Old Egypt, like new Egypt, brings us little luck in poetry as in politics. In one honest song of kindly feeling Mr. Massey shows very much better than in his unprovoked assault on the Ap-Ap monster:—

We just shake hands at meeting
With many that come nigh;
We nod the head in greeting
To many that go by,—
But welcome through the gateway
Our few old friends and true;
Then hearts leap up, and straightway
There's open house for you.
Old Friends,
There's open house for you!

Indeed, the less ambitious Mr. Massey is; the more he speaks from the heart, not the head, and the more briefly he speaks the more he attains true, though not lofty, poetry. There are echoes of more sweet and powerful verses here and there, as in this:—

Ay, 'tis a tale of olden
Time, long long ago;
When the world was in its golden
Prime, and love was lord below.

[Banners, yellow, glorious, golden
On its roof did float and flow;
This, all this was in the olden
Time, long ago.

Mr. Massey is beholden,—
Much,—to Edgar Allan Poe!]

But Poe would never, in a song entitled "My Love," have observed that the lady was Just a wee bit sly.

This is just a wee bit wanting in taste, not to speak of dignity. In fact, Mr. Massey is too fond of wee shrouds, wee bits, wee graves, wee wifies, and other phrases endearing in the sacred intimacies of home, but unworthy of the Muse. He is no Tahureau, and even Tahureau abused diminutives.

Mr. Massey has a national note in his lyre. He appears to have been at Sydney when the Australians volunteered for service in the Soudan. It was not their fault that they had little or no chance of proving their mettle. They have, of course, been denounced as "Jingoes" by people who hold some of Mr. Massey's political opinions. His own heart, as usual, is in the right place:—

The life-streams of the Mother
Through all her youngsters run,
And brother stands by brother,
To die with one another,
All ready and all one!

Mr. Massey says with perfect truth that he is true English, and he has written some stirring songs for England:—

In words she wasteth not her breath,
But be the trumpet blown,
And in the Battle's dance of death
She'll dance the bravest down.

So may it be; but it is hardly correct to say that "in words she wasteth not her breath." Mr. Massey's "Poems for Christie" contain, among many pleasant domestic pieces, a curious visionary tale, "The Nabob's Double," too long to quote, but well worth reading. Many of his brief pieces have a happy concentration, as this on the "Souls of Animals":—

Such look of an immortal likeness, springs
At times into the eyes of dear dumb things,
As if Hereafter we must recognize
The Unknown Life that knew us in their eyes.

He sees not only the soul in animals, but the good in Tom Sayers, and he recognized in Mr. Thackeray the man

Large-hearted, brave, sincere, compassionate.

In fact, Mr. Massey has a thousand claims on our sympathy, even if we cannot believe in the sublime of his long poems, such as his "Tale of Eternity." On his political poems it is as well not to write, for politics will colour criticism of poems political. Mr. Massey has a piece called "A Reviewer Reviewed," in which he declares himself "quite content with critical half and half." It is a modest frame of mind, and almost unexampled among poets. They usually want nothing but nectar "or ambrosial dew." Critical half and half, in the native pewter, is not at all beyond what Mr. Massey deserves, and it may even be trusted that he will sometimes be refreshed with some richer and rarer beverage. At all events, he does not seem to be a water-drinking bard. In a piece on the death of Mr. Russell, the editor of the Scotsman, he says:—

Walhalla! rise and welcome him
Across the Braga-beaker's rim;
And, that his glory may be full,
Brim high some water-drinker's skull.

NOVELS.*

THE MILROYS ought to have come out in a ladies' journal; for the descriptions of how the different characters are "gowned" would be a valuable addition to the columns on dress. Woman's work is not depicted on a very formidable scale; it is the work done by three charming young ladies, one of whom rejoices in a "swelte" figure, and it consists of decorative painting and novel-writing. Their poverty (for they work for their bread) is of the picturesque kind, and means wearing tea-gowns and "Liberty-blue wrappers," and being waited on by a devoted retainer, who hands round afternoon tea in livery. They settle down in a village which is of the Cranford type, as it might seem in a nightmare, where they shock some of the inhabitants and dazzle others by their ways. The Vicar is much pleased with them, and pronounces that "they are ladies every one; no need to look for the hall-mark." Mr. Besant, in his letter accepting the dedication of the book, hopes that "it may be a work of education and help." We fear it will not be either the one or the other; for, though a great many platitudes are aired about women working for themselves and "adopting one special line—it matters not what the line may be, whether house decoration, journalism, or plain sewing, provided it is the best of its kind"—the young ladies with the hall-mark, who are supposed to exemplify this truth, are all of the highly ornamental type, and their chief work in life is selecting husbands from among their numerous suitors. The youngest girl, who is always called Baby, even refuses a lord. It is true he talks more like a chemist's assistant; but he is the owner of broad acres. If the style and taste, not to speak of the matter, of the book leave much to be desired, we can heartily recommend it for the number of quotations from Shakspeare. There are at least three at the beginning of each chapter; and, though their connexion with the subject in hand is not very clear, one is much too grateful for their sustaining presence to cavil at this.

Off with the Old Love is a very good-humoured book, rattled off by the author with such evident faith in human nature, and in novel-readers in especial, that it disarms criticism. It is chiefly composed of rapid interchange of ideas between the characters in the smartest style and choicest slang. The story is very much after the manner of Miss Broughton; but the author evidently gets frightened of her plot and runs away from it in the middle. The scene is Menaggio, where two American beauties with their timid mother and a nursery party to supply the comic element are disporting themselves with three young men. Captain Stopford, the most desirable of them, is supposed to be in the toils of a fascinating Lady Lawlor, "with warm, dark, dissipated eyes, which seemed to reflect back strange scenes they had looked upon," who is also of the party with her elderly husband. Stopford, however, reveals in as tender language as his familiarity with slang will allow that Lessie Leigh, the liveliest of the two girls, is the real object of his affections. When this makes itself clear Lady Lawlor, in whose train Stopford has been travelling through Italy, becomes dangerous, and declares that she will make use of a dark episode in her early life when, as a forlorn governess, she had flung herself on the mercy of Stopford and very nearly made him marry her. He had written her name as his wife in the hotel-book, and Lady Lawlor, fired by a case in New York which just then appeared in the papers of a woman trying to claim a married man as her husband because they had been registered as man and wife in an hotel, threatens to take the same course and throw her wealthy baronet to the winds in order to clutch Stopford. Thus a little pretence is made to cast difficulties in the lovers' path, which might otherwise be too crudely jovial. There is a handsome dying Frenchman, whose prominence on the scene is never accounted for, and an extravaganza American aunt, who plays antics in the background. People obliged to stay at home will find the book an excellent substitute for a week in a second-rate hotel abroad, the society of which it exactly portrays.

The Secret of Fontaine-la-Croix may be safely recommended to young people recovering from brain-fever or in any condition when the use of the mind is forbidden. It is true that there are elements which might be exciting, and that Mme. St. Hilaire, whose face alone revealed some awful tragedy, kept her husband's corpse embalmed in a mysterious room of her château; but the whole tone of the book is mild, missish, and unreal. It is a gentle story of French life, rather nicely told, though the attempt to create "atmosphere" by writing in a kind of translated French is tiresome. The theme is the inexhaustible one of an English girl who takes up her abode in a French family, where she finds a thrilling young Count engaged to the butterfly daughter of the house. One knows from the first what is bound to take place in this kind of school-room novel between the interesting young visitor and the fiery Count—mysterious aversion on her part melting into tender passion, self-suppression on both sides, inevitable revelation of sentiments (in this case under the tusks of a wild boar), heroic renunciation and retirement of the heroine into obscure life, while the hero marries out of duty. As this

* The Milroys: a Tale of Woman's Work. By Nomad. 1 vol. London: Mayson Beeton. 1889.

Off with the Old Love. By N. F. B. 2 vols. London: F. V. White. 1889.

The Secret of Fontaine-la-Croix. By Margaret Field. 1 vol. London: F. V. White. 1889.

Sant' Ilario. By Marion Crawford. 3 vols. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

happens in the middle of the volume, one feels sure that much is still in store for the heroine, and after five years' interval we find her re-established in the château, keeping guard over the giddy young wife, while the husband is away at Martinique on business. An insurrection in the village, excited by sinister rumours about the embalmed body, the burning of the château, and anxiety about her husband, who is now taking part in the French and German war, do their work on the poor little butterfly, so the path is now clear for the heroine, who acts the guardian angel without swerving, as indeed we all should with such opportunities. We fear that those no longer in their teens will not have sufficient imagination to think that the characters exist anywhere beyond the school-room threshold, and will have had too much experience of young men to believe without overwhelming proof in a lover who thinks nothing of carrying a young lady for half a league.

Sant' Ilario is a continuation of Saracinesca, and so much enamoured is Mr. Crawford of his subject that he holds out a hope to his readers that there is more, much more, to come. After all it does not much matter what Mr. Crawford takes for his theme, so long as he continues his present method of writing by the inch, or rather by the yard, without even a standard of what Sydney Smith calls "decent debility." In these days of mania for drawing life ugly, and drawing it mean, there is something refreshing in an author who never deviates from producing stories on a grand scale and giving us operatic performances where the scene shifts from brilliant moonlight to dungeon darkness. There are no fine shades which require attention, and there is a holiday sense of unlimited romance. It is not surprising that his present subject is dear to him, for shadowy Roman palaces, and the vague outlines of the princes and princesses with which he peoples them, suit him exactly. Sant' Ilario is the title of Prince Saracinesca's eldest son, and begins where Saracinesca ended, with Giovanni and Corona in a state of boundless wedded bliss. In spite, however, of the Prince's adoration for his glorious wife, he has only to see a pin which belongs to her, and a love-letter written in a feigned hand on paper with her crest, on the dressing-table of a young Zouave, to be convinced of her unfaithfulness. Thus the happiness of the pair is conveniently destroyed, and material for a three-volume novel provided. The suspicious letter was really written by San Giacinto, Saracinesca's cousin, though it purported to be from a lovely young Princess Faustina with a "fatal" countenance. San Giacinto wrote it because he discovered that Faustina, whose sister he was going to marry, was in love with the Zouave, and in order to prevent her compromising the family honour he took upon himself to concoct this letter postponing a concerted meeting. From this conduct, and from the description of his sinister appearance, one would expect him to be the villain of the book; but this is not the case. He is an excellent person, by birth the head of the Saracinesca family, though all his rights to that position were legally renounced by a former generation in favour of Sant' Ilario's father. Having made a modest fortune as an innkeeper, he proposes to marry the daughter of the grasping Prince Montevarchi. The latter conceives a plan to restore to his son-in-law the position and possessions he had been deprived of by adding a sentence to the document. He finds a forger of the first-water ready for the task in the person of his librarian, who agrees to do the work for a large sum. The paper is forged, the Saracinesca ousted, and a series of startling events is the result. The wicked old Prince is murdered; Faustina is accused of the murder on no other ground than that she had high words with her father about the Zouave; her friend, the injured Corona, calls on her husband to effect Faustina's release; Giovanni is so unhappy at his wife's loss of love for him after his unworthy suspicions that he gladly declares himself the murderer and is locked up by the bewildered Cardinal. Rome makes a prominent and picturesque background to all these wild proceedings, especially as the date is 1867, so that there are opportunities for the Pope's soldiers and Garibaldi's volunteers to march across the stage and make a stir. Though the characters might belong to any nation under the sun, their surroundings and the external details are described with evident knowledge and easy fluency.

PROFESSOR THOROLD ROGERS'S LECTURES ON ECONOMIC HISTORY.*

WHATEVER be the other merits or defects of Professor Rogers's latest contribution to economic science, it is at least eminently characteristic of the author. The volume is composed of a course or courses of lectures on the economic interpretation of history, delivered before the University of Oxford. The lectures were, as the Professor informs us, "very numerously attended." The contents are of the most miscellaneous character—autobiographical details, personal reminiscences of "great men and greater deeds," political insinuations, and economic deductions jostle each other in pleasing variety; while the University itself, distinguished opponents and no less distinguished friends, are the impartial objects of that delicate and discriminating satire for which Mr. Rogers is so justly famous. The references to the University are, considering the person and the place, peculiarly becoming. We learn, for example, the reasons why the University was for so long a period deprived of the services of one of its most distinguished scholars. "I have been restored," writes the Professor in his preface, "to an office of which I was deprived because I traced certain social mischiefs to their origin twenty years ago." The Professor deserves the thanks of the world of letters for thus authoritatively settling a matter over which future biographers might otherwise have been tempted to dispute. Again, in reference to the history of rent, Mr. Rogers expresses himself with equal modesty and consideration for the feelings of his inferior colleagues. "More than twenty years ago," he says, "I pointed out the nature of the problem and its inevitable solution. I suffered the ordinary fate of those who are more far-sighted than the people among whom they live—no great feat here." In another equally characteristic allusion he says, "I should like to know a little of the statistics of the unemployed. They are not yet forthcoming, except in so far as I obtained a Parliamentary return of the Oxford and Cambridge professors." Somewhat later he seems to insinuate even graver charges against his University. The effect of a warm eulogium on the House of Commons is thus materially enhanced. "People may, if they please, criticize the conduct of the House of Commons. . . . But no critic can charge it with being corrupt, with its members being influenced by personal advantage in their political action, with any motive more ignoble than ambition. In this it can be contrasted to its honour with every other Parliament, with every other British institution, even with the University of Oxford." We are equally unconcerned to attack the purity of the House of Commons, in which the attainment of emolument by political action is unknown, and to defend the corruption of Mr. Rogers's University, in which the refusal of profitable offices because a man differs with those who have them in their gift is universal. If the task is pressing, it will, we doubt not, enlist the services of champions more worthy of Mr. Rogers's steel.

From topics which may be assumed to have little more than local or academic interest we may follow Mr. Rogers to others of more general concern. For many reasons these Economic Lectures will amply repay an attentive perusal. "My reader will find that I occasionally refer to the experiences which I gained when I was in the House of Commons." For once the Professor greatly understates the facts. Never until we read this volume had we realized, to our shame be it confessed, how great were the political services which Mr. Rogers had bestowed upon an ungrateful country, nor how bright was the promise of the career so unkindly interrupted by an unthinking metropolitan constituency. We are now enabled to see those services in their true perspective; to understand the distress of the Radical party at losing so distinguished a colleague, and to realize, as we never realized before, the terrible weight of responsibility which lies upon the heedless electors of Bermondsey. We would gladly do tardy justice to Mr. Rogers by collecting from this volume all the instances of fearless advocacy of the cause of the poor and friendless, of well-timed rebuke addressed to a backsliding Legislature, of economical acumen and of political foresight to which Mr. Rogers refers with so much pardonable pride. But one or two instances must suffice. "About twenty-five years ago Mr. Goldwin Smith and myself called public attention to the cost of the British Colonies," says our author. What was the result? The public, as so often happens, were blind to their own interests and heedless of their best friends. "Mr. Goldwin Smith and I were credited with a design of breaking up the unity of the British Empire, and had to pay the usual penalties for premature wisdom." The defenders of the principle of Imperial Unity may indeed take courage. To have encountered such perils, even though unconsciously, and to have survived them, must assuredly fill the hearts of Imperialists with an easy confidence for the future. At least they know the worst. But Mr. Rogers's political efforts were not confined to Colonial questions. It appears from his lecture on the Protectionist Movement (though the relevancy of the information is not immediately apparent) that Mr. Howard Vincent before he became a member of the House of Commons induced the Home Office to propound a Bill which would have made every pawnbroker a prima facie criminal. But there was in the House of Commons at least one vigilant defender of the rights of the threatened interest. So long as Southwark was loyal to its chosen representative there could never be wanting a champion of the oppressed. That obnoxious Bill "I," says the Professor, "effectually extinguished."

In the whole range of practical finance there is no question more confessedly intricate and bewildering than the proper incidence of local taxation. To the discussion of this question Mr. Rogers devotes one of the most luminous chapters in the book. From this we learn that the principles on which local taxation should be based are far less disputable than we had supposed. Indeed the path of future Chancellors is rendered perfectly clear by "The Motion of March 23, 1886." We regretfully confess that this historic pronouncement had slipped our memory. Mr. Rogers is good enough to refresh it. "With these views and on these grounds," so he concludes the lecture to which we refer, "I made my motion in the House of Commons on March 23, 1886, when I proposed that for the future local taxation should, as in Scotland and Ireland, be divided into moieties of which the owner should contribute one part, the occupier another; power being given to the occupier to deduct the owner's moiety from his rent. This motion I carried by a majority of forty after a prolonged debate. In less than three months the decision of the

* The Economic Interpretation of History. By James E. Thorold Rogers, Professor of Political Economy in the University of Oxford, &c. London: T. Fisher Unwin.

House of Commons was followed by a political cataclysm. But I have no doubt (the italics are our own) as to what the solution of the question will hereafter be, and that the precedent of 1886 will be followed in the settlement of a system which is still exciting increasingly grave discontents." We have culled at random three instances of Mr. Rogers's political action as recorded in this volume. But we have quoted enough, we trust, to convince the most careless reader of the important part played in English politics by the Oxford Professor during the last quarter of a century; enough to give fresh emphasis to the ancient reflection that the unheeding world knows little even of its greatest men.

We turn from the political and autobiographical portion of the work to that which is more specially expository and economical. We should be the last to dispute the fact that Professor Rogers has given to the world a voluminous work on economic statistics, or that on many portions of social history he is entitled to speak as "one who has special knowledge." But is it quite necessary that Mr. Rogers should constantly reiterate his own special qualification? Is it not enough that the qualification has been substantially recognized in the proper quarter? In truth, much of the best work which this volume contains (and it contains much that is excellent) is marred by this pretentious self-assertion. In the opening of the chapter on Rent, for example, Mr. Rogers declares, perhaps with more truth than taste (we have ventured to italicize the first personal pronoun):—

In dealing with this controversy . . . I can claim some special advantages. I am the only person who has examined rents historically. I have studied the history of the same estates in some cases for more than six centuries. . . . I can state with perfect certainty what this land produced in corn six centuries ago, and I can also state what it produced at different periods between that remote starting-point and the present time. I know that, while the value of its corn produce has risen in money units or symbols about eight times since my investigation began, the rent in the same units or symbols has risen eighty times. I may believe a great deal in "the indestructible powers of the soil," though I should be very credulous if I held that the fertility of any soil was indestructible, as I think every practical agriculturist would be too. But I am sure, &c.

It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to point out that, were Mr. Rogers's modest claim literally admitted, criticism would be at once superfluous and impertinent. But at least it may be permissible to point out that Mr. Rogers is not always consistent with himself. In an interesting lecture on the distribution of wealth in England at different epochs the lecturer takes occasion to point out that the population of England and Wales from the beginning of recorded economical history to the end of the sixteenth century was "never in excess of two and a half millions, and was often less." According to a subsequent calculation the population had reached this maximum at the end of the reign of Edward III. (1377). The calculation will be found on p. 157. As to its substantial accuracy we have no doubt. But in a later lecture (p. 263) Mr. Rogers asserts that the Great Plague of 1349 had destroyed a third of the people. This estimate is probably below the mark; but, assuming its substantial accuracy, what becomes of the original assertion that at no time did the population exceed two millions and a half? Mr. Seebohm, in a well-known article, has suggested strong grounds for the supposition that the population of England before the Plague was nearly five millions, and that the Plague itself swept off at least half the population. This estimate entirely agrees with Mr. Rogers's estimate for 1377, but both surely are strikingly at variance with the original proposition. Again, there would seem to be something of inconsistency in the illustration with which Mr. Rogers elucidates his argument against preferential duties. It is doubtless true, as the lecturer observes, that the economical disadvantages of slavery outweigh any economical profit which can be gotten from it. But if this be so, how came it, as the Professor alleges, that "some of the loudest humanitarians in Jamaica and Barbadoes had been in the habit of importing slave-grown sugar from Brazil and Cuba, and exporting it to England as genuine free-soil produce"?

Professor Rogers is a great stickler for historical accuracy, and frequently speaks with unmeasured scorn of certain other contemporary historians scarcely less distinguished than himself. But even Professor Rogers is not quite immaculate on this score. If Mr. Froude has unduly exalted the virtues of the "Patriot King," Henry VIII., has not Mr. Rogers somewhat unfairly exaggerated the vices of the first Lord Salisbury and Mr. Pitt? Mr. Rogers is, perhaps, not over-partial to the House of Cecil. In two several lectures he reiterates the opinion that the first Lord Salisbury "instigated the war between King and Parliament; the next was a regicide in fact" (p. 136). Again, "I know nothing in the irony of history more striking than the fact that the son of the first Lord Salisbury of the House of Cecil took part, as he virtually did by sitting among the Lords on the memorable 30th of January, in the execution of the son of that King whom the first Lord Salisbury instigated to quarrel with his Parliament by doing what that Parliament conceived to be illegal, and constantly resented." We cannot conceive what induced the learned Professor to go out of his way to reiterate an historical calumny so gross and so gratuitous. It would be difficult to invent an accusation more entirely groundless or more conspicuously refutable by facts within the knowledge of the most careless reader of English history. On such a matter we make no apology for preferring the careful and responsible statements of Mr. Gardiner to the obiter dictum of Mr. Rogers. And Mr. Gardiner has proved to demonstration that no man laboured more assiduously to avert the coming conflict between Crown and Parliament, and to remove by a reasonable and timely settlement the most conspicuous cause of financial irritation, than did the first Lord Salisbury. Mr. Rogers's scathing sarcasm falls no less heavily on Mr. Pitt. "His contemporaries, especially those whom he favoured, called him a heaven-born Minister. I am afraid that I must assign his place of origin to a lower region, for it would be a strange heaven in which his policy would be acceptable." Among minor delinquencies, that great statesman is accused of having "hired the European monarchs in succession," and making "very unsuccessful bargains." But it is his financial administration that Mr. Rogers with characteristic temerity particularly impugns. "It is paraded of this personage," says the Professor, "that he was a disciple of Adam Smith. There have been many disciples, from Gehazi and Judas onwards, who have misused the instruction which they have received. Pitt's finance was a disastrous reversal of Adam Smith's maxims, even during nine years of peace. It was to become worse and worse during the twenty-two years of the war into which he plunged the country." The "eminent friend" of Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Mill, and Mr. Cobden seems to have forgotten the financial achievements of one of the greatest of their predecessors. He has forgotten surely the policy of Pitt in reducing the Import-duties on articles generally consumed, and at that time hardly less generally smuggled; the proposals which would have conferred on Ireland, fifteen years before the Act of Union, the commercial advantages which were eventually secured to her by that Act; the accomplishment of a commercial treaty with France which was the prototype of the famous treaty negotiated by the efforts of Mr. Cobden. These trifling achievements seem to have slipped the Professor's memory.

Even the "unemployed" professors of a "corrupt" University have, we suppose, the right to political opinions, and perhaps even the right of giving expression to them—in the proper place. Of course something more of latitude must be permitted to a Professor who has played a distinguished part on the political stage; but we respectfully suggest that even he would be wiser to keep the two characters somewhat more distinct. It is possible that in the "very numerous" class which attended these lectures there might be one or two benighted beings to whom such a passage as the following would appear gratuitously offensive. It occurs in a lecture on Labour legislation. "They (i.e. the mediæval legislators) never, to be sure, when they made the machinery of their discipline, and what they called law and order, more searching and more severe, declared that they had created no new crime, when their principal and successful effort was to render it impossible by studiously demoralizing the agents of law to distinguish between innocence and guilt." It would seem, too, somewhat lacking in dignity to interlard a lecture on the Protectionist movement with sarcastic allusions to the calling in which Mr. Howard Vincent served before his entrance into the House of Commons. We could well spare such irrelevant insinuations as the following:—"I presume that Mr. Howard Vincent does not want to merely increase taxes. In my opinion the distribution of the taxes already levied might well be put under the view of a financial director of criminal investigation with considerable advantage to public morality and to the taxpayer's pocket." Such gibes as this are admirably calculated to tickle the ears of the groundlings at obscure political assemblies; they are something less than decorous as the ex cathedra utterances of a University Professor.

It is necessary to speak thus plainly about the vulgarity and inordinate pretension which disfigure a work which is not without value in an economical sense. Mr. Rogers is a great, though not perhaps the only, authority on economic history—a fact which, were he not his own most inveterate enemy, would be more generally recognized than it is. And many of these lectures may be of great utility to the student of economics. The lecture on the Social Effect of Religious Movements; that on the Guild System; and that on the Estate of the Crown and the Doctrine of Resumption are especially interesting and suggestive. Some of the best lectures, however, or at least those which promise best, are the most disappointing by reason of the apparently incurable discursiveness of the lecturer. Not infrequently Mr. Rogers seems conscious of his failing, though seeking to justify the particular manifestation of it. The lectures on the "Origin of English Pauperism" and on "Domestic Manufactures" are instances of the Professor's inability to obey this first law of lecturing—a strict adherence to the matter in hand. With much that he says as to the value of the historical method in opposition to the older and more barren metaphysical economics we are in complete accord.

But alike for those who agree and for those who disagree with Professor Rogers; for those who are blind to the value of his political services in the past; for those who can but inadequately appreciate his economic labours in the present, there is something of consolation. For as he himself, in reference to an episode in his own career, observes with no less elegance than truth, "To a sensible man convinced that he has no prejudices, but only facts before him which he is bound to interpret, obloquy, especially from a daily or weekly paper, is cackle."

LAW BOOKS.*

IT has long been admitted that every natural-born American citizen has the faculty of making a speech whenever he chooses, upon any subject that may arise, and for as long as may seem convenient. It is also known to many that large numbers of American citizens, natural-born or not, can go on writing novels about anything or nothing until their publishers cry, "Hold! enough." It would seem that in respect of topics more substantial than fictitious philandering a not less remarkable fluency distinguishes our Transatlantic cousins. Here is Dr. J. I. Clark Hare publishing two massive volumes, each nobly bound in calf, containing between them no fewer than 1,400 pages of disquisitions on American law, besides lxxxix other pages designed to assist the reader in the use of the 1,400. It seems that Dr. Clark Hare gives lectures at the University of Pennsylvania, and, having given fifty-nine lectures on the constitutional law of his interesting country, he has printed them all at full length, with the result already stated. Now, it "humbly appears," as Scotch judges say, to us, and we respectfully submit, that giving lectures is one thing and writing books another. Lectures ought to be—and generally are—diffuse, full of repetition, and comparatively rambling. Books, and particularly books about constitutional law, ought to be concise, methodically arranged, and sternly coherent. It is quite true that all the world could not, if it wanted to ever so much, be privileged to assist personally at the lectures of Dr. Clark Hare. But does any one really suppose that that part of it which has not been so privileged is going to sit down and read in cold blood what Dr. Clark Hare said to his class, now republished "with such additions and modifications as are made requisite by the current of decision [sic] and events"? For our part we utterly decline to do anything of the sort. His lectures were devised in order that clever or industrious lads should be incited by hearing them to go and study divers printed books, reports, judgments, and so on, and give themselves a thorough acquaintance and familiarity with that branch of the law of the United States which is mainly made and administered in the Supreme Court; and, further, that the stupid or idle lads who heard him should by dint of repetition, and the persuasiveness of the human tongue, get so much of the rudiments of the subject dinned into their heads as would enable them to face the examiner without disaster. They were not made in order that either philosophers engaged in the study of comparative jurisprudence, or lawyers desiring for personal reasons to acquaint themselves with the law of the American Constitution in its application to particular cases, should profit by what was said. There is a good deal about English constitutional law and the English Constitution in Dr. Hare's lectures, and this is rather good reading for Englishmen who care to see that particular aspect of ourselves as an industrious and intelligent gentleman in Pennsylvania sees it. Dr. Hare's view is in some respects novel. For instance, he observes that, though the judges have for some time been practically independent and safe in their offices, yet, if the House of Commons were to lose its temper, the removal of a judge might turn out to be a simpler task than the judges are apt to think. Naturally enough Dr. Hare fails to realize the sort of opinion an average Englishman has of a judge of the High Court and the sort of opinion he has of the House of Commons, and it is also likely that he hardly knows how completely the House of Commons is the slave of some sorts of public opinion.

It has seemed to Mr. W. F. Webster that that part of the law of conveyancing which relates to the vendor's particulars and the conditions of sale when land is sold is sufficiently distinct and extensive to deserve a book to itself. As a mere matter of artistic book-making this proposition can hardly be denied; but, for purposes of practice, so long as you know what you want to look for and where you may expect to find it, it does not really matter so very much whether it is in a big book or a little one. As the existing books on Vendor and Purchaser cover Mr. Webster's ground along with much more, the probable usefulness of his appears to depend chiefly on whether he has said what he has to say better than it is said elsewhere. It can hardly be said that Mr. Webster's work presents any striking features of improvement upon that of his predecessors. It is fairly well arranged, and particularly well got up physically. The references are embodied in the text, as all references in law-books should

* American Constitutional Law. By J. I. Clark Hare, LL.D. Boston (U.S.A.): Little, Brown, & Co. 1889.

The Law relating to Particulars and Conditions of Sale on a Sale of Land. By William Frederick Webster, M.A., of Lincoln's Inn, Esq., Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens & Sons. 1889.

The Law relating to Goodwill. By Charles E. Allan, M.A. (Edin.), LL.B., of the Inner Temple, Barrister-at-Law. London: Stevens & Sons. 1889.

Wharton's Law Lexicon. Eighth edition. With Notices of the Statutes up to the end of 1888. By J. M. Lely, Esq., M.A., Barrister-at-Law, Editor of "Chitty's Statutes" &c. London: Stevens & Sons. 1889.

Wilson's Useful Handy Books—Income-tax, and How to get it Refunded. By Alfred Chapman, Esq. Sixth and revised edition. Inhabited House Duty: How and When to Appeal. By Alfred Chapman, Esq. Law of Trustees. By R. Denny Ullin, of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law. New and revised edition. House-owners, Householders, and Lodgers. By Joscelyn Augustus De Morgan, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law. The Law of Wills. By C. E. Stewart, M.A., Barrister-at-Law. London: Effingham Wilson & Co.

be. The stock of precedents is not particularly copious. The recent decision of the House of Lords in Peck v. Derry makes considerable havoc in Mr. Webster's chapter on Fraud.

Lord Justice Cotton once permitted himself to say that few people understood the meaning of the word goodwill. That or some other circumstance inspired Mr. C. E. Allan to prepare a monograph on the subject, and so far as we are aware there is no other volume, on this topic only, available for professional use. Mr. Allan's chapters deal with the definition and meaning of goodwill, with the rights it includes, the goodwill of solicitors' or doctors' practices, the involuntary or voluntary alienation of goodwill, goodwill affecting the value of land, and a discussion of agreements the validity of which has been questioned on the suggestion that they were sufficiently in restraint of trade to be against public policy. These topics are reasonably well handled, though perhaps here and there Mr. Allan's treatment is a trifle perfunctory. On the ground that the law of goodwill is "practically the same" in Scotland as in England, Mr. Allan has given particular attention to Scotch cases, and hopes his work may be useful to Scotch lawyers. We hope it may, but do not feel called upon to estimate the probability of that event. The author has also "referred to a number of American cases, when he has considered that they illustrated or developed the principles laid down in the English Courts." That is very proper, but he would do well, when he states a proposition for which his authority is only American, to mention the fact specifically in the text, instead of leaving his readers to find it out for themselves by observing the uncouth appearance of the reference in the foot-note.

We have received a new edition, the eighth, of Wharton's Law Lexicon. Like its predecessor, published six years ago, it is the work of Mr. J. M. Lely, who is perhaps best known as the editor of the current edition of Chitty's Statutes. This is a sufficient guarantee that the Law Lexicon now presents whatever advantages such a work is capable of attaining by being edited with industry, learning, and judgment. As the editions since the second have followed each other at pretty regular intervals of about five years, it seems that the work is practically useful.

A small stock of Messrs. Wilson's shilling handbooks on different branches of the law lies before us. That on Income-tax is the sixth edition, is, like its predecessors, the work of Mr. Alfred Chapman, and conveys much useful information about the recovery of money improperly extorted for Income-tax. It contains a statement that during the two or three years' existence of the "Income-tax Repayment Agency" there has been recovered by private individuals, either through the Agency or through their own efforts consequent on perusing Mr. Chapman's work, no less a sum than 90,000*l.* This is serious. In a country which can afford to dower the children of the Heir-Apparent to the amount of 36,000*l.* a year, but not to the amount of 40,000*l.*, it is clear that the disgorging of 30,000*l.* or 40,000*l.* annually must be a subject of much concern at Somerset House. If the calculation is accurate, it shows the value of Mr. Goschen's protests that no special or improper pressure has lately been put upon payers of Income-tax. It is safe to say that, if 90,000*l.* has been paid out of Somerset House in three years, a very much larger sum has been unlawfully collected and paid in. Nor does it mend matters in the least that many persons undoubtedly defraud the revenue of large sums due for Income-tax. The whole objection to the present system is that, while the wicked laugh at Income-tax, the lowly and meek are defrauded by officials. Both things are evils, and they do not in the least counterbalance each other. Mr. Chapman also contributes to the series the handbook on Inhabited House Duty, which is subject to the same observations as Income-tax in a rather less degree. The topic of trustees is not much suited to this form of publication. As a general rule a trustee is able to procure advice much more trustworthy than can be put into a shilling crib. However, any book about trustees may be of use, because it is impossible to read any such book without seeing that the position is one to be sedulously avoided. Mr. De Morgan's opusculum on "House-owners, Householders, and Lodgers" looks rather dangerous, because it conveys a little knowledge. There is not room in its pages for much. There is, however, some information about votes which can do no one any harm; because, even if a man fails to get his name put on the register, he is no worse off than he was before. Without any disparagement to Mr. Stewart, it must be said that his pamphlet on Wills is dangerous, as any "Practical Handbook for Testators and Executors" must be. The layman about to make a will has only two sensible courses open to him. One is to take the best advice he can get. The other is to make his will by the light of nature, subject to this most important proviso, that he must carefully refrain from using any word that he thinks he has heard before in connexion with legal documents. Mr. Stewart's handbook is a middle course, and in medio there is no safety.

WORDS ON WELLINGTON.*

SIR WILLIAM FRASER has thrown together—we can hardly say written or even compiled—what a man might call a Moliériste book. He has a hero, and a very good one; and he has hunted up all kinds of minute points in his life. What dress the Duke wore; what sword he had on in this scene or in that; the exact place in which the Duchess of Richmond's famous ball was held, and other similar details has Sir W. Fraser studiously investigated. In this volume he tumbles out the results of his studies. No more dignified form of expression can be used, for the book is emphatically a disorderly one. It consists of independent paragraphs; and if they were printed on separate pieces, tossed in a hat, and printed as they turned out, they would be quite as coherent as Sir W. Fraser has made them. One result of the manner in which he has elected to work is that his book suffers somewhat from repetition. The same statement turns up again and again—in almost, or quite, the same words more than once. In one case this method of just putting a thing down as it came into his head has caused Sir W. Fraser—as he frankly confesses—to repeat a silly story where he might have told a good one. On page 80 we are told that the “great American President and warrior,” General Grant, when dining at Apsley House with the second Duke, said, “My lord, I have heard that your father was a military man. Was that the case?” Now, the intelligent reader sees that this was impossible. On p. 171 we get the real and much superior version:—

* Words on Wellington: The Duke—Waterloo—The Ball. By Sir William Fraser, M.A., Christ Church, Oxford. London: John C. Nimmo. 1889.

IN AN EARLIER PART of this work I told the story of President Grant dining at Apsley House. I regret that I asked the second Duke what really took place. However, as the reader has had the full enjoyment of the story, I must now, in the interests of truth, state what the Duke told me happened. He said that during dinner General Grant kept trying to get him to say what was the greatest number of men that his father had commanded in the field. The Duke added, “I saw what he was at; if I had said forty or fifty thousand he would have replied, ‘Well, I commanded a hundred thousand,’ so I was determined not to answer his questions as to this; and I succeeded.”

The second Duke seems to have inherited something of the character, as well as the personal appearance, of the first. At times Sir W. Fraser's phrases themselves show want of pruning, as when he says:—“And here I trust no reader will commit the social shibboleth of even thinking of any troops but the Foot Guards when the term ‘Guards’ is used.” How does a man commit a “social shibboleth”? Again, it was not De Foe who wrote the Life of Jonathan Wild the Great.

Sir William Fraser's book will always have a certain value among Wellingtonians. It is not so much that the stories told are new, for we seem to meet most of them as old friends, or that those which are new in print are very characteristic. What the author has done is less to tell new things about Wellington than to record the impression which Wellington made. From him one learns how profoundly the Duke was admired, and how sincerely he was imitated by the generation which grew up in his old age. A more wholesome admiration we cannot conceive of as existing in the heart of any man. It was admiration for one in whom there was emphatically no weakness and no cant. The Duke's devotion to duty is a theme worn somewhat threadbare by much usage; but it will stand handling still. When, indeed, Sir W. Fraser tells us that Wellington kept the promise of marriage he had made before leaving for India, under circumstances in which a baser man might have withdrawn, because he felt that he must set a good example to other officers, we feel that he must be mistaken. There would have been a self-conscious priggery in the thought of which Wellington was incapable. But it is characteristic of the impression he made that his one prevailing motive should have been always supposed to be regard for duty. The absolute truth and absolute sanity of Wellington's character are illustrated here—as, indeed, in all that has been written about him with any knowledge. He was, in truth, the most finished type of all that was best and strongest in the England of the eighteenth century.

The last section of Sir W. Fraser's volume is devoted to the history and defence of his discovery of the room in which the Duchess of Richmond gave the famous dance. We think, on a review of the evidence, that he is right in holding that the corn-dealer's store in the Rue de la Blanchisserie is the “high hall” in which George Osborne was sobered by Dobbin's news, and to which Mrs. Major O'Dowd was not invited. Its position and shape agree with the description given by good contemporary authorities, and all the evidence against it is based on the ill-proved assertion that the “sort of old barn at the back of behind,” as Lord William Lennox called it, turned into a ball-room on that famous night, had been pulled down. Things of more moment have been held proved by weaker evidence.

WILLIAM HAZLITT.*

MR. ALEXANDER IRELAND, who is already well known by his biographical and bibliographical dealings with Carlyle, Emerson, and others, has done a further good deed by arranging a liberal selection (five hundred closely but not obscurely printed pages) from Hazlitt's work, and prefacing it with some seventy more of biography and criticism. Such a book was very much wanted. There is no complete edition of Hazlitt. Mr. Ireland, who has given much attention to bibliography, cautiously puts his published volumes at “about” thirty-five. But some, at least, of them are abstracts or editions of other men's works; while, on the other hand, Hazlitt, who, though not an extremely rapid writer, was constantly employed at a kind of journalism for nearly a quarter of a century, certainly produced some things, and probably not a few which he did not himself collect, and which were not even collected for him after his death. The reprinted edition of Messrs. Bell in Bohn's Library is very good as far as it goes, especially if, as Mr. Ireland advises, it be supplemented by a volume of his art criticism, published by Messrs. Reeves & Turner. But everybody will not read half a dozen volumes, and not to mention that some excellent things, notably the immortal “Fight” (Mr. Ireland tells us that some wiseacres advised him not to print it, but as the youthful translator of French said, he “fished himself of them, and found himself of it well”), are not there, there is there an amount of surplusage and repetition natural in the only kind of writing which Hazlitt's circumstances permitted him, but sometimes not attractive. Mr. Ireland has selected with a liberal hand, and though we hope that his book will send many readers to Messrs. Bell's edition, or to the originals, it is so done that it may very fairly suffice many more. We miss exceedingly few pieces that we should ourselves have given; Mr. Ireland has wisely given whole essays wherever he can (and a very large number of Hazlitt's pieces are so short that there is little difficulty in this); he has in most cases prefixed brief but sufficient notes; and he has given some extracts from the Napoleon. Even for the sake of the “Fight” the book would be worth buying and cheap at the price. There is but one thing that would have improved it, and that would be unfair—at the price—to ask. It is an index. Few writers are so indexless in all editions as Hazlitt, and few are more in need of indexing. We have ourselves hunted for hours after passages which we knew perfectly well, but which we could not at the moment “place.” And the mere titles of essays or papers give very little help, for Hazlitt is often nearly as independent of his titles as Montaigne. But, on the other hand, Mr. Ireland has given some additional information of the biographical kind—for instance, he records a pilgrimage to Winterslow which we have ourselves long intended to make—and he has added a remarkable portrait of Hazlitt different from that generally known. It is said to be derived from a touched-up copy by another hand made on the same occasion, if not at the same time, as the usual portrait, and is spoken of by persons who knew Hazlitt as a better likeness. We can readily believe it, though it can hardly be said to be as flattering as the other. It is much more the Ishmael-Hazlitt we imagine.

In dealing with his subject's life Mr. Ireland has not erred on the side of severity. Perhaps this is excusable, for Hazlitt had abominably hard measure in his lifetime, and has not been overburdened with soft measure since his death. But when Mr. Ireland says that Hazlitt “never carried poisoned arrows into political conflict,” he must surely forget the long passage of frenzied abuse of Scott in the Spirit of the Age, and the constant detraction of the Duke of Wellington, to name no other instances. Mr. Ireland actually finds Hazlitt “chivalrous”; and here, again, we cannot help thinking that he has forgotten (he does not, that we have noticed, anywhere refer to it) the episode of the “Z” quarrel and the Scott-Christie duel. Yet, again, Mr. Ireland calls the Sarah Walker business “a frenzy of platonic devotion.” This reminds us, though not quite in the same sense, of the passage in Venetia where (we quote from memory) Herbert smiles at Lord Cadurcis's use of the same word. We have been told, on pretty good authority, that Liber Amoris was slightly bowdlerized before publication; but, even as it is, we should have thought that the most charitable reader must see how little the devotion was, at least in the ordinary sense, “platonic,” though we admit that a “lady critic,” quoted by Mr. Ireland, declares that “no sensual man could have fallen into such fascination.” If that be so, Restif de la Bretonne runs Hazlitt hard for the prize of freedom from “sensuality.” The truth, of course, is that Hazlitt is our chief English example of the peculiar sensuality des cérébraux, as Mlle. Alice Ozy has it. Lastly, it is surely a mistake to put down the enduring underestimate and misestimate of Hazlitt to the fact of his being on the popular or unpopular side in politics. Had his failure to gain the public ear been merely due to this, the triumph of his principles just after his death must have brought triumph for him with it. The truth is that Hazlitt was not so much a Tory, or a Radical, or a Whig (there were even Tory fibres in him) as an Ishmaelite—a fact which his most judicious and best friends saw and acknowledged. He could not resist the “arf-brick,” and would throw it at anybody and everybody if they came in his way and the fancy seized him. That he was a man to be strongly sympathized with is true, for he was emphatically one of those “melancholics” who, as the philosopher says, require strong delights to draw them from their black imaginings. But to credit him with especial “rectitude,” “honesty,” “tenderness of heart,” “chivalry,” is, we think, a mistake.

A difference of personal opinion, however, like this matters very little, less than ever when, as we have already hinted, the subject received, during his lifetime, far more than his share of the evil things of detraction and obloquy. The chief and principal thing is that Mr. Ireland has here provided a very excellent selection of very interesting work.

* William Hazlitt, Essayist and Critic: Selections from his Writings, By Alexander Ireland. London and New York: Warne & Co. 1889.

SIOOT.*

THERE are few fairer valleys in Egypt than that of which Siot, or as Mr. Griffith, no doubt more correctly, writes it, Siût, is the chief town. The traveller who arrives by the daily train from Cairo, two hundred and thirty miles distant, finds himself near the river-bank, and some little distance from the city, the domes and minarets of which look white and cold against the afterglow in the western sky, and the deep purple of the hills which bound the valley on the south. The wide alluvial plain, brilliantly green a few minutes ago, turns intensely dark, and as the warmth fades out of the sky night comes on with a rapidity to which we are unaccustomed in the North. It is not till the morning lights up the scene from the Eastern horizon that the visitor perceives the peculiarity of the great grey hills which looked so distant and so blue the night before. They are now seen to be honeycombed with vast caverns, and in the clear daylight the forms of square-headed tombs may easily be made out. A little to the right—that is, to the westward—some dots of whitewash and a low dome or two betoken the existence of a modern Mohammedan burial-place; and we can reflect on the curious fact that for a period of time which must be reckoned at nearly four thousand years the dead of Siot have been buried in this mountain. The first tombs date from the reign of the Twelfth Dynasty, at least 2000 B.C. Mariette, indeed, dated its beginning at 3064 B.C.; but the earliest tombs at Siot probably belong to the end of the period. Thence in unbroken succession we have the burial-places of the "Middle Kingdom," the "New Kingdom," the Copts, and, finally, the Arabs, down to our own day. The further or southern slope of the mountain is equally full of tombs, and Mr. Griffith reports upon those of Dayr Reefah ("Dêr Rîfeh," he calls it) and Dayr Dronkeh, all in the same range. In fact, the two wide valleys north and south of the limestone hills must have always been a very important, if not the most important, district of Upper Egypt, with at all times a very large, industrious, and comparatively wealthy population. Siot, the S-se-oo-t of the hieroglyphs, the Asyoot or Al Syût of the modern Arab, is the largest and best built city on the Nile south of Cairo, and has grown immensely in population and importance since the opening of the railway and since it became the terminus of the postal service on the river. Previously it was the great rendezvous of caravans from beyond Dongola, and a centre of the slave-trade, scarcely yet, perhaps, wholly suppressed. Here it is reported, both in Christian and Moslem tradition, the Holy Family abode after the flight into Egypt. Much older than Cairo as an Arab city, it possesses some very characteristic ancient remains, including magnificent Roman columns; and the bazaar is the most extensive and orderly on the Upper Nile.

But the attractions of the city were nothing to Mr. Griffith. At his two visits, described but too briefly in the volume before us, he devoted himself to obtaining correct readings of the inscriptions in the tombs. Though Sir Gardner Wilkinson described them in the old days before Egyptian chronology and hieroglyphics had been studied intelligently, and although Dr. Brugsch reported on them more than thirty years ago, they had never been systematically copied, and in the meantime much had perished. Much, indeed, has perished even since Mr. Griffith's first visit in January 1887. The best known of these tombs are numbered by Mr. Griffith as "I." and "III." The first of these belonged to a mighty man under the Twelfth Dynasty, whose name was Hap-zefa, or, as Mr. Griffith, adhering to the scheme of transliteration adopted as a compromise by the Oriental Congress, spells it, "Hap-t'efa," who seems to have been governor of Siot. The inscriptions, although known to be very instructive on account of the early references they contain to the calendar of the Egyptians of that remote period, have never been fully copied before, and Mr. Griffith rightly devotes nine of his plates to them. Hap-zefa makes no mention of any contemporary Egyptian monarch, and may have been a more or less independent prince, but on Plate 4 we have a "palimpsest" cartouche of Usertesens I. of the Twelfth Dynasty. Hap-zefa repeatedly calls himself the priest of Ap-heru, "the lord of S-se-oo-t," the wolf-headed deity who was reckoned the "guardian of roads," and who gave the city its later Greek name of Lycopolis. Another king's name occurs in the fourth tomb, that of another great man, whose name was Kheti. He mentions King Ra-Kamer, or Mer Kara, of the thirteenth dynasty, whose history is exceedingly obscure. Of Kheti, however, we read that under him S-soot was prosperous, free from famine and pestilence, and that the people had rest in peace and security. This, if true, was a proud boast in the unsettled times which followed the extinction of the Twelfth Dynasty. But, as in another, and probably contemporary, tomb (No. III.), the decorations and writings are incomplete, and the peace on which Kheti prided himself must have been rudely broken.

The only fault we have to find with Mr. Griffith's volume is that his text is so meagre. He might, with very little additional trouble, have given us a few translated examples of the numerous inscriptions he has so laboriously copied. It is to be hoped, however, that now we have the hieroglyphics there is a sufficient number of English students capable of using them to throw light on one of the most interesting and most obscure periods of Egyptian history—that, namely, which intervened between the marvellous civilization which prevailed under the Amenemhats and Usertesens of the Twelfth Dynasty and the barbarism which overshadowed the country before the rise of the Eighteenth. It is possible that some writing in the granite quarries at Assouan, which is of this period, may help the future historian, and it is understood that all the names on these mysterious rocks have now been copied by Mr. Petrie and his predecessors and companions. There are still, if we mistake not, some uncopied inscriptions of uncertain, but probably early, date at the opposite side of the Nile from Siot; but all explorers there have been fascinated by the wonders of Beni Hassan, a few miles only to the north.

WINES IN ENGLISH CELLARS.*

M. MOURAILLE has put forth the little work under notice with the statement, which we believe to be true, that there exists no English text-book on the treatment and management of wines, so that the expert has invariably to turn to French scientific treatises on the subject. Having held the position for seventeen years of Maître-de-chai to Messrs. Spiers & Pond, our author is, no doubt, entitled to speak with considerable experience, for a vast quantity of wine must have passed through his hands. Yet we fear that his work will not adequately fill up the gap in our literature. In trying to account for the taste for extra dry champagne in England in preference to the sweeter kinds, M. Mouraille exclaims, "great is the virtue of advertisement!" and we think we are not judging him harshly when we say that his admiration for this principle is apparent in the pages of his book. It contains many sensible instructions relative to the racking and fining of wines, and directions as to the treatment of faulty ones; but no wine-merchant worthy of the name should be ignorant of the elementary details here set forth, and every such merchant should have quite as much experience as M. Mouraille's at his command to guide him in the subtler difficulties which frequently arise, and for meeting which no fixed rules can be given. As regards the cellarman, for whose use the book is also written, if his master does not see that he understands his duties, and takes care that he performs them, he is hardly likely to turn to these pages for guidance; while there is much from which the connoisseur will dissent. It is here stated, for instance, that Bordeaux wines improve with age during from four to six years. To keep its condition beyond six years a wine must be very strong in tannin and alcohol. As a rule, wine ten years old, say three or four years in wood and six in bottle, has reached its highest state of perfection; after that period it begins to deteriorate. Nevertheless, there are a few wines which tend to improve even after ten years. Such, for instance, are certain growths of Côte d'Or (Burgundies), Roussillon, Hérault, and Gard.

The above is true, no doubt, of the lower growths of Bordeaux, which probably the writer had in his mind, though he does not say so, and of all growths of weaker vintages; but the exceptions of recent years have been too numerous to mention. Who would say that the '64's began to deteriorate in 1874, or (leaving out the '70's) that the '74's or '78's had yet reached their prime? With the remarks on buying at public sales we cordially agree:—

The mere fact of purchasing wines in places offering no guarantee or security to the buyer is a great risk in itself. No risk need be incurred by procuring wines direct from responsible wine-merchants or importers, either in wood or bottled.

We believe that the practice is only to be accounted for by the love of a bargain inherent in many people; it pleases them to "pick up" wine of a high-sounding name at a lower price than it can be bought of a wine-merchant, totally oblivious of the relative merits of the same alleged wine. If they would only test their bargain when it comes home by a little comparative tasting, the illusion would soon vanish. M. Mouraille has patented many ingenious inventions, which are duly described and illustrated in his book. We regret to learn that he has hitherto found no machine for washing bottles which he can recommend; though we have seen more than one in high-class establishments doing their work with admirable efficiency, and causing a great saving in labour. No doubt this will be amended before long, and a "Mouraille's bottle-washer" will be invented to supersede all others. Among the recipes which "ladies perhaps will be pleased to have" we find the following one for "Iced wine for Balls and Soirées":—

Put a block of ice weighing five or six pounds in a porcelain or glass vessel, with a lemon cut in thin slices. Pour in ONE bottle of good vin ordinaire, two bottles of effervescent lemonade, and half a pound of loaf sugar. Stir the mixture, and serve. The beverage may be made in any quantity.

But we fancy the ladies will find the above quite sufficient, as far as their male guests are concerned.

* Wines in English Cellars. By L. P. Mouraille. London: Simpkin, Marshall, & Co.

* The Inscriptions of Siût and Dêr Rîfeh. By F. L. Griffith. London: Trübner & Co. 1889.

PALLAS'S SAND-GROUSE IN SCOTLAND.*

THIS is an important contribution to the history of British ornithology. Few zoological incidents of late years have presented such an adventurous novelty or have caused so much excitement as the invasion of our archipelago by the Tartar hordes of Pallas's sand-grouse (Syrrhaptes paradoxus) last spring. These strange little birds had but once been seen in Europe before. They were exotic in the most exclusive sense; they came to us from the untraversed recesses of Central Mongolia. Suddenly the whole of Western Europe, from the arctic circle in Sweden to the Straits of Gibraltar, was occupied by vast flights of these alien birds; and, almost before naturalists had found time to observe them, they were gone again. The pamphlet before us is not designed as a history of this invasion, a work which Professor Newton has taken into his particular charge, but as a collection of facts regarding Scotland alone. It contains notes of all the data obtained in various parts of North Britain by a great variety of persons, sifted and examined on the spot before observation had time to decline into invention or rumour to take rank as history. The immigration was so sudden, and made at so many different points at once, that it was a labour of no light kind to collect and scientifically to arrange this mass of desultory notes. The result, however, is one which is of very considerable value to science.

As is well known, one previous invasion of Pallas's sand-grouse had been recorded. There was a flight westward of Syrrhaptes in 1863, and the particulars of this are by no means so exactly recorded as we should wish them to be. It is, however, estimated by Mr. Macpherson and others that the invading army of 1888 was not less than twenty times as large in numbers as that of 1863. The geographical distribution of the birds in the latter year was not less widely extended than in 1888, but it was much more thinly dispersed. About twenty-five birds were seen on the shores of the Forth, eight or nine in Forfarshire, and fifteen in Kincardine. But one was noticed in the Moray Firth, a flock of ten or twelve in Caithness, and two or three in Shetland. The whole west of Scotland produced only eight specimens, one of which had flown so far as to Benbecula in the Outer Hebrides. There is no evidence of the arrival in Scotland in 1863 of more than eighty specimens in all, but these were scattered over the country from Unst to Dumfries. The visitation of 1888 was dispersed equally widely, but it was enormously larger in numbers, and can scarcely have consisted of less than two thousand birds. The distribution was curiously even. In the Outer Hebrides, where but a single bird was seen on Benbecula in 1863, there were flocks in 1888 on Benbecula, South Uist, and the Lews; while a very remarkable immigration and settlement took place on Tiree. The existence of these birds in large numbers on the very brink of the Atlantic makes us wonder what is the nature of the instinct which leads these little creatures westward, and what is its limit. When the sand-grouse find themselves in Jutland and Southern Scandinavia, they resign themselves blindly to the long flight over the German Ocean. Once arriving at the estuary of the Forth, their faith is rewarded; but still they fly westward. They pass the Clyde; they reach the sea again; they gather on the sands of Tiree and Oronsay. What leads them still to push westward, and to visit the remotest frontier of Europe—the barren chain of the Long Island? And when they stand on Benbecula, and the unbroken Atlantic is before them, do they still push on westward till they faint with weariness and sink in the vast profound, or is their instinct cunning enough to teach them that this is the end at last? These are questions which are, we believe, still unanswered. We are not aware at least that any one has stood on the western shore of any of the Hebrides, and has seen the sand-grouse take flight still further onward in search of fabulous Hesperides.

The scouts of the main force appeared, in 1888, about the middle of May, and the entire invasion was completed by the second week of June. For the next two months they were endeavouring to make themselves at home in Scotland, and they were being resolutely attacked by their animal and human enemies. On the whole, Mr. Macpherson is able to report that the sand-grouse received "handsome consideration from the Scottish public." Nevertheless, the Wild Birds Act proved quite insufficient, in all but a few places, adequately to protect them. There were, however, many intelligent efforts made to induce the birds to nest, and several reports were circulated to the effect that these were successful. It is in sifting evidence on such a point as this that labours such as those of Mr. Harvie Brown and Mr. Macpherson are particularly valuable. In most cases the wish was found to be father to the thought. At Tentsmuir, where great care had been taken not to disturb a likely flock, it was confidently reported that they bred, but there was no real proof of it. At St. Fergus, where a settlement of no less than two hundred birds settled, there is found to be the belief of a keeper that "he saw a pair of young birds, with down on them, roaming about with an old sand-grouse near them." Young birds were said to have been shot at St. Fergus; but when they were examined they were not found to be tender juveniles, but regular tough old seniors. The same failure attended an examination of suggested nesting in Gareloch. But on the Culbin Sands, near Forres, there is evidence of a formal kind that the sand-grouse did breed. As this solitary instance is of considerable importance, we may quote the words of Mr. Salvage, the well-known collector:—

I certainly saw a clutch of eggs of the Pallas sand-grouse on the Culbin Sands last season. I should have taken them, of course, but for a keeper who was near at the time. My shouting to him a fine day or something of the kind frightened the old bird off the nest, or rather an apology for a nest. There cannot have been any mistake, for she got up quite close to me, and I saw 3 (or 4) eggs. There might have been more, as I did not care to examine closely with the keeper looking on. I, however, marked the spot sufficiently, as I thought, by breaking the twigs of some stunted birches growing near, to enable me to find the nest again. I, however, was not careful enough, and, although I searched the vicinity that evening, and for days afterwards, I failed to find it again. . . . I may add that the Pallas was common on the Culbin Sands last season; I must have seen hundreds. I also saw a few on the Findhorn Sands. . . . I need hardly mention that I was much vexed at missing the clutch of eggs, for I was quite aware of their value, and such a discovery is worth recording.

Mr. Salvage's discovery is borne out, unknown to him, by the fact that sand-grouse chicks were actually captured on the same ground by a keeper of the name of Alexander Scott. He happened to know the peculiarity of the foot of Syrrhaptes, and at once examined the feet of the chicks. He found the three small toes with the pad underneath, and was certain of his bird. This evidence, confirming that of Mr. Salvage, was considered of such unique importance that, after consultation with Professor Newton at Cambridge, Mr. Macpherson went up to Forres and subjected Alexander Scott to a cross-examination. The result was entirely satisfactory, and it is, therefore, accepted that one indubitable case of breeding occurred in Scotland in 1888.

FALLOW AND FODDER CROPS.*

AS Mr. Wrightson truly says, book-farming is not popular with agriculturists, but the rising generation of farmers will have to condescend to the reading of books to hold their own in these scientific days, when the practical man, once the lord of the creation, is held of little account by the man of science. "Practice with Science" is the motto of the Royal Agricultural Society; and this book, written by a scientific man, insists on verification of theory by practice at every step. It certainly does not encourage mere book-farming, but gives ample warning that the same crop, with the same manure, will not afford the same results under different conditions of soil and climate. "The term fallow is derived from the Anglo-Saxon fealewe, and seems to indicate the colour of the bare or unploughed land; and is apparently the same word as is applied to fallow deer, in accordance with their earth-like colour" (p. 7). It is an old word in farming, used to indicate land let alone to recover after the exhaustion of producing a crop, and has crept into English as a metaphor for neglect, or want of care:—

A thousand hearts lie fallow in these Halls.—TENNYSON.

In modern farming, however, every care is taken of the fallow, in preparation for the crops to come, and even the fallow crops may be the most important in a rotation. Bare fallows are explained in the first chapter, which are now almost entirely superseded by fallow crops. Mr. Wrightson reminds us that "the earliest allusions to fallowing are found in Leviticus, when the Israelites were ordered to give the land complete rest every seventh year" (p. 8). The old three-field course was generally followed in our early history, when one-third of the arable land was under fallow, the course being—first, wheat; second, spring corn—oats, barley, or beans; and the third, fallow, let alone to rest from cultivation, but grazed by cattle. Bare fallow, in a modern farming sense, is by no means letting alone; it is a complicated process of cleaning land from weed, taking a year to complete, and if followed by wheat, which used to be the case, nearly two years elapse without a return to the farmer. Bare fallowing required no less than five ploughings, with harrowings, draggings, and rollings to match, thoroughly cleaning the land of weed for the all-important wheat crop. Mr. Wrightson devotes the first chapter to explain what fallows are, and the system of bare fallowing as a preparation for succeeding crops. And, in the remaining chapters, he treats fully of fallow crops; in other words, the cultivation of great varieties of fodder—turnips of many sorts, mangel, cabbage, &c.—to clean and prepare the land for the corn crops. The fodder crops are renovating crops, simply because they are consumed on the land, and are returned to it in some shape or other, in distinction from the corn crops that are sold off the land. In earlier days the corn crop was by far the most important, as affording the principal food of the people. Then sheep were very unpopular, because land was thrown out of corn cultivation to become sheep pastures. Now that corn is cheap, and meat more generally used as food, the fallow crops demand the best attention of the farmer.

Mr. Wrightson gives a full description of every sort of fodder crop, the methods of cultivation, and the manures suitable both for the particular plant, the soil, and the climate, whether in the North or South of England, with their value as feeding stuff for bullocks, sheep, or horses. The results of Sir John Lawes's experiments at Rothamsted on this particular subject, extending over many years, are given in tables; and on this all good farming in the future must be based, with a practical knowledge of the peculiarities of every farm, or of every field for that matter, as a superstructure. The results of experiments tried at Cirencester by members of the Chamber of Agriculture on the cultivation of swede turnips are also given in full detail in treating of that very valuable crop. The Agricultural Colleges at Cirencester and Downton are doing good work, and an interesting experiment made by Dr. Fream of Downton is described. Rye-grass being used as a fallow crop, a question arose respecting its presence in permanent pastures. Dr. Fream obtained twenty-five pieces of turf, each 2 ft. long, 1 ft. broad, and 9 ins. deep, cut from pastures in twenty-five various parts of the United Kingdom, and planted them in the botanical garden at Downton. There he examined every species of grass growing on them, and ascertained that in the vast majority of these turfs rye-grass and white clover predominated, thus setting at rest the question of rye-grass as permanent pasture. This is an example of a useful experiment, and tables are given in this book—p. 230—of the various grasses that grew to maturity on the turfs taken from places so far apart as Derbyshire, Kent, Devonshire, Tipperary, and other counties. There are tables with the results of scientific experiments throughout the work, and pains have been taken to state the cost of every crop, and the value of the crop as food. A horse costs just as much a day as a labourer, each of which Mr. Wrightson puts down at 2s. 6d. a day; and, as two horses and a man will plough an acre a day, an acre will thus cost 7s. 6d. to plough. The rotation of crops is also explained—the Norfolk four years' rotation and the Wiltshire eight years' rotation. The Norfolk four years is considered the best farming, by which one crop of wheat is taken on the fourth year. In the Wiltshire eight years' course two crops of wheat are taken, the first on the third year and the second on the eighth year.

* The Visitation of Pallas's Sand-Grouse to Scotland in 1888. Prepared, chiefly from information collected by Professor Newton and J. A. Harvie Brown, by Rev. H. A. Macpherson. London: R. H. Porter. 1889.

* Fallow and Fodder Crops. By John Wrightson, M.R.A.C., F.C.S. London: Chapman & Hall, Limited.

Mr. Wrightson, in the last chapter—chapter xi.—treats of ensilage, and explains the term, quoting from Mr. Henry Rew, as derived from the Greek σῆρος, a pit, changed to the Spanish and French silos. By this it appears that it was a very old practice to preserve grass by putting it into a pit, recently revived and practised in England in the well-known form now attracting so much attention. He describes the various methods by which ensilage may be made, and the crops most suitable for the purpose. And in an appendix he criticizes Mr. Eckerling's calculations of the value of ensilage on a farm, arriving at a much lower estimate of the net returns from it.

This book can be strongly recommended as a good authority on the subject of Fallow and Fodder Crops, of which it treats. The details of experiments are very carefully given, and the caution is insisted on that every farmer must experiment for himself—that is to say, he should take the facts supplied to him by scientific inquirers and find out for himself how and to what extent they are applicable to his particular farm. The man of science can give him invaluable rules and ascertained facts, and he must vary their application in accordance with his own experience. This is particularly the case with manures, and hardly less so with the various plants that form the crops. Botanical, chemical, and other scientific terms are avoided, though the botanical name is given with the common name of each plant. The motto of the Royal Agricultural Society—"Practice with Science"—is certainly the moral taught by this compact, business-like, useful volume.

WAY'S ILIAD (XIII.—XXIV.)*

MR. WAY'S translation of the Iliad is completed by the issue of this second volume. Three years ago we expressed our opinion of its qualities, and we do not find anything new or different that ought to be said now. Mr. Way at his best continues to be very good—so good that, if he were always at his best, the problem of Homeric translation would perhaps be settled for our time. But he continues also to be, at his worst, not only inadequate but perverse. We thought for a time that we could perceive an abatement in the neo-Scandinavian violence of his adjectives and compounds. Conventional epithets like δορυκλυτός, κορυθαίολος, are still brought into undue prominence by a bewildering variety of equivalents, but there is a tendency to moderation in the quality of them; and so far it is well. Unfortunately there are new outbreaks in other directions. In XVI. 479, 480, in the combat between Patroclus and Sarpedon, we read:—

ὁ δ' ὕστερος ὄρνυτο χαλκῷ
Πάτροκλος· τοῦ δ' οὐχ ἄλιον βέλος ἐκφυγε χεῖρός.

This is the plainest language of Homeric narrative. There is no effort, no ornament, no word that is in any way more catching than another. It is a necessary part of the facts, told with all swiftness and simplicity. "After him Patroclus set on with his weapon; from his hand the missile flew not in vain." What has Mr. Way made of it?—

Patroclus thereafter his javelin swung on high,
And nowise in vain from his hand did the murder-lightning fly.

We could forgive "swung on high," though there is nothing about swinging in the Greek, and the phrase is barely appropriate for the action of throwing a spear. Something must be allowed even to the most diligent and close of translators for the exigencies of metre. But we see no ground of excuse for "murder-lightning." It has nothing to do with the Greek, it is not like anything anywhere in Homeric Greek, and it is not good English. Chapman's amplifications may be worse in themselves, but this is a plainer sinning against light, and Chapman seldom amplifies in the middle of plain and direct narrative. In this place he says (and it would be hard to better him):—

But no such speedless flight
Patroclus let his spear perform, that on the breast did light
Of his brave foe.

We formerly remarked on Mr. Way's unfortunate predilection for thunder and lightning. If it is invincible, he should find other means of satisfying it. Homer did not call a spade a thundering shovel, or a spear murder-lightning; and a version which makes him do so is unfaithful in a material point. It would be better to take the risk of baldness than to make Homer picturesque at this cost. Mr. Lang and his companions do not profess to give us all the poetry that is in Homer; but at any rate the English reader knows that Mr. Butcher, or Mr. Lang, or Mr. Leaf, or Mr. Myers, as the case may be, will give him good English prose, and will not give him anything that is not in Homer. We are bound to say that this "murder-lightning" is the very worst thing we have found. It is an extreme case of Mr. Way's besetting fault, but a typical one in kind.

Apart from these wilful extravagances, Mr. Way's scholarship may be trusted to warrant the accuracy of his version (which is a good deal more than can be said for Chapman), and those who are not content with a prose translation may find it a good companion to the original, or, if the Greek is beyond them, as good a substitute as they are likely to get. It has life and motion, and these will cover many faults. If Mr. Way puts into his teaching as a head-master the same spirit which he shows as a translator, the boys who read Homer with him are fortunate.

A larger proportion of double rhymes appears, or has caught our notice, in these latter books. We do not think Mr. Way's metre is one for which double endings are well suited; and we adhere to our opinion that the form of English verse which shall be truly analogous to the Homeric hexameter still waits for its inventor.

SIX NEW SONGS.

FROM Mr. Joseph Williams we have an album of six songs by Lady Ramsay, of Bamff, to poems by Mr. Herbert Gardner, dedicated to the King of Sweden and Norway, the music of which is varied in style, of well-marked character, and for the most part well within the means of the amateur soprano or mezzo-soprano voice. Mr. Gardner has supplied the composer with poetic material that is far superior to the "song words" with which most of our song-composers are willing or compelled to be content. "What is Love?" and "Flos Florum" are, indeed, poems that every lover of poetry may accept with pleasure; and, as the poems are printed in full apart from the music, the singer may judge how agreeable it is to have music and sweet poetry agree, instead of the too common incongruity of twaddling commonplace, if not sheer nonsense, associated with taking melodies. Lady Ramsay's melodies have decided freshness, and are truly responsive to the poems. In this last important quality—sympathy with the metrical theme—these songs are remarkable, and the merit is sufficiently rare to call for praise. The first song, "With the Spring," is sure to be a favourite. It is the simplest in character of the series, is extremely pretty, and does not tax the vocalist's power. "Between the Green Corn and the Gold" and "Love's Kingdom" are more difficult. The first of these is in the key of F, passing to the tonic minor and reverting to the original key; the second is a spritely melody in C, varied by an episode in the minor. In these songs the somewhat abrupt changes of key (pp. 9, 10, and 13) may perhaps surprise the ear charmed by an intimate acquaintance with old English song. The modern composer is generally addicted to this practice, and the key-changes so frequently indulged in by song-composers of the day are not always duly anticipated by preparation and modulation. Mr. Gardner's most striking poem, "What is Love?" is wedded to the most characteristic setting of the series. This is a lively strain in Bolero form in F minor, with an accompaniment more difficult than the others, and with sound execution should prove very effective. Another attractive number is "The Spinning-Wheel," a romantic ballad of the lady singing in her castle, as she sits at her spinning-wheel, set to an engaging melody accompanied by arpeggios that admirably suit it. The last song, "Flos Florum," is mournful in character, with a simple and expressive accompaniment. Like other songs composed by Lady Ramsay, this pathetic example possesses the uncommon property of strengthening its appeal, as good things will, by repetition.

SOME MORE GUIDE-BOOKS.

AMONG the later, but not too late, guide-books of the year may be noted a new edition of Murray's The Lakes (London: Murray), arranged on the new and immensely improved system on which we commented favourably in the case of the Holland and Belgium. In no case, perhaps, was an immersion in the Fontaine de Jouvence more necessary to "Murray" than in this handbook, which had been for years far behind the excellent local work of Mr. Jenkinson, and still further behind the opening volume of Messrs. Baddeley and Ward's "Thorough" Series. A very great deal has now been done to catch up these forerunners; the most noteworthy of many improvements being the enlargement and multiplication of the maps. In a copy of Murray's Lakes which lies before us and beside this, a copy bought not ten years ago, there is only a single map, on such a scale as to be practically useless. Here there are two good maps in pockets on each cover, and four other sectional coloured maps at intervals, interleaved with the text, and on the half-inch scale. This is as it should be, and means business.

* The Iliad of Homer done into English Verse. By Arthur S. Way, M.A., Head-master of Wesley College, Melbourne, Australia. Vol. II. Books XIII.—XXIV. London: Sampson Low & Co.

A new edition (the fifth) of Mr. Baddeley's just-mentioned work (Dulau & Co.) is also before us; but here we must show something like the apparent injustice which made the Prodigal Son's elder brother so angry. There is less to commend here because there never was much, if anything, to blame. We observe, however, that there are between forty and fifty pages more matter than in the first edition—a good evidence of the continual pains which is taken with these really admirable little books. Another new edition in the same series is the third of South Devon and South Cornwall, also revised and enlarged, and also deserving of the same praise. We are glad to see that a volume for Hampshire and the Isle of Wight is advertised, and we could wish for others. But Messrs. Baddeley and Ward seem to have adopted the sound plan of never "devilling" their work; and the amount of time required thoroughly to survey the ground, and then to arrange one of these books, must be considerable, even if (which can hardly be the case) the authors did nothing else.

Baedeker's Switzerland (Dulau & Co.) is far too well known to need extended comment here; and we need hardly say more than that the thirteenth edition has appeared. It is now so portly a book that subdivision would be something of an advantage. Twice blessed is the guide which will go comfortably into the pocket.

A perhaps excusable desire to take the goods the gods provide in the way of advertisement has induced Mr. Ralph Darlington to print "The Queen's Visit to North Wales" on the cover of his Vale of Llangollen (Llangollen: Darlington; London: Adams). The volume is a specimen, and a very fair specimen, of those local guides which wise travellers who are not desperately afraid of the banging of a saxe or two always add when they can to the publications of the haughty metropolis. The illustrations of such books are not invariably beautiful, nor is their style always classic, but they constantly have bits of local information, not least in their advertisements, which, as they would themselves say, "repay perusal." And this, as we have said, is good of its kind. Rhodes's Steamship Guide (London and Liverpool: Philip) is not a new book, but it is better; it is a book which has weathered two annual issues and found it worth its while to appear a third time. Mr. Rhodes begins with a fervent panegyric of Mr. Ismay and the White Star Line. This panegyric, we doubt not, is fully deserved, though, having a possibly churlish dislike to the mixing up of personal matters with general information, we could have spared it. Then he talks about engines for some time, and then devotes himself to "The Passenger." This section, though its style is a little of the order which has been unkindly described as "Guidebook Thorn-crackling," contains much useful information. Everybody knows, though few people remember, how very much the comfort of a journey depends upon thinking of little things beforehand, and Mr. Rhodes will be a useful prompter. His medical advice seems sensible, though he perhaps recommends rather too many drugs. After this there is a series of articles devoted to the principal ocean lines and voyages, anecdotic, "informational" (as the people say who call good English bad and use jargon as if it were English), and otherwise. Altogether there is a good deal in Mr. Rhodes's book, though it be but a little one; and, while it has every appearance of being a useful practical companion on real voyages, it is not a bad one for a short one in an armchair. There are, of course, one or two blunders. The "Bishop" light is not "near the Lizard," but near Scilly; and this mistake, put into practice, has brought more than one good ship on the Lizard itself.

The Official Guide to the South-Eastern Railway (Cassell) is a wide-ranging publication; for it goes from Berlin to Tunbridge Wells and from Margate to Como. The nasty-minded carper may object that in much the same sense the line of Sir Edward Watkin conducts to Jerusalem and Madagascar and the British fleet at anchor, whether in the Downs or at Petro-Paulovsk. But far be such remarks from us, who have never in our whole history been censorious. To tell the truth, as we have told it more than once before, the improvement in these "official guides" of late years is very remarkable.

We are sorry to learn that Mr. Evans, the original author of the Rustic Walking Routes near London (London: Philip), which we have more than once praised, is dead. But his work lives after him, and is now continued by Mr. S. Sharpe to a "West-by-South" district, ranging from Wandsworth to the Surrey Cobham and from Southall to Kenley. The suburban builder has cut up this district more than either of the northern sections with which Mr. Evans began; but there are still many of the famous Surrey commons and other places to go to. The walks are, as before, carefully planned, excellently described, and cleverly diagrammed.

Algerian Hints for Tourists, by C. Flower (London: Stanford), honestly presents itself as a kind of guide-book appendix rather than a guide-book, and as such deserves recommendation.

Pollock's Picturesque Dictionary of the Clyde (Glasgow: Menzies) we have praised before, and can praise again. Strathpeffer Spa, by F. Fox, M.D. (London: Lewis), is a chiefly medical guide to that healthful, if hyperborean, watering-place; and we have received the second edition of Mr. Oliver Baker's Ludlow (London: Simpkin & Marshall), published last year as a subscription book.

CALENDAR OF TREASURY PAPERS—1720-1728.*

REFERENCES to a vast number of subjects of more or less interest will be found in these "Abstracts" of Treasury papers. The editor, Mr. Redington, has noticed a good many of them in his Preface, and has showed considerable judgment in his treatment of the documents themselves. The Irish Commissioners of Revenue report that the uneasiness of people of all ranks about the patent granted to Wood for coining halfpence is "greater than can be imagined by any that are not on the spot," and suggest that, "as far the greatest part of the current money in this kingdom is clandestinely exported from other countries," means should be taken to prevent Wood from introducing more than the 40,000*l.* worth of copper coin allowed by his patent, and to keep out counterfeits of equal value with his coins "from Holland and other places." In a rather obscurely-worded petition against the Malt-tax of 1725, the Edinburgh brewers argue that the Act of Sederunt requiring them to brew was an infringement of the Claim of Right, inasmuch as it imposed a bond without the authority of Parliament. Only one brewer complied with the orders of the Lords of Session, and he was "branded with the name of traitor to his country." Before long, however, the Commissioners of Excise were able to report that, "by the prudent management of the Lord Hay, the Lord Advocate, and others, the concert of the Brewers is now broke." In the Orkneys the maltsters persevered in their opposition, and were so violent that the Commissioners wrote to General Wade for a detachment of troops for the protection of their officers. Glasgow was fined 6,080*l.* damages for a riot raised against this tax, and the magistrates declared that the Corporation was hardly able to pay such a sum. An Address to the King from the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland sets forth that Popery and Jacobitism were widely prevalent in the Highlands and Islands, that parishes of from thirty to forty miles in length had only one minister and one school, and that in some of them "for every Protestant teacher there were six Popish traffickers practising incessantly." Another Address from the Presbytery of Abertarf states that in the area under their inspection, which was about 150 miles in circumference, and contained five parishes, there were "no legal schools save what are settled by the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge," and that in consequence the people became "an easy prey to popish priests, jesuits, emissaries from Rome, and other disaffected persons." Among several documents referring to smuggling is a letter from the Bristol distillers about "the running of French brandy," in which it is remarked that "we have no settled commerce with France, and probably never may." The smugglers "concerned in the murder of Purchase" were in such force at Shaftesbury in 1724 that the magistrates could not execute the warrants against them without the help of a military force. Many claims were made for rewards for apprehending criminals; one of them was from persons concerned with the late Jonathan Wild in apprehending a highwayman. Other claims were for information, and among these one Samuel Slatford of Oxford set forth in 1720 that he had "detected many dangerous practices carried on there during the late Rebellion, and had discovered a great quantity of arms designed for the use of the Pretender." For his zeal he had to "quit his habitation and livelihood," and therefore prayed for some provision. Robert Dalyell, "late Earl of Carnwath," who had been condemned for his share in the Rebellion and had been respited, petitioned the Crown for a grant, as he had lost all his property by his attainder. He received a bounty of 600*l.* The wife of John Walkinshaw, of Burrowfield, whose husband had lost his estate by forfeiture, also obtained relief on account of her poverty and her large family of children. Parliament had granted a sum to encourage attempts to find out a satisfactory method of ascertaining the longitude at sea, and Peter Laurans asked for a grant on the ground that he had invented a "machine" for that purpose, and had "thereby throw'd himself in low circumstances," so that he could not bring it to perfection, but "my Lords" declined giving him any money until his machine had been produced and approved. A sum of 100*l.* was given to the Rev. William Whiston, sometime Professor of Mathematics at Cambridge, for his method of finding longitude "by means of a dipping needle" and to enable him to complete his "discover." A letter from Sir James Thornhill, the King's Painter, complains that some improper person had been employed to do the gilding on the wainscot in the Gallery of Kensington Palace, which was, he says, a great encroachment on his office. The keeper of the wild beasts at Kensington in 1727 demanded an increase of pay because the two new tigers were so unruly. Each tiger cost 16*d.* a day to feed, and each civet cat 4*d.*

* Calendar of Treasury Papers, 1720-1728, preserved in Her Majesty's Public Record Office. Prepared by Joseph Redington, Esq., one of the Assistant-Keepers of the Public Records. London: printed for Her Majesty's Stationery Office. 1889.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

WE have, at the due intervals, faithfully chronicled the successive volumes of the Livre d'or du Salon. To these volumes M. Georges Lafenestre has for the last decade contributed criticisms of the year's art in France, which have been singularly free from the usual bias and weaknesses of art criticism; while M. Jouaust has accommodated them with all possible glories of print and paper, and the best etchers of the day have given what reproduction—in black and white and in little—is possible of colour and form. It would, in any case, have been a good idea to sift these siftings yet further at intervals. But the present "Ten Year Book" (1) has this further appositiveness, that the majority of the examples selected for it appear in the Fine Arts section of the Exhibition. M. Lafenestre's introductions figure in full; the catalogue is, of course, limited to the selected examples—three for each year in painting, one in sculpture. Among them (not without confessing to something of the usual feeling of surprise at the flight of time) we notice the "Saison d'Octobre" (Bastien-Lepage) of ten years ago, where the cataloguer, though he means it for praise, is surely unnecessarily violent in calling the types "bestial." This has two blooming companions, not by any means withered, the "Allée abandonnée" (Bernier), and "Laghout" (Guillaumet). Among later examples, M. Bonnat's "Job" does not suit black and white, M. Heilbuth's "Beau temps" has too many of our own Academy prettinesses about it; and we at least did not want to see M. Rochegrosse's butcher's-shop "Andromache" again. But the double art of the Flameng family is excellently illustrated in "Les vainqueurs de la Bastille"; that wicked model which haunts M. Chaplin's imagination is welcome again in the more than ever appropriately named "Souvenirs"; and so are the very different "Communiantes" (Jules Breton), and, in sculpture, M. Paul Dubois's admirable "Connétable Anne de Montmorency," and M. Turcan's "Blind Man and Paralytic." Altogether the collection is an exceedingly interesting one, as representing in a more exact sense than usual the cream of the cream of ten years' art in that country of Europe where, if art is not highest, it is at any rate most practised.

It is amusing to pass from serious to comic art at all times, and seldom can there be a more amusing transition than from the book last mentioned to M. Caran d'Ache's (2) summer album. It is not so elaborate as Les Courses, but it is simply screaming fun. The opening subject, "Chasse au tigre," is like and unlike a charming English fantasy, the history of the lamented Tippoo; but there is only fun here and no pathos. The incidents of the "Fusil-à-répétition" are Struwpeter turned Gallic. We fear—we greatly fear—that "Question et réponse" and "Un drame au désert" are intended to be sarcastic on the great British nation, as the "Mariage d'un jockey" certainly is. But all three are delightful, and the great British nation can afford it. Are there not places where camels ("Question et réponse") and elephants ("Un drame au désert") are bestridden by sons of Albion now and where sons of France would fain bestride them? As for "Highlanders," "Grenadiers," Horse Guards and Life Guards, they also are not unknown to France. "La plus belle conquête de l'homme" is Caran d'Ache in excelesis, and is perhaps, taken all round, the best thing in the book. There are plenty of jokes at "Dumanet" (= Tommy Atkins in his ridiculous stage), including not a few at his weakness for the gentle bonne and hers for him. But these are rather old and "stock." The elaborate Consulate romance of "Le plus heureux des trois," and the still more melodramatic piece of the "Récit du capitaine," are excellent, but more in the nature of illustrations to letterpress. At the same time, the various attitudes of the strait-vested and classically-coifed lady in the first-named are not easily to be paid for. The "Cheval moderne," good as it is, would be better if there were a leettle less of it. Our own favourites (this does not contradict what has been said above) are "Métropolitain Oriental," a wonderful triumph of half a dozen lines, and "Appareil à duel," a perfectly lovely satire. This last is all good, but the gem of it is the doctor with his trousse. For many years he has reigned in the letterpress of French novels; but here he is in the flesh, or as near flesh as outline will allow. His strictly professional air at first; his disgust at the "duel sans issue fatale," and his beaming smile as he turns up his sleeves when the combatants, having calculated imprudently (the appareil is a sort of double swing), meet and skewer each other in mid-air, are all incomparable. But it is hardly possible to go wrong in this delightful volume, and the chief result which we expect from this review is that we shall receive scores of indignant letters accusing us of having left out the best pieces of all (for there are plenty more) out of malice prepense.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE annotated edition of The Legend of Good Women (Oxford: at the Clarendon Press) follows closely upon Professor Skeat's edition of the Minor Poems of Chaucer, gratifies a similar want, and will be not less welcome to students of the poet. Fortunately materials for a good text of the Legend abound, and Dr. Skeat has produced one that is indisputably excellent by collating the best MSS. and giving the two forms of the Prologue on the same page, the more recent in full, the older—the Cambridge MS.—with the omission of some verses that are repeated verbatim in the second. A comparison of the two texts of the Prologue fully establishes the claims of the older to be printed, though it exists only in one MS. The various MSS. of the poem are divided into two classes by Dr. Skeat, and his conclusion, after collation, is that those of the first class have been "practically neglected altogether." And much the same is his judgment of the twenty previous editions of The Legend. Dr. Skeat finds that they are all incomplete; some through imperfect collation of MSS., and some, in addition to this common defect, because they are mainly reprints of older editions. As the immediate precursor of the Canterbury Tales, The Legend of Good Women holds a position of peculiar importance in Chaucer's works. The Prologue, for all its allegorical form, possesses interest in the delightful picture of the poet allured from his books to the observance of May and the praise of the daisy, and in the list of writings he had produced previous to 1385. In this confession of authorship we find the only existing reference to a translation of the treatise De Miseria Conditionis Humane of Pope Innocent III.—

the Wretched Engendring of Mankynde
As man may in pope Innocent y-fynde.

There is also the implied admission that Chaucer had translated the Romaunt of the Rose, though Dr. Skeat refuses to accept the existing translation as his. His comment on the passage is interesting. "Chaucer," he says, "here certainly seems to imply that he translated the whole of the Romaunce of the Rose, or at any rate, that portion of it which is specially directed against women." But Dr. Skeat can admit no more than this natural conclusion. He proceeds to point out that the translation does not contain "such passages as the God of Love would most have objected to," though, later, in the Prologue to the Wyf of Bath's Tale some of them are reproduced. Then again, Dr. Skeat urges that when Chaucer does introduce passages from the Romaunt in his poems, they "usually lie outside" the English translation, and when they do not, Chaucer's wording differs. Thus, in the Book of the Duchess we find:—

And every tree stood by himselve
Fro other wel ten foot or twelve,
So grete trees, so huge of strengthe.

In the Romaunt translation the passage runs:—

Those trees were set, that I devyse,
One from another in assyse,
Five fadom or six, I trowe so,
But they were highe and grete also.

Dr. Skeat makes much of the difference between "ten foot or twelve," and "five fadom or six," the original being cinq toises, ou de sis. But is it inconceivable that the poet should permit himself greater freedom when merely adapting a passage than when expressly engaged on a translation? This, however, is but one among the many interesting points discussed in the seventy pages of notes and the suggestive introductory matter of the present volume. Dr. Skeat's examination of the metre of the Legend—the earliest example of the heroic couplet shaped by a master poet—is searching, and full of instruction. His reconstruction of the text is also invariably sound. Words are restored to truncated lines, either as necessary for scansion or as useful for the sense; and those words occur originally in some or all of the MSS. the editor classes in the first rank. It is obvious, indeed, that until now Chaucer has been terribly "mis-metred" by editors, and The Legend of Good Women has suffered rather more than the other poems in this matter. A good glossary and full indices supply the remaining satisfactory features of Dr. Skeat's excellent work.

Mr. William McCormick's Three Lectures on Literature (Alexander Gardner) treat of "English Literature and University Education," the poetry of Wordsworth and of Mr. Robert Browning. The first is a reply to an article by Professor Freeman, which somewhat roughly handled the claims of literature as a subject of study in the Universities. Mr. McCormick tilts with a light, though rather belated, hand in this encounter, and, it is fair to add, deals Mr. Freeman some shrewd strokes. We sympathize with Mr. McCormick's dislike and distrust of pedantry, whether it be ground small from mills in high places, or blatant in less authoritative quarters. Of the remaining lectures, that on Mr. Browning will better repay the youthful reader. It is encouraging in tone; and this is always a pleasant characteristic with the studious young.

Mr. Robert Marr's Music for the People (Edinburgh: Menzies) includes an interesting sketch of the rise and progress of choral Societies in Scotland, with special reference to the various musical Societies, organists, bands, pipers, and others who performed at the Glasgow Exhibition of 1888. Good music and cheap is undoubtedly a popular demand of the day, and in Scotland it is met with efficiency and in abundance. Every town has its choirs, some of which have been long established and are deservedly celebrated. The Glasgow Choral Union, one of the oldest and most important, has long exercised a highly beneficial influence as an excellent model for the many aspiring musical Societies that have sprung into existence recently in all parts of the country. Mr. Marr's review of the subject shows that music is in a very thriving condition in Scotland.

Poems, by "Antæus" (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.), is the

(1) Dix années du Salon de peinture et de sculpture, 1879-1888. Paris: Librairie des Bibliophiles.

(2) Album Caran d'Ache. Paris: Plon.

merest booklet of verse, yet not altogether without individuality. It is made up of a drama that is little but a sketch for a play, and of songs that have on occasion a spritely daring all their own. In "Spring" and "Egoism," two little trills of song, there is something of the promise that justifies the poet's farewell to the reader:—

The winter chaffinch and this little book
Record the promise of a singing age.
Scorn not the weakest bird-note. Rather look
For summer song, long light, and a fuller page.

"Antæus" may well have something more considerable in reserve.

Mr. Montgomery's Leading Facts of French History (Boston: Ginn) possesses decided advantages, as an elementary school-book, in the arrangement of the historical material, the useful maps, and the appendix of genealogical tables. Less happy is the attempt to give phonetic equivalents to French names. Boys and girls are not advanced by being instructed that Poitiers is "almost Pwi'-te-a," Saint Pierre (San Pee-ar'), Jacques Bonhomme (Zhak-Bon-om'), and so forth.

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,766, AUGUST 31, 1889:

The Strike. Armenian Atrocities.
The Future of Parties. Sauce for the Gander.
The Queen in Wales. Hayti. The Indian Budget.
The Last of the Naval Manœuvres.
Lord Addington. The Revolver at Home and Abroad.
Technical Obstruction. The Latest Mare's-Nest.

The Session.
Grouse-Hawking. The National Artillery Association.
The Rise in the Bank Rate.
Musketry Instruction in India. Among the Dust of Empires.
An Ill-advised Governor.

A Revived Poet. Novels.
Professor Thorold Rogers's Lectures on Economic History.
Law Books. Words on Wellington.
William Hazlitt. Sicot. Wines in English Cellars.
Pallas's Sand-Grouse in Scotland. Fallow and Fodder Crops.
Way's Iliad (XIII.-XXIV.) Six New Songs.
Some More Guide-Books. Calendar of Treasury Papers—1720-1728.
French Literature. New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—GRAND FIREWORK DISPLAY,
by Messrs. C. T. Brock & Co., every Thursday. Immense changing Combination Device: Fountains which spring into life and Flowers that grow and blossom. Brock's Living Fireworks and other novelties.—Admission daily, One Shilling.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A., Clare College, Camb.
One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates).
The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, fackshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.
The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks.
Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.
For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.
Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A., Heidelberg.
A. B. CATTY, M.A., Christ's Coll., Camb.
WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.

At the recent Exam. for the I.C.S. a Pupil of Heidelberg College obtained THE HIGHEST MARKS IN GERMAN OF all the Candidates.

SANDHURST FURTHER EXAM., August 1889.
Alexander R. C. Rew..... 7539.

Mr. CATTY in London, 5 Riversdale Road, Twickenham, Middlesex.

ROYAL VETERINARY COLLEGE,

Incorporated by Royal Charter.

WINTER SESSION, 1889-90.

The WINTER SESSIONAL COURSE of INSTRUCTION will commence on Tuesday, October 1. The Chair will be taken by Colonel Sir NIGEL KINGSFOTE, K.C.B., and the INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS delivered by Dr. GERALD YEO, of King's College, at One P.M.

Lectures, Clinical and Pathological Demonstrations, and General Instruction are given on the Pathology and Diseases of the Horse and other Domestic Animals, including Epizootics, Parasites, and Parasitic Affections; also on Anatomy, Physiology, Histology, Chemistry (General and Practical), Materia Medica, Toxicology, Botany, Therapeutics, and Pharmacy, Hospital Practice, Obstetrics, Operative Surgery, the Principles and Practice of Shoeing, &c.

Students are required to attend Three Complete Sessional Courses of Instruction before being eligible for examination for the Diploma of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons. The College Entrance Fee of Forty-five Guineas, payable as a whole or in the following proportions: Twenty-five Guineas on entry, Ten Guineas at the end of the first period of Study, and Ten Guineas at the end of the second period of Study, confers the right of attendance on all the Lectures and Collegiate Instruction during the prescribed Terms of Study.

The Matriculation Examination will be held at the ROYAL VETERINARY COLLEGE, CAMDEN TOWN, N.W., on Wednesday and Thursday, September 25 and 26, at Ten A.M. Candidates must attend on Tuesday, 24th, for the purpose of paying the fees.

A Scholarship of £25 per annum, tenable for two years, dating from October 1889, will be awarded at the close of the Summer Term of 1890; and an additional Scholarship of the same amount in each succeeding year.

Medals and Certificates of Merit are awarded in addition to the Coleman Prize Medals and Certificates.

Class Prizes are given in each division of the Student's studies. Certificates of Distinction are likewise conferred on Students who pass a superior examination for the Diploma of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons.

A Prospectus containing the Rules and Regulations of the College, and copies of the Matriculation Examination Papers set last Session, will be forwarded on application to the Secretary.

August 1889.

RICHARD A. N. POWYS,
Secretary.

THE MASON COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.

SESSION 1889-90.

FACULTIES OF ARTS AND SCIENCE.

The NEXT SESSION COMMENCES on Tuesday, October 1, 1889.

A Syllabus, containing full information as to the various Courses of Instruction, lecture days, and hours, fees, scholarships, &c., is published by Messrs. CORNISH, New Street, Birmingham, price 6d.; by post, 7½d.

Further particulars may be obtained on application to the SECRETARY, at the College.

GEO. H. MORLEY, Secretary.

TUDOR HALL COLLEGE (for Ladies), Forest Hill,

Sydenham, S.E. Established over Thirty Years.—Principals: Mrs. TODD and Rev. J. W. TODD, D.D. Head-Mistress: Miss TODD (Girton), Cambridge. Professors: Seeley, Churton Collins, Garcia, Diehl, Loman, Dulcken, Larpent, &c.—Gymnasium, Tennis-courts, Swimming, riding. Full particulars, Photo of Coll., &c., on application.

THE LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1.

The Hospital, which is the largest general Hospital in the kingdom, contains nearly 800 beds, all in constant use. There are wards for Accidents, Surgical, and Medical cases, Diseases of Women and Children, and Ophthalmic cases. Special departments for Diseases of the Eye, Ear, Throat, Skin and Teeth, and for Cancer, Tumours, Diseases of the Bladder, Piles, and Fistula. Number of in-patients last year, 8,873; out-patients, 101,518; accidents, 7,456. Surgical operations daily.

APPOINTMENTS—Resident Accoucheur, House Physicians, House Surgeons. Forty of these appointments are made annually. Numerous Dressers, Clinical Clerks, Post-mortem Clerks, and Maternity Assistants are appointed every three months. All appointments are free. Holders of resident appointments are also provided free board. The New College Buildings are now complete, and afford more than double the former accommodation.

Two Entrance Science Scholarships, value £50 and £10, and two Buxton Scholarships, value £30 and £20, will be offered for competition at the end of September to new Students. Sixteen other Scholarships and Prizes are given annually.

Luncheons or dinners, at moderate charges, can be obtained at the Students' Club.

The London Hospital is now in direct communication with all parts of the Metropolis. The Metropolitan, District, and other Railways have stations within a minute's walk of the Hospital and College.

For further information apply personally, or by letter, to

Mile End, E. MUNRO SCOTT, Warden.

WOLVERHAMPTON GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

The HEAD-MASTERSHIP will become VACANT at Christmas next by the retirement of THOMAS BEACH, Esq.

It is provided by the scheme that the Head-Master shall be a Graduate of some University within the British Empire and not necessarily in Holy Orders.

His emolument will be derived from three sources.

(1). A Fixed Stipend of £200 a year.

(2). Capitation Fees at the rate of £3 a year for each boy in the senior department, and £1 a year in the junior department.

(3). From Boarders. The school buildings provide a house for the Head-Master, in which he will be required to reside, and accommodation, including fitting and furniture, is also provided in the house for thirty boarders or thereabouts.

There are three Exhibitions of £50 a year from the school to the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, each tenable for three years. The school has been highly successful for many years past.

Candidates for the appointment are invited to send their applications, with testimonials, to Messrs. NEVE & CRESSWELL, Solicitors, Wolverhampton, on or before the 17th day of September next.

The Election will be made on the 1st day of October next.

The Head-Master will be required to enter upon his duties at the close of the Christmas holidays.

It is particularly requested that no personal application be made to the Governors.

All letters may be addressed to the above-mentioned Clerks, marked W. G. S., from whom Copies of the Scheme for the Management of the School may be obtained for seven stamps.

ST. GEORGE'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL,

HYDE PARK CORNER, S.W.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1, with an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS by Dr. T. CLIFFORD ALLBUTT, F.R.S., at 4 P.M.

A Prospectus of the School, and further information, may be obtained by personal application between One and Three P.M., or by letter addressed to the DEAN at the Hospital.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-

Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils.—41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-

Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near

TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR.

BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

FARM PUPILS.—GENTLEMEN are received on the FARM

of the AYLESBURY DAIRY COMPANY, Limited, Horsham, Sussex. 1,400 acres arable and pasture; 400 head of cattle.—For terms and particulars apply to the SECRETARY, Aylesbury Dairy Company, in London, St. Petersburg Place, Bayswater, or Horsham, Sussex.

PREPARATIONS for ENTRANCE and SCHOLARSHIPS at PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—A few VACANCIES for next Term.—Apply to HEAD-MASTER, care of A. & A. W. Brown, 4 Little George Street, Westminster, S.W.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The

COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.

ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

SUN LIFE OFFICE.

EXTRACTS FROM THE SOCIETY'S PROSPECTUS.

Dealing with all the most IMPORTANT POINTS necessary to be considered by Life Insurers.

- (1.) The AGE. This Society was ESTABLISHED in the year 1810.
- (2.) The FUNDS of the Society are AMPLE and WELL INVESTED.
- (3.) The ULTIMATE COST of Assurance in the "SUN."

The Bonus declared in January 1888 proves that a WITH PROFIT Policy, under Table A, opened with the Sun Life Office can be had at considerably LESS THAN COST PRICE—that is, can be eventually obtained for less than the UNLOADED NET PREMIUM.

- (4.) The LIBERALITY of the "SUN'S" CONTRACT and PRACTICAL FACILITIES for DEALING with its Policies.
- (5.) ECONOMY of Management in the "SUN."

EXTRAVAGANT and INJUDICIOUS Expenditure can NEVER produce LARGE BONUS Results to Policy-Holders; hence it is of the FIRST IMPORTANCE that ECONOMICS should be understood and practised.

The Expense Ratio on RENEWAL Premiums, after making due allowance for the large amount of new business transacted, was during the last financial year less than FOUR PER CENTUM of the Premiums.

- (6.) The BASIS of Valuation in the "SUN."

The Valuation, June 24, 1887, was made by the CARLISLE Table of Mortality, on the Basis of which the Premiums charged have long been calculated; a low rate of Interest has been assumed, viz., 3 PER CENT., and the NET PREMIUMS have only been dealt with, thus leaving FUTURE PROFITS entirely UNANTICIPATED.

- (7.) The TEST of Stability.

The Sun Life Assurance Society on the 24th June, 1887, had—(a) Over TWELVE Years' Premium Income in Hand; (b) Over £36 Cash invested against every £100 assured.

- (8.) The DISTRIBUTION of PROFITS in the "SUN."

Bonuses have been regularly declared since 1843, amounting in the aggregate to £1,857,452, and at the last Division, which was exceptionally large, £192,706 was apportioned, and resulted in an average

CASH RETURN OF £36 IN EVERY £100 PAID IN PREMIUMS.

Apply for the Society's Prospectus, at the CHIEF OFFICE, Threadneedle Street, London, E.C.

JOHN G. PRIESTLEY } Joint
HARRIS C. L. SAUNDERS } Actuaries.

SCHWEITZER'S COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all Climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

VAN
HOUTEN'S
COCOA.

PURE—SOLUBLE.
BEST & GOES FARTHEST.
EASILY DIGESTED.
MADE INSTANTLY.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."
Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."
British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

This pure Solution is the best remedy
for Acidity of the Stomach, Heartburn,
Headache, Gout, and Indigestion.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA.

The safest and most gentle Aperient
for delicate constitutions, Ladies,
Children, and Infants.

180 Bond Street, London; and all Chemists.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.
Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS'
UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES.
Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.

Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.
ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,

Established 1836.
LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
INCOME and FUNDS (1888).

Fire Premiums	£615,000
Life Premiums	203,000
Interest	149,000
Accumulated Funds	£2,581,000

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE, LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.

Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.
Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.
W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
F. B. MACDONALD }
Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.
Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.
E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.
THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.
FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK. ISSUE of £371,320.

(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)
The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.
Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.

Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & Co., 67 Lombard Street.

No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.
Under the Trust Investment Act, 1889, recently passed, this Stock is an available investment for every Trustee who is not expressly forbidden by the instrument creating his trust to invest in Corporation Stock.

Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by Borough Accountant's Office, Bridge Street, Sheffield, W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.
August 16, 1889.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR
by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal Claim to the Public Confidence.

FRY'S

J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."

PURE CONCENTRATED

E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure
Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that
I have ordered it for family use."

COCOA.

AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

Dr. PAGET,
SURGEON-DENTIST,
445 STRAND, W.C.
(Facing Charing Cross Station.)

ARTIFICIAL TEETH,
without plates. Perfect imitations of the natural teeth. Artistic, painless, and perfect. Most moderate fees. Consultations free daily.
Illustrated pamphlet post free.

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES,
Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous
Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESSE' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY.
Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESSE, Consulting Medical Electrician
(President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 52 Oxford Street, London,
W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

P. and O. MAIL STEAMERS FROM LONDON TO BOMBAY, GIBRALTAR, MALTA, BRINDISI,
EGYPT, ADEN, and MADRAS via BOMBAY every week.
CALCUTTA, MADRAS, COLOMBO, CHINA, STRAITS,
and JAPAN, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND and TAS-
MANIA, and ALEXANDRIA every alternate week.

CHEAP RETURN TICKETS.

For particulars apply at the Company's Offices, 122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 25 Cockspur Street, London, S.W.

BOOKS, &c.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates
per annum, paid in advance:

Any part of the United Kingdom	£1	8	2
India and China	1	12	6
Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America	1	10	6

STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.;
241 BROMPTON ROAD, SOUTH KENSINGTON, S.W.;
AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

FOR THE CIRCULATION OF BOOKS.

SUBSCRIPTION from £1 1s. per annum.

Prospectuses and Monthly Lists Gratis.

FOR THE SALE OF BOOKS.

Second-hand Copies of all the best Books of past Seasons,
at greatly Reduced Prices.

Lists with Prices Gratis.

FOR THE BINDING OF BOOKS.

On the Premises by the best Workmen.
List of Bound Books Gratis.

N.B.—All Lists and Prospectuses Gratis and
Postage Free to any Address.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

SEPTEMBER. 2s. 6d.

ITALY DRIFTING. By the MARCHESE ALFIERI DI SOSTEGNO.
DISEASES CAUGHT FROM BUTCHER'S MEAT. By Dr. BEHREND, M.R.C.P.
CRITICISM AS A TRADE. By Professor KNIGHT.
DAS I. GARDE-DRAGONER-REGIMENT. By Col. LONSDALE HALE.
WORDSWORTH'S GREAT FAILURE. By Professor MINTO.
A FEW WORDS TO FRESH WORKERS. By Miss OCTAVIA HILL.
WHAT NEXT IN EGYPT? By EDWARD DICEY, C.B.
IN SEARCH OF A RELIGION. By W. S. LILLY.
THE NEW LIBERALISM: A RESPONSE. By GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.
THE GRIEVANCES OF HIGH CHURCHMEN. By the Rev. Canon PERRY.
AN EIGHT-HOUR LAW. By H. H. CHAMPION.
PARLIAMENTARY MISRULE OF OUR WAR SERVICES. By H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW

For SEPTEMBER.

Edited by FRANK HARRIS.

PARALLELS TO IRISH HOME RULE. By E. A. FREEMAN.
BELGIAN NEUTRALITY. With Map.
WHAT ENGLISH PEOPLE READ. By W. M. GATTIE.
THE CASE AGAINST CAPITAL PUNISHMENT. By B. PAUL NEUMAN.
THE COMING ELECTIONS IN FRANCE. By LADY DILKE.
COLERIDGE AS A POET. By Professor E. DOWDEN.
DRY-NURSING THE COLONIES. By Miss F. L. SHAW.
OUR NATIONAL PASTIME. By WILLIAM DAY.
A FORTNIGHT IN BOSNIA. By A. HULME-BEAMAN.
RUSSIAN CHARACTERISTICS. Part I. LYING. By E. B. LANIN.
CORRESPONDENCE:—
Sir Charles Dilke on the Bombay Army. By Vieux Moustache and the Right Hon
Sir C. Dilke, Bart.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

ILLUSTRATED, PRICE ONE SHILLING.

THE

NEWBERRY HOUSE MAGAZINE.

A Monthly Review and Family Magazine for Churchmen and Churchwomen.

CONTENTS FOR SEPTEMBER.

By Professor SAYCE, M.A., LL.D.—LETTERS FROM PALESTINE BEFORE THE AGE OF MOSES.
By the Rev. H. G. DICKSON, M.A.—THE DUTY OF ENGLAND TO WALES AND HERSELF.
By HOMERSHAM COX, Esq.—THE PUBLIC WORSHIP ACT AND ITS RESULTS.
By the Rev. CANON BENHAM.—SHUT UP IN HIS OWN PRISON. A Story.
By ESMÉ SMART.—AN AUTOGRAPH BOOK.
By Professor A. VAMBERY.—DERVISHES. Personal Recollections.
By the Rev. T. S. LEA.—AN ISLE OF THE SEA.
By Miss WORDSWORTH.—WOMEN AND SUNDAYS.
By the Rev. S. BARING GOULD, M.A.—RECENT DISCOVERIES IN CHRISTIAN
ARCHÆOLOGY IN ROME. Part I. (Continued.)
By an "Old Crug."—CHRIST'S HOSPITAL FIFTY YEARS AGO. II. Reminiscences
Domestic and Religious. (Illustrated.)
By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY and H. HERMAN.—THE BISHOP'S BIBLE.
By HELEN MILMAN.—"BOY." A Story for the Young. Continued. (Illustrated.)
CONFERENCES ON CHURCH QUESTIONS—NOTES ON THE PSALMS—SERMON OUTLINES—INSTRUCTIONS ON THE CREED—SEQUENCE FOR S.
MICHAEL'S—CALENDAR—ILLUSTRATED TEXT—BIBLICAL QUESTIONS—
CURRENT EVENTS—FORTHCOMING MEETINGS—CORRESPONDENCE—
REVIEWS.

GRIFFITH, FARRAN, OKEDEN, & WELSH, NEWBERRY HOUSE, LONDON.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

SEPTEMBER. 2s. 6d.

THE WORK OF THE SESSION. By C. A. WHITMORE, M.P.
THE ORIGIN OF MODERN OCCULTISM. By F. LEGGE.
THE RURAL RHYMES OF TUSCANY. By PAUL SYLVESTER.
SECULAR AND HONORARY DEACONS. By Dr. A. J. H. CRESPI.
ORCHIDS AND HYBRIDIZING. By F. BOYLE.
WORDSWORTH AND THE QUANTOCK HILLS. By W. GRESWELL.
A TORY PLEA FOR THE RIGHTS OF MAN. By W. EARL HODGSON.
COW-KEEPING BY FARM-LABOURERS. By H. EVERSHED.
THE AGE OF REASON. By H. G. KEENE.
POLITICS AT HOME AND ABROAD.
CORRESPONDENCE.

LONDON: W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from
Mr. B. BRASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London; or Hall Green (near Birmingham).

Ready immediately at all the Libraries, crown 8vo. handsomely bound, 6s.

THE AUTHORISED TRANSLATION OF

"Souvenirs intimes de la Cour des Tuileries."

MY MISTRESS, the EMPRESS EUGÉNIE;

Or, Court Life at the Tuileries.

By her Private Reader, Madame CARETTE (née BOUVET).

"We recommend everyone who admires good work to buy and read it."—Morning Post.
LONDON: DEAN & SON, 150A FLEET STREET, E.C.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.

A MONTHLY CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.

Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.

136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

Fep. 8vo. price 1s. post-free.

THE SCHOOLMASTER'S CALENDAR: Handbook of
Examinations and Open Scholarships for 1889. Third Year of Issue.
London: GEORGE BELL & SONS, 4 York Street, Covent Garden.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 887. SEPTEMBER 1889. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

LEPERS AT THE CAPE: WANTED A FATHER DAMIEN.
 MARIE BASHKIRTSEFF: A HUMAN DOCUMENT. By HELEN ZIMMERN.
 A RIDE WITH A "HIGHFLYER." With Profile of Midland Railway between St. Pancras and Nottingham.
 TO THE EMPRESS FREDERICK. By the DUCHESS OF RUTLAND.
 MY FIRST VISIT TO ZIMMÉ. By HOLT S. HALLETT.
 LADY BABY. Chaps. XXX.-XXXII.
 A GLIMPSE INTO A JESUIT NOVITIATE. By M. H. DZIEWICKI.
 RECENT CONVERSATIONS IN A STUDIO. By W. W. STORY.
 POESIES FROM ABROAD. By the Hon. FLORENCE HENNIKER.
 THE BRITISH SETTLEMENT AT CAPE JUBY, NORTH-WEST AFRICA.
 By DONALD MACKENZIE.
 LOST—A HEART. By A. WERNER.
 THE SESSION.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

Price One Shilling.

TALES FROM "BLACKWOOD."

THIRD SERIES.—No. IV.

CONTENTS: MY TREASURE. By ANNETTE LYSER—WHO WERE THEY?
 a Maltese Apparition. By the Marquess of LORNE—WITHIN HIS DANGER: a Tale from the Chinese. By ROBERT K. DOUGLAS—THE FACTOR'S SHOOTING.
 By GILFRAID W. HARTLEY—A MAGNETIC MYSTERY. By Major-General W. G.
 HAMLEY.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

SEPTEMBER 1889.]

Now ready, No. IV.

[Price SIXPENCE.

THE NEW REVIEW.

Edited by ARCHIBALD GROVE.

CONTENTS:

THE ARMENIAN QUESTION..... By M. SEVASLY (Editor of the Havasdan).
 A CENTURY OF FRENCH ART AT THE PARIS
 EXHIBITION By CLAUDE PHILLIPS.
 THE PROGRESS OF CO-OPERATION.
 I. IN ENGLAND.... By GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE
 II. IN FRANCE..... By M. MILLERAND (Member of the French Chamber).
 PITT AND TALLEYRAND IN 1792..... By the Baroness BLAZE
 DE BURY.
 THE DYING DRAMA..... By WILLIAM ARCHER.
 THE FRENCH ELECTIONS..... By JOSEPH REINACH (Editor of La République Française).
 THOMSON'S TRAVELS IN MOROCCO..... By EDWARD CLODD.
 WRESTLING IN JAPAN By the Hon. GEORGE N.
 CURZON, M.P.

LONDON: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

Now ready, price Sixpence.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE. No. 83.—SEPTEMBER.

CONTENTS:

THE BELL OF ST. PAUL'S. Part II. Chaps. 19-22. By WALTER BESANT.
 TROPICAL EDUCATION By GRANT ALLEN.
 THE ROUT OF THE ROOKS By NINA F. LAYARD.
 TAUTOGA AMERICANA By EDWARD M. CHAPMAN.
 A SURPRISE PARTY By Mrs. ALFRED W. HUNT.
 AT THE RIVERSIDE By Rev. M. G. WATKINS, M.A.
 MRS. FENTON: a Sketch. Chaps. 4-6 By W. E. NORRIS.
 AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP By ANDREW LANG.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & Co.

Monthly, price Sixpence.

KNOWLEDGE.—An Illustrated Magazine of Science,

SEPTEMBER.

ON TORNADOES. Illustrated. By A. C. RANYARD.
 THE COMMON COCKROACH. By E. A. BUTLER.
 THE ORIGIN AND MOTIONS OF COMETS. By W. H. S. MONCK.
 LIGHTNING RODS. By R. CAUPER DAY.
 HARMLESS PARASITES. By H. J. SLACK.
 THE PRODUCTION OF SUGAR. By WARD COLDRIDGE.
 GROWTH AND DECAY OF MIND. By the late R. A. PROCTOR.
 CHESS, WHIST, REVIEWS, &c

London: W. H. ALLEN & Co., 13 Waterloo Place.

Monthly, 2s. 6d.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.

CONTENTS FOR SEPTEMBER.

ENGLAND AND AFRICA:
 1. CAN WE DESERT EGYPT?
 2. THE FIGHT WITH SLAVE TRADERS ON NYASSA. By Captain F. D.
 LUGARD.
 3. SOUTH AFRICA AND THE ABORIGINES PROTECTION SOCIETY. By H. R. FOX BOURNE.
 THE CANDOUR OF MR. GLADSTONE. By T. P. O'CONNOR, M.P.
 "THE NETHER WORLD." By Archdeacon FARRAR.
 SICILIAN TRAVEL, 1878-1889. By EDWARD A. FREEMAN, D.C.L.
 SCIENCE IN SONG. By LENNOX BROWNE.
 TRADES' UNION CONGRESSES AND SOCIAL LEGISLATION. By GEORGE
 HOWELL, M.P.
 THE DEATH OF COPERNICUS. By AUBREY DE VERE.
 MID-AGE. By MICHAEL FIELD.
 THE POSITION OF WOMEN AMONG THE EARLY CHRISTIANS. By Principal DONALDSON, LL.D.
 CHRISTIANS AND KURDS IN EASTERN TURKEY. By ATHELSTAN RILEY.

ISBISTER & CO., LIMITED, 15 & 16 TAVISTOCK STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON'S LIST.

Now ready, price 1s.

THE TEMPLE BAR MAGAZINE.

CONTENTS FOR SEPTEMBER, 1889:

1. SIR CHARLES DANVERS. By the Author of "The Danvers Jewels." Chaps. 17-20.
2. AMBITION.
3. THE COURT OF VIENNA IN THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.
4. THE SAILOR'S DANCE.
5. A FEW MUSICAL NOTES.
6. THE WATCHERS.
7. ACHILLE.
8. IN CAREW CASTLE.
9. ARMINELL. By the Author of "John Herring." Chaps. 36-40.
10. CHARLES WHITEHEAD.
11. THE CHURCH OF SAN SERVIN AT TOULOUSE DURING PENTE-COST.
12. PAUL'S SISTER. By the Author of "Near Neighbours." Chaps. 22-24.

NOW READY.

AN IRISH COUSIN. By GEILLES HERRING
and MARTIN ROSS. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "WORTH WAITING FOR."

"This novel is one of the best of the season."—Athenæum.

THE SCOTTS of BESTMINSTER. By

J. MASTERMAN, Author of "A Fatal Error" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "Mlle. DE MERSAC."

MISS SHAFTO. By W. E. NORRIS, Author of
"The Rogue" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "COUNTESS IRENE."

ROBERT LEEMAN'S DAUGHTERS. By

J. FOGERTY, Author of "Lauterdale," "Caterina," &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

A NEW EDITION, in 1 vol. crown 8vo. scarlet cloth, 3s. 6d.

DENE HOLLOW. By Mrs. HENRY WOOD.

Forming the Twentieth Volume of the New Serial Issue of Mrs. Wood's Novels, now in course of publication. Each Volume appears at monthly intervals.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

Just ready, the FIFTH VOLUME of

THE MINERVA LIBRARY

OF FAMOUS BOOKS.

A new series of Books of unquestioned value and popularity,

Edited by G. T. BETTANY, M.A.

Each Volume consists of 400 or more pages, with Biographical Introduction or Critical and Explanatory Notes, and Full-page Illustrations, and is issued neatly and strongly bound in cloth, at the low price of 2s.VOLUME V. of the MINERVA LIBRARY, just ready, strongly bound in cloth, price 2s. consists ofGALTON'S SOUTH AFRICA. The Narrative of an Explorer in Tropical Africa: being an Account of a Visit to Damara Land in 1855.
Containing also VACATION TOURS in 1860 and 1861.

Already published in the MINERVA LIBRARY, price 2s. each:

1. CHARLES DARWIN'S JOURNAL DURING A VOYAGE IN H.M.S.
BEAGLE. (Fifth Edition.)
2. THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS. (Second Edition.)
3. BORROW'S BIBLE IN SPAIN.
4. EMERSON'S COMPLETE PROSE WORKS.

"Lovers of good literature and cheap may be commended to the 'Minerva Library.'"
 "Neatly bound, well illustrated, and nicely printed."—Graphic.
 "Will be hailed with delight, we are sure, by all readers."—Weekly Times.

LONDON: WARD, LOCK, & CO., SALISBURY SQUARE, E.C.

Just published.

ECONOMICAL, DAINTY, and PRACTICAL
DISHES,

With the use of LIEBIG "COMPANY'S" EXTRACT OF MEAT.

Compiled by EMILY CORFE.

London: LIEBIG'S EXTRACT OF MEAT COMPANY, Limited, 9 Fenchurch Avenue, E.C.
Post free on application.PARIS EXHIBITION.—The FRENCH DICTIONARY
for TOURISTS—BELLOWS' POCKET FRENCH DICTIONARY. 32mo.
with 4 Maps, roan tuck, 10s. 6d.; morocco, 12s. 6d."Complete."—Times. "Without a rival."—Spectator. "The most portable."
Also Scotsman.TOUS les VERBES.—CONJUGATIONS of all the VERBS,
French and English, with Tables of Weights, Measures, and Equivalent
Values, from Bellows' Dictionary. Second Edition. 32mo. 6d.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

PARIS: ERNEST LEROUX, 28 RUE BONAPARTE.

AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

NEW MILITARY NOVEL.

Now ready, 1 vol. crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

ONE of the ROYAL CELTS. By the DAN WYNNE.

London: SPENCER BLACKETT & HALLAM, 35 St. Bride Street.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

CLARENDON PRESS NEW AND STANDARD BOOKS.

NEW BOOKS.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.
A GRAMMAR of the RUSSIAN LANGUAGE. By W. R. MORFILL, M.A., Oriel College, Oxford. With Reading Lessons.
 * * * The Author's object has been to give a concise and clear analysis of the word-forms and syntax of the Russian language.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.
TERTULLIANI APOLOGETICUS ADVERSUS GENTES PRO CHRISTIANIS. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. H. BINDLEY, M.A., Merton College, Oxford.
 * * * An endeavour to meet the wants of young theological students.

Just published, extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
SCOTT'S MARMION. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by THOS. BAYNE.
 * * * Uniform with Professor Minto's Edition of "The Lay of the Last Minstrel."
COMPLETION OF WATSON AND BURBURY'S "ELECTRICITY AND MAGNETISM."

Just published, 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.
THE MATHEMATICAL THEORY of ELECTRICITY and MAGNETISM. By H. W. WATSON, D.Sc., F.R.S., formerly Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and S. H. BURBURY, M.A., formerly Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. Vol. II. MAGNETISM and ELECTRODYNAMICS.
 * * * Vol. I. ELECTROSTATICS, 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d. still on sale.

Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.
CÆSAR.—DE BELLO GALLICO. BOOKS III.—V. (For Schools.) With Notes and Maps. By CHARLES E. MOBERLY, M.A., late Assistant Master at Rugby School.
 "Stands high among the best classics we have met."—Saturday Review.

Just published, extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.
EURIPIDES.—HECUBA. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by CECIL H. RUSSELL, M.A., Assistant Master at Clifton College, late Scholar of Trinity College, Oxford.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.
CHAUCER.—The LEGEND of GOOD WOMEN. Edited by Rev. W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D., Professor of Anglo-Saxon, Cambridge, Editor of "An Etymological English Dictionary," "Piers the Plowman," &c.
 * * * A Companion Volume to Chaucer's Minor Poems, by the same Editor.

A VOLUME OF SELECTIONS FROM CLARENDON.
 Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d.
CHARACTERS and EPISODES of the GREAT REBELLION. Selected from the History and Autobiography of Edward, Earl of Clarendon, and Edited, with Short Notes, by the Very Rev. G. D. BOYLE, M.A., Dean of Salisbury.
 * * * Uniform with the "Wit and Wisdom of Dr. Johnson," by Dr. G. Burkebeck Hill.

NEW WORK BY PROFESSOR NETTLESHIP.
 Just published, 8vo. cloth, 2s.
CONTRIBUTIONS to LATIN LEXICOGRAPHY. By HENRY NETTLESHIP, M.A., Professor of Latin in the University of Oxford.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED.
 Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.
A SHORT HISTORY of FRENCH LITERATURE. By GEORGE SAINTSBURY, M.A.
 "It is in many ways a masterpiece."—Athenæum.

ENGLISH CLASS-BOOKS.

Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth.

AN ELEMENTARY ENGLISH GRAMMAR and EXERCISE BOOK. By O. W. TANCOCK, M.A., Head Master of Norwich School. Second Edition. price 1s. 6d.

AN ENGLISH GRAMMAR and READING BOOK, for Lower Forms in Classical Schools. By O. W. TANCOCK, M.A., Head Master of Norwich School. Third Edition. 3s. 6d.

THE PHILOLOGY of the ENGLISH TONGUE. By J. EARLE, M.A., formerly Fellow of Oriel College, and Professor of Anglo-Saxon, Oxford. Fourth Edition. 7s. 6d.
 "This admirable and authoritative work..... A manifesto of the soundest English scholarship."—Notes and Queries.

CONCISE ETYMOLOGICAL DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE. By W. W. SKEAT, M.A., Litt.D., Professor of Anglo-Saxon, Cambridge. Editor of "The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman" &c. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s. 6d.
 "Mr. Skeat's larger dictionary has established his title to the gratitude of all scholars; and of his smaller dictionary we can only say that it is not less useful and valuable."—Saturday Review.

PRINCIPLES of ENGLISH ETYMOLOGY. FIRST SERIES. THE NATIVE ELEMENT. By W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Crown 8vo. 9s.
 "On the whole the best guide to English etymology that has yet appeared."—Academy.

SPECIMENS of EARLY ENGLISH.
 A New and Revised Edition. With Introduction, Notes, and Glossarial Index. By R. MORRIS, LL.D., and W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D.
 Part I. From OLD ENGLISH HOMILIES to KING HORN (A.D. 1150 to A.D. 1300). Second Edition, carefully Revised. 9s.
 Part II. From ROBERT OF GLOUCESTER to GOWER (A.D. 1298—A.D. 1393). Third Edition. Price 7s. 6d.

SPECIMENS of ENGLISH LITERATURE from the "Ploughman's Crede" to the "Shepherd's Calendar" (A.D. 1394 to A.D. 1579). With Introduction, Notes, and Glossarial Index. By W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. 7s. 6d.

THE VISION of WILLIAM concerning PIERS the PLOWMAN. By WILLIAM LANGLAND. Edited, with Notes, by W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Fourth Edition. 4s. 6d.

CHAUCER.—The PROLOGUE to the Canterbury Tales; The Knights Tale; The Nonne Prestes Tale. Edited by R. MORRIS, Editor of "Specimens of Early English" &c. Sixth Edition. 2s. 6d.
 "It would hardly be possible to find any pieces of English literature edited at any time more thoroughly for the help of students than these selections."—Prof. HENRY MORLEY.

CHAUCER.—The PRIORESSES Tale; Sir Thopas; The Monkes Tale; The Clerkes Tale; The Squires Tale, &c. Edited by W. W. SKEAT, Litt.D. Third Edition. 4s. 6d.

CHAUCER.—The TALE of the Man of Lawe; The Pardoner's Tale; The Second Nonnes Tale; The Chanouns Yemannes Tale. By the Same. New Edition. 4s. 6d.

GAMELYN, the TALE of. Edited, with Notes, Glossary, &c. By the Same. Stiff covers, 1s. 6d.

POEMS of LAWRENCE MINOT. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by JOSEPH HALL, M.A. 4s. 6d.
 "Far exceeds all its predecessors in value. The book on the whole is one of unusual excellence."—Academy.

SPENSER'S FAERY QUEENE. BOOKS I. and II. Designed chiefly for the Use of Schools. With Introduction and Notes by G. W. KITCHIN, D.D., and Glossary by A. L. MAYHEW, M.A. Each 2s. 6d.

BACON.—ADVANCEMENT of LEARNING. Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A. Third Edition. 4s. 6d.

SHAKESPEARE.—SELECT PLAYS. Edited by W. G. CLARK, M.A., and W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A. Stiff covers.

The Merchant of Venice, 1s. Hamlet, 2s.
 Richard the Second, 1s. 6d. Macbeth, 1s. 6d.
 — Edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A.
 The Tempest, 1s. 6d. As You Like It, 1s. 6d.
 Julius Caesar, 2s. Richard the Third, 2s. 6d.
 King Lear, 1s. 6d. A Midsummer Night's Dream, 1s. 6d.
 Coriolanus, 2s. 6d. Henry the Fifth, 2s.
 Twelfth Night, 1s. 6d. King John, 1s. 6d.

MILTON.—AREOPAGITICA. With Introduction and Notes. By JOHN W. HALES, M.A. 3s.

MILTON.—POEMS. Edited by R. C. BROWNE, M.A. 2 vols. Fifth Edition. 6s. 6d.
 Separately, Vol. I. 4s.; Vol. II. 3s.

MILTON.—PARADISE LOST. BOOK I. Edited by the Rev. H. C. BEECHING, M.A. Stiff covers, 1s. 6d.; parchment, 3s. 6d.

MILTON.—SAMSON AGONISTES. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by J. CHURTON COLLINS, B.A. Stiff covers, 1s.

CLARENDON'S HISTORY of the REBELLION. BOOK VI. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by T. ARNOLD, M.A. 4s. 6d.
 "The editor has done his work thoroughly."—Schoolmaster.

DRYDEN.—SELECT POEMS. Stanzas on the Death of Oliver Cromwell; Astraea Redux; Annus Mirabilis; Absalom and Achitophel; Religio Laici; The Hind and the Panther. By W. D. CHRISTIE, M.A. Second Edition, 3s. 6d.

ADDISON.—SELECTIONS from Papers in the Spectator. With Notes, by T. ARNOLD, M.A. Price 4s. 6d.; parchment, 6s.

STEELE.—SELECTIONS from the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by AUSTIN DOBSON. 5s.; parchment, 7s. 6d.

POPE.—With Introduction and Notes by MARK PATTISON, B.D.
 I. ESSAY on MAN. Sixth Edition, 1s. 6d.
 II. SATIRES and EPISTLES. Third Edition, 2s.

JOHNSON.—RASSELAS. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by G. BURKEBECK HILL, D.C.L. Price 3s. 6d.; parchment, 4s. 6d.

JOHNSON.—LIFE of MILTON. Edited, with Notes, &c., by C. H. FIRTH, M.A., Balliol College. Price 2s. 6d.; stiff covers, 1s. 6d.

GRAY.—SELECTED POEMS. Edited by EDMUND GOSSE. Stiff covers, 1s. 6d.; parchment, 3s.
 * * * An Edition with Notes for Schools by FOSTER WATSON, M.A.

GOLDSMITH.—SELECTED POEMS. Edited by AUSTIN DOBSON. 3s. 6d.; parchment, 4s. 6d.
GOLDSMITH.—The TRAVELLER. Edited by G. BURKEBECK HILL, D.C.L., Editor of "Boswell's Life of Johnson." Stiff covers, 1s.

LATIN AND GREEK CLASS-BOOKS.

Extra fcp. 8vo. cloth.

LEWIS and SHORT'S LATIN DICTIONARY. Founded on Andrews' Edition of Freund's Latin Dictionary. 4to. cloth, 25s.
 "Must supersede all its rivals for common use."—Professor J. E. B. MAYOR.

A NEW SCHOOL LATIN DICTIONARY.
A LATIN DICTIONARY for SCHOOLS. By CHARLTON T. LEWIS, Ph.D., Editor of Lewis and Short's Latin Dictionary. Small 4to. cloth, 18s.
 "Within its limits without a rival among school dictionaries."—Classical Review.

AN ELEMENTARY LATIN GRAMMAR. By J. B. ALLEN, M.A. Third Edition, 2s. 6d.

A FIRST LATIN EXERCISE BOOK. By the Same. Fourth Edition, 2s. 6d.

A SECOND LATIN EXERCISE BOOK. By the Same. 2s. 6d.

RUDIMENTA LATINA. By the Same. 2s.

REDDENDA MINORA; or, Easy Passages, Latin and Greek, for Unseen Translation. For the Use of Lower Forms. By C. S. JERRAM, M.A. 1s. 6d.

ANGLICE REDDENDA; or, Easy Extracts, Latin and Greek, for Unseen Translation. By the same Author. Fourth Edition, 2s. 6d.
 — Second Series. By the same Author. 3s.

PASSAGES for TRANSLATION into LATIN. For the Use of Passmen and others. Selected by J. Y. SARGENT, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Hertford College, Oxford. Seventh Edition, much Enlarged and Rearranged. 2s. 6d.

A LATIN PROSE PRIMER. By the same Author. 2s. 6d.

* * * This Latin Prose Primer is intended to be used as a companion to "EASY PASSAGES for TRANSLATION into LATIN" (Seventh Edition), by the same Author.

AN INTRODUCTION to LATIN SYNTAX. By W. S. GIBSON, M.A. 2s.
 * * * Instead of beginning with an abstract rule to be learned, each section begins with a Latin sentence or sentences illustrative of the rule which is to be explained.

EXERCISES in LATIN PROSE COMPOSITION. With Introduction, Notes, and Passages of Graduated Difficulty for Translation into Latin. By G. G. RAMSAY, M.A., LL.D., Professor of Humanity, Glasgow. Second Edition. Price 4s. 6d.

FIRST LATIN READER. By T. J. NUNNS, M.A. Third Edition. 2s.

HINTS and HELPS for LATIN ELEGIACS. By H. LEE-WARNER, M.A., Assistant-Master in Rugby School, Editor of "Selections from Livy." Price 2s. 6d.

* * * Key to the above to be obtained, by Teachers only, on direct application to the Clarendon Press, Oxford. 4s. 6d.
 "Almost the only guide to Latin versification which can be called interesting in itself."—Academy.

A GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. By HENRY GEORGE LIDDELL, D.D., and ROBERT SCOTT, D.D. Seventh Edition, Revised and Augmented throughout. 4to. cloth, 36s.

A GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. Abridged from the above, chiefly for the Use of Schools. Twenty-first Edition. Square 12mo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

AN INTERMEDIATE GREEK-ENGLISH LEXICON. Founded upon the Seventh Edition of "Liddell & Scott's Greek-English Lexicon." Small 4to. cloth, 12s. 6d.

This Abridgment of the Oxford Greek Lexicon has been undertaken in compliance with wishes expressed by several experienced Schoolmasters. It is an entirely new work, and it is hoped that it will meet their requirements.

GREEK VERBS, IRREGULAR and DEFECTIVE. By W. VEITCH, LL.D. Fourth Edition. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

UNIFORM WITH "PASSAGES for TRANSLATION into LATIN PROSE."

PASSAGES for TRANSLATION into GREEK. By J. Y. SARGENT, M.A., Fellow and Tutor of Hertford College, Oxford. 3s.

GRÆCE REDDENDA; or, Miscellaneous Exercises for Practice in Greek Prose Composition. Arranged by C. S. JERRAM, M.A., Editor of "Anglice Reddenda," "Euripides Alceste," &c. 2s. 6d.

WORDSWORTH'S GREEK GRAMMAR. 4s.

WORDSWORTH'S GREEK PRIMER, for the Use of Beginners in that language. Seventh Edition. 1s. 6d.

EASY GREEK READER. By E. ABBOTT, M.A., LL.D., Fellow and Tutor of Balliol College. In one or two Parts. 3s.

GRADUATED GREEK READERS.
 FIRST. By W. G. RUSHBROOKE, M.L. Second Edition. 2s. 6d.
 SECOND. By A. M. BELL, M.A. 3s. 6d.

FULL CLARENDON PRESS CATALOGUES sent free on application.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,767, Vol. 68.

September 7, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

THE STRIKE.

THE immense amount of speaking and writing which has been set going by the talk and the idleness of "labour" during this last week, contains very little which is creditable to that somewhat hazy personification. There is among it not a little personality of the meanest kind, still more idle repetition of what had been sufficiently said, and, what commonly goes with these errors, a plentiful lack of the faculty of looking facts in the face. Against these things may be set off a certain amount of common sense shown by the members of the Trades-Union Congress at Dundee, and the abstinence of the London strikers from actual riot. We do not know, however, that it is any particular credit to any body of persons that they should be only able to show a little practice of the most elementary virtues as the set-off to a great deal of folly or worse. The temperate tone of the speech made by Mr. RITCHIE, the President of the Dundee Congress, does not quite counterbalance the spiteful attack made on Mr. BROADHURST, still less the somewhat vulgar personalities with which Mr. BROADHURST retaliated for the attack made on himself. As for the merits of that attack, there was nothing new in them. It is an old story that the priest must live by the altar, and that some of the faithful are apt to suspect him of living too well. A position of instructor and representative brings authority, and that has been noted to bring money, and then there will be found envious spirits in the congregation to assert that the money was the object, and not the defence of the principles. It has been the fate of many to undergo these charges, and therein Mr. BROADHURST's fate is not singular. His defence we accept as complete. That he was entitled to invest his savings as he pleased—and much to be envied, firstly, for the possession of savings, and then for the good fortune, so rare in these days, which enabled him to find a safe investment which brings him in the very tidy figure of 25 per cent.—we hold to be as certain as that Mr. W. H. GLADSTONE was justified in evicting the tenants who would not or could not pay their rent. Only we venture to point out that this bold assertion of the rights of the capitalist has a somewhat comic sound from Mr. BROADHURST's mouth. We have heard denunciations of the doctrine from that quarter before the case was altered.

Even on this occasion it came very shortly after a passage in the speech of Mr. RITCHIE with which it did somewhat jar. The President asked what might not be accomplished "with Unionist parochial managers, Unionist Town Councillors, Unionist magistrates, and Unionist members of the Legislature"; and he answered himself with confidence that, when the Unions have everything their own way, "the unjust employer and the 'sweater' would be hurried out of existence. Railway Companies which pay 8 per cent. [not quite 25, you see] of a dividend, and work their employes sixteen to eighteen hours a day, would become an impossibility. Labour, even of the lowest and humblest description, would be sympathetically dealt with." This and more to the same effect Mr. RITCHIE said, and we repeat that we do not see how it squares with Mr. BROADHURST's uncompromising assertion of the orthodox doctrine that the capitalist is entitled to obtain all he can for his money. The President's language was, though we imagine he would shrink from confessing it, Socialism—or, if not that, it was wordy platitude. What is an unjust employer except one who gets the utmost he can for his money? What is a sweater except a term of abuse for a contractor who buys his labour as cheap as he can? Why should not a railway Company pay a man for working eighteen hours if he likes to work for that length of time? What is sympathetic treatment of labour if it is not the payment of more than its market value? The speech of Mr. RITCHIE, and the greater part of what has been said about the London strike, prove how hopelessly incapable most people are of understanding that in dealing with labour you have two courses to choose from, and that you must needs take one. Either you leave buyer and seller free to higggle in the market, or you adopt some form of Socialism by which you propose to regulate their relations according to some standard of "justice." The two systems are not compatible, for the slightest admixture of the second vitiates the first. If the regulating system is taken, it must be universally applied if the burden and the benefit are not to be unfairly apportioned, which would defeat its own purpose. It would appear, however, that there are many thousands of persons in London, some merely silly, some interested for their own ends, who think that a combination of the two might be profitably applied to the Dock strike. Shipowners and labourers would by this compromise be left free to higggle, while the Dock Companies would be required for the general good to treat the humblest and lowest description of labour in a sympathetic way. The view of the holders of this opinion is neatly put in the sentimentality of Mr. PUNCH's cartoon, and was admirably illustrated by Cardinal MANNING's inquiry of the Dock Committee whether they did not think it better to sacrifice a problematical dividend in order to end the present painful crisis. Even the desire to gain a cheap advertisement as a friend of the people ought hardly to have misled an educated man into the stupidity of asking men of business whether they did not think it better to give up all hope of obtaining a profit on their capital at once, in order that a strike, by which they are not the only or the greatest sufferers, might be ended at their expense for the benefit of other people. The course of the shipowners is intelligible enough. It might suit them very well to acquire the docks as the property of a bankrupt. It is natural, if not magnanimous, in them to try what they can extract from the Companies. As men of business, however, they are doing themselves little credit, since they ought to see that, if the Dock Companies cannot afford to give the extra penny, the strikers cannot get it, and that, if they will not allow themselves to be bullied, they cannot be coerced.

One of the commonest platitudes talked about the strike takes the form of a lament that the Dock Companies should, by their obstinacy in standing out, inflict such a terrible loss on London. The loss is obvious, but why is the blame to be thrown exclusively on the Dock Companies? There are several other parties to the quarrel who might facilitate a compromise by surrender. The shipowners might agree to pay a higher dock rate, for instance, which would enable the Companies to pay better wages. If a general rise in freights and prices followed, the public would then have an opportunity of showing its sympathy with the strikers more effectually than by sentimental twaddle. Then, again, the leaders of the men might advise them to be content with what they have got—or they might, while advising those who chose to do so to stand out, withdraw their 10,000 or 12,000 men on picket duty, and allow the labourers who are ready to work to do so. This last measure would, it is plain, settle the strike at once. As it is, work is gradually increasing in the docks, and if the pressure put on by the adventurers who have seized the control of the strike were taken off, thousands would rush in at once. For this, if for no other reason, it is desirable that the Dock Companies should win. They are no doubt fighting for their own hand like everybody else in the scrimmage, but for the moment their interests happen to coincide more than those of anybody else with the general interests of the community.

The strike has, through the ignorance and sheeplike docility of the labourers, been turned into a dangerous semi-socialist movement. It is, therefore, highly desirable that it should end in the defeat of the strikers. The more complete that defeat is the less chance will there be that Mr. BURNS, Mr. H. H. CHAMPION, and the handful of screeching spouters who have shared the stump with them will be allowed to mislead more men. The signs are encouraging for the Companies. The total failure of the Manifesto of last week, the gradual return of men to work, and the enlightenment of the public as to the real aims of Messrs. BURNS and Co., more than counterbalance the subscriptions which have been received by the Committee and the fussy activity of Mr. LAFONE, whose action and that of the few wharfingers who go with him is perfectly natural. The nature of their business enables them to recoup themselves for the cost of higher wages by charging higher rates. They can, therefore, afford to accept the terms of the men. That is not the case of the Dock Companies.

A HOLIDAY DEPUTATION.

AN irreverent person once observed that the phrase "Annual Meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science" appeared to him a needlessly cumbersome and circuitous substitute for the simpler locution "picnic." Such an objection would not lie with quite equal force against the words "Deputation of English Home Rulers to Ireland," which is some four words shorter; but still it must be admitted to be rather a roundabout way of describing an Irish holiday tour. The ladies and gentlemen, however, who have lately landed at Dublin—and the ladies, significantly enough, from the holiday-making point of view, figure very prominently in the report of the visit—may be allowed, in these desperately serious days, to flatter themselves that they have gone to Ireland primarily on a serious mission, and only secondarily to enjoy themselves. Some people like to be humbugs even in their pleasures; and, moreover, there is undeniably an element of "business" about the transaction which may well take the place of, and is perhaps in the minds of the deputation actually mistaken for, genuine political enthusiasm. The list of the members of the deputation is a very instructive catalogue of names. They are, for the most part, those of men who have either failed or ceased to make that mark in English public life which they desire to make, and who feel the necessity of putting themselves in evidence at a moment when the competition in self-advertisement has a little slackened. They are politicians, if they will not be offended at our saying so, who do not mind "speaking during the dinner-hour." They are actors who do not object to appearing at matinées in the dead season, when the stars are away for their holiday in the Engadine. Mr. SUMMERS, Mr. SCHWANN, Mr. H. J. WILSON, are typical specimens of the class of what may be called "vacation performers." Mr. CARVELL WILLIAMS and Mr. W. H. WILLS are gentlemen actually "out of an engagement"; they have lost their seats in Parliament, and are anxious again to attract the attention of some discerning constituency. And at the head of them all was Mr. STANSFELD, who stands in exactly the same relation to his more prominent and successful colleagues on the Front Opposition Bench as the SCHWANNs and SUMMERSES do to the ELLISES and PICKERSGILLS on the benches behind.

Mr. STANSFELD's own account of the matter, given in a speech "of some length," appears to show a somewhat needless anxiety to justify his visit. Its motive is perfectly well understood, we can assure him. The explanation above given of it will be readily accepted by all who are acquainted with the inner working of politics; and, having regard to the very uncertain outlook which lies before Mr. GLADSTONE's lieutenants in general, it will, we believe, be regarded as no less adequate from a moral than from a political point of view. At a time when the struggle for succession to Mr. GLADSTONE appears to be "anybody's game," it is impossible to blame anybody who, as Mr. SEXTON proudly said of Mr. STANSFELD, "had been in the Imperial Cabinet, and he ventured 'to say would be again,' for trying to keep as well up in the running as possible. This account of the matter is, at any rate, a more satisfactory one than that given by the leader of the deputation himself. He had asked himself, he said, "what justification he could offer for "coming over to Ireland to discuss a question which was primarily an Irish one, and he had come to the conclusion that it was his right as a citizen of a kingdom which was united, and was determined to remain united, to take an interest in any question which affected even the remotest part of it." But this justification is so instantaneously obvious that one is at a loss to understand how any reflective process should have been necessary to arrive at it at all. One would have thought that the answer to Mr. STANSFELD's self-interrogation would have arisen simultaneously with the question. When was it that the momentary hitch took place? Did it only occur to Mr. STANSFELD after more or less prolonged meditation on this "primarily Irish question" that Ireland was a portion of the United Kingdom? Or did the fact that he himself is a citizen of that United Kingdom only dawn by degrees upon his mind? Or, finally, did he spend some time in contemplating these two facts "in their quiddity" before he was visited by the brilliant aperçu that the citizen of a kingdom has "a right to take an interest in any question which affects even the remotest part of it"? Upon any view of his meaning, his attempt to pose as a Unionist is one of a most maladroit description, eminently characteristic of all the efforts of Gladstonians when they endeavour to fit the language of Unionism to their unaccustomed lips. All that Mr. STANSFELD has succeeded in proving is that the unity of the United Kingdom is not with him a truth of instinctive consciousness, but an information of reasoning. No genuine Unionist could possibly have asked himself "what justification he could offer for coming over to Ireland to discuss a question which is primarily an Irish one"; and Mr. STANSFELD's success in replying to his own interrogation does not by any means atone for the political gaucherie of having framed it.

Nor was Mr. STANSFELD much happier in his subsequent criticisms on what he professes to regard as the self-contradictory views of the Unionist party. "The opponents of the Irish people on this question," he said, "held inconsistent opinions. They seemed to think that the cry for Home Rule was fictitious. In the same breath they pointed," as no doubt they do, if people can be said to point with their lungs, "to the deep-rooted desire of the Irish for self-government; a desire so antagonistic in spirit to Great Britain that, if self-government were granted, it would be used against the interests of the United Kingdom, and lead to separation." So far, however, from these two opinions being intellectually inconsistent, one is only the natural and logical corollary of the other. It is the very same persons who are attempting to pass off a "fictitious cry" for a particular political change as a genuine national demand for that change—it is these very persons who, if they obtained what they are clamouring for, would turn the concession to the purposes which Unionists foresee and deprecate, and which Mr. STANSFELD sees no reason to fear. Surely the position of those who hold this view of the grant of Home Rule and its probable consequences is a perfectly plain and intelligible one. What they believe is simply this—that the Irish people, as such, have not, and never had, any definite or reasoned desire for separate legislative institutions; but that agitators have succeeded in persuading them that the satisfaction of the vague discontent, itself in a great measure the product of agitation, with which they are filled is only to be obtained under the system of self-government known as Home Rule; and, further, that the very disappointment, the inevitable disappointment, which upon the concession this visionary hope is destined to encounter, would in its turn supply the agitators with the strongest possible leverage for a movement in favour of complete separation. Nor should it be necessary to point out how potent an ally they would have found in Mr. GLADSTONE's Bill if that most mischievous measure, bristling with irritating and humiliating restrictions on the exercise of the privileges which it professed to confer, had become law. When Mr. STANSFELD talks lightly about the people of Ireland "desiring a system of self-government only in the interest of their own country, and in accordance with and subordinate to the necessities of the union with Great Britain in one United Kingdom," he coolly assumes the successful solution of the very problem which has to be solved, and which the agitators would obviously find their account in representing as insoluble. At every check which the legislative policy of an Irish Parliament might undergo from the restraints of the constitutional statute there would be an immediate outcry against its provisions, and a ready complaint that the interests of Ireland were being sacrificed to the real or pretended "necessities of the union with Great Britain in "one United Kingdom"; and if this outcry and complaint were not attended to, it would at once become the business of the agitators, as it would be in their power under the latest development of the Gladstonian Home Rule Scheme, to compel a hearing for their demands by paralysing the action of the Imperial Parliament. We do not say that it is theoretically impossible to work a local Legislature having powers defined and limited by the terms of a constitutional statute; but we do say that, without complete good faith and goodwill on both sides, the practical impossibility of this achievement is complete. And to postulate good faith and goodwill on the part of those by whom the local Legislature would be worked is to make an assumption which is not only destitute of antecedent probability, but which these men have themselves negatived by a whole catena of declarations, and by a course of policy persisted in by them with unbroken uniformity down to the date of Mr. GLADSTONE'S capitulation to them three years ago.

EAST AFRICA.

THE new concession to the British East African Company is good news in itself, and comes conveniently for the Company at a time when it is endeavouring to increase its capital by offering shares to the general public. This extension puts at English disposal the whole northern coast of what is recognized as Zanzibar territory, with the exception of the unlucky little enclave of Vitu, which, however, is not likely by itself to be of much value to its possessors. It brings once more under what is practically English rule a considerable number of Banian or British-Indian traders, whose interests, as unfortunate experience has shown too well of late, are not likely to be looked after by any but their own fellow-subjects. And it more than restores (because the restoration is effected in a manner likely to be stable and solid) the predominance of England which was broken by the unfortunate refusal to accept the protectorship of the Sultanate, and which seemed menaced with something like utter extinction shortly afterwards. It was, of course, certain to be received with groans and growls by the German "colonial men," despite the severe lesson which they have recently received; and it is possible that the irrepressible Dr. PETERS may make some trouble on the spot, for it seems that the trouble which he has already made for himself has not been terminated, as seemed at one time likely, by that process which the French soldier describes, or used to describe, as "lead-wash for the head." But this person and his backers at home have had too recent and too unmistakable a lesson from Prince BISMARCK for their grumblings to be of much danger or importance, and the more sensible part of the German press has already admitted that there are no valid German claims on the Somali coast.

The really satisfactory thing about the matter is, of course, that the British East African Company does not gain a mere paper concession—a sort of general license to catch-who-catch-can and catch-what-caught-can-be. A solid basis of trade has been established at Lamu already, and at the other ports, it is believed, there are also the foundations of commercial enterprise. Politically the acquisition tends to strengthen the hold of England on the "shoulder" of Africa, and it is also of not inconsiderable importance as supplying an additional basis for communication with the Upper Nile and the Lakes. That this communication can ever be satisfactorily effected by the Congo, Mr. STANLEY, the most enthusiastic defender of the Congo route, may be said to have disproved himself by his own exploit on the Aruwimi. But it does not seem by any means impossible that, if EMIN Pasha, as is likely, sticks to his post, routes of traffic may be opened or reopened from the Lakes to the East Coast, routes which must sooner or later be reconnected with the recovered waterway of the Nile. There may be no vision of "Africa and golden joys" in such prospects, but they are prospects of solid advantage, of the opening up of not inconsiderable markets whereof English producers stand in great need and of not inconsiderable spheres of work for Englishmen—all being conducted on the good old principle of making sure of one thing before you go on to another. This new success of the East African Company should be an encouragement to those who are trying to start a somewhat similar enterprise to the north of the Zambesi, and to the horror of Sir JOHN SWINBURNE.

For it would seem that Sir JOHN, unlike Mr. VERDANT GREEN'S bed-maker, "has had concessions himself, sir," but "can not enter into their feelings." We have before wished well to these adventurers, who may be able to build up a flourishing business to the south of the Congo State and the German "sphere"; while the British East African Company is doing the same on the north. Only let them remember to pursue as far as possible the same course that the elder Company has pursued—the course of here a little and there a little, and not the course of making great paper schemes which end in nothing, or in worse than nothing. Intelligence of what is being done on Lake Nyassa is conflicting and rather vague; but if, as it seems, there has been a Congo-State-like capitulation to the "Arabs," that also is not the way to go.

READING BOOKS AND BUYING BOOKS.

TWO articles in the magazines, in Murray's and the Fortnightly Review, are devoted, oddly enough, to books. The first, by Lord BRABOURNE, is about the books which people buy and do not read; the next, by Mr. GATTIE, is about the books they read and do not buy. Both critics go into statistics, which, by way of exception, really seem to prove something. Mr. GATTIE examines the returns of provincial lending libraries, and by "provincial" you shall understand that the libraries of large towns are intended. Books are divided into eight classes. Theology and philosophy come first. But why not theology and fiction? The most popular theology is played off in novels, and the most popular fiction plays freely round theology. Philosophy is much in the same case. M. PAUL BOURGET'S Le Disciple is likely to prove a favourite novel. It is "Greats work" mixed up with GABORIAU, or BOISGOBEY seasoned with Greats work. Here we read of Mr. HERBERT SPENCER, of RIBOT, of the juge d'instruction, of "cold pison," of SCHOPENHAUER, of revolvers, and ROUSSEAU. Now is it not unfair of Mr. GATTIE to take philosophy and theology together in one category when he should take romance and realism and religion, brigands and biblical criticism, all in one agreeable lump? Dividing a hundred marks among his eight classes of books, Mr. GATTIE finds poor old theology and philosophy much neglected. Liverpool takes nearly, and Exeter quite, three per cent. of this kind of thing; but Rochdale will have none of it, nor will Derby, Stafford, Plymouth, Norwich, and Great Yarmouth. Yet these cities may take in plenty of theology and philosophy through the pores, as it were, in the shape of fiction. Fiction is absorbed at from seventy to eighty per cent. of the whole hundred, and fiction is now almost always philosophical and theological. Mr. GATTIE complains that Miss BROUGHTON, Miss BRADDON, and the unfortunate Mr. RIDER HAGGARD are very popular. It must be admitted that Miss BRADDON is not so philosophical as M. PAUL BOURGET, nor Miss BROUGHTON quite so keen on theology as the author of Robert Ward, Preacher; but, then, surely Cleopatra is a fair summary of MASPERO, RENOUF, MARIETTE, BRUGSCH, NAVILLE, WILKINSON, CHABAS, REVILLIOUT, and Egyptological research in general. So Mr. GATTIE must not despair of serious studies. They are admitted in the disguise of novels. Poetry, except at Bristol (six per cent.), is nowhere. Why is poetry popular at Bristol? The shade of AMOS COTTLE might reply. Labourers and bricklayers do not read—do not read books—any more than literary men or baronets. The readers are milliners and clerks and boys, and even metal-workers, who may be interested in Mr. SYMONDS'S Benvenuto Cellini. Potters, like poets, read very little. Portsmouth is the most bookish place of them all. At Aberdeen, oddly enough, poetry is not popular, only at 1'44 per cent. A book called The Best Match was plunged on by the women of Aberdeen, as The Virgin Widow was long ago by another class of readers. But The Best Match turned out to be a devotional work, and, like Sir HENRY TAYLOR'S poem, not what had been expected from the title.

Some profane persons will hear with enthusiasm that Vanity Fair and Pickwick—ay, and Esmond and David Copperfield—are very much more liked than Middlemarch. This is not bad news; the literary heart of England is still in the right place. Mr. GATTIE explains this by GEORGE ELIOT'S dealing with exploded feudalism, as if Esmond was not as "feudal" as Daniel Deronda. That the public occasionally knows what is good seems as plausible a theory. THACKERAY is said to be twice as popular as

SCOTT. We doubt this. You can buy SCOTT for next to nothing; THACKERAY, till a very short time since, was, of course, more expensive, and had to be got from libraries. CHARLES READE is said to be out of vogue. FIELDING and STERNE, as might be expected, are little asked for. They are as antiquated now as SIDNEY'S Arcadia. Mr. GATTIE seems astonished that popular novels in three volumes are sold by the libraries at a shilling a volume. In his opinion this proves them to be temporary trash. He may forget that you can buy them new in one handy volume, as cheap as in three thumbed volumes. Treasure Island, from the libraries, is said to sell better than other favourites. This may apply to the first edition; there be enthusiasts who collect Mr. STEVENSON'S first editions. Nay, there are poor authors whose first editions go for ten times the original price, while nobody buys their second editions at all. This may be an honourable, but is assuredly an unenviable, kind of popularity. It is not Miss BRADDON'S or Miss BROUGHTON'S kind. Some modern novels keep their vogue; a few of Mr. BESANT'S and Lorna Doone and East Lynne. Mrs. GASKELL is out of fashion, which speaks poorly of public taste; and even Lost Sir Massingberd finds few to hunt for him, Mr. GATTIE says. Yet the search will repay the adventurous. Miss EDNA LYALL is in great demand. She is so ideal. The public that neglects Mrs. GASKELL for Miss EDNA LYALL and her "clearly defined purpose" is not a public to be reasoned with, but, were it worth while, to be prayed for. There is a continuous demand for The Story of an African Farm, and of the young woman who would not marry the baby's father, and the young man who dressed like a woman, and nursed her when she (apparently) had gout—but it may have been some other affection of the feet. One person in every thirty-five has bought a shilling novel, and The Mystery of a Hansom Cab has rivalled Called Back. Mr. GATTIE seems to think that all shilling novels are "shockers," all or most; but there may be some very nice, reflective, psychological novels—analytic, too—among the "bob'sworths." No English novelists have enough "genius" and hold upon the public to enable them to drive out the "rabble of trash-mongers." What, not even Miss EDNA LYALL? M. GUY DE MAUPASSANT, the inevitable TOLSTOI, M. PAUL BOURGET, and other evangelical foreign authors are our best hope. We may (as we understand) expect much service to really sound letters from—O GYP, hear it! O M. JULES LEMAÎTRE, listen to this—from M. GEORGES OHNET! But perhaps Mr. GATTIE does not include M. OHNET among the authors of "the best foreign novels."

As a rule, all these works are rather read on loan from libraries than bought. But who would read the books that Lord BRABOURNE writes about, the books which people "soon parted from their money" buy? Probably none but enthusiasts of topography, and they soon find out that the price of a dear book is a fluctuating value, and depends on "condition," binding, margin, and the casual competition of the sale. It needed not Lord BRABOURNE to tell us this, which he does with some spice of anecdote. These things are not mysteries—that about 400,000 owners of a shilling should give it for The Mystery of a Hansom Cab is the mystery which neither Mr. GATTIE nor any other philosopher can dispel. If a man knew how to create such a demand, he would create it and hold his tongue.

"BE MY VISITOR OR I WILL—"

FOR six months or more the newspaper Correspondents at Berlin have been employed upon a "visit of the CZAR," which remains to this day an unsettled thing. It might have been supposed that the Emperor WILLIAM and his entourage would studiously affect, if they did not actually feel, a proud, polite indifference as to whether the CZAR would or would not return the call of his German cousin. Anxiety on the subject is hardly intelligible; display of anxiety amongst the most improbable of things; and yet the daily repetition by the Berlin news-writers of reports that the CZAR is coming; that for some dark Olympian reason he is not coming; that, after all, the visit is merely postponed; that it will only be a "How d'ye do?" en route; that it actually will be made at Berlin; that the CZAR will not hear of Berlin, but does not mind meeting the EMPEROR at some border place while he is on a more direct errand—all these reports, over and over repeated in every tone of satisfaction and apprehension, testify to a perturbation for which it is hard to account. But, as for that matter, nervousness and restlessness have strongly marked the whole course of German politics since the present EMPEROR came to the throne. They appear at all points, in all that is said and done.

One thing is evident enough. If the Germans think so much of this visit of the CZAR as they seem to think, they have tried very strange methods of bringing it about. According to all belief, the young EMPEROR'S meeting with the Russian potentate was rather forced. It did not please the CZAR, who had a mind to put it off; and, if it was so, all the more tact was needed to procure the return visit. How much may have been employed in private it is, of course, impossible to say; but whatever the amount, and whatever its quality, enough was done in public to counteract it altogether. With the modest Minister of a phlegmatic country like England it may pass very well to seek good understandings through alternate buffetings and embracings. Neither the one nor the other are regarded much, the question being decided upon a review of much larger matters. But a Czar of All the Russias is a very different person to deal with; and within the memory of man no such personage has been less amenable to handling of that sort than the present owner of the Russian Empire. The wonder is that any such handling should have been attempted by a Government with Prince BISMARCK at its head; and the surprise becomes yet greater when we reflect that the whole thought, the whole endeavour of the EMPEROR'S servants are addressed to the maintenance of peace. To be sure, there be those, in France and elsewhere, who deny that that is the ultimate purpose of the German arrangements and combinations—seeing or pretending to see in them a plan for forming a great alliance, which, when it is complete and well bound together, shall be drawn into a conflict that cannot be long postponed without risk to the German Empire. But, at the same time, even these suspicious critics assert, and it is part of their case to assert, that Prince BISMARCK is taking the utmost pains to foist on the world a belief in his pretended longings for peace. From these accounts of the matter it appears, then, that the Germans are really working for peace, or else that they are extremely anxious to appear so. But the truth is that, meanwhile, they are giving the CZAR ample material for awkward questioning on either point. If he was not so loftily indifferent to what the world says or thinks, if he, too, had adopted the system of diplomatizing through the press, a dozen inspired writers might be primed with observations on this very question of the visit which all the ingenuity of the Wilhelmstrasse would be overtaxed to answer. As thus:—The CZAR is expected to go to Berlin on a visit of courtesy. The courtesy is demanded as something that can hardly be withheld, while from time to time proclamation is made that its accordance will signify that the CZAR is on the best of terms with his cousin, and relies on the wisdom of his policy. At any rate, the CZAR is bound to present himself in the Prussian capital, there to do its master honour. Should he neglect so plain an obligation, it will be clear that he is a foe to Germany and peace; and that the League, and its costly responsibilities, are justified by his evident determination to make war. That is the ceaseless refrain of the German press. But what happens meantime? While the CZAR is still pressed to go to Berlin with fraternal embraces for the EMPEROR, the utmost pains are taken to make a public show of an alliance which, according to one account, has been formed to crush the Muscovite, and, according to another, to muzzle him. And this last is not an unauthorized or merely speculative account either. It is official. The Italian KING goes to Berlin to parade the alliance—with what necessity, and for what peaceful purpose? There are grand military junketings—all for the CZAR to view. When they are over, there is a meeting of the Austrian and German sovereigns to renew them; and on all occasions when glasses are raised and Royal and Imperial allies toast each other Europe is called in to hear that the confederation thus paraded is meant to force peace upon the CZAR. This is what we mean by the muzzle—a restraint to which, in itself, we have no objection.

Now His Majesty of Russia might well ask how all this is to be interpreted, and how he in particular is expected to take it. But, without appeal or suggestion from St. Petersburg, two considerations must arise in the mind of every one who wishes to understand the true state of affairs and who does not shut his eyes to facts that may displease or disturb him. It is obvious, in the first place, that the junketings and banquetings aforementioned, with all that is said and done at them, might be regarded as something like intentional insult by a potentate far less high and mighty than the Emperor of RUSSIA. A much humbler prince, with a tithe of ALEXANDER's pride and not so many soldiers by a quarter of a million, might be expected to refrain from courtesy visits to a foreign capital where demonstrations of this kind are got up repeatedly and ostentatiously. If, then, the CZAR hesitates to return the visit of his cousin of Germany, we need not seek an explanation beyond the reasons provided by those who yet appear so very desirous of seeing him at Berlin. Other reasons he may have, of course. These, however, are enough—more than enough; and it is mere superfluity of investigation to inquire any further. But there is another consideration. The natural effect of these proceedings on his mind who is specially solicited to mark them must be as well known at Berlin as everywhere else. How, then, are they to be accounted for? Is there any commanding necessity for them? Would the alliance of the three Powers be less firm without these public meetings, these reviews of troops, these banquets of advertisement, and high dramatic toasts? We know that none of these things are needed to ratify an alliance which two out of the three populations concerned believe to be a matter of life and death, while the third sees in it a promise of safety with considerable profits. As for the CZAR himself, is evidence of this sort necessary to convince him that such a confederation exists? The question is absurd. He has his own means of ascertaining the relations of his neighbours, which in this case have never been a secret; and there could have been no difficulty in acquainting him with the reality of the alliance in a quiet way. But a very different way has been chosen; and the question how peace can be served by these ruffings and girdings and biting of thumbs in the public street is not easily answerable. If, on the other hand, the intention were to hasten conflict by flouting an extremely proud, resentful, autocratic sovereign in the presence of his people, one difficulty would disappear at once; and there it is that the awkwardness comes in. Who can assert that the parades at Berlin are necessary, or deny that they are provoking? And yet the allies do mean nothing but peace. It is to avert war and its frightful calamities that they are banded together. We must suppose, then, that there is some disturbing element of injudiciousness at work; and perhaps we know where to look for something of the kind. But whatever may be the explanation of so curious a state of things, we are bound to take account of all the facts of the case, and to shirk none.

THE FRENCH PRETENDERS.

THAT pretenders as a class and French pretenders in particular, that candidates all over the world and French candidates more than any others, are incapable of being taught by experience are facts known to the most superficial observer. The various addresses which have been published to the electors of France during the last ten days or so are not, therefore, to be taken as proving anything new. They are all of them full of prophecies of the millennium if only the country will take the pill for preventing the earthquake which each vendor has to offer. The Count of PARIS, his able supporter M. HERVÉ, and Prince VICTOR BONAPARTE agree on that point. Each of them is sure that universal suffrage will so pronounce that incontinently he, or his King in M. HERVÉ's case, will be put at the head of affairs, and then the chief of the State will cease to be a nullity. Ministers will cease to be suspected of tripotage, the finances will be admirably managed, the army will experience some ill-defined but immense benefit, the foreign policy of France will become a model of peaceful and imposing dignity. There is in all these respects nothing to choose between them, and the country may with equal safety decide for either Royalists or Bonapartists. In the meantime the General is engaged in calling the attention of the country and the Government to the fact that, after all, the sentence of the High Court may not be a bar to his candidature, since it is only the Chamber which is entitled to decide on the validity of any given election.

It is just possible that the authors of these magnificent promises do not, in their private, unofficial capacity, believe every word of them. But, if this scepticism seems to defend them to some extent from the charge of credulity, it is only to give them over to it in another way. They must, one supposes, expect the country to believe them, and believing them to act on them. A more remarkable proof of that incapacity to learn by experience which distinguishes the race of pretenders could hardly be given. France has done many things in the course of a hundred years of revolution, but what she has not done has been to vote spontaneously in favour of any party or body of principles, or for anybody or anything, except a strong Government in actual possession of power. The election which upset the administration of Marshal MACMAHON was only an apparent exception to the rule, but not a real one. In that case the Republic was the nominal Government, and was threatened in some ill-understood way which caused uneasiness by some alternative which inspired no enthusiasm. The country was indifferent to the Marshal and detested his Ministers. Moreover, the popularity of the dead THIERS and the living GAMBETTA was great and the Republicans were temporarily united. No such conditions will exist at the approaching struggle. It is possible that in this case, also, the result of the election may be something of a surprise; but of what kind it will be no one even pretends to guess—no one, that is, who is not a candidate, and, therefore, naturally or officially cocksure. The Government has shown that it can hit, and will certainly use all the machinery at its disposal for purposes of coercion. It has a strong Radical and Moderate Conservative following; with that, and the support of the timid who fear all changes, it may secure a majority. On the other hand, the Oppositions are less well placed than the Republicans who upset Marshal MACMAHON. They are not nearly so well united, and they possess no leader so popular as GAMBETTA; they have no name to use which even remotely approaches that of THIERS. A few months ago, in the palmy days of the General's popularity, the want of a leader who could serve the turn seemed likely to be made good. But it is tolerably certain that the General's popularity is not what it was before his flight. If it has really very seriously diminished (it is always advisable to use the "if" freely in discussing General BOULANGER), then the chance of the Oppositions may be considered to have sunk very notably. The Count of PARIS, with that readiness to make arrows out of all wood which is so truly Orleanist, recommends his followers to support all enemies of the Republic, including the Boulangists as certainly as the Bonapartists. Prince VICTOR speaks in a prouder strain, but his party will doubtless be no more scrupulous than the Royalists. This alliance may serve to put the Oppositions in a position to scramble over the spoils of France; but it has one defect. It aims openly at making the Boulangists Royalist or Bonapartist tools. Now, as the Boulangists have always noisily asserted themselves to be Republicans, this patronage may possibly do them no good with some of their followers. This possibility is one of the many which make the result of the coming election so doubtful, and, since they balance one another so evenly, make it seem not wholly improbable that, when the voting is over, the parties may stand much as they do at present.

TRAVELLERS' TALES.

YEARLY, at this season, is the complaint of the tourist heard in the land, and provokes the harmless and unnecessary newspaper correspondence and comment. For the sea-serpent and the gooseberry we may wait in unperturbed confidence, finding in Mr. A. J. BUTLER's letter on the wrongs of tourists a sufficient sign of the season, and a precursor of greater woes and wonders. Mr. BUTLER has lifted up his voice in the remote wilds of Surrey, to proclaim the scandalous charges made and, we suppose, paid for board and lodgment at a certain hostelry in that pleasant county. This suffering traveller found that the round sum of 1*l.* daily did hardly suffice for his bare board and lodging in the Surrey hotel. In the Tyrol, however, he declared they "did him" in a far superior style for the modest outlay of five shillings a day—a sum which is, indeed, too suggestive of the "bare board" of which he writes. Why should this discrepancy be? No wonder is it that Mr. BUTLER prefers Meran to the Surrey hills. His indictment of the Surrey hotel is a formidable bill of wrongs. There was the fabulous charge of six shillings and sixpence for a double-bedded room, exclusive of "tubs," Mr. BUTLER indignantly adds, as if tubs were common objects in Continental hotels. Then he grievously for the three shillings and sixpence expended on half a mile's service of the "local fly." The hardened traveller will smile at these proofs of extortion. He will justly compassionate the guilelessness of Mr. BUTLER, and trust that his home experiences may be salutary. The angry reference to the "local fly" betrays a sensibility that has miraculously survived the rigours of foreign travel, or it may be a last protest wrung from the still-vested recollection of an ill-cooked dinner. Mr. BUTLER had been better employed if he had said something of another kind of local fly which is intolerably active in foreign hotels, and in many ways far more costly. Of course these grievances have called forth support or remonstrance from tourists and from innkeepers, to the intelligent gratification of the numerous readers of newspapers always eager to hear "some argument betwixt one tway." Brief is the season, and the opportunity comes but once a year. Those who back Mr. BUTLER in his great wrath are emulative with a good will, knowing they have but a short time. "L," who has been doing the southern cathedrals and the wild hills of Surrey, cites the inconsiderable items of his hotel bills and sighs for the first-class economies of Nuremberg. It is the old story again. Five shillings at Nuremberg go further than twenty at Exeter or Guildford. To hear the other side is quite sufficient to convict the grumblers of futility and unreason. Mr. BUTLER infers, in his haste, that all Surrey hotels are like that of his late bondage, where tubs were extras and the local fly a deadly impost. Mr. MOBERLY BELL, having travelled over the same district, easily refutes the errors of Mr. BUTLER; and Mr. JOHN BRAYE informs a distracted public of his extremely satisfactory travels in Dorsetshire. It is really surprising that Mr. BRAYE is not apologetic when confessing that he was supplied, for the paltry consideration of four shillings, with a substantial tea, the use of a coffee-room, good-sized drawing-room, and clean bedroom, and a breakfast of ham and eggs. By abjuring the local fly Mr. BRAYE was enabled to travel six or seven miles in a mail-contractor's van, with an entertaining driver, in the company of an old lady, the sister of a London banker, for a sum under one shilling. What better fortune could the traveller desire? We hope that the visitors' book was relieved of its burden of dull impertinence by the record of Mr. BRAYE's gratitude.

There is a sort of tourists foredevote to mischance. There is no possibility of pleasing them. The voyager's art is altogether beyond their attainment. On va, mais on ne voyage pas. Experience teaches them nothing, as they go from place to place, irritably sensitive to the disadvantages of their present halting stage. It is always some remote town or health resort that, in the matter of prices or scenery, is glorified to their discontent when compared with the abode of to-day. They travel perpetually in the odour of comparisons. For such the best and biggest hotel, though thick-sown through all the picturesque countries of the globe, proves less satisfactory than the worst inn's worst room is to the wise traveller. Without occasional discomfort travel would be more wearisome, because more monotonous, than it is. It is grossly inconsistent to complain in one breath of over-charges and uncivilized accommodation. In the barbarous old days before steam and hotels, when the poet GRAY and the Rev. WILLIAM GILPIN set the fashion of picturesque tours, there was some justification of the traveller's complaint of discomfort. No sensible persons expected to find "home from home" in the roadside inns of a century ago, though many of these were exceedingly comfortable and inspiring. Over-charge was somewhat more unusual in the inns on the coach roads of old, and is at once one of the proofs and fruits of civilization. Travelling, on the other hand, was more expensive and tedious than it is now, and in this cheapening of the process and extension of the locomotive range lies the modern tourist's compensation for the more expensive and less substantial accommodation of our country hotels. It would be interesting to know something of the dietary of the Meran Hotel commended by Mr. BUTLER. Was it well varied, or all quail and thin soup? It can hardly have been what our rude fathers called generous, whatever its constituents, and, without something less vague than Mr. BUTLER's comparative estimate, the Surrey hotel can scarcely be said to be disgraced. Cheapness is, after all, a much-abused word. Some travellers would "quarrel with mince-pies," and others would thrive on the "tough billygoat and turpentine" which sorely troubled Lord BYRON's English valet in Greece and Albania. The expensive hotel is not necessarily the most costly, and the dearest dinner is that which disagrees with you.

MUNICIPAL POLITICIANS.

IT is not necessary to make much personal comment on the early and melancholy death of Mr. BOTTOMLEY FIRTH, just as he had attained what may be supposed to have been nearly the summit of his ambition—the important and not unremunerative post of Deputy-Chairman of the London County Council. On every conceivable point of politics or connected with politics Mr. FIRTH's opinions were opinions which we think mistaken, if not also mischievous; while the manner in which he defended those opinions was not likely to reconcile those who objected to their matter. On the other hand, it is not merely conventional respect for the dead which indisposes us to speak harshly of a man who was, at any rate, consistent, vigorous, and no doubt true to his own idea of what was politically and socially desirable. Mr. FIRTH's decease will give another opportunity of repairing the laches, on the part of Londoners, which unfortunately placed their municipal affairs in the hands of a majority distinctly opposed in all ways to the feelings and opinions of London. But the majority is still too great for there to be any hope of seating a representative of these feelings and opinions in the important and well-paid post also vacated. The majority have it in their power, of course, to reward one of their own extremists if they choose; they have it also in their power, if they can induce some really good man, not wholly out of harmony with the views of the more moderate and respectable of them, to clear the Council in part from the heavy reproach it has hitherto incurred. But it may be at once granted that such a person may not be very easy to find.

The now unfashionable believers in the necessary connexion of supply and demand must be rather exercised between hope and fear on the subject of the Municipal Politician. The establishment of County Councils has created a very great demand indeed. It cannot be said that the chief recent precedent, the history of School Boards, is encouraging on the subject of supply. When School Boards were started, as when County Councils were started, a few men of real eminence were ready to take place in them; but they were soon disgusted, and, despite occasional elections of a better type, the average School Board politician is not of a very high class. In the case of the County Councils better things were hoped for; and better men did, as a fact, stand, for the reason that, on the analogy of the French Councils-General, the seats were supposed to be likely to form steps to higher things. In the country this hope seems to some extent to be realized. But the London County Council—owing, no doubt, in great part to the indolent indifference of Londoners—was a grievous disappointment. Even the victorious party could not be very proud of the personnel, with some few exceptions, of their representatives; and, though the minority is, no doubt, individually of better quality, even there the average is not extremely high. Nor is it very difficult to see why this is the case. The examples of men working their way through town-corporation work to Parliament are not numerous, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN being almost the only one of much distinction; and there is no particular reason why the County Council road should be any smoother or more certain. Yet it will be a serious thing if the municipal politician of a better kind than has yet presented himself does not appear. The London County Council, when it has not been merely ridiculous, has up to the present time been, like the School Board, chiefly extravagant; extravagance, even when there is no suspicion of personal corruption, being the natural result of inexperience and want of practical ability. Whether Mr. FIRTH's shoes, comfortably lined as they are, will be sufficiently attractive to secure a really good man is a less immediate question than the question whether the really good man is there to fill them, a question to which the answer is not readily forthcoming. The sacred principle of popular election would, of course, be outraged by the suggestion that the paid "deputy" of a County Council should be appointed by the Local Government Board and be irremovable during good behaviour; but this arrangement would have many advantages.

LESSONS OF THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

AS a matter of course the lessons of the naval manœuvres are being set forth on all hands, with equal promptitude and confidence. Lessons bad and lessons good are to be found in abundance. We need hardly say at this time of day that among the bad lessons we include those which profess to be strategical or tactical. Thus, for instance, a Correspondent of the Times points out how the fight off Ushant illustrates the influence of luck in naval warfare. Luck is great in all human affairs; but, with Admiral BAIRD's order of last week before us, we must differ from the Times' Correspondent as to its share in this case. On the contrary, as little was left to fortune as human ingenuity could leave. The Admiral's plan was complete. He divided his fleet into two bodies, putting the quicker ships into one and the slower into the other. He then sent off the quicker squadron in the hope that it would somehow slip through the enemy, that the enemy would follow up Channel, and that he would follow the enemy to see what he could pick up. How could an admiral have more carefully provided that a part of his fleet should fall in with the bulk of the other side and be crushed? Accordingly this is what happened, and in all these things, as the Athenian General observed, fortune had no part. Then, of course, we are asked to remember that even Sir GEORGE TRYON's victory did not prevent the raids on coast towns, and the deduction is that the same thing would happen in war, and that Frenchmen would be greatly rejoiced at the destruction of an English town. We dare say they would, but their joy would be sensibly cooled when the bombardment of Edinburgh was followed by the bombardment of Havre, Honfleur, Dieppe, St. Malo, Nantes, Rochelle, and Marseilles. It also appears to us doubtful whether a couple of ironclads, not manned from Charenton, would run into the Frith of Forth, till they were quite sure that there was not a squadron capable of smashing them in the trap waiting off St. Abb's Head. It is one thing to play these games in manœuvres, when no harm can follow; another thing to do them in war, when death or capture would be the consequence. We are perfectly conscious that we have said this a hundred times; but, then, the nonsense we protest against has been repeated many thousands, and we can but endeavour to redress the balance.

No doubt, however, the manœuvres have taught lessons such as can be—and, indeed, must be—learnt wherever ships keep the sea. It is not a new lesson, or one which we alone have had to learn. On the contrary, it is rather old as things go in this time of change; and the French have had to learn it as well as ourselves, and lament, as we do, the accursed purblind pedantry of science which will not look at facts. It is briefly this—that, since Admiralties took to forgetting that a ship is, after all, a hollow structure meant to prove habitable at sea in all weathers, for more or less prolonged periods of time, they have turned out things which are not ships at all, though they may be called so by courtesy. Big and little, they will be half useless in war because human beings, who are made of flesh, bones, and blood, who have lungs and stomachs and spinal cords, who must eat occasionally and sleep from time to time, cannot live in them. This, also, we have said before; and the French have said it, and it must be said till it is hammered into the heads of Ministries and dockyard authorities. A third thing which has been said again and again, which the French have said often, and which the naval manœuvres have given occasion to say again, is this—that the fighting power of many of our warships has been sacrificed to speed, and that, as a just punishment, the speed has not been retained, even when it was attained on the measured mile. Warships cannot be built merely to go and to carry cargo like an ocean packet. They must supply a platform for guns and be solid. If the first thing thought of is speed, the platform and the solidity are sacrificed, but not discarded. The result is a compromise which, like other compromises, means a bundle of second-rate qualities. Our swift cruisers are apt, in fact, to be half-swift and half-strong. Meanwhile, the old Hercules, built when the tradition that a ship was not yet forgotten, keeps her sound and sufficient qualities after some twenty years of service, in spite of her accident at the beginning of the manœuvres. These are some of the lessons of the manœuvres, and others of the same stamp are to be obtained from them.

MORE UNEQUALITY.

WE were half afraid or—for there is nothing in these days like a little hypocrisy—let us say, we charitably hoped that the body which mystically calls itself the “C. E. T. S.”—that is to say, the Church of England Temperance Society—was going to sit down under the correction that Mr. THOMAS WETHERED administered to it some weeks ago. Such conduct would not only have been Christian (and though there is nothing Christian in Total Abstinence, Temperance is undoubtedly a Christian virtue), it would also have been discreet; for Mr. WETHERED had got the Society so thoroughly in Chancery that, in the way of fair fighting, it could do nothing. But some considerable experience in the ways of this particular sect of will-worshippers made us pretty certain that Christianity and discretion (by the way, “Christianity and Discretion Dissuading the C. E. T. S. from “Attacking Mr. WETHERED” would be a simply unsurpassable subject for an allegorical ceiling in the old style) would not get the better of the Temperance man's usual intemperance, and that the Society, in Chancery though it be, would probably try to kick Mr. WETHERED's shins. And so it was. Although Mr. WETHERED was in error (the Times having held back for a time the “official” documents in question) in supposing in a further letter of his own that the C. E. T. S. was not going to give him an official answer, that well-intentioned victim of monomania, its Chairman, Canon ELLISON, and a polite London Diocesan Secretary, had already endeavoured to reply. And a publication which appears to be a kind of organ of the Society, and which is called the Temperance Chronicle, has also rushed to the rescue. All three give illustrations of temperance ways which are very instructive and edifying, and with which Mr. WETHERED ought to be well pleased.

A vain people may need reminding that Mr. WETHERED had been asked to contribute, he a brewer and unashamed, to the funds of the Society; the consistency of his doing so being urged upon him by the information that its fundamental principle was union on perfectly equal terms and partnership in government in, as far as possible, equal proportions between total abstainers and moderates. Mr. WETHERED, a much-inquiring man, found out on inquiry that the equal proportions were three teetotallers to one Laodicean, and that the samples of the equal terms vouchsafed him consisted, in part at least, of abuse of his trade, and scarcely veiled requests to know how he could have the impudence to meddle with the Society at all. Canon ELLISON's answer is, as might be expected from him, decent in form. It shirks, indeed, the plain question asked by Mr. WETHERED; and, instead of giving an answer, practically admits the charge. But it pleads that, though perhaps the advanced section may come to the front because they are greater busybodies than their fellows, “loyalty to the dual basis has, in practice, come to “be the determining qualification for membership.” Disloyalty to the dual basis (that is to say, the absolute equality of teetotallers and moderate men in the august and all-seeing eye of the C. E. T. S.) would be felt to be “a disqualification either for membership or for “any office in the Society, paid or unpaid.” Poor Canon ELLISON! While he thus wrote, or soon afterwards, “the “London Diocesan Secretary, C. E. T. S.,” an official who, we suppose, is either paid or unpaid, was writing to the effect that Mr. WETHERED “was a striking example of “the old saying that ‘he who drinks beer thinks beer.’” The great Basis lays it down that “a man may drink and not be “drunk,” and the paid or unpaid officials of the Society ask beer-drinkers and beer-brewers to subscribe to their funds. This Diocesan Secretary informs Mr. WETHERED that it is “no part of the Society's scheme to foster the liquor trade “by affording help to the manufacturers.” It was part of its scheme however, it appears, to ask them for subscriptions and call them names afterwards. Also Mr. WETHERED (who did not ask, but was asked, to join the Society) is informed that it “does not desire to admit those who aid and abet the “drinking habits of the country.” What a wobbly basis! What a wonderfully unanimous Society! One Diocesan Secretary asks a brewer who, we suppose, is a “manufacturer” of liquor and a “trader” in it, and an “aider and “abettor of drinking habits,” to give his noble honour's name and his noble honour's worship's money to the Society; another addresses to him the compliments we have just quoted and several others. Also the organ (which, by the way, is under the wholly erroneous impression that the elder Mr. WELLER was “a boozing pub"lican") rebuffs Mr. WETHERED with sarcastic references to a time when people "will ask lawyers to improve law off the face of the earth, and wait till the hangman agitates for the abolition of capital punishment." Unfortunately for the organ, that appears to be precisely what the Oxford Branch of the Society it represents did. Mr. WETHERED did not come to the Society; the Society went to Mr. WETHERED. It asked him for his money, the accursed thing derived from aiding and abetting the sale of drink; it asked him for his name, his hideous "entire" name; it put before him its rules. And when the poor man took the rules seriously and thought the Society meant what it said, lo! it calls him a "disappointed brewer," who "appears to have fancied that the C.E.T.S. had no special wish to prevent drinking." Well he might, since the fundamental basis of the Society is that it does not endeavour to prevent drinking, but only to prevent excessive drinking.

In other words, these communications, both anonymous and signed, contain, if not a very well-mannered or amiable, a very ingenuous, confession that every word Mr. WETHERED has said is true. If the vile body of the moderate drinker chooses to join the Society, it may do so; if the vile purse of the moderate drinker will strengthen the sinews of war of the Society, let it by all means; for is it not well to spoil the Egyptians? Even if the abominable liquor-trader, the aider and abettor, the manufacturer, can be got at, let him be got at, and let us all relieve our souls by abusing him afterwards. The Reverend (we suppose he is Reverend) DENNIS HIRD is not a polished corner of the Temple; but, in his avowal that "he cannot answer for 'gentlemen,'" he is certainly an honest corner enough. He talks about the "undisguised misery which our present drinking laws and customs allow to prevail." What in the name of common sense is a drinking law? An enactment obliging all the lieges to go drunk to bed, to drink down to their peg at stated times? If the phrase had any meaning, that is what it would mean. Mr. DENNIS HIRD, of course, means by his absurdity the laws which regulate the sale of drink. And, according to him, every Christian must make strenuous efforts to "alter the existing evil" in these. Now observe that there is at the present moment, even in the Reverend Mr. HIRD's illegitimate sense of the word, no "drinking law" which facilitates the sale of drink. There are laws which (as some people think, not too wisely) restrain, hamper, and impede it. It is impossible to alter these (except in a sense which would set the Reverend DENNIS HIRD weeping and howling) without depriving the moderate drinker or the strictly temperate person (who is, we are told, at least equal in the eye of the C.E.T.S. with the Reverend DAWSON BURNS himself, if not superior) of his Christian liberty.

In fact, this C.E.T.S. appears to be an almost ideal example of a house divided against itself; and if it has stood hitherto, it can only be because one party of the inhabitants, with a meekness certainly Christian enough, has allowed itself to have practically nothing to do with the house except paying its expenses. Even Canon ELLISON, who has vestiges of sweet reasonableness, admits, with a delightful unconsciousness that he has swept his own legs from under him, that, though the Society's "basis" is a division of the executive into as far as possible equal proportions of moderates and abstainers, it "does not know, and has no right to ask, to which section the nominee belongs." To promise that you will have equal proportions of two unknown quantities, of two quantities which you "have no right to know," is a little rash surely. As for Mr. HIRD and the newspaper writer, the hoof of the teetotaller has stamped well through the "basis" in their case and is visibly protruding. We speak ourselves as quite impartial persons, who think a drunkard nearly as great a fool and nuisance, socially and intellectually, as a teetotaller, and (except when you come to the most acrid variety of those who put abstinence from alcohol in the place of the Deity), no doubt, a worse offender against religion and morality. To teach drunkards moderation, self-restraint, self-respect, and regard for others, is as good a work as to teach teetotallers charity, common sense, and thankfulness for the good gifts of God; and though we do not greatly love Societies for any purpose (the two Societies to which every born member of the Church and State of England belongs being enough for us), a Society for this double work would not be a bad thing. But this we do not gather that the C.E.T.S. is, even if its basis was as level as Mr. WETHERED has proved it to be unlevel.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN AT BIRMINGHAM.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S address to the Grand Committee of the Birmingham Liberal-Unionist Association—the 2,500 members of his "family," if we must humour Gladstonian witlings by adopting their little joke—was in some respects even more calculated to irritate his opponents than are his deliverances in the House of Commons. He was not, it is true, quite so actively aggressive as he is in his place in Parliament, and rather rallied than denounced the "New Radicals" of his former party. It was not, however, his brief and contemptuous references to the STOREYS and LABOUCHERES of the Opposition, and to the fact that such men alone have been the gainers by Mr. GLADSTONE'S destruction of the Liberal party—it was not these passages in his speech which Gladstonians must have read with the greatest annoyance and disgust. His practical suggestions of policy, his tactical recommendations to the Government, are likely to have caused them much more agitation and concern than the fiercest invective or the most elaborate taunt that he could have flung at them. And in particular must these emotions have been excited by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S proposal for the treatment of the Irish land question in the next Session of Parliament. Such questions, says Mr. CHAMBERLAIN very truly, ought, as far as possible, to be treated as questions of national importance and raised above the level of mere party politics, and he accordingly suggests that the Government, "instead of introducing a Bill upon which they must stake their existence, and by which they must stand or fall, should submit their proposals to Parliament in the shape of resolutions, and invite upon them a free and frank discussion and a full criticism from all quarters of the House, enlightened by which they might afterwards proceed to embody in a Bill the general Parliamentary opinions which such debate had elicited."

Now we do not say that this advice of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S either will in fact, or even ought as a matter of policy to, be adopted. Wise Governments have other things to think of than merely embarrassing their opponents; and it is not always, or perhaps often, that the path of national duty, in respect of great political questions, is also the way to party advantage. But there can at least be no manner of doubt that the method of "procedure by resolution," in dealing with unsettled Irish problems, leads straight and surely to the latter of these goals, whatever may be the case as regards the former, and that no tactics so certain to confound and paralyse the Gladstonians could possibly be adopted. Their leader's stock argument against "abstract resolutions" would be unavailable in this case—first, because the resolutions would be voted upon with a view to immediate legislative action; secondly, because his own previous failure as a legislator on this very matter can be shown to have been largely due to his own ignorance of the general drift of Parliamentary and public opinion on the "principle of the thing"; and, thirdly, and most importantly of all, because Mr. GLADSTONE himself has created the aptest of all precedents for the proposed course by the way in which he dealt with the question of the Established Church of Ireland. To be compelled, in short, to treat the Irish land question as one raised above the level of party politics is exactly the last kind of compulsion which the Opposition and its leader would like to see laid upon them. Hence the feelings with which they will regard the author of the proposal to put them in this position will be of an even more impassioned nature than ever. The New Radicals, and especially the Scotch members, will feel that he is additionally endeared to them by the triple-barbed sarcasm which he cast at them as scandalized objectors to the idea of endowing Roman Catholic education in Ireland. But that project is still more or less in the air. They do not know—indeed, nobody does—exactly how much or how little the Government mean by their declaration on the subject. But the Irish land question comes nearer and nearer to actuality every year; and to find Mr. CHAMBERLAIN already to the fore with a plan for checkmating them with respect to it must be exasperating indeed.

AGRICULTURE AND TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION.

IT is not often that an appointment of such universally recognized fitness as that of Mr. CHAPLIN to the Presidency of the Board of Agriculture is announced to the public. Mr. CHAPLIN is a hard Parliamentary hitter, and would be the last man likely to escape the criticism of his opponents in this or any other connexion, if such criticism could with any show of reason be directed against him; but none such is forthcoming. Both in point of general capacity and special qualification—and the former is in these days the claim most likely to be overlooked—he is unmistakably designated for the post; and probably even his worst Radical enemy will be forced to content himself with the sneering observation that, if Mr. CHAPLIN seems made for the office, it would be equally plausible to say that the office was made for Mr. CHAPLIN. Assuming, however, that the experiment of creating it is a hopeful one, or, at any rate, one worth trying, the public will not regard it with any less favour for its affording the means of utilizing the best expertise which Parliament can furnish for the purpose of conducting it. It is not to be denied that, if a Board of Agriculture is capable of doing anything more for agricultural interests than the State has been able to do under the somewhat haphazard administrative system which has previously existed, it is more likely to effect this under the presidency of Mr. CHAPLIN than of any other politician who could be named. The extent and thoroughness of his practical knowledge of his subject is undisputed; and those who have impartially watched his political career will agree, moreover, that he brings to his new office an amount of general intellectual vigour and special Parliamentary ability which has not yet obtained the adequate appreciation of the public.

On one circumstance, at any rate, Mr. CHAPLIN is to be congratulated, and that is, that no very exaggerated anticipations have been formed or are likely to be formed of the beneficial potency of the Act which he has to administer. In this respect it, perhaps, differs from another chapter in the Statute Book of last Session—the Technical Instruction Act. We suspect that there are more people who think that technical education will powerfully assist British industry than who believe that a Board of Agriculture will revive the prosperity of the farmer; and to the former class of persons Lord Cross had some very salutary words of advice to give at the Cutlers' Feast the other night. Let us by all means, he said, establish the schools which the Act has given us the power to establish. In them we can train up our workmen, as the German, and the Austrian, and the Belgian and other nations are training theirs. It will be our own fault if in future it can be said that their artisans are better trained. But “do not think for one moment,” Lord Cross added, “that you can teach them in school what ought to be taught in the workshop. If you think that by teaching in school you can do away with the workshop, you will commit the most fatal mistake that ever was made.” The technical school, as Lord Cross truly says, is useful only as a preparation for the workshop, and must only be so used. We trust that so only it will be used; but we are quite sure that the warning which the SECRETARY for INDIA has just uttered was not unneeded, and we are even inclined to fear that it will need many and many a repetition yet. Parliament having been at the pains to provide for the establishment of technical schools, and the great multitude of bookish talkers and writers with whom we are blessed in these days having preached, after their not very wise manner, the wonderful efficacy of these institutions, it is inevitable that many persons should regard them as substitutes for the workshop, and should spend months, or perhaps years, in them which would be much better spent in the workshop itself. This possible mischief of our latest piece of paternal legislation is one which all sensible men should do their utmost to obviate.

CURIOUS CURIOS.

THE cry about savait and pouvait comes home to an old traveller who has roamed the world in youth, with no purpose beyond diversion. It is only a man of brains and fancy who sets forth to explore the universe so soon as he becomes his own master, and perseveres till he has seen the better part. Such a one, in after years—when the beard is whitening and the joints grow stiff—must needs take up some pursuit, or, at least, a hobby. Whatever it be—scientific, artistic, or anthropological—he will bemoan his wasted opportunities. He must read in dull and vague analysis the inner meaning of sights and scenes he has himself beheld. He will perceive that facts which passed before his eyes scarcely noticed held secrets of high value. He will find that in idle wandering he crossed the track of mysteries all important now, skirted round them perhaps, with a blind indifference that seems wilful even to himself. It was in his power, perhaps, to decide questions of weight, earnestly and warmly discussed by the learned. Bitterest of all, he may see his own careless observations of the time quoted and balanced when the incident itself has almost slipped his memory. Then the despairing old lament rises fresh to his mind every hour.

We have not been quite so reckless as other travellers of this class in omitting to note down and preserve odd memorials; but by comparison with our opportunities what we have done is pitiable. Our list of curious curios may properly open in Stamboul, for it is not worth while to speak of Europe proper. There are interesting arts and examples in the Russian Empire, but they fall under the influence of the East, so far as we recollect them. They say that the Bezestan is quite ransacked, all its stores empty, and even its supplies exhausted—saving the perennial fountains of Birmingham and Paris. It is very likely. In our time there were foreigners who kept the whole area under constant survey, and bought indiscriminately everything which was strange. For years now the same process has been carried on wholesale. Foremost in the catalogue of our plunder we set two little pieces of earthenware, such as collectors term écuelles, of a manufacture which no expert of our acquaintance has identified. They are exceedingly light, very dark grey in colour, the ground closely strewn with spiculæ of a shining white metal, upon which stands out a bold and graceful pattern of ornament, jet black. In form and decoration these little things are as beautiful as striking. The merchant attributed them to Broussa; but that is his custom when at a loss. Very charming, also, are the Dervish crutches of high class—those that belonged to fashionable anchorites. We have seen them of ivory, inlaid with silver; but more common are those of ebony, inlaid with gold flowers of daintiest workmanship—perhaps we should speak of such things in the past tense. The official posture of the Dervish—as one may say—is recumbent. His crutch measures some eight inches in length, and he rests it beneath his left shoulder, while with his right hand he brandishes an article essential to his comfort and his business—the scratcher. We have seen specimens of this, also, very costly and tasteful—the finest, of ivory and gold. They always represent a hand at the extremity of a slender shaft, one to two feet long. Sometimes the fingers are clenched, the index and thumb extended. Our example—to which a tragic story is attached—shows a hand half-closed upon a snake, which curls and twists in such a manner that it would scratch with a vengeance, the belly being roughened. This implement is of large size, made from very heavy wood, in two pieces only; its shaft, near an inch in diameter, is carved à jour at the base, very boldly and accurately, in the fashion of chain-work, with a loose ring cut out of the solid. Some one, perhaps the Dervish himself, must have occupied the best part of a lifetime in shaping this object. With it he drummed upon his alms-box—a cocoa-nut sculptured and polished, one of the double ones from the Seychelles for choice—and scratched his back, and occasionally administered a smart tap to the uncharitable. He tapped too hard once, being drunk, they say, and fractured the skull of a child, outside the door of Alla-ooden Bey, an Albanian chief, and a finished gentleman, who was abused like a pickpocket in certain English papers just before the war.

We have a great liking for the Albanians, and an intense admiration for all their work—of the peaceful kind. Among the peoples to whom wide travel has introduced us there is not one that shows the sense of beauty and fitness, which combined form taste, in a degree to be compared with these gallant savages. They stand among modern races as Hellenes stood among the ancient; but, of course, their opportunities are very, very few and narrow. Yet, if it can be said that all they do is striking and beautiful, no higher praise may be given to man. In every collection of curios examples of their favourite decoration—gold or silver and coral—may be found. The great majority of these are imitation, but so fine is the idea that they must needs be effective. A “set” of weapons, really good, such as used to be common in the Bezestan, but uncommonly dear, is to our mind a joy for ever. One may study it from every point of view—form, grace, and colour—and it delights. The most superb piece of embroidery we ever saw, in Court, or Trésor, or museum, is a fringed handkerchief bought from the head of an Albanian girl. It has nothing of our “patterns.” Upon a dull, dun ground, profusely shaded with embroidery of a somewhat paler hue, stand shapeless devices in black outline filled with brilliant scarlet, but touched here and there with sky-blue—such a study of colour as our experience of art cannot parallel. And assuredly it was no chance success, for we have seen many of the same order, though none so grand. Whether the superb maiden from whom it was bought at Antivari was herself the genius who made that design could not be ascertained; but it is probable. There are goldsmiths and artificers, of course, in Albania; but every man seems to be prepared to take a pan of charcoal, a blow-pipe, and any sort of tool that comes to hand, and shape a pretty thing in metal “out of his own head”; it is so probably with the women in their department. Sailing once along those shores we observed a Ghegghe warrior, with stomach armoured in handsome weapons, who wore around his neck a chain of twisted silver wire, from which hung two long cordons, both beautiful, but one supreme in its ingenious and complicated grace.

A Ghegghe is as proud a man as can be found—so proud and so conscious of his worth, that one may say to him without offence what feeble souls would regard as insulting—but only with extreme courtesy!—if that be omitted it is safer to address a Pathan Ghazi. So, after due formalities, we asked this fine fellow if he would sell his chain. “Two lire,” said he quite calmly, and put it into our hands. In explanation of the low price he stated that it was his own work—and doubtless he had looted the silver. In the Far East we shall have to mention such amateur artificers again, if we live to tell the curios of that interesting region; Turkey is not nearly exhausted yet. Among Circassians, also, many warriors execute their own jewelry and so forth, and that, too, in the lovely enamel called “Tulla,” from the name of the Russian town where Catherine established a colony of these artists. But the Tulla work of commerce, admired by inexperience, is a grotesque caricature of the native manufacture. Very many Russian officers have their sword-hilts so adorned. When we once expressed rapture unfeigned over a beautiful specimen worn by the Grand Duke Nicolas Nicolaivitch, he mentioned that it was wrought by a private in his Guard, a Terek Cossack—that is, Circassian—and assured us that the same man would make a facsimile for three Imperials. The finest examples of Tulla enamel which can be obtained in open market—sometimes—are those drinking cups used by ladies at the bath in harems of the rich. The material is beshtlik silver—obtained by melting the debased coinage, usually gilt, and finely granulated on the outer surface. Devices large and bold, jet-black in the shadows, so to speak, blurred to an inky brown in the lights, stand forth grandly on this background of rough gold. They have no particular shape, though symmetrically repeated, and linked by festooned scrolls after the manner of garlands. There is perhaps a vague suggestion of spears and swords and flags arranged in a trophy, but nothing definite. Such art rises above form and method. We possess, however, a very ancient example of Tulla work, from which the enamel is almost smoothed away. Upon this box two figures, distinctly Persian in character, are spurring, with lances poised, towards a castle surrounded with trees. Nothing of the sort is produced nowadays in Circassia or elsewhere. If the art was originally Persian, it has been vastly improved.

Sheik 'Mtier, that supreme ruffian who betrayed and put to death poor Palmer and his comrades, introduced us to a style of embroidery hitherto unfamiliar. The fancy could not conceive a more striking type than his—tall, lean, majestic, always still in attitude, but watching—watching without a blink—his eyes strangely shadeless, keen and round as a vulture's, turning from one person to another unwearied, hour after hour, during those long conferences. We have seen many Bedouins, but never one who showed so clearly in his face the consciousness that all men's hands are raised against his people, and the assurance also that he himself could well hold his own. The Sheikh's grand figure was always enveloped in a black burnoose, but under the tasselled rope which bound his head he wore a scarf gorgeously worked in gold over the whole surface. That was the finishing touch to a superb picture—not undesigned. The savage chief knew well what he was doing, assuredly, when he crowned the wide and stately folds of his black cloak with a golden glory, and surrounded his dark, terrible face with sheeny silk. It would never have done to propose “trade” to a Bedouin of this legendary type, but with some hesitation Professor Palmer asked whence came his remarkable scarf. “Mecca,” 'Mtier replied in his brief way, looking at us the while with a gaze of such intense and concentrated scrutiny, that if we had really thought of stealing the Kaaba we should have felt very uncomfortable. Specimens of this manufacture are not easily found, but they repay much trouble in the search. It would seem that there are two classes of scarf known as Mecca embroidery—the one narrow, adorned at each end with gold work disposed in long triangles, after the fashion so oddly prevalent from Montenegro to Samarcand among the less artistic peoples. The other class is much larger, and covered with gold in a very intricate design, while the ends are decorated with those same triangles, two to three feet long. Merchants of Cairo do not know how these things are made. The grandest piece of gold cloth that ever came before our notice is probably from Mecca—it was the State napkin of Sultan Mahmoud's Caffajee, which that official wore over his left hand and arm when presenting the tray. This glorious object is cream-white silk, closely woven with gold stars on one face, with gold squares on the other. The border has a charming pattern in flowers of gold on pale blue ground, which is reversed on the other side. One might form very erroneous notions of the taste and beauty displayed in old Turkish dress from objects like this. The contrast of its graceful and costly magnificence with the threadbare tail-coat and ill-arranged white tie of the Caffajee now officiating at Yildiz, is too grotesquely sad. But it is the one utility of that Museum called “of the Janissaries,” beside the Hippodrome, that it removes any feeling of the sort. A tail-coat may be vulgar and sordid, but it is not offensive, like the phenomenon of ugliness and bad taste there on view—the authentic livery whereof this charming scarf was a detail. But the greatest of Mecca work is a singularly bold, loose style of embroidery upon cloth of black camel's-hair. The stitches rise high in stiff little loops of extremely brilliant colour, and the effect thus produced is but ill described by the word gorgeous. No skilled workwoman of our acquaintance has been able as yet to copy this stitch, and we cannot consent to pull our noble cloth to pieces. Smaller examples might be found, however.

From Stamboul and Egypt and Arabia we may conveniently pass to India—but not to-day. It was our intention to exhaust the world of curious curios when we sat down; we have only touched a corner of it.

THE PHILANTHROPY OF MR. TUPMAN.

A BUSINESS like that of the dockers' strike is always fertile in studies for the anthropologist, and it is only to be regretted that some of its aspects almost necessarily engross attention to the neglect of the others. We treat elsewhere the general and important aspect as well as some of the minor ones—such as that eminent piece of human nature, the evidence given by the ship-owners of their sense of the great truth that the dockowners' difficulty is as much the shipowners' opportunity as ever England's difficulty was the opportunity of what Shakspeare, with a most improper and unusual, but no doubt purely dramatic, illiberality, calls “the weasel Scot.” We may or we may not double upon some things; we must omit or pass lightly over some. Such, for instance, is the curious pertinacity with which at such times what may be called the Household Words style of journalism is revived. It is not, we think, very effective now, for it has long ago been surpassed by the still more palpitating actuality of the journals of the gutter. Even the reader most guiltless of the knowledge of “Satan's Invisible World Displayed” must by this time have more than an inkling of the way in which it is done, and of the fact that any person at all skilled in the craft can write a paper of the kind just as well comfortably sitting in his room and never having stirred out of it as after a weary perambulation to Limehouse and Shadwell. But it still goes on, and the “gaunt docker” with “wan, stern smiles,” and his children with “pinched countenances,” and his wife with a “dazed look,” and all the rest of it, continue to be served out exactly as if they were hot and hot, and not the veriest Jacks of Dover that had ever been warmed up out of a penny-a-liner's own head a hundred times over. God forbid that we should jeer at gauntness, or at anything of the kind, if it were a reality! But the things to which we refer are to any one who has the faintest power of telling true metal from false mere shams in themselves, whether or no there be somewhere at the same time, owing to the folly of some folk and the scoundrelism of others, realities of which the shams are pitiful counterfeits.

For the present, however, we intend pretty much to confine ourselves to a single and definite subject—the truly mirifical and stupendous exhibition which has been made in the last week or two of that peculiar virtue, the philanthropy of the vicarious and Tupmannic kind which refers deserving objects to other persons for relief in money and in kind. It has been a commonplace of newspapers to talk of the “sympathy” shown to the strikers. At first, we believe, there was a not inconsiderable amount of sympathy, which was quite respectable, genuine, and of such a kind that a rational man need not have blushed to share it. The dock labourers were commonly reported, if not exactly known, to be paid on scales considerably lower (all things taken into consideration) than, let us say, the scales of remuneration of a political agitator, or a newspaper proprietor who runs down the Court, and fills his columns with Court tittle-tattle, or a minister of any denomination who lives on pew-rents, and is popular. The most elaborate and solemn assurances were given that the strike was to be conducted on the strictest principles of abstinence from intimidation. A very few days showed that all this was mere bosh. It was not to be a fair battle between men who (as they had a perfect right to do) chose to withhold their labour and take the consequences and men who (as they had an equal right to do) tried to supply their want of that labour as best they could. The strike leaders tried to paralyse all the industries of London, and partly succeeded. They bid for a general collapse of trade, and only sulkily withdrew the bid. Thousands of their pickets threatened and maltreated poor wretches whose only crime was the offering of honest labour at the price it would fetch. This very soon altered the views of people of common sense. But it did not alter the views of Mr. Tupman. He continued, from under a Cardinal's hat, from out of a curate's cassock, from every conceivable garb—even, we regret deeply to say, from within the venerable form of our friend Mr. Punch (who may, perhaps, be not “all there,” to judge from the festive contents of part of his week's number)—to implore other people to relieve distress, to scold other people because they did not relieve distress, to preach sermons of a high and melancholy morality as to the gross selfishness of those dock directors who would not give up to the dockers the possible dividend due, not merely to themselves, but to their trustors the shareholders. He, Mr. Tupman, was quite willing to give up other people's money; why should the directors boggle? And the miraculous thing is that there are some people who have taken Mr. Tupman's advice. Some of these we understand. Cardinal Manning is naturally as prodigal of the goods of dock shareholders as his brethren Archbishops Walsh and Croke of the goods of landlords. Eminent politicians, through the safe channels of their wives and sons-in-law, can cast bread upon the waters with a tolerable certainty of finding it after days more or fewer. Less eminent politicians understand the virtues of “ground-baiting” seats. “One Whose Blood Boils at Tyranny” or “Anthrophophilus Theoblasphemon Snooks” may cheaply purchase the sight of these designations in print by sending one-and-sevenpence-halfpenny to The Nightman or The Farthing Candle. But there would seem to be a certain number of the public—the genuine, good, stupid public—who have obeyed Mr. Tupman and subscribed, without the least appreciation of the rod that they are putting in pickle for their own backs to suffer and for Mr. John Burns to wield.

The state of mind of the people who do this—who subscribe money to feed the idle unemployed into a condition of health strong enough to “bash” industrious blacklegs into mummies—is exceedingly well illustrated by a coroner’s juror at Poplar on Tuesday. The case was one of those too common cases—each of which is, in effect, a case of manslaughter by the strikers—in which an unskilled workman, put on to do work which Cardinal Manning’s and Mr. Tupman’s protégés refuse to do, fell down a hold and was killed. Cardinal Manning’s and Mr. Tupman’s protégés might not improbably have given him not less hard measure if he had not fallen down the hold; but that may be passed. Hear the words of the sapient juror:—“If the Company had employed experienced workmen the accident would, in all probability, never have happened. At the present time the Companies advertise and take on anybody, and I think it is scandalous.” When one reads words like this one is, as old authors say, “filled with admiration and deep muse,” after indulging which for some time many things become clear to the mind. This juror can hardly have been an acknowledged lunatic; he must, from the allusions in his remarks, have been aware that there is a strike on, that the Companies desire nothing so much as to “employ experienced workmen,” and that the experienced workmen prefer to listen to Mr. Burns, to take strike pay, to do nothing except bash a blackleg now and then. But he thought it scandalous, not of the men, but of the Companies.

This kind of person no doubt it is who, in different ranks of life, supplies what may be called the genuine subscription to the strike funds. He has been told by agitators, by sentimentalists, by interested politicians, by interested clerics, by newspapers, that the men “don’t get their rights.” It never occurs to him that, if at the present moment the Companies adopted the utmost principle of liberality according to Mr. Tupman and handed over their whole net earnings to Mr. Burns’s lambs, it would hardly give the labourer what he demands, certainly not what he would demand later. Still less, of course, does it occur to him that capital will hardly care in future to start and maintain enterprises the profits of which are to depend on Manning-Tupman philanthropy; or that, as not only theory, but bitter experience shows, nothing in the world is easier than to quarrel with your bread and scrape till you may cry in vain even for dry bread because the trade which gave it you had gone elsewhere. No! He has been told to “sympathize with the docker,” and he “sympathizes” at the bidding of Mr. Tupman.

But is Mr. Tupman himself sincere? Very often, no doubt, he is not; but probably he sometimes, and even not seldom, is. When we get good Mr. Broadhurst getting up and plaintively asking in full Trades-Union Congress whether he may not do what he likes with his own and buy shares in such and such a Company, another glare of light bursts on the mind. The general Trade-Union theory, the plea for relief for these strikers, looks, in the light of Mr. Broadhurst’s plea for his possession of shares which pay twenty-five per cent. (we wish we had some), very much as the Poplar juror’s theory of the scandalousness of the Companies who won’t employ experienced workmen looks in face of the fact that the experienced workmen decline to be employed; and as Cardinal Manning’s generosity at the expense of A, who is trustee for B, looks in the light, let us say, of the story of Saint Martin and the Cloak. Ah, what a foolish man Saint Martin was, and how the princes and saints of what calls itself his Church have improved since his day! If the saint had only had some of Cardinal Manning’s lights, he would have cut somebody else’s cloak for the beggar, and preached (with universal approval) a sermon of reprobation in case the hardened offender had objected. But they were benighted persons in those days. In fact, if Saint Martin, who was a military man, had come upon pickets employed in “turning a man round till his clothes came off him” (the words of a friendly reporter), and so forth, we really do fear that, instead of drawing his sword to cut his cloak, Saint Martin would have drawn it to administer a little correction, perhaps with the flat, perhaps with the edge, to the heroic pickets who are supported by the charity which Mr. Tupman tells other people to give.

RACING.

TEN thousand pounds are said to have been offered and refused, two or three years ago, for The Baron, who won the Brighton Cup, and six thousand are understood to have been given not long ago for Vasistas, who ran second for it. The Baron is what is called a disappointing horse, and with good reason; yet, like many horses thus described, he has paid his way, having won more than 5,000*l.* in stakes, and with his good looks and good breeding he ought to make a valuable stallion. That such a moderate horse, however, as he has turned out should have beaten the winner of this year’s Grand Prix de Paris says little for the field that ran in the latter race, although The Baron himself had run second for a Grand Prix in his day. It cannot be said that Vasistas pleased the British critics, who called him a narrow, mean-looking plater. He was beaten again for another race at Brighton by Whistle Jacket, whose price of 3,600 guineas seemed quite small in comparison with his own; but he was meeting him at a disadvantage of a stone at weight for age. Those who went to the Northern Meetings during the week after Goodwood saw some curious examples of in-and-out running. On the Monday, at Ripon, Mr. C. J. Cunningham’s Blair Hope was last in a very moderate field of four horses, after starting at the long price of 12 to 1; on the Thursday he was backed at half those odds, and was barely beaten a neck by Warlabby, after a very close race. For the Claro Plate for two-year-olds, at Ripon, 9 to 2 was laid on Lockhart, who had won all the four races for which he had started, having beaten, among others, Prince of Tyre, a winner of eight races; yet, wonderful to relate, he was now beaten a length and a half by Mr. T. Holmes’s Dauntless, who had been unplaced to him on only 2 lbs. worse terms twelve days earlier. We may anticipate here by saying that at Stockton he was beaten a length by Mr. McGregor, and that last week, at York, Mr. McGregor was unplaced to him when he won the Gimcrack Stakes, although they were meeting at almost the same weights. It is but fair to mention the fact that the race at Stockton was run in a heavy storm, and that the course was boggy in one part, and under such conditions some excuse must be made for apparently inconsistent running.

At Lewes none of the more brilliant two-year-old performers of the season ran for the Astley Stakes, and the favourite was Mr. Maple’s Biondina, the winner of the Corporation Stakes at Brighton on the previous Tuesday. Garter was second favourite, and Bena, Cushat, and Spring Cup were backed next at the same odds; but Porter, the trainer, won the race with Sanfoin, an outsider at 8 to 1 that had never run in public before. As he was receiving 10 lbs. from the remarkably good-looking, but rather moderate, performer, Garter, who ran second, he has not yet become entitled to be considered of the first class, especially if the rumour be true that Garter was interfered with by Spring Cup near the distance. With Stockwell within the third degree on each of the extreme sides of his pedigree, and four strains of Birdcatcher and two of Touchstone in the course of it, Sanfoin’s blood is excellent. He has plenty of length, rather high quarters, and grand shoulders. Altogether, this handsome chestnut colt ought to turn out a capital bargain on his yearling price of 550 guineas; indeed, it is said that 3,000*l.* was offered for him within a day or two of his victory. Unfortunately, although he is entered for the Derby, St. Leger, and several other important races of next year, he was, at the time of the Lewes Meeting, without any further engagements for this season, and, worse still, he is reported to be a sufferer from rheumatism.

A still more illustrious rheumatic patient appeared, after a long absence from public racecourses, at the Redcar Second Summer Meeting. This was Mr. C. Perkins’s Chitabob, whom many people had considered the best two-year-old of last season. The Tenth Great National Breeder’s Foal Stakes was his first race of the year, and, with much extra weight on his back, he won with the greatest ease from a very second-rate field. It was a dull race enough, nor was it one of large monetary value; nevertheless, it aroused a great deal of interest and excitement, as it had the effect of establishing a strong second favourite for the St. Leger, and not a few good judges asked whether this grand, powerful, bright-chestnut son of Robert the Devil might not yet turn out to be the best colt of the year. Two days later, Chevalier Ginistrelli’s Signorina, by winning the Berkshire Plate for two-year-olds at Windsor, brought up her gains in stakes to 8,071*l.* This was her sixth unbroken victory, and thus far she was the largest two-year-old winner of the season. Another brilliant two-year-old, Lord Zetland’s Margarine, won the Wynyard Plate of 750*l.* at Stockton, giving weight to everything in the race. She is by Petrarch out of a mare by the Duke, out of a Melbourne mare, and her depth of girth, good shoulders, square quarters, and excellent limbs delighted the critics. On the following day, Lord Zetland won the Hardwicke Stakes at the same meeting with another two-year-old, his grey colt Fontainebleau, who now won his first victory. He is a well-topped colt; but some authorities on horseflesh object to his feet, and judging from his previous form, as well as from his subsequent defeat at York, he must be very moderate. Lord Zetland won the Great Northern St. Leger on the same afternoon with Pinzon, who gave Workington 3 lbs. and beat him by a head, while the winner of the Oaks finished half a dozen lengths behind them. On this form Mr. E. Lascelles’s Nunthorpe, who had beaten Workington easily by three-quarters of a length at even weights at Redcar, appeared to be at least as good, and possibly even better, than Pinzon, who could only just beat Workington when giving him 3 lbs.; but, as we shall show presently, this did not prove to be the case. Although he has lost a great many races, Pinzon has won 3,000*l.* in stakes, and in this he must be considered lucky, for had not Gulliver fallen lame in the race for the Midland Derby of 1,379*l.*, it is unlikely that Pinzon would have beaten him by half a length, even when receiving 4 lbs. On the first day of the Stockton Meeting, a so-called “good thing” proved a failure for the Stockton Handicap. As soon as the betting opened 3 to 1 was taken about Mr. C. Perkins’s St. Martin, a four-year-old that had never won a race; and more and more money was invested on him until he reached a fraction less than 2 to 1. Why he should have been so heavily backed public form does not tell us. He now beat everything except Mr. R. Osborne's Countess Lilian, an outsider who started at 14 to 1, and diverted the intended gains of St. Martins's backers into other channels.

There was a good day's racing on the Tuesday of the York Meeting. Mr. Maple's ill-tempered colt, Hugo, disappointed the army of backers that made him first favourite by refusing to make even a pretence of racing for the Lonsdale Plate, while Colonel Forester's rather lightly-made Stone Cross, who started at 10 to 1, won by a neck after a capital race with an even greater outsider. The odds of 2 to 1 which were laid on Mr. H. Milner's Antibes for the Yorkshire Oaks were hardly justified; for it was all that she could do to beat Minthe, who was giving her 3 lbs., by a neck, and, at the weights, one filly may be said to have run about as well as the other. For the One Thousand Antibes had been unplaced to Minthe, a fact which may give some idea of the improvement made by the former filly between the spring and the autumn. Mr. C. J. Blake's Killowen, a good-looking chestnut colt by Arbitrator, that had never run in public before, was made favourite for the Great Breeder's Convivial Produce Stakes; but he only ran third, the race being won by Mr. W. Low's Right Away, an own brother to Veracity that had cost 1,150 guineas as a yearling. Among the unplaced horses were Fontainebleau, the winner of the already mentioned Hardwicke Stakes at Stockton, and L'Abbé Morin, another winner. Right Away's success did honour to Le Nord, who had given him 5 lbs. and a beating by a length at Goodwood. For the second time in a couple of hours a race was won by a 10 to 1 outsider, when Mr. J. Bibby's St. Kentigern won the Bradgate Park Stakes; and the last race of the day fell to almost as great an outsider, in Zeno, who started at 8 to 1, and won by eight lengths. Lord Penrhyn's Far Niente, a well-shaped two-year-old colt, with plenty of bone, by Galliard, won his first race, after six failures, in the Badminton Plate.

On the second day, at the York Meeting, the Duke of Westminster's Blue Green was made a better favourite than Lord Zetland's Margarine in a field of sixteen for the Prince of Wales's Stakes, because he was to receive 12 lbs. from that filly. As soon as he had arrived at the post he began to show temper, and eventually he became almost unmanageable. When the flag fell he was the last to get off, yet he gradually overhauled the leading horses, and ran Margarine to half a length; so it is reasonable to suppose that he would have won if he had had a fair start, not that there would have been much credit in beating Margarine at the weights. Backers showed great discrimination in their betting on the Great Ebor Handicap, as the first, second, and third favourites ran first, second, and third in the race. These three horses were carrying the heaviest weights in the handicap, and their relative positions were in proportion to their weights—the heaviest being borne by the winner. It was undoubtedly a good performance on the part of Mr. J. Lowther's King Monmouth to win by a length and a half under 8 st. 12 lbs.; and the Australian horse Ringmaster ran well under his 7 st. 13 lbs.; while Mr. Maple's Peeler was a bad third. King Monmouth has now been racing for six years, and he has won about 11,000*l.* in stakes. Mr. J. Lowther had the further good fortune of winning the last race of the day, the Ebor St. Leger, with Workington, who gave Mr. H. Hall's Quartus, a colt that had been backed for the Doncaster St. Leger, 4 lbs. and a beating by a length and a half. As will be inferred from races which we have already described, this running represented Quartus inferior to Pinzon, and apparently even more so to Nunthorpe.

It would be no exaggeration to say that the Great Yorkshire Stakes, which was worth the comparatively small sum, for these days, of 655*l.*, was one of the most interesting races run since the Derby in relation to the St. Leger. There were rumours that Chitabob was a non-stayer, and he was now to be tried over a mile and three-quarters with the St. Leger colts, Pinzon, Nunthorpe, and Scottish Fusilier. Odds were laid upon Chitabob, and he won; but this was not all; for, as soon as Fagan allowed him to go to the front, he had his three opponents completely at his mercy; and although, through his jockey's easing him at the distance—rather too liberally in the opinion of some racing critics—Pinzon was enabled to finish at his girths, it was obvious that he could have won by several lengths if he had been allowed to do so. As we said above, recent running had pointed to Nunthorpe as being at least as good as Pinzon, yet Pinzon now beat Nunthorpe with the greatest ease. The race for the Great Yorkshire Stakes effected a revolution in the betting on the St. Leger; but we must, for the present, leave the question of its special bearing upon that event to the adventurous army of racing prophets; this much, however, we may say, that it revived an interest in what had threatened to be a singularly dull St. Leger.

This week, at Derby, Captain Machell's fine, lengthy Hermit filly, Heresy, beat a field of fourteen for the Champion Breeders' Foal Stakes, giving 8 lbs. and a beating by three-quarters of a length to Mr. De la Rue's Dearest, who had cost 1,700 guineas as a yearling. As much as 12 to 1 was laid against the winner. Signorina added 800*l.* to her winnings by cantering in before a good second-rate field for the Harrington Stakes; and on the same day St. Peter, by Peter, achieved his first victory in a field of eighteen for the Devonshire Nursery Handicap, winning by a neck from Mr. W. Low's Gold Wing, who had cost her owner

2,600 guineas last season. Mr. J. Lowther's Workington won the Breeders' St. Leger "hands down by a length" from Antibes, and, indirectly, his victory increased the confidence of the backers of Chitabob for the St. Leger.

THE CAMBRIANS IN BRITTANY.

IT was a happy thought, in the best sense of that much-abused term, that the antiquarians of Wales should have their annual campaign in Brittany this year. For Brittany is one of the most fascinating countries in Europe for antiquarians, whatever their nationality may be, and to educated Welshmen it could hardly help being doubly so. Leaving aside, however, the Breton language, which tickles the Welshman's ear with a sort of quaint mockery of his own, one of the first things to strike him is the old-fashioned ways of the people, as compared with what he has seen in Wales or met with in England. Here he notices a method of threshing which greatly exercises him, there he comes across a plough which he cannot understand, and he constantly witnesses the prevalence of a creed which he somewhat promiscuously associates with the dark ages. For the visible symbols of Latin Christianity meet him at every point, and frequently in very crude forms. The other day we passed a roadside cross of so primitive an appearance that in one respect it reminded us of some Irish figures of the eighth or ninth century, and altogether it gave us the idea of its being very old; but, on mentioning it to an authority on Breton matters and a native of the district, he assured us that, so far from the cross being some nine or ten centuries old, its maker was still living at a neighbouring town and thriving on the profits of his pursuit of the fine arts. This crucifier of lapidary monsters had discovered, beyond all doubt, a short cut to one goal of the sculptor's ambition, the great art of concealing art. So one has to be cautioned continually against the error of regarding mere crudity as a mark of age in Brittany.

The first day of the excursion on the French side of the Channel was spent in travelling to Vannes, and a pretty long day it was, thanks to the slowness of French trains. With the next day began the real business of the Association, the inspection of the contents of the museum. There everybody naturally expects to find the archaeological spoils of the district; but few who have not been at Vannes can form any adequate idea of the wealth of prehistoric and Galloroman treasures to be seen in the museum; at any rate, that is decidedly our impression, when we call to mind, for the purposes of comparison, the contents, for example, of the barrows explored by Canon Greenwell in England. Some of the celts are unsurpassable, to say nothing of the necklaces of callais, the Galloroman torques, and other objects of value. The museum owes a great part of its present wealth to finds made since the year 1850, and the whole is arranged in three departments. The first of these is devoted to prehistoric objects, which are grouped, to some extent, with reference to the localities in which they were found. The next department is devoted to the bronzes and various things of Galloroman origin; while the third consists of objects belonging to the middle ages. In one respect the Cambrians were unfortunate—the finest prehistoric objects from Tumiach had been lent to the Paris Exhibition. On the other hand, they were allowed access to private collections, such as that of M. de Limur. And that contained in a house dating from about the middle of the seventeenth century, representing unchanged the dwellings of provincial gentlemen anterior to the French Revolution, and reminding one to some extent of the palaces of Florence; you missed only the powder and the elaborate dress of the period to complete the picture such as it was in the eighteenth century. Brittany is slow of change even when pushed from beyond by revolutions on the banks of the Seine.

At Vannes the visitors were successful in enlisting the able and disinterested services of a well-known Breton archæologist, Dr. de Closmadeuc, President of the Société Polymathique, under whose auspices most of the works of search in the Morbihan were conducted. By his advice, a steamboat was secured for the excursion of the following day, which enabled the party to reach the points of interest in a most comfortable fashion. As the vessel paddled about in the gulf of the Morbihan the view changed every minute, and Dr. de Closmadeuc plied his fellow Brythons at every point with the place-names, which were in most cases such as the Kymry were at once able to equate or compare with the same or similar names in the Principality. This was by way of amusement accompanied by an indication of the spots where the Doctor and his friends had found the objects which the party examined at Vannes. Presently some of the spots themselves were visited, and many a covered alley carefully scanned, candle in hand. The first and far the most curious of its kind was that in Gavrinis, where the stones of the building are more elaborately and completely covered with ornamentation than any others visited in the district. Here the archæologists wise in lapidary matters had a little discussion whether the carving had been done before or after the stones had been fixed in their places; but some tree-like ornamentation in a recess was discovered to make for the former view. Its advocates seemed also, later in the day, to score a point when one of the supports of a dolmen at Locmariaker covered a portion of the carved under-surface of the capstone. As the party included in its number several sceptical spirits, one missed the airing of wild theories usual on occasions of the kind, and even the great menhirs failed to elicit a single expression of genuine belief in phallic worship. However, the Doctor had a theory which we must not pass over in silence. Besides the dolmens and menhirs visited, a cromlech was shown on an islet called Er Lanic, opposite Gavr Inis. A part only of this cromlech is now visible, the rest being under water; nor is that all, for hard by lies another cromlech which is wholly covered by the sea. On these facts, for such they seem to be, the Breton archæologist builds an important theory. Before, however, we make any further reference to it, we must explain that a cromlech in the language of French archæology means a circle of large stones, while what is called in Wales a cromlech is in Brittany a dolmen, the latter word being interpreted to mean a stone table, in reference to the capstone supported by upright stones. The word is somewhat incorrectly formed from real Breton words of the Vannes dialect—namely tol, “a table” (with the article it becomes an dol, “the table”), and men, “a stone”; but those of the party who were word-wise failed to find any peasant in the habit of calling the dolmen near his dwelling ann dol men. The same applies to the word cromlech, the use of which may, for anything we know, be confined to archæologists. In any case the question forces itself upon us, how the word cromlech came to differ so much in meaning in Wales and Brittany. Now, from the submerged cromlechs of Er Lanic, Dr. de Cloismadeuc argues that, since the time when the stones were set up, the island, or rather the whole neighbourhood, has subsided very considerably. In fact, he goes so far as to think that the whole archipelago of the Morbihan Gulf was then a part of the mainland, traversed by a single river and its tributaries. Thus Gavr Inis and the other islands would have no existence as such at that time, and this theory has been accepted by such authorities as Desjardins, who would apply it to Galloroman times. But the Breton doctor refuses to have the date of the building of the cromlechs brought down to the Galloroman period, as he would rather suppose them set up an indefinite length of time anterior to Cæsar’s destruction of the power of the Veneti and the Armoric league. It is but right, however, to add that he not only admits that the subsidence is still going on, but that he has himself adduced facts serving to mark the more recent stages in its progress. On the other hand, the formation of the Gulf of the Morbihan since Cæsar’s time serves him as an explanation of the impossibility at the present day of discovering the towns and ports alluded to in Cæsar’s passages referring to the Veneti.

This day spent in the Morbihan was a long and busy one, which was ended by the return of the party to Auray, where a Cambrian deeply impressed with the belief in the permanence of ancient habits and customs found the prehistoric hatchet pictured on the dolmens still in use for splitting wood for fuel. We are here tempted to leave the business of the excursion for a moment in order to notice one of the other pleasures of the day, that of beholding beautiful scenery. Auray is very well situated, and the view on both sides of the river as you come up the stream is very fine. Here and there it reminded some of the party of the prettiest bits of the Menai Straits, and to its natural charms of sheets of water, green fields, and groves it added the interest attaching to antiquity, in the form of the remains of a Roman aqueduct which once crossed the river; in Wales the footprints of ancient Rome are far fewer and much harder to trace. But what one misses most in Breton scenery is mountains, and this deficiency prepares one to find the Vannetais word mané, “mountain,” brought down to mean a mount in the sense in which that word was used by Pennant and others of his time for what is now more usually called a mound or tumulus. It is needless to say that the guide-books industriously mix up mané with men, “a stone,” and that the reader would do well to make it a rule to skip the etymologies with which they are abundantly adorned.

The next day was spent in visiting Plouharnel and Carnac, together with many other places of interest on the way. The museum at Plouharnel was inspected, and the still richer one formed by James Miln at Carnac; but the new feature of the day’s work was the walk to the lines of standing stones characteristic of the district. The mystery of the origin of these alignments, as they are called, is perhaps more inscrutable than that of the dolmens and cromlechs; but otherwise they are, to our thinking, far less interesting. The day after was devoted to Erdeven, Courconno, and other places rich in the same attractions as those of the two previous days. Then came Sunday, with its much-needed rest; but some of the party, so far from resting, exerted themselves to find a church where a Breton sermon might be heard; not, as they learned, an easy matter in the month of August. Monday was spent in travelling from Auray to Morlaix, but with stoppages which admitted of one’s visiting the chief points of interest at Quimper and some other places of note in Brittany. Morlaix now became the headquarters for two or three days, and from that town excursions were made to the Cathedral at St.-Pol de Léon, with its remarkable architecture and other objects of curiosity and legend; nor was Roscoff, with its enormous fig-tree, left out of the programme. The last day at Morlaix was spent in visiting the seventeenth-century church of St. Thégonnec, Guimiliau, and other points of attraction. In the Morbihan the prehistoric work of man figured so largely in the foreground that the Cambrians, while there, were comparatively little attracted by the specimens of Christian art to be found in the district; but from the moment they came to Morlaix it was otherwise, and their attention was fully directed to the architecture, the calvaries, the relics, and other things associated with the churches and shrines of the diocese.

The last working day of the Association began with the inspection of the church of Brelevenez at Lannion, of which we may briefly say that the various interests attaching to it are far greater than any one could gather from what the guide-books known to us choose to tell their readers. From Lannion the excursionists drove in the direction of Perros Guirec to a house called Ros-map-Amon. It was, however, not to see a stupendous dolmen or menhir, it was not to scan the successive styles of architecture in the structure of an ancient church; it was to see and hear the most famous of living Bretons. For in this pleasant retreat M. Renan loves to pass his summers in comfort and hard work. The books he requires are few, but one of them is thumbed out of all shape. In the last extremity he could spare even that, as he knows its contents by heart—it is the Bible. After he had received the party with his usual politeness and good humour, he gave them a speech of the kind which is so well known as an essential element at the Celtic dinners in Paris; but, alas! there was no reporter from Paris present. It turned partly on the nature of the objects to be inspected in the course of the afternoon, partly on the general character of the ancient saints of Brittany. Here he dwelt on the fact that Rome never thoroughly liked Celtic saints, and he related an anecdote showing how a priest in this district recently managed to get rid of the statue of an honest old Breton saint in order to set up in its place that of the Virgin of Lourdes.

Then the excursionists proceeded, led by Mme. Renan and her husband, to the old church of Perros. M. Renan himself was, however, more interested in a church reached a little later—namely, that of Notre Dame de la Clarté, which is remarkable both in itself and in its conspicuous position. Thence he led the party towards the seashore, to feast their eyes on objects more ancient than the church, more ancient even than any prehistoric work of man to be seen in Brittany, or elsewhere—we mean the quaint and stupendous erections fringing the coast, the cheese-wrings and rocking-stones left in position by the giant forces of nature when she had nothing else for their idle hands to do. In the distance he directed our attention to Enez Aval, or the Apple Island. The makers of guide-books sometimes call it the Isle of Agalon or Avalon, which enables them to put Arthur to sleep there in security; but the Breton peasant knows nothing of his presence there, and the whole story looks suspiciously like a borrowed one suggested by the name of the island. One may be allowed to observe in this context that the stories about Arthur in Brittany have but a very precarious existence. It is true that we have known a Breton scholar to argue seriously for St.-Michel-en-Grève, a low and level site in this district, as the scene of Arthur’s despatching the giant Dinabuc, and not Mont St.-Michel in Normandy. We have never succeeded, however, in discovering much in the way of place-names commemorative of Arthur in Brittany, such as frequently occur in Wales and the North-country as far as the river Forth.

On the return of the party from the cliffs they came across a little sandy cove with a quaint shrine. This proved to contain the wooden statue of St. Guirec, and the presence of M. Renan was most fortunate, as he is never happier than when discussing a question of what we may perhaps term Christian anthropology. For St. Guirec is the object of a curious practice on the part of the maidens of the neighbourhood. Those who wish to be married pay stealthy visits to the shrine, and stick pins in the poor saint’s person—that is supposed to ensure their being mated within the year. The continuance of the belief in the efficacy of the pins is attested by an artist who had the curiosity the other day to lie concealed, watching the visit of a spinster to the shrine. Little is known of the life of the saint, nor are we clear as to the psychology of the pins. A local philosopher would have it that, as pins are used by the fair sex in fastening their clothing, pins must be to women the most appropriate symbols of union possible; but this clearly failed to account for the pins being thrust into the saint’s body. M. Renan was inclined to favour a more material explanation, suggested of old by a Hebrew prophet, for St. Guirec might, like Baal, happen to be abroad, or napping, or otherwise better engaged. After bidding the Renans good-bye, the party went its way, and brought to a close that evening the most pleasant and instructive excursion of the Society since the days when Longueville Jones and Barnwell, Parker and Babington, Westwood and Freeman, were wont to take the field.

THE EXPERIMENTAL MATINÉE.

I.

THE rage for the experimental matinée has shown no abatement during the theatrical season which is now closed; on the contrary, these performances, which in previous years have rarely been given later than the month of May, have this year been frequent during both June and July. It may be worth while, now that we have a brief respite from the “morning performance,” to consider some of the uses and abuses of this trying form of dramatic exhibition and its bearings on the present condition of the stage.

The matinée is an institution of comparatively very recent growth, first started to enable children to go to pantomimes without the disadvantage of keeping abnormally late hours, and is now so universally adopted that a large percentage of the London playhouses open their doors at least one afternoon in the week for the performance of their ordinary evening's entertainment. It is not, however, with these supplements of the regular week's work that we now wish to deal, but with those programmes, specially prepared to extort the applause or ridicule of a single audience, to which we have applied the name of experimental matinée.

The end to which these performances are the means is always either the exploitation of a particular play or of an individual actor or actress, the latter being in a large numerical majority. The afternoon is the time big with the fate of budding (nay, sometimes of overblown) Julias and Juliets, of those stars of the Theatre Royal Back Drawing-room and of the Assembly Rooms of Little Puddington, who regard all the recognized leaders of our own stage as very overrated personages; though, acting probably on the principle of "omne ignotum pro magnifico," they may compassionately except from their strictures the efforts of a Bernhardt or a Salvini.

The afternoon performance is the opportunity of the unappreciated. No one would hazard the fate of a play or of a player, under the risky conditions which appear inseparable from the matinée, could he secure a hearing at a regular evening performance. But, notwithstanding the increased, and apparently still increasing, number of the London theatres, the chances of actors and of dramatic authors have by no means kept pace with that increase. Out of the sum total of London houses a large percentage are devoted to musical entertainments which cannot be said to afford occupation to dramatist or to actor, unless we allow great width and laxity to those terms. Of the rest, many present but one play, which, if even only moderately successful, will keep the stage some five, or even ten, times as long as the best pieces of a generation back. The dramatists of to-day are not a numerous band; those whose work is in anything like demand among London managers may be counted on the fingers of one hand.

The desire on the part of any author to add his own name to that select band is natural and intelligible. On the one hand, successful stage-work is paid for at a rate for which writers in other literary fields may sigh in vain, and on the other, there is a fascination and glamour about the stage, its professors, and even its inanimate adjuncts, of which few have not felt the effects. One of the best and most popular of the novelists of to-day, who has attained the highest success in his own line of authorship, has placed on record the delight that he would experience in listening to the successful performance by gifted actors of a play from his own pen; and if we find a writer second to none in his own branch of literature longing for fresh triumphs across the footlights, what wonder that others, less accustomed than he to well-earned praise, should share his theatrical aspirations; and that writers of novels, of "novelettes," of "shilling-shockers," and the rest, nay more, that those who have never written at all, should crowd the slippery path which leads to dramatic fame, or the reverse. Then we have the mass of matinée-givers who burn to distinguish themselves as Claude or as Pauline, as Charles Surface or as Lady Teazle. These come from many sources, from the great Sahara of amateurdom, from the stony places of the provincial stage, and from the more pleasant pastures of London; they offer themselves for the amusement or boredom of that somewhat special gathering, a matinée audience. Many and diverse may be the motives which urge the giver of a matinée. The Society beauty—who comes perchance from Grosvenor Square or Slocum Pogis, perchance from Maida Vale or "South Belgravia," and whose claims on "Society" may be as shadowy as her pretensions to beauty—burns to emulate the few who have at one step passed successfully from the drawing-room to the stage, and finds to her cost that she has fondly confused the rule with its exception. The ambitious actor, of some experience may be in town or country, who sighs for better parts and more remunerative salaries, and who reviles the lack of appreciation with which managers regard him, too often discovers, after he has sunk his hard-earned savings to enable him for one brief afternoon to play a part worthy of his talents, that the managerial estimate of his powers, and not his own, was the correct one; and so likewise the dramatist learns, by the bitter experience of three hours of purgatory or worse, that those who have for months been declining, with or without thanks, his precious manuscript were not such fools as he has been wont to declare them.

For, as the matinée is in the vast majority of cases the protest of the rejected, so also is it, in the long run, the justification of the rejector. Much of the work that sees the light under those conditions is, indeed, of so hopeless a quality that one is struck with honest surprise that it should ever have seen the light, and wonders if the race of "damned good-natured friends" is now extinct, who might have spoken in time the word of friendly warning.

On considering the mass of the work submitted at experimental matinées to the judgment of the critic and of the general public (who are—theoretically, at any rate—supposed to be present on such occasions), the preponderance of the bad over the good, of the chaff over the wheat, is something almost appalling. At rare intervals, it is true, one encounters a play or a player of sterling merit, hitherto neglected by those in authority, whose chance, long waited for, comes at last at some afternoon performance; but such are the black swans of matinées, rare upon the earth; indeed, so inferior is the general quality of matinées acknowledged to be, as compared with the standard required of the ordinary evening's performance, that managers have not unfrequently ere now discovered to their cost that a piece hailed at a matinée as a triumphant success may, when transferred to the night's playbill, prove little better than a failure. The ordinary matinée-goer has by bitter experience grown to be thankful for small mercies, and welcomes with enthusiasm anything a bit better than his customary fare; but caterers must be wary of placing that fare before the epicurean customers who frequent the theatre at more fashionable hours.

Fired that the town reject it: "Faith, I'll print it,
And shame the rogues."

Such, the exclamation of the unsuccessful dramatist of a previous generation, is the spirit of the matinée-giver of to-day. "If managers are such fools as to refuse my play, or to decline to engage me as an actor, I'll give a matinée." And he does—with what result? A month or so of anxiety and worry, the expenditure of not less than 120*l.*, perhaps as much as 200*l.*, an afternoon of wild excitement; and after? perhaps success, but more likely —.

Well, even if so, he has done some good. He has given employment to authors, actors, actresses, and dramatic critics, though it is to be feared the critics do not view their connexion with matinées very complacently; he may even, though this is unlikely, learn by experience to alter his estimate of his own abilities. As regards the hardships entailed on the dramatic critic by the frequency of the experimental matinée—on which topic the bitter cry of one well-known authority is never weary of making itself heard—the grievance is far more fancied than real. It requires but little knowledge of the theatrical world to classify beforehand the forthcoming performances. Their relative importance is to be judged by the name of the author, by the cast of the actors engaged, by the theatre selected for the purpose. Slight, indeed, must be the experience of the critic who could not from these and similar details determine if a promised entertainment is likely to prove worth the waste of an afternoon.

BUDA-PESTH.

THERE is an inscription on an old bridge in Hungary to the honour and glory of the Sultan who erected it, in which the Caliph is styled "Emperor of Teheran, Constantinople, and Pesth." Nowadays it is difficult to carry the imagination back to the time when the Moslem hordes possessed what has become the finest capital of perhaps the most fruitful land in Europe. In everything except actual size Pesth is probably the superior to-day of either Paris or Vienna. To those who knew the city twenty years ago the transformation is little short of magical. Amongst a network of magnificent streets the Radialstrasse runs its majestic miles from the heart of the town out to the Stadtsfeldschen, or People's Park—a very model of municipal architecture, with well-proportioned houses, each one fit for a ducal residence, lining the broad roadway for half its length. Then, as the business centres are left behind, the villas of the wealthy take their places, leading gradually out to the green grass and trees of the country. But if the Radialstrasse can claim without much hesitation the distinction of being the best-built boulevard of the nineteenth century, it is run very close in the beauty of its shops and houses by several of the secondary streets, and the new Museum Ring, now in course of construction, bids fair to outdo all its predecessors. The price of land in Pesth has risen some five hundred per cent. lately, and the restless energy of its inhabitants, urged on by their pride in the capital, opens out a prospect of further extension, at present without limits.

The universal air of prosperity and content which stamps the Magyars at home is one of the features which must strike the visitor most forcibly. To judge by the merry life of Pesth and the smiling faces of everybody one meets, it would almost seem as if an elixir of gaiety was distilled in the atmosphere. A well-known proverb tells us that the Portuguese are always gay, but to match Pesth with Lisbon one would have to allow a very liberal handicap to the latter. Even their business seems a pleasure to the people of Pesth, and is not attended with any of the usual symptoms of worry, but is despatched leisurely and comfortably in luxurious offices, or behind well-served counters, with such courtesy and politeness that the stranger cannot fail to admire the contrast between Pesth and the slovenly slipshod ways of the countries to the East, or the distracting bustle and wear and tear of the greater Western centres. Whilst we generally make a business of pleasure, and sometimes manage to make believe to combine the two, the Magyar absolutely converts his business into an enjoyment both for himself and others. This is probably the secret of the careless, happy faces of the people, beginning from the peasants in the market-places up to the highest in social and commercial ranks. Whether the inner life corresponds to the outer show it would be impertinent to inquire. The mask, if mask it be, is too cleverly assumed and too enjoyable to contemplate for us to wish to tear it off.

In many respects the Hungarian character resembles the British, especially in its love for sport and for water. The bath is a great institution in Pesth, and some of the larger establishments are quite palatial. The Bruck-Bad and the Ofen-Bad are old Turkish hamâms, greatly enlarged and gorgeously refitted, but with the old pillars still standing, and the original cupolas letting in the sunlight dimly through eyelets of painted glass, in coloured shafts, which flicker through the steam of the hot mineral springs which feed the basins. A morning spent at Bruck is not only a fit preparation for the day after a long railway journey, but a thing to be remembered with joy for ever. Besides the closed-in hot and cold baths, there are open swimming-baths on the Danube, largely patronized by the ladies, many of whom are fearless divers and swimmers; and altogether the vigour with which the population takes to the water leaves a comforting impression that at least one is surrounded by well-washed neighbours. Horse-racing is becoming as national a sport in Hungary as in England; and the racecourse outside the town is always in capital order, in spite of the difficulties in keeping the ground soft enough. The riders are all English—as are the few bookmakers in the Ring. Most of the betting, however, is carried on through the Pari-Mutuel, which is managed with the utmost regularity and precision. The enthusiasm over a close finish or at the victory of a popular favourite almost takes one back to the Yorkshire moor. The return home when the day is over is the people's opportunity, and for miles the road is lined with those whose occupations have prevented them from being on the course. There is little of our Derby-day dust, and none of its drunkenness or rowdiness; but the drags and pretty costumes are there, and the long parade is well worth seeing.

The Stadtsfeldschen is an incalculable boon to the people of Pesth—a sort of Kensington Gardens, where, however, all sorts of amusements are provided, and a perpetual fair goes on all summer-time. First, there is a switchback railway, much patronized by country cousins, but despised of the townfolk. Of course we have the usual shooting-galleries and merry-go-rounds, photographs on tin for sixpence, the King of the Cannibal Islands, the Fat Man, and hoc genus omne. Furthermore, a large circus—reserved seats a franc—and anybody who likes can look on from outside without paying at all, unless his spirit is moved by the periodical visit of the clown or the leading lady with the hat. Those who do not care for these excitements sprawl about under the trees, and the grass is literally covered with picnic parties, children, nursemaids, and their followers. In the evening gipsy stringed bands are always playing at the principal hotels and restaurants; and, though the Hungarian music has a great sameness and disagreeable jerkiness about it to the uninitiated, it is a source of never-failing delight, rising to frantic enthusiasm at times, to those of whom it is understood. There is also a little gem of an Opera House, where the performance has to be good to please the critics; a German theatre, always in possession of an excellent troupe; and numberless minor entertainments, the most popular of which is the Orpheum, much resembling “the Oxford.” Here there is generally to be found a sprinkling of English artistes, one or two French, and the latest wonders of the nondescript stage, such as the Man-Serpent, the Japanese Jugglers, the champion Unicycle Rider, and similar first-class performers. The Orpheum is lit with electric light, and both the accommodation and the company are good. In fact, there is no kind of public amusement, either indoor or outdoor, to which a daughter might not take her mother in Pesth; for, though the ladies of Hungary enjoy, or at least possess, a world-wide reputation for the lightness and grace with which they toss their caps over the mills, the behaviour of all classes in the streets and everyday resorts of the capital is a model of decency.

Beyond their practical arrangements for best solving the problem of how to make life best worth living, the inhabitants of Pesth have not much to offer to the visiting sightseer. He must content himself with the ever-changing panorama along the stately quays, the mighty roll of the Danube under its three great bridges, the busy hurrying of the steamers on the river, and the well-dressed crowds on land, the pretty drives, and the fashionable consumption of ices at “Kügler's,” and beer at the “Ungaria” or “Queen of England.” The guide-books will tell him the stock programme of what he must see, in order properly “to do” Pesth; but the real interest of the place is the growth of a new people in a new city, and its chief attraction is the care which is taken to well grease the rails along which the hours slip smoothly away. The National Gallery of Pictures is, however, one of the shows not to be missed. There are one or two Rembrandts, and an excellent portrait by Godfrey Kneller. The Spanish School is well represented, and, altogether, an hour or two may be profitably and pleasantly spent in the galleries. A trip up the Danube to the Margaretteninsel will also repay the stranger. This delightful little eyot is thickly wooded down to the water's edge with wild-growing forest trees, whilst the centre is laid out in spacious lawns and flower-beds like the grounds of an English country-house. Nominally it is “a bath”; but, since taking the baths has nowadays become little more than an excuse for change of air and scene and meeting new people, the Margaret Baths are not very largely favoured by the citizens, who, as far as comfort and the quality of the springs are concerned, might, and do, go much further from home and fare worse. On the days when the best military bands play there, though, the steamers are crowded, and if the colossal bathing establishment does not net its fair share of profits, the hotel and the cafés drive a compensating trade.

The last effort of the Magyars to attract visitors to their capital has been the establishment of the famous Zone Tariff on their railways. Taking Pesth as a centre, the system is divided into thirteen zones, with a uniform charge between each, irrespective of distance. The general effect is a reduction of about twenty-five per cent., and at present the maximum first-class fare from any part of the dominions to headquarters is eight florins. The scheme was vehemently attacked and characterized as absurd; but as far as the experiment has gone it has proved a success, even on the railways, without taking into account the attainment of the main object, an enormously increased swarm of spending travellers. The audacity of the plan is only another proof of the progressive energy of the Government and of their steady purpose to push Pesth more into public notice, and to enable it to take a leading position amongst the great capitals. The city is somewhat unfavourably situated on the main Oriental route from coming so soon after Vienna. The tourist who stops at all between London and Constantinople generally confines himself to a day or two at Paris and Vienna, going straight through Pesth, Belgrade, and Sofia, unless curiosity prompts him to halt a few hours to see with his own eyes the atrocious Bulgarian or the recalcitrant Serb. Not one in a hundred ever dreams of breaking the journey at Pesth, which is usually considered as a kind of second-rate Vienna. This is a mistake which, once found out, is seldom repeated. The pity is that life, especially a traveller's life, is made up of mistakes.

SHORT TIME IN THE COTTON TRADE.

LAST month the price of American raw cotton in Liverpool rose higher than it had been at any time previously since the effects of the American Civil War ceased to be felt in that market. The average price for the whole twelve months ended last Saturday night was also higher, and, further, the fluctuations in the price were wider than at any time since the close of the Civil War. From $5\frac{3}{8}d.$ per pound in December it rose to $6\frac{1}{2}d.$ in August—a variation of $1\frac{1}{4}d.$ per pound. In the preceding year the variation was only $\frac{2}{3}d.$ The average price of the twelve months was nearly $5\frac{1}{2}d.$ per pound, against $5\frac{1}{2}d.$ in the preceding twelve months. Lastly, the highest price in the past twelve months was $6\frac{1}{2}d.$, and in the preceding twelve months only $6d.$ From all this it would seem to follow that the supply of raw cotton is falling short of the demand of manufacturers, and the inference is strengthened by two circumstances. Firstly, that every year, when the old crop has been nearly absorbed and the new crop has not yet begun to reach the market, there is a scarcity of supply leading to a sharp advance in price. This year the squeeze has been greater than for a considerable time past; but it differs from recent years only in the greater intensity of the demand. Secondly, it seems to be established that what is called the visible supply—that is to say, the quantity of raw cotton known to be in existence in the producing and manufacturing countries alike—is rather smaller just now than for some years past. Members of the trade however are hardly prepared to admit that the demand for raw cotton is outrunning the supply, and they attribute the scarcity felt towards the close of the cotton year to the manipulation of speculators rather than to any real deficiency of supply. No doubt speculation does help to create the difficulty; but speculators would not be able to “corner” the market if there was an abundant supply. They succeed in their operations because they find that manufacturers have not sufficiently supplied themselves with raw material, and the stock they have to manipulate is small enough to allow of success. Early in the year it was believed that the last American crop was considerably larger than it has proved to be. In consequence, manufacturers in this country did not buy largely. They hoped that the price would decline rather than rise as the summer advanced. Speculators discovering this, and ascertaining that the crop was smaller than had been estimated, bought up the supplies offering in the market, and thus aggravated the scarcity which in any case would have existed. Manufacturers object that, at all events in this country, there has not been that excessive construction of new mills which has often hitherto taken place, and therefore they contend that the demand of manufacturers cannot have increased so much as it must have done if it be really true that supply is falling short of demand. But we may point out, in reply, that it is the American supply which is deficient; that, although there has not been a very large increase in the number of factories in this country, there has been some increase, and that improved machinery has enabled the old factories to work up larger quantities than they formerly did. And, further, there appears to be no doubt that there has been during the past couple of years a considerable increase in the number of cotton mills in the United States, and there likewise has been some increase in Continental factories.

While the price of the raw material rose thus rapidly, there was very little advance in the price of the manufactured article, with the result that profits began very seriously to diminish. In consequence, an attempt was made in May last to induce cotton-spinners throughout the North of England to diminish production; but it failed. In July, however, the state of affairs became so bad that the great majority of spinners agreed to work short time during the month of August. But, in spite of the consequent falling off in the demand, the price of the raw material continued to rise. And now an earnest attempt is being made to induce weavers as well as spinners to work short time during the present month. Next month the new crop will begin to arrive, and it is hoped then that the price will fall so much as to enable full time to be again resumed. The course of events during the past five or six weeks seems to confirm the inference that the supply is not sufficient for the present demand of manufacturers. It is objected in many quarters, however, that neither American nor Continental manufacturers have been obliged to adopt short time; and, therefore, it is argued that the difficulties of this country must be due to Liverpool speculation. But we may point out that American and Continental manufacturers produce for the home market, in which they secure a practical monopoly by protective tariffs, whereas English manufacturers produce for all the world, and more particularly for the more backward countries of the world. For several years past the exports of cotton manufactures from this country to the Far East have been very large. Apparently, the markets of the Far East are now glutted in consequence, and, further, it would seem that the purchasing power of the Indian and Chinese populations has been reduced by drought and famine. We may add that the competition of the Bombay mills is being keenly felt by Lancashire manufacturers, not only in India, but in China. It would appear, indeed, that the Bombay cotton spinners are able to undersell Lancashire in the Chinese market. Owing to this combination of circumstances, it is found impossible to raise prices in the Far East very much. Cotton manufacturers and cotton operators, however, persist in laying the principal blame upon speculators, and a cry has arisen for Parliamentary action to put down speculation in cotton. It is by no means certain that if this were done the condition of the trade would be improved. If, as the facts seem to us to prove, the cotton industry is growing too rapidly for the purchasing power of our customers, it is surely not detrimental to the trade that the fact should be brought home to those engaged in it promptly and so strikingly that all must recognize it. But, whether speculation be good or bad as regards the trade, it is certain that Parliament cannot put it down. If it prohibits one form of speculation another form will be invented. Our manufacturers, therefore, must learn to rely upon themselves alone. And there are several ways in which they can take precautions against these annual recurring "corners." One precaution naturally suggests itself—to buy largely when the new crop is being sent to market in large quantities. The Continental spinners do this, and that is one reason why attempts are not made to "corner" the Continental markets as is done habitually in Liverpool. No doubt buying largely in advance of requirements is costly; but it is still more costly to allow expensive machinery to remain wholly or partially idle for weeks, or it may be months, together. Another plan would be to use other kinds of cotton than American more largely than is done at present. The fact that American is so much used proves unquestionably that at present American is the most suitable. But it surely cannot be beyond the ability of the trade to encourage production of better cotton in India and Egypt. And other methods might be suggested.

At the same time, it is clear that an effective remedy can be found only by opening up new markets. As the more advanced countries of the world grow in wealth and intelligence they learn to manufacture for themselves more and more completely. Therefore, we must reconcile ourselves to the fact that, as the years pass over, we shall lose more and more of the advanced markets of the world. For this reason it becomes all the more incumbent to find and open up new markets. The cotton industry is at present mainly dependent upon the Far East, and as it happens the Far East is not able just now to buy from us in such quantities and at such prices as would relieve our difficulties. If we could find new markets our embarrassments would disappear. Until this is done, it is to be feared that periodical "corners" will continue to be experienced. The high prices of the past twelve months will, no doubt, encourage American planters to increase the acreage under cotton, and in that way the mere scarcity of supply will cure itself. But that will be followed inevitably by a further growth of the cotton manufacture, and after a little while the present difficulty will reappear, unless in the meantime new and important markets can be opened up. As regards the immediate future, it is probable that the price of the raw material will fall somewhat next month. The acreage under cotton in the United States this year is considerably larger than last year, and the reports concerning the crop are very favourable. The present estimate is, that the yield will be about $7\frac{1}{4}$ millions of bales, or about a quarter of a million of bales more than twelve months ago. That is not a very large increase, it is true, but there will be a strong inducement to send raw cotton to market as early as possible because of the high prices now ruling, and therefore a fall in the market is probable. But a very considerable fall is hardly likely. The old stocks appear to be smaller than they were at this time last year, and the new crop does not very greatly exceed last year's crop. Therefore the expectation of most thoughtful observers is that the demand will nearly, if not quite, equal the supply, and that planters will hardly be willing, therefore, to sell at much reduction of price. Still the fall will probably be sufficient to enable spinners and manufacturers to resume full time next month.

THE GLOUCESTER FESTIVAL.

THE meeting of the Three Choirs which takes place at Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester in succession, and of which this year Gloucester was the scene, possesses at once a musical, a religious, and a social character. All who take an interest in the matter know that the Festival had its origin in the coming together for the first time, just one hundred and sixty-six years ago, of the choirs of Gloucester, Hereford, and Worcester Cathedrals. The object of these meetings was at once combined practice, the performance of works which, for due effect, required a much more numerous choir than either of the three cathedrals separately could boast, and, finally, the relief of the widows and orphans of clergymen of the three dioceses who had died without being able to make provision for their families. Music is such a modern art, that to go back a little more than a century and a half is to plunge, so far as music is concerned, at once into archaic times—to a period when Handel's oratorios, which now, notwithstanding their imperishable majesty and beauty, have an antiquated character, had not yet come into being. In due time, however, Handel's sacred works were performed in England wherever there were soloists and choirs to sing them; and what more suitable choirs could be found than those of the three great cathedral cities where the study and practice of choral music was already a tradition? For something like a century Handel's oratorios were, more than any others, and indeed almost exclusively, laid under contribution by the directors of the Three Choirs; and it was not until 1846 (the year of Mendelssohn's Elijah) that any oratorios but those of Handel were recognized in England. Mendelssohn's masterpiece in the sacred style was, however, at once adopted at our cathedral festivals, as at English musical festivals generally, especially those of the great manufacturing cities, such as Leeds and Birmingham, for the latter of which the Elijah is known to have been specially composed. But the history of the Three Choirs need not be traced from the time when they had no orchestra, but depended for accompaniment on the local organist alone, to the present day, when the singing of the most eminent vocalists is supported by the best orchestral players that London can furnish. Works, too, of the most modern, the most recent, kind are now produced at the meetings of the Three Choirs; and, in addition to the obligatory Messiah, and the almost equally indispensable Elijah, the programme of the Festival which closed yesterday contained Spohr's Last Judgment, the Stabat Mater of Rossini, Gounod's Messe Solennelle, Sullivan's Prodigal Son and Golden Legend, Dr. Hubert Parry's Judith, and two entirely new works—one by Miss Ellicott, the other by Mr. Lee Williams, organist of the Gloucester Cathedral.

It has been said that the Festival possesses a musical, a religious, and a social character; and, as regards the last point, it need only be mentioned that open house, or something very like it, is kept during the Festival week by the Bishop, the Dean, the Mayor, and the cathedral organist, who this year acted as conductor of the Festival, and further aided its success by contributing to it a work of remarkable beauty. Of course, visitors flow in from various parts of Gloucestershire and of the two neighbouring counties which, like Gloucester, have a cathedral city for chief town; and some of these visitors seem almost as much bent on conviviality as on the enjoyment of a kind of music which may often be of too elevated a character to be in strict harmony with their tastes. Nevertheless, lovers of good music are numerous enough in Gloucester as well as in the cities musically allied to it; and when, as this year, the programme of the Festival is unusually interesting, enthusiastic amateurs are attracted from all parts of the country. So full, moreover, is England just now of tourists, that some of those who went to Gloucester this week with the intention of "doing" the city were far from pleased at finding that, by reason of the Festival, the cathedral was, in a certain measure, closed to them. "Why can we not see it?" one party, seemingly of Transatlantic origin, exclaimed. "If music is being performed, that is no reason why we should not go in. We must see Gloucester Cathedral, and if we cannot do so without paying fifteen shillings a head, the fifteen shillings must of course be paid, though the terms seem high."

Most musical festivals present in their programmes some traces of local influence, and the chorus, with soprano solo, by Miss Ellicott, daughter of the Bishop of Gloucester, was more in place at the Gloucester Festival than it might have been considered at Birmingham or at Leeds. It would be hard for a clever, aspiring young lady like Miss Ellicott not to have an opportunity of presenting a composition which, without the least pretentiousness, is not ungraceful, in a city and on an occasion with which she is so honourably connected. This was the only novelty at the Festival, with the exception of Mr. Lee Williams's Last Night at Bethany, which, composed by the cathedral organist, might be regarded beforehand as a local product worthy at most of being treated by the hospitably-received stranger with politeness and forbearance. The Last Night at Bethany can be dismissed, however, in no such fashion. It is the work of a composer who, if he does not possess the rare gift of genius, is at least endowed with talent of a delicate and refined character. From a cathedral organist performing habitually an organist's functions, and no other, one expects simply church music. But Mr. Lee Williams has in The Last Night at Bethany given us music which is not merely ecclesiastical, but in a wide sense religious. One can only convey an idea of absolutely new music by comparing it with music which is old and familiar; and the composer of whom one is chiefly reminded by Mr. Lee Williams's flowing, melodious strains is Gounod. The solo passages had the advantage of being perfectly sung, especially those assigned to Mme. Albani and Mr. Edward Lloyd. But the choral numbers are, on the whole, the most effective, and some of these possess a tuneful charm which, in the eyes of those critics who can applaud nothing in music which is not harsh and crabbed, should alone suffice to condemn them. Everything in the work is nicely balanced and in the best taste, except, perhaps, the final number, which does not merely contrast with the rest, but clashes with it. The verses of Mr. Joseph Bennett's libretto are marked by feeling and power, and it may be that their spirit and sentiment are reproduced by the composer throughout. The concluding piece possesses, in any case, the fault which is so conspicuous in that boisterous, almost bacchanalian, Song of the Apostles which brings Gounod's Redemption to a close. Distant anticipations of the divine joy to which the pathetic incidents of The Last Night at Bethany are to lead must be expressed, of course, in joyful music, but surely not in music of so robust a character.

Dr. Hubert Parry is, like Mr. Lee Williams and Miss Ellicott, of Gloucester, or nearly so. But his Judith, which formed one of the features of the Festival just concluded, is known to have been composed for Birmingham, where it was produced with striking success at the festival of last year; and, whether Dr. Hubert Parry had belonged to the North, East, or South of England, his Judith must, as one of the most successful oratorios of the day, have found its place in the programme of the Gloucester Festival. One is inclined to ask now, as when the work was first produced, why it is called Judith rather than Manasseh, and why, above all, the author and composer (for Dr. Hubert Parry is his own librettist) has taken such pains to purge the story of Judith of all the drama which belongs to it? "The exploit of Judith is too terrible for artistic presentation," he argues. But the incidents of an oratorio are never, thanks to the very nature of the oratorio form, so vividly presented as to inspire either much pity or much terror; and, apart from that, the sacrifice of Manasseh's innocent children is far more horrible than the slaying of the not altogether innocent Holophernes. Possibly the rivalry and the passion by which the slaying of Holophernes is accompanied struck Dr. Parry as unfit for treatment in a work of religious character.

Another comparative novelty in the Gloucester programme was Dr. Mackenzie's Dream of Jubal, in which there is much to admire, though the plan of the work may be dismissed as utterly objectionable. The effect of the speaking voice in combination with orchestral music of the most varied kind is simply irritating. One feels inclined to call upon the speaker, narrator, reciter, whatever his proper designation may be, to cease from interrupting so much beautiful music; unless, indeed, the ironical idea should be preferred of begging the conductor to stop the music, so that the deep-mouthed utterances of his quite unnecessary interpreter may not be disturbed.

The two finest works in the Festival programme were the Elijah of Mendelssohn and the Stabat Mater of Rossini. The former has always been accepted as a masterpiece. The latter, violently decried on its first production nearly half a century ago, has survived all hostile criticism, as, strangely enough, it has survived nearly all the operas of the melodious composer, whom it was at one time the fashion to regard as too operatic for the Church. The most attractive day, judging practically by the number of persons drawn to the cathedral in the morning and to the Shire Hall in the evening, was Thursday, when The Prodigal Son and The Golden Legend of Sir Arthur Sullivan were performed. The success of this composer's oratorios has been greatly influenced by that of his operettas. Yet The Prodigal Son, which belongs to the period before The Sorcerer and the Pinafore, contains as much beautiful music as The Golden Legend itself.

WRONG AGAIN!

[Mr. O'Brien will partake of no food which is not shared by his fellow-prisoners; mutton chops and white bread are discarded, and brown bread and skilly are demanded. . . . Mr. O'Brien is, however, willing to compromise matters with those who, as he complains, persecute him by forcing dainty viands upon a hungry man, by consenting to partake of them provided Dr. Kenny, M.P., is allowed to visit him, and certify that such victuals are necessary to his health and comfort.]

BESIDE the untasted chop he sat,
With eye averse and visage stern
(Twas delicately rimmed with fat,
And done—he knew it—to a turn.
But vainly lured its savoury whiff;
His patriot nostril scorned to sniff).

A manchet of the finest flour
Gleamed purely white beside his plate
(And this was near the dinner-hour,
When sulks and hunger most debate);
But vainly, too, did this invite
That prisoner's stoic appetite.

The very warder shrank in awe
Beneath his lightning-glance of pride,
When that foul minion of the law
His rude persuasions would have tried,
Though timidly he ventured still
To tempt the martyr with the grill.

"Come, sir," he said, "take heart and eat;
'Tis no neck-chop, but from the loin"—
But, heedless of the smoking meat,
Still sat, with far-off look, O'Broin,
Gazing as though he read in dream
His country's future through its steam.

"Nay, pick a bit," the warder urged,
"No other prisoner fares like you."
But there the hero's wrath up-surged,
And fiercely forth his protest flew.
"Villain!" he cried in tones of pain,
"It is of that that I complain.

"How dared that thrice-accursed brood,
That execrable Castle set,
Insult me with superior food
To what the other prisoners get?
Their insolence at nothing stops—
How dared they give me mutton chops?

"And when as Irish unicorn
I with the British Lion close,
Know that my bitterest hate and scorn,
My malediction waits on those Who, while I'm fighting with the Crown,
Give me white bread instead of brown."

The warder stared, and, puzzled sore,
Began to mutter words like these—"Political" and "Tullamore,"
And "prison dress" and "sandwiches";
Whereat—for saints are still but flesh—
The martyr's anger blazed afresh.

"Dull tool of my dull tyrants thou!
Dost thou," he wildly cried, "not know
That what was then my right is now
The vilest wrong I undergo?
I claim, and they concede me not,
The common malefactor's lot.

"Take, then, that loaf and chop away,
And place brown bread and skilly there;
Unless, indeed—as p'raps he may—
My doctor orders better fare;
Out of his learning's well-known wealth
He may prescribe it for my health.

"'Tis Dr. Kenny, he alone
Who, I have vowed, shall doctor me;
And even now, so time has flown,
He may be here—go, slave, and see!
But stay a moment; while you're gone—
Yes—you may put the cover on."

REVIEWS.

THE GREEK ANTHOLOGY.*

THIS collection of translations from the Anthology is a pleasant and interesting one, the value of which must not be judged from its appearance in a cheap series. It is ushered by an editor who (if we may be forgiven for saying so) does not seem to know very much about the matter, but who indulges in some pretty paganism and pretty writing out of, or after, "St. Beuve" (sic), Paul de Saint Victor, Mr. Symonds, and some other well-known hands. About this introduction, which is enthusiastic and amiable, we wish to say as little as possible. It is, we fear, an illustration of a new reversal of an old adage—of the rushing in of angels (we believe that "Graham R. Tomson" is a lady) where manly fools would fear to tread, unless they were very sure of their feet and facts. Meleager is one of the most charming poets of his own particular class in any age or country, and "the wise ones, the grave and the precise ones," who grumble at his morals may go hang. But we may be quite certain that, when an English lady observes "sometimes his treatment of his theme was un peu léger" (we don't blame Graham R. Tomson for that extraordinary accent), she no more knows the original of such an epigram as that which ends (observe our cunning: we give a "light" to scholars, and none to the prurient who may run to indices of first lines) with the words Ῥωμαϊκὴν λοπάδα than she knows what name Achilles bore when he was dressed as a girl. Again, it does Graham R. Tomson much credit to speak so handsomely as she does of the great edition of Jacobs, "a new edition in five volumes, with very valuable tables, and, above all, with a commentary which is a marvel of exegesis, filling thirteen volumes." Unluckily the commentary that is a marvel of exegesis fills three, and still more unluckily the whole edition (these three being divided into eight parts) does with the five volumes of text and indices make thirteen nominal volumes. It is a small matter, but it shows that Graham R. Tomson can never have even looked at the marvel of exegesis she describes. Nor is there any reason why she should; but why make as though she had? Why write "Curiart F. Jacobs"? Why say that "Fanie" is "the Greek equivalent for a little flame," which it certainly is not, though it may perhaps be the French equivalent for "Phanion"? Anybody may if they like hold that the "fixed period" of Ceos, the custom of old men and women meeting and pledging each other in cups of poisoned wine, "shows a true sense of dignity and self-respect, the very essence of the fitness of things." Epictetus, by the way, would have thought as differently as any Christian, but thought is free. Thought is not free to make those little mistakes about volumes and the letter F when there was no need to say anything about them at all.

* The Canterbury Poets—The Greek Anthology. Edited by Graham R. Tomson. London: Walter Scott. 1889.

But peace with Graham R. Tomson, who is not the only person who has thought it desirable to write about the classics on the strength of a knowledge of "St. Beuve." We say peace in no sarcastic sense, for we are really obliged to her, and her introduction, if it had been stripped of its frippery, is really pretty. She has got together, as we have said, so fair a herd of translators, that we forgive her this, and more. A very large contingent in prose and verse comes from Mr. Lang; another from Miss Alma Strettell, who has, perhaps, gone nearest of all translators to the unattainable goal, a translation of Heine. Not a little is signed by Mr. Garnett, whose learning and literature are alike unimpeachable. Mr. Gosse has sent a few. Among professors or ex-professors the worthy signatures of Messrs. Lewis Campbell and Goldwin Smith occur; and though the majority of the items are thus modern, the older names of Wellesley and Cowper and Moore and Bland appear. Indeed, at all times the Anthology has been a temptation alike to scholars and to non-scholars. Its endless variety, the exquisite poetry of the best things in it, and, above all, its singular modernness, have attracted every person with a taste for literature who has read it in the original and a good many who have read it only in translations. From the major classical writers we are separated by a great gulf, a gulf the width and depth of which are felt the more the more familiar the explorer is with the originals. The majority of the writers of the Anthology are quite near to us, despite the difference of faith, morals, and public opinion. Even such a dirty scoundrel as Strato is more germane in manner, if not in subject, to modern thought than Sophocles, who might not have thought Strato a dirty scoundrel. No occasional verse in the world, with the exception of some pieces written by English poets between 1590 and 1650, or thereabouts, has the "notes" of the best Anthology poetry, which may range, putting the earliest and latest examples aside, over at least as many centuries as Ben, and the tribe of Ben, covered decades. Beside its exquisite concinnity Horace is awkward, and the French masterpieces mannered and thin; beside its range and its curious note of passion we can only place the best English and German poetry of anything like the same kind. Indeed, though Heine matches and betters it, we can hardly, in the very same kind, match and better it in English without going back to the seventeenth century. No wonder, then, that it is beloved of the lovers of poetry.

The lovers of poetry, however, as exemplified in the present volume, take, like other lovers, some liberties with the objects of their passion. For instance, this of Mr. Lang's is a charming poem:—

Ah, Golden Eyes, to win you yet,
I bring mine April coronet;
The lovely blossoms of the spring,
For you I weave, to you I bring:
These roses with the lilies wet,
The dewy dark-eyed violet,
Narcissus, and the wind-flower wet,
Wilt thou disdain mine offering,
Ah, Golden Eyes?
Crowned with thy lover's flowers, forget
The pride wherein thy heart is set,
For thou, like these or anything,
Hast but thine hour of blossoming,
Thy spring, and then—the long regret,
Ah, Golden Eyes!

But the original, unless we mistake its identity (and, by the way, it would have been convenient if there had been exact references to the originals), runs simply, "I send thee, Rhodoclea, this garland, having myself woven it with my own hand, of beautiful flowers. There is the lily, the rosy calyx, the moist anemone, the wet narcissus, and the dark-blue gleaming violet. Crowning thyself with these, cease to be proud-boasting. Thou and the wreath both blossom and fade." Unde "Golden Eyes"? (Rufinus had a golden-eyed mistress (Ep. 36), and very pretty golden eyes are; but was it Rhodoclea? This poem does not say so.) Unde "April"? Unde "spring"? Unde lines 8, 9, and a good deal of 10, 11, 12? Unde "And then—the long regret, ah, Golden Eyes"? Vile, doubtless, is he who looks such a gift-jennet in the mouth. But the restraint and elegance of the best Anthology verse are so much of its essence that amplification seems specially out of place. Mr. Lang, it is needless to say, can be much closer than this when he chooses, while he is seldom less elegant; even his belles infidèles are so pretty that, as in other cases, we shut our eyes to their slight and venial infidelity. But here is one which is almost faithful:—

Believe me, love, it is not good
To hoard a mortal maidenhood;
In Hades thou wilt never find,
Maiden, a lover to thy mind;
Love's for the living! presently
Ashes and dust in death are we!

It is true that this is not absolutely exact. Baldly rendered—and we can be very bald when we choose—it runs thus:—"Thou hoarest thy virginity; and what is the good of that? for coming to Hades thou shalt not find a lover, O damsel! Among the living are the joys of Cypris; but in Acheron we shall lie, O maid, bones and ash." But what of this? Herrick and Herrick's master would have smiled on the version, which is certainly one of the best in the book. It has the terseness, which is the first thing, and is thus distinguished, for instance, from this of Miss Alma Strettell:—

Unnumbered were the ages past, O man,
Before thy day began.
Unnumbered, too, the ages yet shall be,
That Hades hath for thee.
What store of life, then, doth to thee remain?
Scarce as it were a grain!
Scanty thy life and short—nor mayest thou
Even enjoy it now;
For it is hateful, and its poisoned breath
More dire than loathed death.
Then scorn this stormy life of thine and shun—
As I indeed have done,
I, Pheido, son of Krita—and like me,
Seek the still haven of tranquillity,
The haven of dark Hades' silent sea.

Now the original has eight lines only, and in any case it would have been a mistake to render these by nearly double the number. But this is done by quite unnecessary surplusage. χὼ λοιπὸς μῦθος εἰς Αἴδην, says Leonidas in his lapidary fashion; Miss Strettell upholsters it into a couplet. And then the poet says:—

ἡ ὅσον ὅσον
στιγμὴ, καὶ στιγμῆς εἴ τι χαμηλότερον.

The double ὅσον, the "a point, and if there be anything more diminutive than a point," may be hard to render poetically; but it is surely something of a rijiuto to make it "scarce as it were a grain." "Scanty" but scantily renders τεθλιμμένη, though there is, perhaps, no single word that does much better. But why run out into nearly four lines ("Nor—death") the simple "for neither is it sweet, but more hateful than death, the enemy"? And why weaken the end by inserting "still," "tranquillity," the second "haven," "dark," "silent," and "sea"? "Go to the Haven, to Hades," says pure art, Greek art, and impure art, English art, cannot render it without three extra adjectives and three extra nouns. Yet Miss Strettell is an excellent translator in her way. So is Mr. Garnett; but is his freedom a wholly nobil thing?—

Stern Cynicus doth war austerely wage
With endive, lentils, chicory, and sage;
Which shouldst thou thoughtless proffer, "Wretch," saith he,
"Wouldst thou corrupt my life's simplicity?"
Yet is not his simplicity so great
But that he can digest a pomegranate;
And peaches, he esteems, right well agree
With Spartan fare and sound philosophy.

Now for our baldness. "We saw at the banquet the great wisdom of the beard-cherishing and with-bludgeon-begging Cynic. For at first he abstained from lupines and radishes, saying that virtue must not be a slave to the stomach. But when he saw before his eyes a plump and snow-white sow's belly, it promptly stole away [or perhaps 'he promptly juggled off'] his discretion. Contrary to expectation, he asked for some, he ate it, and no mistake, and he said that a sow's belly never did any harm to virtue." We admit a dispute of readings; but, though Mr. Garnett's is a good epigram, it is surely an unnecessary paraphrase.

Nevertheless, there is much interesting and some excellent work in the book; nor should we have made the strictures we have if we were not, as it happens, in the most excellent charity with the authors perstringed. Also we admit that, in this case of all cases, to break a stone is not to make a stone. But in this poetical bijouterie you cannot play the game too strictly. Mr. Lang's Advice to the Maidens above cited may be above the reach of some translators in elegance, but they can at least make the amount of unfaithfulness it allows itself their limit.

NOVELS.*

SNOW in harvest is much less rare than a lively novel in the dead season, and the critic feels perhaps unduly grateful to the joint authors of An Irish Cousin for having deprived his task of some of its terrors. The book is brisk and easy throughout;

* An Irish Cousin. By Geilles Herring and Martin Ross. 2 vols. London: Bentley. 1889.

In the Wire-Grass. By Louis Pendleton. New York: Appleton & Co. 1889.

In Sinful Paths. By S. Gibb Holmes. London: Swan Sonnenschein & Co. 1889.

the narrative never drags, and even the first person singular, in which the story is told, ceases to be what it so often is, unnatural or obtrusive. The Irish Cousin in question is not the heroine and teller of the tale, but a young man, Willy Sarsfield by name, who is capitally drawn and thoroughly human. His attitude towards his father's niece, Theodora Sarsfield, whose Scotch mother had emigrated to California and had there married Owen Sarsfield, the Irishman, is very attractive. He tries in every way to make her feel happy and at home when she comes from America to visit him and his unpleasant old father in county Cork, attending to her little wants and personal comforts with the consideration which goes further in touching a woman's heart than all the great sacrifices that can be made for her. The little touches by which the reader is made to distinguish between Willy's native susceptibility, his genuine kindness of heart, and his real love for his cousin are delicately given. For a long while he is nothing but a boy, an excellent comrade, always ready to play, to take huff and be appeased, but unselfish and kindly even at the moment of the deepest wounds to his vanity. There is nothing mawkish or sentimental about Willy Sarsfield, and the woman that married him would have held her happiness in her own hands. He makes a mess of his life, partly owing to his good qualities themselves; but, in spite of her social inferiority, his wife's great love for him was certain to gain his affections in the long run. The other young man who finally captivates Miss Sarsfield is of a more shadowy and conventional type; but his two sisters are well-studied specimens of the ordinary young lady. Willy's father somehow suggests the immortal figure of Uncle Silas, and his property and house form a congenial home of mystery. The old gentleman shuts himself up for hours in his study drinking more than is good for him, and only emerging at meal-times, to embarrass his niece with clumsy compliments or clumsier chaff. The house is old, ill furnished, much provided with doors; while outside is a handy bog, containing a bottomless pool. Over and above these valuable accessories is a dumb woman, who lives ostensibly at the Lodge, but glides about the hall all night, or is seen executing an Irish jig in the moonlight under Miss Sarsfield's window. Nay, she even goes further, and on one occasion approaches the young lady with a pillow, and an evident intention of plagiarizing from Othello, when the damsel's defiant mien awes her into retreat. Surely Catherine Morland herself could have asked nothing better. People living in such surroundings must commit murder, whether they like it or not; and we are not surprised to learn that Mr. Owen Sarsfield's bones, instead of reposing at Cork, where he was taken ill on landing from America, had been secretly laid by his younger brother Dominick and the dumb woman in the deepest recesses of the Poul-na-coppal in the bog. It may be as well to explain that the object of this falsehood and possible murder was that, by antedating the death of Owen, the property, on the father's decease, a few days later, passed to Dominick. The joint authors likewise deserve praise in the matter of their heroine. Every one knows by heart the young autobiographer who, while insisting on her snub nose, red hair, and abnormally large mouth, is always hinting at the contrary opinion held by the admirers whom she reckons by legions. When the reader further learns at the very opening of the story that the maiden has left America only six days before, on her first visit to Europe, he knows that three proposals a day is the least he can expect. How great, then, will be his relief when he finds that Miss Sarsfield frankly ascribes to herself the ordinary amount of good looks, and insinuates nothing more; and that the scalps of her victims only number two—the susceptible Willy and Nugent O'Neill. Miss Sarsfield's grammar and style of narration leave something to be desired; but she is lively and pleasant and a lady—and always, as she is careful to remind her acquaintances, an Irish lady. The little incidents of her first run, which she refrains, with great reticence, from describing at length, are very amusingly told; and in this, as in other instances, Miss Sarsfield has no false shame about laughing at her own mistakes and discomfiture. Altogether the joint authors of An Irish Cousin may be congratulated on what seems to be their first novel.

Apostrophes play almost as large a part in the two hundred and fifty pages of In the Wire-Grass as the capital I did in the tale of one's childhood. Stories written in some dialects are perplexing, even exasperating, to read, and require as severe an application of the intellect as the perusal of Mr. George Meredith or the study of Dante. Properly to grasp the author's meaning, and to do justice to his conscientious struggle to convey the local intonation, the student should read the conversations out loud; but this limits his hours of enjoyment to his moments of solitude, as the nuisance would not be tolerated in the family circle. How often have we toiled after Mr. Cable and the Prophet of the Smoky Mountains, and have at last come sadly to the conclusion that, in the effort to obtain verbal understanding, much of eloquence and subtle beauty had passed over our heads. So it is with Mr. Louis Pendleton's tale of In the Wire-Grass, the scene of which is laid in Southern Georgia. It is clever in description, and has much about it that is interesting; but between the clipped and transmogrified talk of some admirably-drawn negroes and the bewildering drawl of a gentleman back from Texas, the reader feels that he has missed several of the most telling points. It is a pity that the author could not invent a better ending to his novel. The story of Hilda's marriage and her repudiation is absurd; and absurder still is the notion that her father never took the trouble to ascertain if the gentleman pointed out to him as Linton Markham was really his guilty son-in-law or not, but strangled him promptly before any one could interfere. One would think that it was both a penal and an unheard-of thing for cousins to bear the same name, from the use made of this incident in novels. Stranger demands are yet made on our credulity. Miss Rachel Hall, aunt of the heroine Audrey, leaves a written statement to the following effect. Her father had gone yachting for an indefinite time with a friend, and for months letters never reached him. Meanwhile his daughter Hilda met and married Linton Markham, and, though her friends knew of the marriage and were present at the ceremony, his family were kept in the dark, in order to propitiate a rich aunt who had already her eye on a wife for him. Even when Hilda's reputation suffered, Mr. Markham made no effort to put things straight, and Hilda left him, went home, and died. We gather by implication that at some time during this period she must have given birth to her daughter Audrey; but no direct reference is made to the fact. Soon after the widowed Mr. Markham married his aunt's candidate, and had the son who twenty years after unknowingly fell in love with Audrey, his half-sister, four years his junior! At least this is what Miss Rachel believes and states, without troubling herself to inquire into possibilities, though, of course, the reader is aware that this very unpleasant notion is untrue, and that the conquering hero is the son of the Linton Markham who was murdered by mistake. Mr. Pendleton is always hazy on the subject of ages, and makes the Captain Brooke who, when Audrey was ten, was talked of in the countryside as a suitable husband for her aunt, aged thirty-five, be proposed six years later as a desirable parti for Audrey herself, he being "now past thirty" (p. 98). Still, with all these faults and drawbacks, there is a great deal of life and vigour about the book. There is a quotation from a charming poem invented by a "cracker boy" or "mean white trash" beginning

Nigger an' a monkey
Settin' on a rail;
Only diffunce I kin see,
Nigger got no tail!

Likewise an interesting description of a swamp in the heart of the forest, where the escaped murderer, Miss Rachel's father, lived for three years and was visited by his daughter and her old nurse Maum Chloe. Further on is a capital account of a fox-hunt, which is a very different affair from what takes place in the Shires. "In Southern Georgia the fox is of a grey color, and therefore a different species from the ordinary red American fox. The animal feeds at night, and is usually hunted during the hours preceding midnight; it may, however, be 'jumped' before dawn, and chased through the early morning hours. This was the plan in the present instance. Half-past four had been proposed as the proper time, but the start was made an hour earlier." No wonder American ladies are rarely to be seen in the field!

It is charitable to suppose—indeed, we have the express statement of the author to warrant the supposition—that such books as In Sinful Paths are written with a good purpose. It is, however, far more difficult to imagine what use they can be to any mortal. In Sinful Paths purports to be a realistic picture of a girl who is tempted and falls, and of her subsequent life; but it is wholly untrue to nature. The language, while professing to be studiously calm and businesslike, is prone to exaggeration, and altogether the book is neither interesting nor edifying.

MONK.*

ONE advantage of what the forerunners of the press of the future call "serieses" is that they supply opportunities for studies of men who might otherwise wait long for a biographer. Mr. Corbett's Monk is an instance of this good that there is in a class of books of which some are apt to speak with unwarranted contempt. "The blockhead Albemarle," as Pepys—who, by-the-by, thought Hudibras stupid—called him, is not an historical personage who was likely to attract the biographer independently; though, as we see, it was easy enough to find a man who loved him well enough to write about him when invited thereto. There is abundant interest in his life certainly, and he would be an admirable hero if he were only treated with that poetic sympathy which is so necessary for the biographer and is also so different from that undiscerning admiration to which Lord Macaulay gave a Latin name. Monk needs to be loved for himself and for what he was, and not loved first and then compelled to conform to some recognized standard of merit. If a man were in search of a phrase with which to ticket Monk, he might do worse than describe him as that Englishman of all Englishmen who most clearly illustrated the amazing luck of England. It may be that such luck comes only to peoples who deserve good fortune. We are the more inclined to accept this proposition because of a surety the luck of this country has been unspeakable. Never was it more conspicuous than in the presence of George Monk at the head of the army of Scotland in 1660. In his own very different way he was as distinctly the man for the situation as ever Cromwell had been. The Protector, whatever else we may think of him, was at least admirably fitted to so rule England in the general crash of revolution as to save all that could be saved from destruction. Fanatic and revolutionist enough he was to understand fanatics and revolutionists, to gain the support of some and see through the others, and yet in all the foundation of his character a solid English country gentleman of an almost Tory stamp. As he was also a born ruler and master man, he could seize the revolutionized nation and hold it quiet till the paroxysms of its passion had settled down. It would be absurd to assert that Monk could have done such a feat of lion-taming. He could do no other than be swept along with the currents between 1645 and 1650. But ten years later the time had come when the nations could again fall into the old roads, and when they were longing for an end to makeshifts and unrest. Then there was another work to be done—something less amazing than Cromwell's, something in which the doer looked less overpoweringly superior to his kind, and yet a great thing, and a necessary and a beneficent. It could not put him who did it into a position of lonely grandeur; but it could, and did, enable him to earn the sincere, if not enthusiastic, gratitude of his country. This work Monk did; and, therefore, he deserves to rank among those Englishmen who have made modern England.

* English Men of Action—Monk. By Julian Corbett. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

It would scarcely be a paradox to assert that he succeeded because he was a strictly limited, even rather stupid, man of the ordinary Low-Country-officer stamp. From time to time this seems to be the view of Mr. Corbett himself. We find him describing Monk as a dull man; and in the account of the great crisis acknowledging that the General of the army of Scotland was carried on by the forces behind him in a way he did not himself clearly understand. At times, again, it seems to strike Mr. Corbett that this is not the way to write about a hero, and then he feels bound to show that Monk was really a very superior person. Hence a certain want of coherence in the portrait. If Mr. Corbett had acknowledged at once that Monk was a solid military gentleman, with military ideas and military morality, strengthened by a very earthy shrewdness of his own, he would have given a more acceptable picture of his man. At times, indeed, he speaks as if he saw as much clearly; but then, again, at others he digresses into interpretations which are in point of ingenuity, though not of absurdity, on a level with that apology for Jezebel with which, under the scarcely sufficiently recognized inspiration of M. Ernest Renan, he has so lately diverted the reader of magazines. Hence, as we say, a certain incoherence in the portraiture. Mr. Corbett, indeed, gives you the real man and the interpretation in the manner of M. Renan within a few pages of one another. On page 11, for instance, he mentions Monk's appointment as captain-lieutenant in Vere's regiment, and proceeds to explain with what moral superiority he performed his duties:—

He [Monk] had no idea of young gentlemen playing at soldiers and disgracing the name by using it only as an excuse for every kind of license. Soldiering under Captain Monk was found to be a very serious thing. The wildest blades were soon tamed by the impassive stare and rough speech of the captain-lieutenant, young as he still was, and many there were who lived to thank him long afterwards for the severity of the lessons he taught.

Here is a sketch of something other than the usual military gentleman who kept military order in his company. Turn we to p. 14, and what do we find:—

In the following year [the year after the siege of Breda], as he lay in winter quarters at Dort, the burghers took deep offence at some disturbance of which his young reprobates had been guilty, and claimed to try them for the offence. No one had a higher sense of his duty to his employers than Monk, and no one stood up more stoutly for the rights of the men under his command. He insisted on settling the matter by court-martial. The burghers appealed to the States. Such cases were not unknown, and had always been decided in favour of the military. But Dort was an important town, and not to be offended lightly. The States-General decided in favour of the burgomaster, and the Prince had to order Monk and his troops into quarters which were by no means a change for the better. Monk was highly offended. He considered the honour of the army was outraged in his person. Unable to support the indignity, and disgusted at the want of consideration shown to a man of his services, he resigned his commission, and resolved to place his sword and experience at the service of his own country.

How did Mr. Corbett get past this story without making that quotation which comes so naturally to one's mind?—

"Oh! my Lord," said the soldier in a sort of enthusiasm, "their behaviour on pay-day might be a pattern to all Europe—no borrowings, no lendings, no offsets, no arrears, all balanced and paid like a banker's book. The quarters, too, are excellent, and the allowances unchallengeable; but then, sir, they are a preceese, scrupulous people, and will allow nothing for peccadilloes. So that if a boor complains of a broken head, or a beer-seller of a broken can, or a daft wench does but squeak loud enough to be heard above her breath, a soldier of honour shall be dragged, not before his own court-martial, who can best judge of and punish his demerits, but before a base mechanical burgomaster, who shall menace him with the rath-house, the cord, and what not, as if he were one of their own mean, amphibious, twenty-breeched boors. So not being able to dwell longer among these ungrateful plebeians, who, although unable to defend themselves by their own proper strength, will nevertheless allow the noble foreign cavalier who engages with them nothing beyond his dry wages, which no honourable spirit will put in competition with a liberal license and honourable countenance, I resolved to leave the service of the mynheers. And hearing at this time, to my exceeding satisfaction, that there is something to be doing this summer in my way in this, my dear native country, I am come hither, as they say, like a beggar to a bridal, in order to give my loving countrymen the advantage of that experience which I have acquired in foreign parts."

"Le maître a parlé," said Sainte-Beuve, after quoting Sir Walter on Le Sage. There is no more to be said.

Perhaps Mr. Corbett did not quote this inimitable passage because it would have clashed with one of the conflicting views he takes of his man. We could wish he had read it and stuck to it; for the facts he quotes prove that Monk was very much the soldier of fortune who looked steadily to his pay and booty, and yet was not forgetful of the honour of a cavalier and the needful points of commanded duty. Mr. Corbett speaks of Monk's genius as a general and other intellectual things; but the facts prove that when Cromwell was there Monk saw brilliant things done, when Cromwell was absent brilliant things did not happen. What took their place was good, stout, competent soldiering, and the loyal doing of work according to the contract. Because he was a solid trustworthy man the Council of State put him over the fleet and the Protector put Scotland in his hands. When the Protector was gone his chance came. If Richard Cromwell had been true to himself, Monk would have been true to him. He had his "whole stift of Dunkel-spiel on the Lower Rhine," and his chance, which in an honourable way he did not neglect, of licking his fingers like a good cook; and what more should he want? But Richard was a poor creature. Anarchy came, and then Monk, the one strictly professional sane man with a trustworthy force at his back, mowed the meadow. Had he been touched with imaginative ambition the temptation to rule for himself would have been too much. He would have done what some half-dozen Frenchmen in a somewhat similar position have done. But to walk on the edge of the sword with the scaffold on one hand and the assassin on the other was no temptation to George Monk. He had neither the brilliant nor the weak qualities which lead a man to run that dreadful course. He saw that to the fanatics themselves the monarchy was the second best thing—to the mass of the nations, English, Scotch, and Irish, it was the one certain alternative to insecurity. He took his course, not hastily, not by a brilliant stroke, but slowly, solidly, and not altogether selfishly. A duchy, thirty thousand a year, and security, could be got with the good will of the nation. Once more in his life, pay, booty, and the honour of a cavalier went together. He turned from the chance of personal power, and clung to what was safe with the good firm grip of a brave man. It was, indeed, happy for England that such a man should have been where he was. Solid and absolutely sane bravery was the note of the man, whether in the breach at Breda, in the miserable Irish welter, in the Highlands, or at Whitehall during the Restoration or during the Plague. Such were the men whose bones were made in England, and therefore we did not fall from Cromwell to unknown depths, as France has fallen from Napoleon to—well, to what we see.

USEFUL NATIVE PLANTS OF AUSTRALIA.*

THE Technological, Industrial, and Sanitary Museum of New South Wales, which was founded in 1880, is an enormous permanent exhibition already containing more than 25,000 specimens, intended to be for Sydney what South Kensington and Bethnal Green, &c., are for London. Animal and vegetable products of all kinds, "waste products," and their utilization, food-stuffs, pottery, &c., metals, agricultural requisites, and numerous other exhibits are provided for, and are evidently accumulating, and such things need cataloguing in due course. Hence the present book—a well-got-up volume of nearly 700 pages, literally crammed with information about plants and their uses. At first sight a catalogue can rarely attract the general reader, but the amount of interesting information scattered through these paragraphs of Mr. Maiden's will amply repay the attention of any one who cares to learn something about the uses of the many curious plants of Australia.

In the first place, the work is carefully and systematically done, and provided with copious indices. Whether the various subdivisions are the best possible is of less importance than whether they are maintained consistently and intelligently; and, in our opinion, the author has adopted a simple plan, and carried it through with credit. In the second place, the information is, in most cases, full and to the point; and it seems much more important that useful information should be given under each heading than that the catalogue should be small and "handy." It is true this plan entails numerous cross-references and some repetitions; but, so far as we have tested the book, these evils appear to be well kept down.

The most surprising fact to us, however, is, that a book of this kind can be made so interesting, while although we see traces of "padding" here and there, there is an air of honesty about the paragraphs which compels attention. Of course, Australia is a world of plant-wonders in itself, and it would be difficult to avoid saying something interesting about the huge "Gum-trees," or the queer "Grass-trees," or the "Bottle-brushes," "Wattles," and other well-known marvels; but the author has in most cases succeeded in saying something interesting under headings of far less promising nature, and giving us the authority for it into the bargain.

The material thus industriously worked up is enormous and must be rapidly growing. More than six hundred timber trees alone are treated of, many of them in some detail, while foods, forage-plants, drugs, perfumes, gums, &c., oils, dyes, fibres, and so on, all receive attention.

* Useful Native Plants of Australia. By J. H. Maiden, F.L.S., F.C.S., &c., Curator of the Technological Museum of New South Wales. London: Trübner & Co. Sydney: Turner & Henderson. 1889.

It is, of course, impossible to mention many details here. Most readers will be interested in the accounts of the natives' method of obtaining water from the roots of trees; of the aborigines' only hereditary property—the Bunyabunya (Araucaria Bidwillii)—of the queer She-oaks (Casuarina), Gum-trees (Eucalyptus), &c. Every one has heard of the giant trees of California, belonging to the Coniferous genus Wellingtonia, and some of which have been known to reach 400–450 feet in height; but it may not be so generally known that the Australians here beat the Americans by several feet, for a specimen of the Giant Gum (Eucalyptus amygdalina) is quoted as being 471 feet in height.

Much information is accumulating with reference to the numerous and valuable timbers of Australia, and the author has used discretion in his extracts; but the very excellence of this catalogue is one of the best proofs how much has still to be done. And the same may be said for the other departments. Drugs and poisonous plants are always difficult to get accurate information about, and those of Australia may well be particularly so; for, as the author remarks, there is no well-trying and ancient (however superstitious) native faculty to appeal to, as there is in India and other Asiatic countries, and the "tamed" aborigine is very ready to give information when he sees it is wanted, and will reply only too willingly to leading questions.

More than one old friend is to be met with in these distant climes, and it seems strange to find our common little Cardamine hirsuta (which, by the way, is erroneously called "Lady's Smock," a name given to its close ally, C. pratensis) scattered "throughout the colonies," and to learn that the Bracken Fern occurs in all the colonies of Australia.

In conclusion, we must heartily agree with the author in his repeated deprecation of the practice of sending wrong information to various centres of dissemination; but we might add that the practice is so common because good observers are so rare. When our colonists take more trouble to learn something about nature and how to observe properly, we shall have less of the chaff that now flies about from one source to another, and curators of museums will not be the only people who benefit from the change.

BONHAM'S INDUSTRIAL LIBERTY.*

A LARGE amount of valuable work in the field of social and economic science has been coming to us from America in the last few years. This activity in a specific domain is in itself not without significance. But more significant still is the prevailing tendency and bias of recent economic work. Mr. Bonham, like many of his fellow-writers, is an ardent disciple of Mr. Herbert Spencer, an inexorable and unbending individualist. Putting on one side his desire to promote certain specific social and financial reforms, his main purpose in the work before us is to arouse the attention of Americans to a danger which seems likely not merely to postpone indefinitely the hope of a more perfect liberty in industrial matters, but even to threaten the existence of their much-vaunted political freedom. In Mr. Bonham's view political liberty is being slowly smothered beneath industrial slavery. Vast corporations are being gradually consolidated—corporations dangerous to individual freedom, and inconsistent with the spirit of the American Constitution, forgetful of their obligations towards the State which endowed them with life, and careless of the interests of the mass of the shareholders whose rights they were appointed to safeguard; powerful for the accumulation of individual fortunes, but directly antagonistic to the healthy development of legitimate industries. Politically these monsters daily increase in strength; they strike swiftly, and in secret; the net which they spread is ever widening, until it threatens at no distant date to envelop the whole fabric of political liberty in the United States. Such is the alarming picture which Mr. Bonham draws of the industrial and political situation in America at the present time. If it be correct, its character has certainly been imperfectly apprehended up to the present in this country, and Mr. Bonham deserves gratitude for enabling us to realize it more vividly.

He approaches his subject with much circumspection. His method is sternly logical, and his style at times almost severely abstract. He has, indeed, aimed at keeping in view "principles rather than statistics," and so, having made "an analysis of the salient political and industrial evils of our time," he has been enabled to "measure by fundamental rules the departure in some of our governmental and industrial methods from these principles." He, therefore, begins by tracing the development of the idea of liberty in England. Correct views upon English constitutional history are not perhaps essential to the soundness of his main argument; but, since he alludes to the matter, it were as well he should do it accurately. It may be quite true, as Mr. Bonham points out, that the importance of Magna Charta has been over-rated; but it is not true, as he implies, that its provisions were framed with an exclusive regard to the interests of the baronial classes. Nothing, indeed, is more remarkable in that remarkable document than the breadth of view it exhibits as to the relations of class and class. Nor is it strictly true to say, as Mr. Bonham says, that "Simon de Montfort called into being the House of Commons." The importance of the Bill of Rights, too, must in future be discounted; it was, as we learn from Mr. Bonham, "really a Bill of particulars." Indeed, the ideas of liberty entertained by even the best of Englishmen in the past were hopelessly limited and perverted. It remained for the framers of the American Constitution, for men "acquainted with the ancient republics," men who had "eminent legal ability, the sagacity and patriotism of the statesman, and the wisdom of the political philosopher," to proclaim to the world the true meaning of political and individual liberty! It is handsomely acknowledged that America owed "a great debt to England"; but Mr. Bonham cannot overlook the fact that in England we have bowed the knee to kings and have permitted ourselves to be trampled on by an hereditary aristocracy. We do not complain that Mr. Bonham should think the existence of a monarchy incompatible with liberty; we do not complain that he should hold in light esteem those constitutional documents which are sometimes grandiloquently called "the monuments of English freedom"; but, though we forgive him this, is it not a trifle unreasoning—a little unphilosophic—to resent the fact that political liberty in the particular sense in which it is understood by Mr. Bonham and the authors of the Federalist should not have been born into the world centuries ago, full grown and completely equipped? He professes great admiration for the work of Montesquieu, but he complains that, "measured by the standards of to-day," parts of it are very defective. But who, judged by such lights, may escape condemnation? Who, measured by the standard of the American Constitution, may hope to approach perfection? Mr. Bonham expects too much. Not in this case only, but to a great extent throughout the book, his argument is vitiated by an entire and irritating absence of all sense of historical perspective. He manifests it here, and he manifests it still more clearly in a later chapter on "Political Government." He does justice to the spirit which animated the mediæval Churchmen. But, because the enlightened citizen of the Great Republic has now reached a stage when he can dispense with the ministrations which the Catholic Church offered and the sanctions it proclaimed, is it wise or is it philosophical to conclude that the aims of the mediæval Church were false or that the means employed "weakened and degraded" the political condition of mankind?

We have indicated a flaw in Mr. Bonham's philosophic method which we take to be fundamental; but, though it vitiates his history, it affects far less seriously his examination of the political and industrial problems of to-day. His conclusion is that the existence of industrial liberty, and through it of political liberty, is grievously threatened, chiefly by the growth of parasitic developments which could not be foreseen at the time when the American Constitution was framed. In his view, "industrial liberty consists in the freedom of each individual citizen, guarded by such delegated authority, contributed by each, as is necessary to preserve their individual freedom equally to each; and this liberty includes the freedom of each individual citizen to contract and the sanctity of contract." Accepting this definition, for the time, as both adequate and true, we ask by what dangers is this liberty assailed? To answer this question is the purpose of the work before us. Mr. Bonham shows, in the first place, that the vast industrial revolution effected by the application of steam to the manufacture and carriage of goods has been, on the whole, adverse to the growth of liberty. The enormous impulse it has given to the creation of wealth is, of course, unquestioned; the improvements it has effected in its distribution are less obvious. But Mr. Bonham's great point is that it has tended, and is tending more and more, to give a dangerous supremacy to the industrial Corporation—a supremacy which is already perverting industrial liberty, and which may extinguish political liberty as well. It is impossible to follow in detail Mr. Bonham's searching analysis of the operations of these industrial Corporations. We are fairly well accustomed to hear of the dishonesty of railway management in the United States, but never, we may make bold to say, has such a lurid light been thrown upon its systematic and ever-widening corruption as by the pen of Mr. Bonham. Assuming the correctness of his facts (and there seems, indeed, no room for question), there cannot be a shadow of doubt that railway management in America is even more hopelessly corrupt than English investors have realized; that it is not merely unmindful of its responsibility to the public, but grossly unfaithful to the trust reposed in it by the proprietors. The main source of the evil appears to be in the relations which have been built up between the railway managers—acting as private individuals—and the "parasite Corporations" which have come into existence in connexion with the great railway Companies. By the assiduous development of these relations the railway managers have succeeded in giving such preferential advantages to these "Parasites" as to create for them a practical monopoly in certain industries. More than this, the system had been immensely extended and elaborated by the creation of vast "Trusts." The projectors of the "Standard Oil Trust," for example, "erected a structure by which they coupled all of the secret interests of the managers of the several trunk-lines, so far as their interests referred to the shipment of petroleum. They thus made a basis for division of the profits of this product between one great parasite and the managers of the different railways. By this device all competition which formerly existed between the parasites of the different trunk-lines was overcome through consolidation. . . . Thus a whole industry was seized. This 'Trust' standing between the producer and the consumer, and through alliance with the railway managers controlling the only means of communication, proceeded to extract from both producer and consumer the largest possible margin, and to hold the industry in its grasp." Such is the system by which legitimate profits have been diverted, and the vast fortunes of a few "manipulators" have been built up.

* Industrial Liberty. By John M. Bonham. New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Among many interesting questions raised by Mr. Bonham in connexion with this subject, two seem to us of special interest. There can be no doubt that our author is right in insisting upon the close connexion between these notorious but hard-to-be-detected railway and Trust malversations, and the growth of the Socialistic temper which has lately made itself dangerously manifest in America in such organizations as the "Knights of Labour." No one defends either the objects or the methods of these organizations, but it is impossible to deny that they are, in America, in some sort a natural growth. As Mr. Bonham truly says:—

Whilst the laborer may not reason accurately upon all the details, he cannot fail to feel instinctively the salient consequences which lie all around him; he cannot fail to see that the greatest of the fortunes that have been heaped up within the last twenty years owe their being, not to the creation of industry, but to a species of legerdemain, through which the fruits of other ownership held in trust have been transferred to these custodians. If men placed in charge of property under what ought to be held as the sacred obligations of custody appropriate that property to themselves, why may not the laborer who has no such nice obligation disregard the law of ownership in a less degree?

Mr. Bonham is not specially complimentary to the American "laborer," but he is not, perhaps, far out in his estimate of average human nature. There is another aspect of the matter which is of even more interest to ourselves than the connexion between Socialism and financial "manipulation." It is the relation between the existence of these consolidated "Trusts" and the maintenance of the Protective Tariff in the United States. We have never held that the removal of their trade restrictions would prove an unmixed advantage to our own traders; but none the less is it interesting, from the point of view of abstract economics, to understand the reasons which have so long delayed their return to the path of financial sanity. Among these reasons the development of the "Trust" system is certainly not the least potent. It is shown by Mr. Bonham ingeniously, but at the same time conclusively, how these "Trusts" are able to appropriate the premium which is afforded by the Protective tariff to certain industries, and, further, how the operations of the "Trusts" tend exactly to neutralize the benefits which the Protectionists claim for their own system:—

The Protectionists [he says truly] cry for protection because they assume that it encourages industry; but their "Trust" flatly contradicts the assumption. They seek to prohibit foreign competition by a tariff, and then repress home industry by a "Trust." Thus the salt, steel, lead, rubber, and other similar "Trusts" methodically and rigorously aim to keep from growing the several industries which the tariff is to foster, in order that the organizers of a "Trust" may profit by the repression of those industries, and then, by the reduction of wages and the increase of price, appropriate the Government's bounty.

We have not lately seen any clearer or more caustic reductio ad absurdum of the system which all the best American economists have now combined to deprecate. Needless to say that the "Trust" system has developed in many other directions, which Mr. Bonham explores in considerable detail, but whither we have no time to follow him. The obvious question which occurs to an English reader is, How comes it, since the methods pursued by the "manipulators" appear to be so accurately known, that no means have been taken to put a stop to a system which is so palpably injurious to the common weal? Mr. Bonham in part supplies the answer. The obstacles in the way of reform are neither few nor unimportant. In the first place, the existing judicial tribunals are entirely inadequate to deal with the evil. The abuse did not exist at the time the Constitution was originally framed, and consequently no remedies were provided even by its all but omniscient framers. Here we have an illustration of the disadvantages attendant on the immobility of the American Constitution—that element which in the judgment of the late Sir Henry Maine was one of its most salient advantages. Even Mr. Bonham has been fain to confess with Bacon that his country has not been sufficiently apt "in devising remedies as fast as time breedeth mischiefs." The appointment of the Inter-State Commerce Commission was, indeed, an indication of a dawning perception that existing tribunals were insufficient to meet existing dangers; but neither that Commission nor the Pacific Railway Commission have succeeded in thoroughly unearthing all the secret machinations of the "foul conspirators" against the commonwealth. But it is not merely of the insufficiency of judicial tribunals that Mr. Bonham complains. He realizes clearly that the most formidable obstacle to reform consists in the immense political influence which the "Corporations" can exert, and in the "Corporations" lies the root of the evil. No thorough reform can be looked for from "statesmen who have direct or indirect alliances with the railway interest." Their corporate interests, as Mr. Bonham says, "stand in perpetual conflict with their duties as representatives of the people. . . . Some of these representatives have been placed in their seats through the direct influence of the corporate power for the purpose of furthering it by legislation. Having been successfully engaged in supplanting economic and natural laws by processes which seem to them of a more practical kind, it is not to be supposed that such representatives will examine the force of those economic laws with which they stand in conflict." But perhaps the most disheartening feature of the whole situation, to the eye of the ardent reformer, is the comparative apathy with which the public at large regards the matter. This apathy can without difficulty be explained. In the first instance, the American people were possessed by an absorbing anxiety for railway development; they were careless as to the evils which the system established by themselves might generate. Then came a reaction; the people were alarmed at the power of the monster they had created; retaliatory legislation was hastily promoted; the intervention of the Courts was invoked; the railways were found, as a rule, to be within the forms of law; the excitement quickly aroused, as quickly cooled, and public opinion was once again lulled into acquiescent apathy. Meanwhile the magnitude of the evil, so far from diminishing, is steadily increasing, and every year the "railway interest," by the consolidation of its connexions, is making itself more and more impregnable. Firmly as he deprecates the acquisition of railways by the State, Mr. Bonham clearly recognizes that nothing can be done in the direction of reform until the relations of the railway and the State are put upon a sounder basis, until the former acknowledge a "specific trust." At present the railway interest has got somewhat out of hand, and, as our author pertinently observes, "all human experience shows that no artificial organization whose motive is private gain can safely be endowed with political influence or regulation of industry except under continuous and specific governmental control."

We have already alluded incidentally to the close connexion between the "Trust" system which Mr. Bonham so vigorously assails and the maintenance of the Protective tariff; but the chapter on "Protection" (chapter viii.) is well worth reading apart from all reference to the main thesis which the author is seeking to support. It really seems impossible to believe that the vast, though scattered, agricultural interests of the West will submit to be crippled in their industry for the sake of the manufacturing "Ring" in the Eastern States, when once they clearly realize the true bearing of the matter. From the consideration of the Protective system and its glaring absurdities, Mr. Bonham passes naturally to the more general aspects of paternal government. He is, as we have said, a stern individualist, and nowhere does this come out more strongly than in his treatment of the education question. To his thinking it is no part of the function of the State to attempt to neutralize nature's law of diversity of faculty. He is roundly opposed to compulsory education, and still more so to making that education gratuitous, maintaining that the common-school system and the policy on which it rests must "in the sum of its consequences deteriorate the freedom and well-being of the race." Nay, he would even go so far as to contend that the future of American civilization is threatened by this adventitious aid to the already prevailing tendency towards uniformity. In this country we have hardly had time to realize the full effects of the "Revolution of 1870"; opposition to the School Board, if not silenced, is generally stifled; but there are more people, we suspect, who would concur in the following sentiments than would care to avow it:—"It is an assumption, and not a right, by which a majority does the initial wrong of reaching into the pocket of one citizen and taking part of the fruits of his industry in order to accomplish the second wrong of thrusting the arm of the Government into the family of another, to lift from his shoulders the paternal duty; and then to do the third wrong of attempting to substitute for that paternal duty the process of making the minds of children uniform."

Much of Mr. Bonham's tirade against paternalism is tolerably familiar to readers of Mr. Herbert Spencer; but, for all that, there is a freshness of treatment and a vigour of argument in the disciple which cannot fail to render his work more than acceptable. The problems with which he deals are to a large extent local problems; but the principles which he enunciates, and with not a little force maintains, are capable of wider application. He occasionally lapses into extravagance and bombast, as when he declares that the town meeting and the Corporation stand in the same antagonism now as when "Arminius smote Varus, shattered and drove back the Roman legions from the country of the Rhine"; but, on the whole, his style is dignified and restrained, and apt for the illustration of principles which, though not popular, are sound.

TWO BOOKS OF EASTERN TRAVEL.*

IN The Land of the Dragon Mr. Percival begins by endeavouring to dispel the idea which he found current among his friends in England during a well-earned furlough, that Shanghai was situated in a dismal swamp, and that the houses are "perched on piles," the ground not being sufficiently dry to admit of the people "occupying tents or log huts." Shanghai, as we thought most people knew, is the model European city of the East. The success of its municipal system is guaranteed by the fact of the Town Council being composed of the leading merchants and bankers, who take a pride in their city, and have made its cleanliness, its drainage, its supply of water, gas, and electric light an example which might well be followed by some communities nearer home. The "dismal swamp" of forty years ago has been transformed into a bright and beautiful abode, whose fine public gardens, yacht club, cricket club, Fine Arts Society, Amateur Dramatic Company, &c., enable the residents to enjoy life most thoroughly, except during the hot season. It is curious to read that "many young and wealthy Chinese from all parts of the interior look upon Shanghai as Europeans look upon Paris or London. Most of them come here with plenty of riches, and a large credit; but the majority return—i.e. if they return at all—very much after the fashion of the Prodigal." Yet in spite of all these attractions, and of a double-columned list of local Societies which occupies nearly the whole of one of Mr. Percival's pages, Shanghai has one drawback besides the heat of summer—you can go nowhere, and do nothing, without a boat. Round Shanghai foreigners have, with much difficulty, obtained from the Chinese authorities "permission to make a very few miles of road outside the boundary of the foreign concession; but five miles east and five miles west is the limit. You must go and return by the same road. Day after day the same weary drive is all the carriage exercise to be had, which in a short time becomes monotonous in the extreme." In Mr. Percival's case, however, this necessity for making his vacation tours in a house-boat seems not to have been unwelcome; and, when jaded by work, his habit is to start with his wife and daughter on a series of adventures such as few single men would care to face. All three were once attacked and overpowered by a furious mob of villagers and imprisoned in a "Joss-house," whence they escaped by cutting a hole in the bamboo walls; their boat was almost wrecked in a heavy gale on Lake Taihu, and leaked so badly that a dry dock had to be improvised for her repair; yet, in spite of battle and tempest, when the writer came to leave the lake which had treated him so roughly, "we were all rather sorry. I had been sent there as an invalid to recover a little health, and, when I came to review the treatment, I thought it had been rather a severe one for a sick man. But it had agreed with me, for I was perfectly well and strong." The country round about Shanghai was the scene of the great Tae-ping rebellion twenty-five years ago. One of the most curious results of this great struggle was that within a few years in the more remote districts round Shanghai it was not unusual to meet an American or a European in Chinese attire, who had married a native woman and adopted the Chinese language to the almost utter forgetfulness of his mother tongue. I have met with one or two of these men myself. They are mostly, if not all of them, waifs and strays, who served, some in the rebel, some in the Imperial army, during the fifteen years of the rebellion. Those that I have seen are comfortably settled, with Chinese wives and families, living in Chinese communities exactly as though they were natives of the land. Indeed, I have often fancied that the marked character of the Caucasian features have partly changed into the almond, cat-like eyes, and the stumpy nose of the Chinese.

* The Land of the Dragon; My Boating and Shooting Excursions to the Gorges of the Upper Yang-tze. By W. Spencer Percival, H.B.M.'s Civil Service, China. London: Hurst & Blackett. 1889.

A Suburb of Yedo. By (the late) Theobald A. Purcell, Surgeon-Major, A.M.D., and (by permission) Principal Medical Officer to the Japanese Government. With Illustrations. London: Chapman & Hall. 1889.

A propos of this, Mr. Percival extracts from the leading Shanghai paper a delicious yarn of a belated shooting-party, who applied to a native farmer for hospitality. Their host treated them well, was a bit of a sportsman, and a very pleasant evening was spent, when suddenly the "native" electrified his guests by rising and saying to them in English, "Gentlemen, allow me to introduce you to my wife!" We cannot resist quoting Mr. Percival's account of his visit to an "opium-den," said to be the largest place of the sort in all China, which he found to be a luxurious establishment, where, in the "first class," the woodwork of the couches is inlaid with mother-of-pearl, jade, and ivory. The couches and pillows are richly covered, some with embroidered satin, some with crimson velvet. The building is in the form of a quadrangle, open in the centre for light and air. This centre court is a garden, containing a variety of rare plants and shrubs, interspersed with a quantity of miniature rock-work. The ceiling throughout the interior is beautifully carved, and in places richly gilt, with many grotesque designs, thoroughly Chinese, and at regular intervals along the walls are let in large slabs of curious variegated marble. . . . I lingered about the place for more than two hours, occasionally sitting and talking to one of the smokers . . . but always watching for the vacant, silly gaze of which I had heard so much. . . . I admit I felt uncomfortable, and not a little disillusioned. Like a stranger in a West-End club staring at members in the smoking-room, whom he had been led to expect to find inebriated and rolling about the floor, but who, on the contrary, gaze calmly and curiously at the audacious intruder, I felt baffled and confounded, for, like many of my fellow-countrymen, I had pictured to myself this greatest opium resort in the whole of China as a perfect den—an epitome of vice and misery—and fully expected the reality to exceed my mental creation; and now, after as thorough an investigation as two hours admitted of, I had to confess that this establishment, instead of proving the haunt of unspeakable misery and iniquity, presented, in elegance, order, sobriety, decorum, and courtesy to the guests, a not unfavourable comparison with the majority of cigar-divans and coffee-houses in many of the large cities of Europe.

The most important part of Mr. Percival's book is his description of the journey to Ichang. The gorges of the Yangtze Kiang have already been well described in Mr. Little's book; and he, after his adventurous voyage through them, determined to run a trading steamer up the river. The steamer has been built; but the difficulties to be overcome before she could make a trip have been enough to dishearten any man.

All the natives of the two provinces of Szechuen and Hupeh appeared to dislike the advent of steam navigation. They thought, and very naturally so too, that, if one steamer is successful, it will only be a very short time before there is a regular line of steamers running between Ichang and Chungking. The Mandarins objected because they feared the result of any closer intimacy with the outside barbarian. The governing authorities objected because they feared a row. The merchants objected because they feared that foreign traders would soon learn the price of Szechuen produce, and so cut down their profits. The boat-owners objected because they feared that steamers would take away their occupation, and the trackers and coolies objected because they feared that, if the boat traffic disappeared, their means of livelihood would disappear also. In the face of so much opposition and so many difficulties, I fear Mr. Little had rather a rough and anxious time.

Indeed, we fear that he cannot even yet be congratulated upon having brought his enterprise to a successful issue. Nevertheless the introduction of railways and steamers into the interior of the Chinese Empire is merely a question of time, and of a very short time also. A complete revolution has taken place in Chinese ideas since the Woosung railway plant was bought up and dropped into the sea. There is already a railway 81 miles in length in actual working, and the telegraph, which was bitterly opposed at first, now extends for 3,000 miles. In spite of the opposition of the literati, whose training renders them intensely patriotic and opposed to foreigners as foreigners, and who "breathe the spirit of the Emperor Yung-Ching, who, addressing a deputation, declared:—'China will want for nothing when you cease to live in it, and your absence will not cause it any loss,'" in spite of the ill-will of nearly all classes in China, its Government seems to see that, as the admission of steamers and railways is inevitable, all it can now stipulate for is that the management of them shall be retained in Chinese hands. On Friday, June 21st, 1889, the Shanghai Correspondent of the Standard telegraphed:—"Li Hung Chang has written a memorial, accepting the control of the railways in the north of China, and recommending Chang Chi Tung for the corresponding position in the south. It is stated that tenders are to be received for the building of a railway from Peking to Hankow. There seems no doubt that the Government at last really mean business in this matter."

A Suburb of Yedo forms a complete contrast to Mr. Percival's book. The one describes China from the outside, the other describes Japan from the inside. Emerson, we are told, once prophesied there would grow up in England an irresistible taste for Orientalism. Thus far it has taken the form of admiring and imitating the furniture and fabrics, rather than the literature, of the East; but nevertheless, at a time when all countries in Europe and America seem to be fast being ground down into mere repetitions of one commonplace pattern, we cannot wonder if the two nations of China and Japan, whose arts and letters have grown up independently of our own, should have a strange fascination for us. These idyllic little sketches of Japanese life are distinctly unprogressive; we hear nothing about the railway and the steamship, and the thoughts which shake so many of mankind in the East just now. The book, while modestly professing to describe "Our Suburb," is really a storehouse of deliciously quaint old-world Japanese gossip, most sympathetically told, and evidently keenly enjoyed by the narrator. The real native illustrations, capitally executed, add immensely to the local colour; and the descriptions of "the barber," "the doctor," "the blind priest" and his winsome "little maid," the "story-teller," and the poor old bellringer who perished in the fire with the beloved bell which he could not save, are all alike freshly and pleasantly written. We grieve to learn from the title-page that one who could write so well will write no more. He appears to have thoroughly entered into the life of the people among whom his lot was cast, and we imagine that most readers will be sorry that his book contains so very few pages and surprised at the clearness of the pictures of old Japan which they contain.

AN ANALYSIS.*

A VOLUME now before us declares itself a part of the Short History of the English People, by the late J. R. Green. It is not so, for it is really a part of Mrs. Green's revised edition. We have already expressed our opinion as to the propriety of the course adopted in preparing this edition; the book is a famous one, and there should have been no tampering with the text of the deceased author. When the revised edition was first published it contained a warning that the book was not as Green had left it; this volume gives no such warning, and the purchaser who believes that he has bought the famous Short History, or rather a portion of it, will have just cause of complaint. A comparison of the first few pages with the corresponding pages of the original will afford a fair crop of examples of the method pursued by the reviser. An Analysis is appended, compiled by Mr. Tait. If, as we imagine, it is intended to represent the contents of part of either of the editions of the Short History, it should have given references to pages. It contains several statements which we have failed to find in the book itself. Nevertheless, it is possible that they may be there in one form or another; for it is not by any means always easy to hunt up a given statement of fact in the Short History. As an independent analysis of English history from the death of Thomas Cromwell to the Revolution—

* A Short History of the English People. By John Richard Green, Hon. Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford. With Maps, Tables, and an Analysis by C. W. A. Tait, Assistant-Master in Clifton College. Part III. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

the period covered by this volume—it strikes us as a careful and intelligent piece of work. For many reasons Green's book, brilliant as it is, is not a good school history; but the teacher who will accept the help which Mr. Tait offers him may use it with a fair chance of profit to his scholars.

THE SCIENTIFIC PAPERS OF SIR WILLIAM SIEMENS.*

DR. POLE'S Life of Siemens has been appropriately followed up by a reprint of the great inventor's papers and addresses upon scientific subjects. To most people it will be matter of surprise that one who was essentially a man of action rather than of speech has furnished so considerable an amount of material for reprinting. Siemens was by no means an inarticulate engineer; but he left so large a legacy of accomplished work, in the way of invention and construction, that one did not look for evidence of a very active pen. Nevertheless, Mr. Bamber has collected enough to fill three substantial volumes, and we could point to papers which he has omitted—perhaps because their subject-matter was sufficiently covered by other papers which are included in the collection. Indeed, the editor might very properly have given this principle a greatly extended application. As things are there is a great deal of repetition, much of which is needless. It was inevitable that, when Siemens was describing one of his inventions—say, for instance, his regenerative gas furnace—to one and another of the learned or semi-learned Societies, he should handle much the same matter, and dress it in much the same form. In such cases space would have been saved, a larger circle of readers might have been secured, and at least as much honour would have been done to the author's memory, if only the most representative paper had been selected for publication in extenso, and the others had been given in short abstract, with quotations of any passages in which substantial novelties were to be found. The same principle might have led to the excision or abbreviation of a good many of the numerous short speeches which fill a considerable part of these volumes, remarks made by way of compliment or criticism of papers read by others at the Institution of Civil or Mechanical Engineers or Naval Architects, or at the Iron and Steel Institute. Those remarks cannot in the nature of the case have been meant by the speaker to form any part of his abiding work, and such interest or value as they have is of course much lessened when they appear, as they do here, apart from the papers they referred to and from the discussions in which they took their place. Even in the matter of illustrations the editor might have lightened the ship without loss or serious inconvenience to his readers. Several of the plates in vols. i. and iii. are identical or practically identical, and this happens because there is substantial repetition of the subject-matter which the plates were drawn to illustrate. In one or two instances papers are included which we should not have looked for, such as a letter written to the Times in 1878, when a telegram from New York announced that Edison had solved the problem of what was then called the division of the electric light. There was a terrible flutter among holders of gas shares, and Siemens wrote to allay the panic. The panic was absurd; but Siemens wrote under a complete misconception of what Edison's invention consisted in, and his letter has now turned out to be a curious (and, for him, a quite rare) instance of the futility of scientific prophecy. It marks an episode that is worth remembering in the history of electric lighting, but it is scarcely in its right galley in a permanent collection of scientific papers. In all other respects the editor appears to have done his work extremely well; our only complaint is that he has perhaps given us a little too much.

But, speaking generally, if there is too much, it is too much of an exceedingly good thing. These papers and lectures by Siemens are not only of great scientific and historical value, besides that they are models of technical exposition. As to style, it would be difficult to find better examples of simplicity, clearness, directness, and sustained relevancy; as to substance, most of them have the interest which naturally attaches to any narrative of successful invention told (and here the story is always most modestly told) by the inventor himself, and almost any one of them might be cited as showing the happy results which follow when an engineer who has a firm grasp of the practical side of a question is able to take an equally firm grasp of its scientific side. This was, perhaps, the strongest of Siemens's many strong points. He was not great as a theorist, nor ever made any pretension to that kind of greatness. Only once did he attempt an ambitious flight in the region of scientific speculation (in his theory of the Conservation of Solar Energy), and on that occasion he is generally considered to have ventured too near the sun. But he was the very reverse of an empiric. His whole work was directed by his appreciation of scientific principles. He looked on these as a sailor looks on his guiding lights. They interested him not, or at least not mainly, as parts of a philosophic scheme, but rather in their relation to his conduct as an engineer. He saw them with an intensely clear vision, and strained his eyes to trace their bearing on industrial practice; and no sooner did the connexion become apparent than he hastened to put his ideas to the trial. Nothing was more characteristic of the man than his quick pursuit of thought by action. And the pursuit, if begun without delay, was kept up without flagging. To the quality of fervour he joined the rarer power of patient insistence, which would seek again and again for a new application of an idea when the first had failed, or repeat the trial under altered conditions till failure turned to success. Take, for instance, a part of his work in the industrial application of heat. At a time when comparatively few even among professed physicists had accepted the conclusions of Joule as to the conservation of energy and the dynamical theory of heat, and fewer still had begun to realize their practical significance, Siemens's paper "On the Conversion of Heat into Mechanical Effect" showed that he had taken firm hold of the new doctrines, and was hard at work turning them to account in the improvement of heat-engines. As early as 1816 an ingenious Scotch "minister," the Rev. Robert Stirling of Dundee, had invented a remarkable form of air-engine, the chief novel feature of which was a part called the "regenerator," which acted like the respirator worn over the mouth and nose of a consumptive patient, taking heat from warm air when that passed through it in one direction, storing the heat up, and giving it back to cold air that passed through it in the other direction. Stirling's notions about the action of his engine had been crude, and in one important respect erroneous. Siemens, attacking the subject from the standpoint of the new philosophy, pointed out the true function of the regenerator, and suggested its application to steam-engines for the purpose of increasing what is now called the efficiency—that is to say, the proportion which the work done by the engine bears to the heat which is supplied. His ideas were sound; but, after many years of trial, again and again renewed, they failed of being directly realized. But Siemens held to his faith in the regenerator as a heat-saving appliance, and before long a suggestion made by his brother Frederick opened up an immensely wide field for its application. This was the proposal to use the regenerator as an adjunct to ordinary furnaces, as a means of extracting heat from the waste gases before allowing them to escape up the chimney, and returning this heat to the furnace by giving it up to the stream of fresh air which goes in to support the combustion of the fuel. The furnace regenerator consists of two chambers stacked with bricks, fitted with connecting flues and valves so that the hot gases from the furnace may pass out through either chamber, while the cold air enters through the other. After the hot gases have been passing through one of the chambers for a time, so that the bricks in it are heated up, the valves are switched over, and the stream of fresh air now enters through the heated chamber, while the hot current of waste gases escapes through the other and heats it up. From time to time the valves are changed, at regular intervals which depend upon the capacity of the bricks for storing heat. The advantage of the regenerator is twofold. In the first place, it leads to a very great economy of fuel, by recovering heat which would otherwise go to waste; in the second place, it allows a far higher furnace temperature to be attained than would otherwise be possible even with the most lavish expenditure of fuel. The invention of the regenerative furnace dates from 1857; it was rapidly matured by Siemens and adapted to iron-puddling, glass-making, and other processes. There is now scarcely an application of heat on the large scale in which the regenerative principle does not play an important part. Its greatest application—namely, to steel-making—which Siemens had in view from the first, was not achieved without further invention and patient effort, extending over several years. Siemens was not long in seeing that the regenerative action was incomplete so long as the air which entered the furnace was the only vehicle by which heat was restored. He wished to make the fuel itself take part in the action, and for that purpose the fuel must be supplied in the gaseous state. The Siemens gas-producer, invented in 1861, made this practicable. By a process consisting partly of semi-combustion and partly of distillation, it extracted the combustible constituents of coal in the form of a gas which is passed through a separate regenerative chamber and is thereby heated, just as the air supply is heated, to a temperature of 3,000° or so of Fahrenheit's scale before it is delivered to the furnace hearth. After the invention of the gas-producer the regenerative furnace was ready to be applied to the direct production of steel from the ore and from cast-iron, and Siemens attacked this problem with characteristic energy in 1862, just as the rival and quite distinct process of Bessemer was being brought to commercial success. Bessemer's long struggle was ending when Siemens was beginning his. Disappointed, as he says, by the indifference of manufacturers and the antagonism of their workmen, he resolved in 1865 to erect sample steel-works of his own at Birmingham, and it was there that the process was matured which will always be associated with his name. One has only to turn to the high-pressure boiler of a modern steam-ship or to such a structure as the Forth Bridge to realize what has been made possible by Siemens's steel.

Papers on Heat and Metallurgy fill one of the three volumes. Another deals with Electricity, in the modern development of which, as everybody knows, Siemens played an important part. The third consists of miscellaneous Lectures and Addresses, and not the least valuable of the reprinted papers are some of those which it contains treating of technical education. Everything Siemens wrote or spoke on that vexed question bears the stamp of strong common sense, and comes with peculiar authority from a man with his sound knowledge of the functions of science and wide experience of the needs of industry. He advised the maintenance of the apprenticeship system, reducing it to three years or so, beginning it later than is now usual, and supplementing it by a course of training in theory at a technical college or school. It is, however, doing injustice to his views to attempt a brief summary of them, and the addresses themselves well deserve careful reading. This, indeed, is true of the whole contents of these volumes. They are instructive, for they are the authentic story of what a really great man did and failed to do, and they are interesting, for every chapter of the story is exceedingly well told. One rises from them with the feeling that Siemens achieved what he did because he set to work in the right way and kept at it. He did great things intelligibly and legitimately, and no one will class him as one of those successful people whose success must be as great a puzzle to themselves in their reflective moments as it is at all times to their friends.

* The Scientific Works of C. William Siemens, Kt., F.R.S., D.C.L., LL.D., Civil Engineer: a Collection of Papers and Discussions. Edited by E. F. Bamber, C.E. Vol. I.—Heat and Metallurgy. Vol. II.—Electricity and Miscellaneous. Vol. III.—Addresses, Lectures, &c. London: John Murray. 1889.

CLASSICAL EDITIONS AND SCHOOLBOOKS.*

MR. HADLEY'S edition of the Hippolytus deserves notice, although as a commentary for the use of learners, which appears to be its main purpose, it leaves something to be desired. The text of the play has always offered a tempting field for conjectural emendation, and Mr. Hadley's suggestions are not all unhappy. For instance, at ll. 715-16 the MSS. reading is:—

ἐν δὲ προστρέπουσ' ἐγὼ
εὐρημα δὴ τι κ.τ.λ.

Mr. Hadley suggests

ἐν δὲ πρόσθ' εἰποῦσ' ἐρῶ,
εὐρημα δὴ τι κ.τ.λ.

Of course the emendation is not convincing; perhaps here none could be; but it involves little alteration; it gives very fair sense; and it makes the passage refer back to Phædra's suggestion of suicide at l. 400. Other conjectures of Mr. Hadley's will be found at ll. 383 sq., and again at ll. 441 and 491. They are as plausible as most that have been made by previous editors, and this is probably as much merit as Mr. Hadley himself would claim for them. On the whole, Mr. Hadley is conservative with regard to the text. He even retains and suggests a rendering of the awkward MSS. reading at ll. 78 sq. His version is "And Aidōs the gardener doth tend it with water from the rill, that it may furnish garlands for all those in whom is no taught goodness; but at their birth a wise sobriety in everything alike took them for her own." The clumsy translation of δρέπεσθαι may be passed over as a matter of detail; the point is, can εἶληχεν have the meaning here given to it, and is τὸ σωφρονεῖν the subject? For our part we are inclined to agree with Mr. Hadley. It is a pity in a play where so much turns upon disputed readings that the chief variants and emendations are not given at the foot of each page for convenience of reference. Regarded as a school edition, Mr. Hadley's work has many good points. He knows his Greek tragedians well, and quotes them aptly, and he is thoroughly sound on points of grammar and scholarship. Especially valuable to students are the numerous short notes on the use of various forms and compounds by the tragedians, such as those on ξενόσθαι and ἀποξενόσθαι (l. 1085), on the future of φεύγω, though his view on this matter is opposed to Dr. Rutherford's expressed in the New Phrynichus, a work to which we have not observed any reference in Mr. Hadley's notes, and on ἐκρῶσθαι (l. 1247). As compared with most editors of the present day, Mr. Hadley is sparing of help.

* The Hippolytus of Euripides; with Introduction and Notes. By W. S. Hadley, M.A., Fellow of Pembroke College, Cambridge. Cambridge: University Press.

Ovidii Metamorphoseon liber undecimus. Edited, with Notes, by Rev. Edgar Sanderson, late Scholar of Clare College, Cambridge. Oxford: Parker & Co.

Livy. Book XXII. Edited by Marcus S. Dimsdale, M.A., Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. Cambridge: University Press.

Xenophon's Hellenica. Book II. With Analysis and Notes by Rev. L. D. Dowdall, B.D. Oxon. Cambridge: Deighton, Bell, & Co.

Xenophon's Anabasis. Book VI. With Notes and Vocabulary. London: Rivingtons.

Cæsar's Commentaries. Book I. With English Notes and Argument by George Long, M.A., and Vocabulary by W. F. R. Shilleto, M.A., late Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge. London: George Bell & Sons.

Virgil's Æneid. Book I. With English Notes and Argument, abridged from Professor Conington's edition by the late Rev. J. G. Sheppard, D.C.L. With Vocabulary by W. F. R. Shilleto, M.A. London: George Bell & Sons.

Exercises in Latin Verse of Various Kinds. By Rev. George Preston, M.A., Head-Master of the King's School, Chester. London: Macmillan & Co.

Key to the Same. By Rev. George Preston, M.A., Head-Master of the King's School, Chester. London: Macmillan & Co.

Faciliora: a Book of easily Graduated Latin Exercises for Beginners. Compiled by Rev. J. L. Seager, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge. London: George Bell & Sons.

Crustula; or, Unseen Passages for Lower Forms. Edited by E. A. Wells, M.A., Assistant-Master in Durham School. London: Rivingtons.

Selections from the best Latin Authors. By the Rev. Edmund Fowle and the Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A., late Scholar of B.N.C., Oxford. London: Relfe Brothers.

We are rather pleased to note the absence of an analysis of the plot of the play. Sixth-form boys and undergraduates reading for honours can dispense with such assistance. We should have liked to see a scheme of the choral metres, and the absence of a list of dramatis personæ is probably due to an oversight. The working out of the plot is occasionally illustrated by comparisons with the tragedies of Seneca and Racine on the same subject.

Mr. Sanderson's edition of Metamm. XI. is described on the cover as a volume of the Oxford "Latin texts with short notes." As there are some sixty-five pages of notes to twenty-four of text, this description is, of course, ironical. The notes are for the most part sound enough; but they give far too much help, and contain a good deal of matter which boys should hunt up in books of reference. If an editor of Ovid sets to work to explain every mythological reference; to give, as Mr. Sanderson does, accounts of Phœbus, Hermes, Nereus, the Erinyes, and the Satyrs, and to tell the myth of Phrixus and Helle, and the legend of Orpheus, instead of sending his reader to the classical dictionary, his commentary must needs grow to an inordinate length. In other matters, too, Mr. Sanderson gives far too much help. A boy who is fit to read Ovid does not need to be told that Laomedonta, Danaen, Hesperidas are Greek accusatives, or that "petisset (l. 105) is for petivisset." Are not these things written in the Latin grammar? Why, again, should a boy be informed that obsita (l. 234) comes from obsero? For what purpose has he a dictionary if it is not to find out such matters as these? A still greater encouragement to indolence is given in parsing fallare (l. 84); the problem of discovering its mood and tense is surely not insoluble, especially as the verb putes, which is coupled with fallare, gives the necessary clue. If this line needs any note at all, it is on the use of et non, to which Mr. Sanderson does not refer. He thinks it necessary at l. 50 to explain that caput is the head of Orpheus, which is perfectly obvious, yet he makes no mention of some points which may well puzzle beginners in hexameter verse, such as the scansion of Bacchæi ululatus (l. 17). Superfluous as much of Mr. Sanderson's information is, it is for the most part correct; but there is one surprising exception in a note on l. 133. Midas prays to Bacchus, "Miserere, precor, specioso eripe damno." Mr. Sanderson writes:—"It was a showy, or brilliant, harm that had befallen him, because if he died, as seemed likely, of starvation he could cut a shining figure in death." Of course, there is no reference here to the possible death of Midas, specioso damno only means "a fair-seeming but baneful gift." Mr. Sanderson has evidently been misled by the phrase splendida brachia two lines earlier. The introduction contains a short account of the poet himself and of the most important MSS. and editions of the Metamorphoses. The text is expurgated for school use, and some of the chief variants and emendations are given at the foot of each page.

Mr. Dimsdale, whose edition of Livy, Book XXI., has been well received, now gives us a very good school edition of Book XXII. There are two short introductory chapters, the first dealing with the sources of Livy's narrative, and roughly indicating what parts of the book seem to be derived from Polybius, what from Roman annalists, while the second treats of the style and grammar of Livy. Mr. Dimsdale is particularly sound and instructive on Livy's use of the subjunctive. The notes, both historical and grammatical, are good and useful, and any one who has worked carefully through the book with their aid ought to know the history well, and to have a very clear notion of the distinctive features of Livy's style. Four appendices discuss disputed points about Hannibal's movements, and the events of the war. We can only indicate some of Mr. Dimsdale's conclusions. He holds that Livy's account of the battle of Trasimene is more probable than that of Polybius, and places the battlefield in the plain on the north shore of the lake. With regard to Hannibal's entrance and escape from Campania, he follows Polybius; and he maintains about Cannæ what we hold to be undoubtedly the correct view—that the battle was fought on the right bank of the Aufidus.

Mr. Dowdall's edition of Hellenics, Book II., contains a very full analysis of the subject-matter, and an exhaustive commentary, whose chief fault is that it is much too long. Nearly ninety pages of notes to thirty of text, and of rather easy text, is an undue proportion. The length of the notes arises in some measure from an attempt to cater at once for the student of history and tolerably advanced scholar, and also for that rather exacting person the "junior student." For those who read to learn Greek this edition will, we fancy, be found more useful than Mr. Underhill's, which we have recently noticed, but to the historical student we should recommend Mr. Underhill's.

Those teachers who wish to have a good and well-printed text at a cheap rate, who are glad of a few—perhaps rather too few—sound notes, and who do not particularly object to a vocabulary at the end of the book, have probably found out by this time that they can get what they want in Rivington's "Greek and Latin Texts." It is, therefore, enough to say that the sixth book of the Anabasis has appeared in this series. Perhaps it ought to be added that the vocabulary is honourably distinguished from other abominations of the kind in that poetical and Ionic words used by Xenophon are marked with an asterisk as a warning to the unwary.

Not much more is needed than mention of the fact that Book I. of Mr. George Long's edition of Cæsar and Book I. of the Æneid, with Conington's notes as abridged by Dr. Sheppard, have been published singly; each, we are sorry to say, with a vocabulary appended. These volumes belong to a series called the "Lower Form Series." It, therefore, seems a mistake to place the notes at the foot of each page, but they are printed in such very small type that the lower-form boy who has omitted to prepare his translation lesson will do ill to trust to being able to "get something out of the notes" on the spur of the moment.

The only fault we have to find with Mr. Preston's Latin verse book is that there is not enough of it. The whole range of Latin verse-composition is included, and there are only fourteen passages to be turned into lyrics and seven for hendecasyllables and iambs. There are some thirty pieces for elegiacs and twenty for hexameters, and it would, we fancy, have been more useful to enlarge this part of the work somewhat, and to keep lyrics for a separate volume. However, what we have is so good that we must not grumble at the quantity; the little volume will serve admirably as a supplement to larger works. The passages are well chosen; perhaps some of them are scarcely good enough in themselves to be worth the trouble of putting into Latin, but these for the most part require some exercise of ingenuity which renders them excellent practice. It was a happy idea to give the well-known passage about woman's influence from Esmond for hexameters in Juvenal's manner, and the fair copy given in the Key is full of vigour. The attempt to turn into elegiacs an announcement in the Standard is ingenious, but not quite so happy as Dr. Kennedy's now famous version of a notice of a committee-meeting.

Mr. Seager's Faciliora is a first Latin exercise-book. For the first twenty pages no verbs are introduced. At p. 41 the direct object is first introduced. Yet by the time p. 73 is reached we find sentences of this type:—"It is certain that, if my sword is broken, I shall buy another"; "He said that he was being carried, as his leg was broken." Probably the sub-oblique clauses are intended to be rendered by the ablative absolute, as no explanation of sub-oblique construction has been given; but we have not ourselves been fortunate enough to meet with boys who could progress at this rate, any more than we are acquainted with a young Newton who understands a proposition of Euclid as soon as he hears the enunciation. However, Mr. Seager says that his exercises were originally compiled for the use of his own pupils, so we can but congratulate him on the aptitude for the learned languages which those young gentlemen possess. To any teachers who have not yet realized that analysis of sentences is a valuable method of teaching a language Mr. Seager's book may be useful. It might also suit the needs of learners beginning Latin late in life; but it proceeds far too rapidly for young boys.

Mr. Wells's little volume may be found useful not only in the lower forms of public but also in the higher classes of preparatory schools. His passages are, on the whole, easy and well chosen; and he has been wise in drawing largely upon authors not generally read by schoolboys—such as Curtius and the elder and younger Pliny. There are two features of the book to both of which we should decidedly object if it were intended for older boys—namely, headings indicating the subject-matter of each passage and short foot-notes. The latter, however, rarely do more than give the English of some word which a young boy is not likely to have met with, and the insertion of such aids has enabled Mr. Wells to set several good passages which otherwise could hardly have been included. There seems, therefore, to be quite as much to be said for as against the practice. The headings we dislike even for young boys. One of the uses of practice in unseen translation is to enable boys to gather the sense of a passage without aid from the context; and, if such aid is supplied in a still simpler way, it would be more useful for them every now and then to translate without dictionary a chapter of the book which they are reading in form than to take a passage elsewhere. But, in spite of this drawback, Mr. Wells's book is not a bad one; its worst feature is a ridiculous introduction intended to show "how to make sense." No one who is fit to read Latin or Greek at all, much more to do unseen translation, needs to be told that he must first find the subject of a sentence, then the verb; that verbs often vary in meaning, that prepositions, or "pointers," as Mr. Wells absurdly adds, are never followed by a nominative, and so forth. But the judicious teacher will not call his pupils' attention to this monument of grandmotherly solicitude, and they certainly will not trouble themselves to read it of their own accord.

Messrs. Fowle and Whitaker have compiled a book of a sort which is happily not often used in schools nowadays. Odds and ends from various writers are of little use except for unseen translation, and the plentiful notes forbid us to suppose that this is the purpose of the volume. Little need be said of the notes themselves. They consist largely of translations of words and phrases which for the most part could easily be made out by the student without such assistance. We have noticed some blunders and misprints in the text. For instance, in Horace, Od. II. xvi. the i in citius is marked long, and in the ode which here follows it (I. vii) we find fugerit printed instead of fugeret, to the ruin of both sense and metre. Altogether we seldom meet with a more useless piece of book-making than this.

THREE HUNDRED YEARS OF A FAMILY LIVING.*

"WELL to Sutton-Colfield to-night," says Falstaff, when on the march with his ragged regiment, or "to Sutton-Cop-hill," as is said to be the original reading. With this most people's knowledge of the history of Sutton Coldfield begins and ends. From the present work they may increase their stock of information on the subject. The author, indeed, does not quote Falstaff, or enter into the question of Cophill versus Coldfield; though in a preliminary chapter he gives the early history of the living in the days before the Riland family's connexion with Sutton began. The parish church of Sutton was first built, at some time subsequent to the Norman Conquest, by the Earls of Warwick, "who found in the 'Cold-field'—the wind-swept, pebbly waste where stood the town next on the south to Lichfield—a suitable place for a hunting-seat, and there made provision for the spiritual wants of their retainers and dependents." From the Beauchamp and Nevil Earls of Warwick the right of presentation to the living was handed on to the King-maker's grandson, Edward Plantagenet, the Duke of Clarence's son by Isabel Nevil. When this last hapless Plantagenet was attainted and beheaded, his possessions escheated to the Crown, which, more than half a century later, put the advowson of Sutton up to sale. After passing to two purchasers in succession, it was bought in 1586 by John Shilton, of Birmingham, mercer; and from that time to this the patronage has been exercised by his descendants. The Shilton family appear to have been Puritanically inclined; and the author conjectures that in purchasing the advowson they were actuated, like the Simeon Trustees of later days, by the desire to secure an important benefice for a minister of their own opinions. Two of the Shiltons' nominees, John and Anthony Burges, were men of sufficient theological and literary note to find a place in the Dictionary of National Biography. Anthony Burges (who was no relation to his predecessor of the same name) was in great request as a preacher; and his "funeral discourse at the burial of Mr. Thomas Blake, at Tamworth, became so celebrated that it was difficult to procure a copy. It was published in 1658, with the title of 'Paul's Last Farewell.'" After the Restoration Anthony Burges conscientiously resigned his benefice and retired to Tamworth, where he was buried in 1664. He was succeeded at Sutton Coldfield by Dr. William Watson, who held the benefice for twenty-seven years until his death in 1689, when the Rev. John Riland, who had married the patron's daughter, was presented to the living, and eventually bought the advowson from the now impoverished Shiltons, who seem to have brought themselves to grief by "land hunger" and an injudicious marriage. John Riland was the son of a Royalist clergyman who had suffered during the Civil Wars, and was himself a High Churchman. This would do him no harm at Sutton Coldfield, where the general feeling had veered from Puritanism to Toryism and Jacobitism. The country gentlemen drank Jacobite toasts at their club at Coleshill, and they did not lack sympathizers among the townsmen of Birmingham, whence over two hundred Jacobites came to Sutton to hear the great High Church champion, Dr. Sacheverell, preach on the Sunday before the coronation of George I. "The consequence of it," says the historian Tindal, "appeared a day or two after" in the form of a riot and an attack upon Dissenting places of worship. Dr. Sacheverell had some connexion with the district, his cousin Valens Sacheverell being the occupant of New Hall, near Sutton, where the Doctor himself spent the greater part of the years during which he was suspended from preaching. The tendencies of the Rilands are shown not only by the Rector lending his pulpit to the renowned Doctor, but by marginal MS. notes which remain in one of the books in the Rectory library, and which might have been seriously compromising if they had come under unfriendly eyes. In the next generation the Rilands' Jacobitism had no doubt become what the French call platonic. When rumour averred that the rebels of '45 had advanced to Lichfield, the Rilands, instead of hastening to offer their family plate to the rightful King, sank it in the ornamental canal in Sutton Park. This alarm seems to have been the only disturbance of the peaceful days of the Rev. Richard Riland, who was born at Sutton, succeeded his father in the living in 1720, and there ruled till 1757. Several of his letters are given, beginning with the one in which in 1730 he made his offer of marriage to Miss Bisse, a Somerset young lady whom he had met at Bath. His love-letter is of the practical order, and there is no denying that it comes to the point at once:—

Madam,—I intimated to you in my Last that I had an Offer of some considerable Importance to make, which I once intended to have mention'd sooner. Without any further Introduction, it is that of a Husband; if you are not better provided, I am at your Service.

The letter continues in the same style through a long paragraph; then the suitor remarks:—

If this offer be not agreeable I doubt not I shall soon be told so—if it be, I can see no Reason why That may not be told too with equal Freedom, & with Scruple or Reserve; but whether it be Agreeable or not, I hope no offence is giv'n by making it.

"No offence" was given, for two months later a marriage licence was granted for Mr. Riland and Miss Bisse. They apparently "lived happily ever after," as the fairy tales put it, and had two sons, Richard and John, who in due time were sent to Queen's College, Oxford. Several of the father and mother's letters to them appear. "Pray Dick save your money," writes the mother in 1750, "for it costs us a good deal in our last journey to see you, and we shall be very short this winter." Nevertheless in 1753 they were not too "short" to be able to allow themselves some amusement, for the Rector writes from London:—

* Three Hundred Years of a Family Living; being a History of the Rilands of Sutton Coldfield. By the Rev. W. R. Riland Bedford, M.A. Birmingham: Cornish Brothers. 1889.

Yr Mother & I have been 2 successive nights at the Playhouse, on Tuesday night we saw the Harlequin Sorcerer, which I think superior to every thing I have ever seen at a Playhouse, especially the Ostrich and the Horse, & on Wednesday night we heard the oratorio of Jephtha, perform'd by near 100 hands. Music so full, so grand, so fine I never heard before; but yr Mother thought there was too much of it.

In 1755 they were again in London, and went to Sadler's Wells and to "Cuper's Gardens"—

Vauxhall we have not yet seen. Yr mother and I are very well, having lost our disorders which each of us bro't hither. On the 20th or 21st inst. there will be a play at Drury Lane. I have lost many a good Anthem, St. Paul's being shut up, & will not be opened till ye 31st. We have dined every day, but one, on Beef, either roasted, or stakes; chiefly the latter. . . . It is said here, particularly among the merchants on 'Change, that there will be no War between England & France. The Dog Act will certainly take effect next session of Parliament, so that Chlo & Rover must either be annually paid for, or Demolished—utrum horum?

Richard Riland bequeathed the advowson to his elder son, Richard Bisse Riland, of whose gifts and graces we have a glowing account from an old parishioner. He had "no ostentatious pride," was "free from asperity, religious without Puritanism, superstition, or enthusiasm, a true defender of the Established Church of these realms and of its discipline, without wavering or turning to the right hand or the left." Also, "he was a fine, tall, straight, handsome man, wore a large full wig, like unto a Bishop's wig, and stood six feet one or two in height; very rarely that we see such another man; he was both an ornament and an honour to the Clerical Profession."

This ecclesiastical ornament had a daughter, Lydia, who married a young Birmingham attorney of the name of Bedford, and their son, William Riland Bedford, was presented to the living on the death of his uncle John Riland in 1822. Into the fortunes of the living and of its incumbents we need not enter further, having given sufficient specimens. The book is avowedly a family history; and it may perhaps be said without offence that it will be more interesting to connexions of the Rilands than to the general public. At the same time, there is a great deal of Corporation and parish history which will be of local value; and no historical student will despise a domestic or parochial chronicle, which often gives better insight into the life of the past than can be obtained from more ambitious works.

THE THEORY OF CREDIT.*

IN this volume Mr. Macleod makes a valuable contribution to economic literature. A jurist as well as an economist, he brings beside a vast store of varied information to illustrate and explain points that have puzzled some eminent thinkers. If we were disposed to be critical we might indeed complain of his too frequent repetitions, but probably he would answer that only by iteration and reiteration can he hope to bring home to the mind of the general reader the conclusions he desires to establish. We might also object to his method, and more especially to his introduction of algebraic signs and symbols, which, if generally adopted, would still further divorce Political Economy from observation, by the light of which alone it can be fruitfully studied. But fortunately the subject which he treats suffers less than almost any other from the exclusive adoption of the deductive method, since very largely at least it is a matter of analysis. And in analysis Mr. Macleod is subtle and searching. At first sight it may seem that the question with which he deals is hardly worthy of the time and labour bestowed upon it. It may be said that whether credit is or is not wealth depends upon what we mean by the latter word. If we give it one definition then credit undoubtedly is wealth, whereas if we give it another it clearly is not wealth. But this, we venture to think, is a superficial view of the matter. The function of credit cannot be thoroughly understood without a full and accurate conception of its nature. To arrive at this we must, of course, determine what credit really is. Mr. Macleod shows that the purchasing power of credit was clearly appreciated by the early Greek philosophers, by the Romans, and by the first economists. The Ricardian school, however, denied that it was wealth, and some of them even went the length of asserting that it was as absurd to call it so as to say that a thing can be in two places at the same time. Credit, in the sense in which it is used in economic discussion, is nearly synonymous with debt. To buy upon credit, for example, is to incur debt; and, similarly, an instrument of credit is an evidence of debt. It does undoubtedly appear absurd to say that debt can add to the wealth of the world; but, if we admit that whatever increases the purchasing power of the world adds to its wealth, then experience proves that credit is wealth. We shall see by-and-bye how Mr. Macleod accounts for the mistake of those thinkers who deny that credit does add to the purchasing power of the world. In the meantime let us, by an appeal to the every-day facts of the business life around us, inquire whether it is or is not true that credit does add to the purchasing power of the world.

During the great Civil War in America the Federal Government defrayed a considerable part of its expenses by an issue of Treasury Notes—Greenbacks as they came to be popularly called—which were neither more nor less than promises to pay; in other words, evidences of debt. So, again, in its last struggle with Turkey, the Russian Government paid a large part of its expenses by an issue of notes of the Imperial Bank of Russia. Here at home, to take the most conspicuous example, our joint-stock and private banks derive by far the largest part of their resources from their deposits, which consist really of money borrowed from the public. Lastly, when a trader buys goods, and gives in payment a bill, he really buys upon credit. In all these cases we see that credit does add to the purchasing power of the borrower. It may be replied that no competent thinker denies that, but that the credit given to the borrower is transferred to him by the lender, and that in consequence the lender's purchasing power is so much diminished. Is this true? A merchant buys goods from a manufacturer, and gives him in payment a bill. The credit, it is admitted, has increased the merchant's purchasing power, but does it diminish the purchasing power of the manufacturer? He takes the merchant's bill; but, if he chooses, he can discount it with his banker, and with the proceeds he can buy anything that he pleases. So far it is evident that the purchasing power of the manufacturer—that is to say, of the creditor, has not diminished any more than the purchasing power of the merchant. But how is it with the banker who has purchased from the manufacturer the merchant's bill? The manufacturer, having discounted the bill with his own banker, let us suppose for the sake of clearness, has standing to his credit the price of the bill. If he does not draw upon the account, of course it is a deposit like any other, and can be freely used by the banker in lending and discounting. But let us now suppose that the merchant does draw to the full amount of the proceeds of the bill. Then the banker's immediate resources are diminished by exactly the same amount if he keeps the bill in his portfolio, which, by the hypothesis, we suppose him to do. But he believes that the manufacturer is solvent, and will meet the bill when it falls due, otherwise he would not have discounted it. Then he obviously can draw a bill himself to mature at the same date as the bill he has discounted, and by means of the repayment of the latter he can withdraw his own bill. In that way his purchasing power is not lessened any more than that of the merchant or the manufacturer. But it may be objected that this is only carrying the process of borrowing a little further, and that whoever discounts the banker's bill will have his purchasing power diminished. Let us, then, assume that the banker keeps the discounted bill in his portfolio, and does not draw a bill himself. And let us inquire whether in that case his purchasing power is lessened. Surely it is not. For as he knows that the bill will mature on a certain day, and as he believes that it will then be met, he can make purchases, and so arrange that the payments will not fall due until the bill is paid off. It seems clear, then, that a credit operation is not a mere transfer of purchasing power from the lender to the borrower, but that it is an acquisition of purchasing power on the part of the latter. And now we are in a position to see that the true function of credit cannot be thoroughly understood until we have arrived at an accurate conception of its nature.

Mr. Macleod's theory, then, briefly stated, is that a loan is the exchange of the present value of wealth expected to come into existence in the future for actually existing wealth; that it is, therefore, a real sale; and that it is analogous to the sale of land. When a piece of land is sold, it is not merely the land as it stands at the moment, with all that is over it and under it, which is purchased, but also its capacity of producing wealth in the future. The sale of land, therefore, is the sale of the present value of future wealth as well as of the value of existing wealth. In the case of a loan, however, it is only the present value of the future expected wealth which is exchanged by the borrower for the actually existing wealth given to him by the lender. When, for example, a manufacturer sells goods to a trader, and takes a bill in payment, both the manufacturer and the trader expect that the goods will be sold by the latter before the bill falls due, and will be sold with a profit. It is out of the profit that the discount is paid to which the bill is subjected. And so in all cases the borrower represents that at a future date he will have money out of which he will be able to repay the debt, and the lender believes the representation. That this is the true explanation of the transaction appears from the fact that in a true loan the thing lent, whether it be money or goods, or anything else, becomes the property of the borrower. When a banker, for example, lends 100*l.* to a customer, the money becomes the absolute property of the customer; so much so that the banker is not justified in refusing to cash the customer's cheque drawn upon the money, though the cheque may amount to every penny which stands to the credit of the customer. And it is to the ambiguous meaning of the word loan in English that Mr. Macleod traces the error of those who have contended that credit does not add to the purchasing power or the wealth of the world. A man is said to lend a horse or a watch to a friend, although he retains the full property in the horse or the watch, and only parts with the temporary use of it to his friend. This is known as a bailment in English law. But a man is also said to lend money to a person,

* The Theory of Credit. By Henry Dunning Macleod, M.A. 2 vols. Vol. I. London and New York: Longmans & Co. 1889.

although in so doing he parts with the entire property in the money, and takes in return a contract to be repaid the amount, generally with interest, on a future day. This is a loan proper. The borrower does not engage to return the identical pieces of money which he has borrowed; he only undertakes to repay the same amount, and he has the full right to pay away the money in any manner that he pleases. He may waste it if he chooses, and the lender has no cause of complaint—has no right even to remonstrate with him. The only right he has is to claim repayment when repayment becomes due, and to enforce his claim by process of law if the debtor does not fulfil his part of the contract. It is this circumstance, that in a loan proper the property as well as the possession of the thing lent passes from the creditor to the debtor, which constitutes the transaction an exchange in the economic sense of the word, and enables credit to increase the purchasing power of the world.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

PROFESSOR CRANE (1), of Cornell University, who has already done not a little good work in French literature, has, we think, produced the most useful book in reference to a certain period of that literature that has recently appeared in English. Mr. Crane is not an ideal literary critic, and his conscientious and excellently erudite centos of other people's opinions might, perhaps, be advantageously exchanged for a somewhat more original first-hand method. "Never quote or paraphrase from your authorities without acknowledgment" is an excellent rule, and so apparently elementary that, if it were not for the frequent breaches of it, it might seem to go without saying. "Never neglect your predecessors" is one which, perhaps, needs more enforcement, for human laziness is immense, and human vanity not too easily measurable. But "Deal with your predecessors as a free man, and not as a slave, without insolence, without dishonesty, and without servility," is the counsel of perfection, and few there be who seem to attain to it. Mr. Crane has not quite attained; and the extraordinary fulness and honesty of his references and citations, difficult as it is to quarrel with them, obscure to some extent, and perhaps have even to some extent prevented him from acquiring, the full grasp, as of his own hand, which is so desirable, if so rarely met, in literary dealings.

The book, however, is a very good one. Its subject—which, put in other words, is the literature of the attempt made historical under the names of Mme. de Rambouillet and the Précieuses to introduce refinement of manners into French society—has always been an interesting one, and has always, by its connexion with certain literary work of the first importance, attracted a considerable amount of attention. The most important—certainly the most bulky—store of information about it, the "heroic" novels of "Sapho" and her friends, after being long quoted without too much knowledge by Moliéristes and others, have been quite recently made the subject of a genuinely German monograph by Herr Körting. The more miscellaneous literature has been more abundantly dealt with, and altogether Mr. Crane has got together a mighty bibliography and a very useful one.

But the merit of the book does not lie in this, nor even in the capital body of notes which the Cornell Professor has subjoined to his selections. The really excellent thing is that Mr. Crane has read the original books, and has got out of them a very large and excellent collection of original matter. Whether the book will be a good school and college reading-book (which seems to be its object) we are not so sure. Both practice and theory seem to us to show that, for such purposes, either entire special works or else selections from a wide range of authors and subjects are superior to extracts which either require for their full appreciation more knowledge than the "student" is likely to have or else confine him too much in the acquisition of that knowledge to a particular period. But in itself it is an excellent book. It has as frontispiece a full-sized reproduction of the Carte de Tendre, not "stinted of its sizings," as is too often the case. It has abundant "portraits," both direct and slightly travestied in the romances. It has historiettes (proper ones, of course; Mr. Crane is even a little reminiscent of piano-trousers in his remarks on Tallemant) from the Sieur des Réaux, poems and letters from Voiture (whom Mr. Crane does not admire quite enough), extracts from Clélie and from Artamène, from Sorel (whom Mr. Crane admires quite enough), from Saint-Evremond, from Chapelle and Bachaumont, from Fléchier. It has, lastly, a curious and interesting appendix from the etiquette treatises which resulted from the vogue of "Precious" manners. In short, it is a really excellent collection of texts, excellently commented, and furnished with good critical and bibliographical apparatus.

Mr. Crane has not attempted—has, indeed, distinctly disclaimed attempting—any general literary study of his tempting subject. We own that we feel towards him the same puzzled respect with which Dr. Folliott regarded Captain Fitzchrome's abstinence from classical quotations. Much as has been written on the subject, there is still room not merely in English, but in French, for an essay in moderate compass showing how this curious movement, assisted by the political coincidences of the time, introduced in French literature the artificial decency which forms so strange a contrast with what had gone before and with what was to follow; how it started the wave of "sensibility"; how it helped to make Paris what it certainly had not been before, the centre of Europe, not for thought, but for manners and fashions; how, less beneficently in any sense, it contributed to that estrangement of the French nobility from all serious pursuits, and even, to some extent, from all manly exercises, except duels and war, which gradually ousted them from their place as a true aristocracy. But we have no just cause of quarrel with Professor Crane for not writing what he did not feel himself called upon to write; and we have a just cause of gratitude to him for doing, and doing very well, what he was thoroughly qualified as well as minded to do.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

THE admiration expressed by the late Mr. Matthew Arnold of one of the poems in Mr. Joseph Truman's slim volume, Afterthoughts (Macmillan & Co.), is not merely in itself perfectly intelligible, as the testimonials of poets are wont to be, but suggests the key to what is the chief distinction of Mr. Truman's poetry. "Elleray," the poem in question, may be said to be Christopher North's poetic epitaph. Wandering in the "wood shadows" at Elleray, the thought of Wilson visited the author, naturally enough, and naturally does he refer to

The image of a man magnificent,
A theme for human love and wonderment,
Grand in his sadness and his merriment.

A dozen lines brings us to the epitaph:—

Better for us, had that potential mind
Been somewhat more to deathless feats address;
Alas for mental splendours unexpressed!
A few pale poems and some worthier prose
Make up the meagre sum which the world knows
Of what was working in that brain and breast;
The vague eternal kingdoms have the rest.

Here we feel at once what is the critical quality in these lines that induced Arnold to write of the poem "I have not often read anything more true and more happily expressed, and I wish all who know Wilson could see it." Most people who never knew Wilson, and some, we are sure, who did, are profoundly grateful for the pale poems and worthier prose, and leave such criticism of life as is here implied for the superior few who are capable of it. After all, though contentment is an unheroic virtue, what more would you have of Christopher North? "Deathless feats" are very fine things, no doubt, though somewhat hard to define, and altogether an elusive standard for the measure of men. Mr. Truman shows both the fervour and conviction of a disciple in such poems as "The Village Sermon," "The Broadest Church," and "Many Ways Open," where the inspiration and style proclaim the influence of Arnold, and the influence is not less agreeable than striking. Grace, refinement, a chastened melancholy, and pathos that is deep or placid, and never superficial, are to be noted as characteristic of Mr. Truman's poetry.

In Heart to Heart, by Mr. Ivan Hues (Kegan Paul, Trench, & Co.), we have more poetry offered to a prosaic world, with the friendly word of a poet who has much that is kind to say of it and the popularity that may usefully enforce his commendation. Mr. Hues sings a romantic epic of "gallant little Wales," which, it appears, has "much and favourably impressed" Mr. Lewis Morris, who thinks the lyrics "show a good ear," and "the case of the rhymes, many of them double rhymes, very remarkable." Perhaps "case" is a misprint for "ease"; but, whether it be so or not, the principal feature of the poet's verse is unquestionably its unvaried and monotonous fluency. If the bards sang as they sing in Heart to Heart, we should become very tolerant of modern bards and rejoice in the mystic charms of an Eisteddfod. What is chiefly admirable in Mr. Hues is the unquenchable patriotism displayed by Childe Awen, the hero of his poem, whose rapturous praise of the land of the Waal, "proud Walian land," is like the pedigree of Headlong Ap-Breakneck Ap-Pistyll, for continuity of eloquence. Only Awen is somewhat ill-named. His fluency is decidedly modern, and his song seldom betrays the bardic abstraction known as awen proper to the singer of so lofty a theme.

Stories from Carleton, with a brief and well-considered preface by Mr. W. B. Yeats (Walter Scott), is the latest addition to the "Camelot series," and an excellent selection from the shorter stories and sketches of the admirable Irish novelist. The book includes such excellent examples of Carleton's impressive and picturesque style as "The Poor Scholar," "Shane Fadh's Wedding," the delightful and exquisitely humorous description of the "Hedge School," as it was when Carleton was himself being trained as a "poor scholar," and the charming and characteristic story "Tubber Derg." The "clay-cold melancholy" which Mr. Yeats finds in the longer stories is almost absent from this well-selected book, while the humour, the graphic power, and the dramatic art of Carleton are fully represented. Altogether, as a popular introduction of a great writer, nothing could be better.

What to Do? (Walter Scott), the new volume of the translation of Count Tolstoi's works, belongs to the autobiographical section of the novelist's writings, and comprises, with a good deal of Socialistic political economy, a curiously naïf account of the author's "slumming" experiences in Moscow, which is better worth reading than the prolix and contradictory speculations on society and history that fill the greater part of the volume.

(1) La société française au dix-septième siècle. By T. F. Crane. New York and London: Putnam's Sons.

Dr. George Herschel, in Health Troubles of City Life (Bristol: Wright & Co.), offers some useful advice on the "break-down" in health to which men of business are liable. The causes that lead to the sudden collapse of active men are, the author thinks, often extremely trivial when first discernible, and only from neglect produce serious results. Strong tea and cigarettes are potent sources of ill, Dr. Herschel well observes; and to these he adds overwork, irregular meals, want of exercise, worry, and other more generally recognized causes of nerve exhaustion and dyspepsia. The author writes with much good sense of the best means to lessen the effects of strenuous business life in an age of keen competition. He is no fanatical foe to alcohol and tobacco; but he urges business men to smoke and drink, as they should eat, at stated times. And this is precisely what many men cannot arrive at, even with the strongest recommendations of the family doctor.

Perhaps the Complete Prose Works of Emerson (Ward, Lock, & Co.), the new volume of the "Minerva Library," edited by Mr. G. T. Bettany, cannot with due regard to accuracy be considered as one of the "famous books of unquestioned value and popularity" which the series was designed to embrace. The volume is made up of several books, the Essays, English Traits, and others, all, indeed, valuable, yet scarcely at present popular or famous. The reprint, however, ought effectually to remedy the neglect of Emerson among those for whom cheap literature is now so abundantly provided. The print is clear, though necessarily small, and the editor's introduction is brief and satisfactory.

Nonsense Drolleries, by Edward Lear, illustrated by William Foster (Warne & Co.), is a re-issue of "The Owl and the Pussy Cat" and "The Duck and the Kangaroo," with drawings of excellent spirit and humour, by an artist who shows a really delightful sympathy with the poet's frolicsome moods.

A Manual of Home Nursing, by Louisa Emily Dobrée (Swan Sonnenschein & Co.), is a sound, sensible, and comprehensive little handbook on the art of tending the sick. Miss Dobrée is nothing but practical when treating of the duties of the nurse and her relation to the patient and the doctor.

The wanderer among the East-Anglian water-ways may be provided with a capital and cheering companion in Summer in Broadland (Jarrold & Sons), an illustrated narrative of a gipsying tour on the Norfolk Broads by the author of Friesland Meres. Such pleasant reading ought to send many to Norfolk and Suffolk to reap the like good fortune that fell to the author.

The Swoop of the Eagles (Ward & Downey) is the "latest born," though decidedly not "the loveliest far," of all the numerous progeny of the Battle of Dorking. It is, in truth, a dull, tedious fable of the partition of the British Empire in circumstances that are not only incredible, but altogether free from the saving grace of humorous presentment.

We have received new editions of The Two Sides of the Shield and Nuttie's Father, by Miss Yonge, and Charles Kingsley's Prose Idylls (Macmillan & Co.)

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

THE UNITED STATES.

The Annual Subscription to the SATURDAY REVIEW, including postage to any part of the United States, is £1 10s. 4d. or $7 39, and may be forwarded direct to the Publisher, Mr. WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, 38 Southampton Street, Strand, or to Mr. B. F. STEVENS, American Agency, 4 Trafalgar Square, London. International Money Orders can be sent from any office in the United States, and Subscriptions, payable in advance, may commence at any time.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had in Paris every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse); also at Le KIOSQUE DUPERRON, Boulevard des Capucines, and Le KIOSQUE MICHEL, Boulevard des Capucines, by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may likewise be obtained in Paris every Saturday of Messrs. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

For CONTENTS see page 286*

SCOTTISH PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

No. 6 ST. ANDREW SQUARE, EDINBURGH.

COMBINES THE ADVANTAGES OF Mutual Assurance with Moderate Premiums.

THE PREMIUMS are so moderate that an Assurance of £1,200 or £1,250 is generally secured from the first for a yearly payment which elsewhere assures (with profits) £1,000 only—equivalent to an immediate Bonus of 20 to 25 per cent.

The WHOLE PROFITS go to the Policyholders, on a system at once safe and equitable,—no share being given to those by whose early death there is a loss. On this principle large additions have been, and will be, made to the Policies of those who live to participate, notwithstanding the lowness of the premiums.

The SURPLUS at last Investigation was £1,051,035, of which £350,345 was reserved for future participation. The number who shared was 9,384. First shares were (with a few unimportant exceptions) from 18 or 20 to 34 per cent, according to age and class. Other policies were increased 50 and 80 per cent.

The SOCIETY has taken a leading part in the REMOVAL OF FORFEITURES.

POLICIES, as a rule, are WORLD-WIDE, and free from Restrictions on Residence after five years—provided the Assured has attained age 30.

Surrender Values compare favourably with other first-class Offices.

June 1889.

JAMES WATSON, Manager.

BRANCH OFFICES:

GLASGOW, 29 St. Vincent Place.
ABERDEEN, 259 Union Street.
BRISTOL, 31 Clare Street.
LIVERPOOL, 25 Castle Street.
NEWCASTLE, 3 Queen Street.

DUBLIN OFFICE: 16 College Green.
BIRMINGHAM, 95 Colmore Row.
LEEDS, Royal Exchange.
MANCHESTER, 10 Albert Square.
BELFAST, 23 Donegall Place.

Secretary in London—J. MUIR LEITCH,

OFFICE, 17 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.

RESULTS for 1888.

NEW ASSURANCES COMPLETED £1,163,000.

Being for the 15th year in succession above a million.

PREMIUMS IN YEAR £558,875.

TOTAL INCOME £855,886.

CLAIMS (including Bonuses*) £328,530.

* Averaging 49½ per cent. on Policies Participating.

REALISED FUNDS, £6,516,468

(the Increase in year being £401,212).

PREMIUM FOR £100 AT DEATH:

With Profits.

Age next Birthday	Payable during Life	Limited to 21 Payments
25	£1 18 0	£2 12 6
30*	2 1 6	2 15 4
35	2 6 10	3 0 2
40†	2 14 9	3 7 5
45	3 5 9	3 17 6
50	4 1 7	4 12 1

* A man of 30 may secure £1,000 at death by the yearly payment of £20 15s., which generally assures £800 only.

Or he may secure £1,000 by twenty-one yearly payments of £27 13s. 4d.—being thus free of payment after age 50.

† At 40 the Premium ceasing at 60 is, for £1,000, £33 14s. 2d.—about the same as most Offices require during the whole of life. Before these Premiums have ceased the Policy will have shared in at least one division of profits. To Professional Men and others, whose income is dependent on continuance of health, this limited payment system is specially recommended.

Subject, by special Acts of Parliament (1848 and 1884), to the jurisdiction of the English and Irish Courts.

Copies of Annual Report containing Tables of Rates and Full Information may be had.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF NO. 1,767, SEPTEMBER 7, 1889:

The Strike.
A Holiday Deputation. East Africa.
Reading Books and Buying Books.
"Be my Visitor or I will—." The French Pretenders.
Travellers' Tales. Municipal Politicians.
Lessons of the Naval Manœuvres.
More Unequality. Mr. Chamberlain at Birmingham.
Agriculture and Technical Instruction.

Curious Curios.
The Philanthropy of Mr. Tupman. Racing.
The Cambrians in Brittany. The Experimental Matinee—I.
Buda-Pesth. Short Time in the Cotton Trade.
The Gloucester Festival.
Wrong Again!

The Greek Anthology.
Novels. Monk. Useful Native Plants of Australia.
Bonham's Industrial Liberty.
Two Books of Eastern Travel. An Analysis.
The Scientific Papers of Sir William Siemens.
Classical Editions and School Books.
Three Hundred Years of a Family Living. The Theory of Credit.
French Literature.
New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—MAGNIFICENT FIREWORK DISPLAY.—Every Thursday at 8, by Messrs. C. T. Brock & Co. Grand special Devices, including the Magic Garden Fountains which spring into life and Flowers that grow and blossom. Brock's Living Fireworks and other novelties of 1889.—Admission daily, One Shilling.

TOUR in the MEDITERRANEAN.—The ORIENT COMPANY will despatch their large full-powered steamship "CHIMBORAZO," 3,847 tons register, 3,000 horse-power, from London on the 25th of September, for a Thirty-eight Days' Cruise, visiting Lisbon, Gibraltar, Algiers, Palermo, Naples, Leghorn, Genoa, Nice, Malaga, and Cadiz.
 The "CHIMBORAZO" is fitted with the electric light, hot and cold baths, &c. Cuisine of the highest order.
 Managers..... (F. GREEN & CO., and ANDERSON, ANDERSON, & CO., Fenchurch Avenue, London, E.C.)
 For terms and further particulars apply to the latter firm, or to the West-End Agents, Grindlay & Co., 55 Parliament Street, S.W.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON.
 The SESSION of the FACULTY of MEDICINE will commence on October 1. Introductory Lecture at Four P.M. by Mr. R. J. GODLEE, M.S., B.A., F.R.C.S.
 The Examinations for the Entrance Exhibitions will commence on September 24. Scholarships, Exhibitions, and Prizes of the value of £800 are awarded annually.
 In University College Hospital about 3,000 In-Patients and 35,000 Out-Patients are treated during the year. Thirty-six Appointments, eighteen being resident, as House-Surgeon, House-Physician, Obstetric Assistant, &c. are filled up by competition during the year, and these as well as all Clerkships and Dresserships are open to Students of the Hospital without extra fee.
 Prospectuses, with full information as to Classes, Prizes, &c. may be obtained from the College, Gower Street, W.C.

JOHN WILLIAMS, M.D., Dean.
J. M. HORSBURGH, M.A., Secretary.

OWENS COLLEGE, VICTORIA UNIVERSITY, MANCHESTER.

PROSPECTUSES for the SESSION 1889-90 are NOW READY.
 I.—DEPARTMENT OF ARTS, SCIENCE, AND LAW.
 II.—DEPARTMENT OF MEDICINE.
 III.—DENTAL DEPARTMENT.
 IV.—DEPARTMENT FOR WOMEN.
 V.—DEPARTMENT OF THE EVENING CLASSES.
 VI.—SCHOLARSHIPS, &c. (value £12 to £100 per annum).
 Apply to Mr. CORNISH, 33 Piccadilly, Manchester; or at the College.

HENRY WM. HOLDER, M.A., Registrar.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.
 Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb.
 One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates).
 The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.
 The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks. Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.
 For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

THE MASON COLLEGE, BIRMINGHAM.
 SESSION 1889-90.
 FACULTIES OF ARTS AND SCIENCE.

The NEXT SESSION COMMENCES on Tuesday, October 1, 1889.
 A Syllabus, containing full information as to the various Courses of Instruction, lecture days, and hours, fees, scholarships, &c., is published by Messrs. CORNISH, New Street, Birmingham, price 6d.; by post, 7d.
 Further particulars may be obtained on application to the SECRETARY, at the College.
 GEO. H. MORLEY, Secretary.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.

Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A. Heidelberg.
 A. B. CATTY, M.A., Christ's Coll., Camb.
 WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.

At the recent Exam. for the I.C.S. a Pupil of Heidelberg College obtained THE HIGHEST MARKS IN GERMAN of all the Candidates.

SANDHURST FURTHER EXAM., August 1889.
 Alexander R. C. Rew..... 7539.

Mr. CATTY in London, 5 Riversdale Road, Twickenham, Middlesex.

TUDOR HALL COLLEGE (for Ladies), Forest Hill, Sydenham, S.E. Established over Thirty Years.—Principals: Mrs. TODD and Rev. J. W. TODD, D.D. Head-Mistress: Miss TODD (Girton), Cambridge. Professors: Seeley, Churton Collins, Garcia, Diehl, Loman, Dulcken, Larpent, &c.—Gymnasium, Tennis-courts, Swimming, Riding. Full particulars, Photo of Coll., &c., on application.

THE LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1.

The Hospital, which is the largest general Hospital in the kingdom, contains nearly 800 beds, all in constant use. There are wards for Accidents, Surgical and Medical cases, Diseases of Women and Children, and Ophthalmic cases. Special departments for Diseases of the Eye, Ear, Throat, Skin and Teeth, and for Cancer, Tumours, Diseases of the Bladder, Piles, and Fistula. Number of in-patients last year, 8,873; out-patients, 101,518; accidents, 7,456. Surgical operations daily.

APPOINTMENTS.—Resident Accoucheur, House Physicians, House Surgeons. Forty of these appointments are made annually. Numerous Dressers, Clinical Clerks, Post-mortem Clerks, and Maternity Assistants are appointed every three months. All appointments are free. Holders of resident appointments are also provided free board. The New College Buildings are now complete, and afford more than double the former accommodation.

Two Entrance Science Scholarships, value £80 and £10, and two Buxton Scholarships, value £30 and £20, will be offered for competition at the end of September to new Students. Sixteen other Scholarships and Prizes are given annually.

Luncheons or dinners, at moderate charges, can be obtained at the Students' Club.

The London Hospital is now in direct communication with all parts of the Metropolis. The Metropolitan, District, and other Railways have stations within a minute's walk of the Hospital and College.

For further information apply personally, or by letter, to Mile End, E. MUNRO SCOTT, Warden.

ST. GEORGE'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, HYDE PARK CORNER, S.W.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1, when an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS will be delivered by Dr. T. CLIFFORD ALLBUTT, F.R.S., at 4 P.M.

The following ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS will be offered for competition in October:—

1. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £125, for the sons of Medical men who have entered the School as bona fide first-year students during the current year.
2. TWO SCHOLARSHIPS, each of £50, open to all students commencing their studies.
3. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £90, open to all students who have entered the school during the current year, and who have passed the Cambridge 1st M.B. since October 1888.
4. A SCHOLARSHIP, value £65, for students who, having been signed up for or previously passed the Oxford 1st M.B. or the Cambridge 2nd M.B., have entered the School during the current year.

The following Exhibitions and Prizes are also open to students:—

The William Brown £100 Exhibition; the William Brown £40 Exhibition; the Brackenbury Prize in Medicine, value £32; the Brackenbury Prize in Surgery, value £32; the Pollock Prize in Physiology, value £18; the Johnson Prize in Anatomy, value £10 10s.; the Treasurer's Prize, value £10 10s.; General Proficiency Prizes for first, second, and third year students, of £10 10s. each; the Brodie Prize in Surgery; the Acland Prize in Medicine; the Thompson Medal, and Sir Charles Clarke's Prize.

All Hospital appointments, including the two House Physicianships and two House Surgeonships, are awarded as the result of competition, and are open to the students without additional expense of any kind.

Clerkships and Dresserships, and all the minor appointments, are given without extra fees. Several paid appointments, including that of Obstetric Assistant, with a salary of £100 and board and lodging, are awarded yearly upon the recommendation of the Medical School Committee.

The new Physiological Laboratories and Class Rooms are now open.

Prospectuses and fuller details may be obtained by application to

THOMAS WHIPHAM, M.B., Dean.

ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, ALBERT EMBANKMENT, LONDON, S.E.

The WINTER SESSION of 1889-90 will OPEN on Tuesday, October 1, with an Introductory Address, at 3 P.M., by Mr. WILLIAM ANDERSON, F.R.C.S.

TWO ENTRANCE SCIENCE SCHOLARSHIPS, of 125 guineas and £60 respectively, open to all first-year Students, will be offered for competition. The Examination will be held on September 25, 26, and 27, and the subjects will be Chemistry and Physics, with either Botany or Zoology, at the option of Candidates.

Scholarships and Money Prizes of considerable value are awarded at the Sessional Examinations, as also several Medals.

Special Classes are held throughout the year for the "PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC" and "INTERMEDIATE M.B." Examinations of the UNIVERSITY of LONDON.

All Hospital Appointments are open to Students without extra charge.

The fees may be paid in one sum or by instalments. Entries may be made separately to Lectures or to Hospital Practice, and special arrangements are made for Students entering in their second or subsequent years; also for Dental Students and for Qualified Practitioners.

A Register of approved Lodgings is kept by the Medical Secretary, who also has a list of local Medical Practitioners, Clergymen, and others who receive students into their houses.

Prospectuses and all particulars may be obtained from the Medical Secretary, Mr. GEORGE RENDLE.

E. NETTLESHIP, Dean.

GUY'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL.

The WINTER SESSION commences on Tuesday, October 1.

The Hospital contains 695 beds, of which 500 are in constant occupation. Special Classes are held for Students preparing for the Examinations of the University of London, and other Higher Examinations.

APPOINTMENTS.—All Hospital Appointments are made strictly in accordance with the merits of the Candidates, and without extra payment.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS.—Two Open Scholarships in Arts, one of the value of 100 Guineas, open to Candidates under twenty years of age; and one of 50 Guineas, open to Candidates under twenty-five years of age. Two Open Scholarships in Science, one of the value of 125 Guineas, and another of 50 Guineas, open to Candidates under twenty-five years of age.

PRIZES are awarded to Students in their various years amounting in the aggregate to more than £300.

DENTAL SCHOOL.—A Dental School is attached to the Hospital, which affords to Students all the instruction required for a Licence in Dental Surgery.

COLLEGE.—A residential College is in course of erection upon a site close to the Hospital, to accommodate about 50 Students in addition to the Resident Staff of the Hospital. The College contains a large Dining Hall, and Reading Rooms for the use of the STUDENTS' CLUB.

For Prospectus and further information apply to the Dean, Dr. PERRY, Guy's Hospital, London, S.E.

GUY'S HOSPITAL CLASSES for the PRELIMINARY SCIENTIFIC (M.B. Lond.) EXAMINATION are held in the Medical School, GUY'S HOSPITAL, during the Winter and Summer Sessions. The Fee for the whole Course is Ten Guineas. The Class is not confined to Students of the Hospital. For further particulars apply to the DEAN, Guy's Hospital, S.E.

WOLVERHAMPTON GRAMMAR SCHOOL.

The HEAD-MASTERSHIP will become VACANT at Christmas next by the retirement of THOMAS BEACH, Esq.

It is provided by the scheme that the Head-Master shall be a Graduate of some University within the British Empire and not necessarily in Holy Orders.

His emolument will be derived from three sources.

(1.) A Fixed Stipend of £200 a year.

(2.) Capitation Fees at the rate of £3 a year for each boy in the senior department, and £1 a year in the junior department.

(3.) From Boarders. The school buildings provide a house for the Head-Master, in which he will be required to reside, and accommodation, including fitting and furniture, is also provided in the house for thirty boarders or thereabouts.

There are three Exhibitions of £60 a year from the school to the Universities of Oxford or Cambridge, each tenable for three years. The school has been highly successful for many years past.

Candidates for the appointment are invited to send their applications, with testimonials, to Messrs. NEVE & CRESSWELL, Solicitors, Wolverhampton, on or before the 17th day of September next.

The Election will be made on the 1st day of October next.

The Head-Master will be required to enter upon his duties at the close of the Christmas holidays.

It is particularly requested that no personal application be made to the Governors.

All letters may be addressed to the above-mentioned Clerks, marked W. G. S., from whom Copies of the Scheme for the Management of the School may be obtained for seven stamps.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL.

The WINTER SESSION, 1889-90, will COMMENCE on Tuesday, October 1.
The Hospital has a service of 230 beds for Clinical Teaching, including those of the adjoining Royal Westminster Ophthalmic Hospital, to which General Students are free.
TWO ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, of the value of 100 Guineas and 50 Guineas respectively, are awarded annually in October.
A SCHOLARSHIP of the value of 50 Guineas is open to Students from the University of Oxford who have passed the 1st M.B. Examination, and to Students from the University of Cambridge who have passed the 2nd M.B. Examination, and who have not entered at any London Medical School.
Candidates for the above Scholarships are required to give notice of their intention to compete on or before Saturday, September 21.
FEES.—For the curriculum of study required by the various Examining Bodies and Hospital Practice, 90 guineas in one sum, or 100 guineas in five instalments. The composition fee for Dental Students is £12 2s., payable in two instalments.
The hours of lectures have been specially arranged to suit the convenience of Dental Students. Charing Cross Hospital is within three minutes' walk of the Dental Hospital of London.
UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.—PRELIMINARY SCIENCE INSTRUCTION.—Arrangements have been made for Students desirous of undergoing a Course of Instruction in Science, such as that required for the Preliminary Scientific (M.B.) Examination of the University of London, to attend at the Normal School of Science, South Kensington.

ENLARGEMENT OF MEDICAL SCHOOL.

The Medical School is being considerably enlarged, and in addition to other improvements new Physiological and Pathological Laboratories will be erected, and additional reading and writing room provided for the use of the students.
A Prospectus, containing much additional information, will be forwarded on application to the Librarian and Secretary, Mr. J. FRANCIS PINK, at the Office of the School, Chandos Street, Charing Cross, between the hours of Ten and Four.
J. MITCHELL BRUCE, M.A., M.D., Dean.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils. —41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

RADFORD HOUSE, COVENTRY. PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS OF GENTLEMEN. Established 1800. Boys received from Six to Twelve years of age, and prepared for College and Local Examinations, which have hitherto been successfully passed by the Pupils of this School. Eight acres of recreation ground.—Apply for particulars to Mrs. and Miss HOUGHTON.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR. BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

FARM PUPILS.—GENTLEMEN are received on the FARM of the AYLESBURY DAIRY COMPANY, Limited, Horsham, Sussex. 1,400 acres arable and pasture: 400 head of cattle.—For terms and particulars apply to the SECRETARY, Aylesbury Dairy Company, in London, St. Petersburg Place, Bayswater, or Horsham, Sussex.

PREPARATIONS for ENTRANCE and SCHOLARSHIPS at PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—A few VACANCIES for next Term.—Apply to HEAD-MASTER, care of A. & A. W. Brown, 4 Little George Street, Westminster, S.W.

THE HEAD-MASTER of ASCHAM SCHOOL, BOURNE-MOUTH, wishes to form a Class of LITTLE BOYS to EDUCATE with his own Son of Seven. Special terms.

EDUCATION, PARIS.—An ENGLISH LADY, residing at Neuilly, receives a limited number of YOUNG LADIES, who share with her own daughters educational advantages and home comforts. French is the language of the household. English and foreign resident governesses. First-class professors for all accomplishments. The house stands in its own grounds. Large garden, tennis court. Highest references given.—Prospectus on application to Rev. G. G. W. CLEMENCE, the Rectory, Alwalton, near Peterboro'.

SCHOOL PIANOS.—NEW MODELS from 18 Guineas. All the latest Improvements. These instruments are remarkable for their beautiful tone, perfect touch, and durability. PIANOS for HIRE, or on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.—W. J. ENNEVER & SON, Manufacturers, 57 Berners Street, London, W.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath. Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.
ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London. Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

FRY'S J. WYBRANTS OLPHERTS, M.D., says: "I find it the most agreeable beverage of the kind I have ever tasted, delicious both in flavour and odour."
PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA.
E. BUCKNILL, M.D., says: "Your Pure Concentrated Cocoa is so extremely nice that I have ordered it for family use."

A Y R T O N & T H O M A S, PATENT AGENTS.
Conduct every kind of British, Foreign, and Colonial Business connected with PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.
Mr. H. M. THOMAS, Author of "The True Position of Patentees," being a practical engineer, PERSONALLY SUPERINTENDS the applications in respect of mechanical inventions.
Moderate Terms. No charge for preliminary advice.
Telegraphic Address, "Prolonged, London."
9 & 10 Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, W.C.

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES, Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESS' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY. Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician (President of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 52 Oxford Street, London, W. (corner of Rathbone Place). Advice free, personally or by letter.

SCHWEITZER'S

C O C C O A T I N A.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all Climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA.

PURE—SOLUBLE.
BEST & GOES FARTHEST.
EASILY DIGESTED.
MADE INSTANTLY.

"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question."
Health.

"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE."
British Medical Journal.

C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON,
WEESP, HOLLAND.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal Claim to the Public Confidence.

GOOD MORNING!

Have you used

PEARS' SOAP?

FOR THE DECORATION OF THE HOME visit THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY'S Gallery, 74 New Oxford Street, W.C. A noble display of Copies of THE GREAT MASTERS, framed and unframed.

The Chef-d'œuvres of THE NATIONAL COLLECTIONS of London, Paris, Rome, Dresden, St. Petersburg, Madrid, &c. &c.

Catalogue of 186 pages, Sixpence, post-free. A descriptive Pamphlet free by post on application to

THE AUTOTYPE COMPANY.

TONGA, the SPECIFIC for NEURALGIA.

"Tonga maintains its reputation in the treatment of Neuralgia."—Lancet.
"Invaluable in facial Neuralgia. Has proved effective in all those cases in which we have prescribed it."—Medical Press.
2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 11s. Of all Chemists.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS' UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES. Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—15, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,
 LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
 Established 1836.
 INCOME and FUNDS (1888).
 Fire Premiums £615,000
 Life Premiums 203,000
 Interest 149,000
 Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

PRUDENTIAL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED,
 HOLBORN BARS, LONDON, E.C.

FOUNDED 1848.

INVESTED FUNDS £10,000,000.

CLAIMS PAID £12,000,000.

LONDON ASSURANCE CORPORATION.
 Established by Royal Charter, A.D. 1721.
 7 ROYAL EXCHANGE AND 43A PALL MALL, S.W.

Marine, Fire, and Life Assurances have been granted by the Corporation for more than a century and a half.
 Funds in hand exceed £3,500,000.

NATIONAL PROVIDENT
 INSTITUTION.

FOR
MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE.

See New Prospectus, page 17, for particulars of ENDOWMENT-ASSURANCE POLICIES
 combining
 LIFE ASSURANCE at MINIMUM COST
 with provision for old age.

48 GRACECHURCH STREET, LONDON.

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW
 LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).

12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.

Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.

Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.
 ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
 FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.
 CITY OFFICE—11 LUDGATE HILL, E.C.
 JOHN MUNRO, Secretary.

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE,
 LOMBARD STREET and CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.
 Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.
 Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.

W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
 F. B. MACDONALD }

Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
 Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.

Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.
 E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.
 THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.
 FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.
 ISSUE of £371,320.

(Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)

The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.
 Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.

Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. Glyn, Mills, CURRIE, & Co., 67 Lombard Street.

No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.

Under the Trust Investment Act, 1889, recently passed, this Stock is an available investment for every Trustee who is not expressly forbidden by the instrument creating his trust to invest in Corporation Stock.

Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by Borough Accountant's Office, W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.
 Bridge Street, Sheffield, August 16, 1889.

AMERICAN DENTISTRY.

Dr. PAGET,

SURGEON-DENTIST,

445 STRAND, W.C.

(Facing Charing Cross Station.)

ARTIFICIAL TEETH,

without plates. Perfect imitations of the natural teeth. Artistic, painless, and perfect. Most moderate fees. Consultations free daily.

Illustrated pamphlet post free.

BENGER'S FOOD
 FOR INFANTS,
 CHILDREN AND INVALIDS.

GOLD MEDAL, HEALTH EXHIBITION.

EXTRACT FROM PRIVATE LETTER.—“The infant was very delicate; our medical adviser ordered your Food. The result in a short time was wonderful; the little fellow grew strong and fat, and is now in a thriving condition—in fact, ‘the flower of the flock.’”

BENGER'S FOOD is Sold in Tins, at 1s. 6d., 2s. 6d., 5s., and 10s., by Chemists, &c., everywhere.

THE TRADE SUPPLIED BY ALL WHOLESALE HOUSES.

SHOPPING BY POST.

Before purchasing their DRESS MATERIALS elsewhere, Ladies are requested to write to
 HY. PEASE & CO.'S Successors for a box of their New Patterns of

DARLINGTON DRESS FABRICS.

Which include the celebrated Gold-Medal Merinos, Cashmeres, Cross-Warp Serges,
 and an immense variety of new goods for Autumn wear.

The Patterns are sent free on approval by return of post to any address in Town or Country.
 Telegrams: “SUCCESSORS,” DARLINGTON.

HY. PEASE & CO.'S Successors, THE MILLS, DARLINGTON.

BOOKS, &c.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

No. 887. SEPTEMBER 1889. 2s. 6d.

CONTENTS:

LEPERS AT THE CAPE: WANTED A FATHER DAMIEN.
 MARIE BASHKIRTSEFF: A HUMAN DOCUMENT. By HELEN ZIMMERN.
 A RIDE WITH A “HIGHFLYER.” With Profile of Midland Railway
 between St. Pancras and Nottingham.
 TO THE EMPRESS FREDERICK. By the DUCHESS OF RUTLAND.
 MY FIRST VISIT TO ZIMMÉ. By HOLT S. HALLETT.
 LADY BABY. Chaps. XXX.—XXXII.
 A GLIMPSE INTO A JESUIT NOVITIATE. By M. H. DZIEWICKI.
 RECENT CONVERSATIONS IN A STUDIO. By W. W. STORY.
 POESIES FROM ABROAD. By the Hon. FLORENCE HENNIKER.
 THE BRITISH SETTLEMENT AT CAPE JUBY, NORTH-WEST AFRICA.
 By DONALD MACKENZIE.
 LOST—A HEART. By A. WERNER.
 THE SESSION.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

Price One Shilling.

TALES FROM “BLACKWOOD.”

THIRD SERIES.—No. IV.

CONTENTS: MY TREASURE. By ANNETTE LYSER—WHO WERE THEY?
 a Maltese Apparition. By the Marquess of LORNE—WITHIN HIS DANGER: a Tale from the Chinese. By ROBERT K. DOUGLAS—THE FACTOR'S SHOOTING.
 By GILFRID W. HARTLEY—A MAGNETIC MYSTERY. By Major-General W. G.
 HAMLEY.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

Ready immediately at all the Libraries, crown 8vo. handsomely bound, 6s.

THE AUTHORISED TRANSLATION OF

“Souvenirs intimes de la Cour des Tuileries.”

MY MISTRESS, the EMPRESS EUGÉNIE;
 Or, Court Life at the Tuileries.

By her Private Reader, Madame CARETTE (née BOUVET).

“We recommend everyone who admires good work to buy and read it.”—Morning Post.
 LONDON: DEAN & SON, 160A FLEET STREET, E.C.

Just published.

ECONOMICAL, DAINTY, and PRACTICAL
 DISHES,

With the use of LIEBIG “COMPANY'S” EXTRACT OF MEAT.

Compiled by EMILY CORFE.

London: LIEBIG'S EXTRACT OF MEAT COMPANY, Limited, 9 Fenchurch Avenue, E.C.
 Post free on application.

Now ready.

THE FAUNA of BRITISH INDIA, including Ceylon and Burma. Published under the authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council.
 Edited by W. T. BLANFORD.

MAMMALIA. By W. T. BLANFORD, F.R.S. Part I.
 Medium 8vo. paper covers, pp. i.—xii., 1—250, and 71 Woodcuts, 10s.

FISHES. By F. DAY, C.I.E., LL.D. Vol. I. Medium 8vo. cloth, lettered, &c., pp. i.—xviii., 1—548, and 164 Woodcuts, 20s.

DITTO. Vol. II. pp. i.—xiv., 1—510, and 177 Woodcuts, 20s.

London: TAYLOR & FRANCIS, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street.
 Calcutta: THACKER, SPINK, & Co. Bombay: THACKER & Co., Limited.
 Berlin: R. FRIEDLANDER & SOHN, Carlstrasse. (1888.)

CHEAP EDITION OF VERE CLAVERING'S NOVEL.

Picture boards, 2s.; cloth, 2s. 6d.

A MODERN DELILAH. By the Author of “Barcaldine” &c.
 London: SPENCER BLACKETT & HALLAM, 35 St. Bride Street.

Now ready, fancy boards, 1s.; cloth gilt, 2s.

THE LIFE and LETTERS of FATHER DAMIEN. Edited, with Introduction, by his Brother, FATHER PAMPHILE.
 CATHOLIC TRUTH SOCIETY, 21 Westminster Bridge Road, London, S.E. And all Booksellers.

Just published, 3s.; free by post, 3s. 4d.

THE OWENS COLLEGE CALENDAR for the SESSION
 1889-90.
 London: MACMILLAN & Co. Manchester: J. E. CORNISH.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.

Post free for 13 stamps, from
 Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London; or Hall Green (near Birmingham).

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates
 per annum, paid in advance:
 Any part of the United Kingdom £1 8 2
 India and China 1 12 6
 Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America 1 10 6
 STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
 London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
 Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.

BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.

GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
 IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.

A MONTHLY CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.

Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1815.

136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A DAUGHTER OF THE PEOPLE."
DIANA. By GEORGINA M. CRAIK (Mrs. MAY).
3 vols. crown 8vo.

NOW READY.

AN IRISH COUSIN. By GEILLES HERRING
and MARTIN ROSS. 2 vols. crown 8vo.
"Quite one of the best Irish novels of the generation."—Observer.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "WORTH WAITING FOR."
THE SCOTTS of BESTMINSTER. By
J. MASTERMAN. 3 vols. crown 8vo.
"This novel is one of the best of the season."—Athenæum.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MLLE. DE MERSAC."
MISS SHAFTO. By W. E. NORRIS. 3 vols.
Crown 8vo.
The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"There is not a dull page in these three volumes."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "COUNTESS IRENE."
ROBERT LEEMAN'S DAUGHTERS. By
J. FOGERTY. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

Also now ready.

A CHRONICLE of TWO MONTHS. 1 vol.
crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 9s.

A TEXT-BOOK OF ORGANIC CHEMISTRY.

By A. BERNTHSEN, Ph.D.
Formerly Professor of Chemistry in the University of Heidelberg.

Translated by GEORGE M'GOWAN, Ph.D.
Demonstrator in Chemistry, University College of North Wales, Bangor.

The Original Text has been specially brought up to date by the Author for this Edition.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, 49 AND 50 OLD BAILEY.

NEW SCHOOL BOOK BY DR. ABBOTT.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE LATIN GATE:

A First Translation Book on a New Method.

Illustrated by French and English Etymology, with Graduated Reading Lessons, Notes, and Vocabulary, and Hints on the Structure of Latin Words and Sentences.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

LATIN PROSE through ENGLISH IDIOM. Thirty-third Thousand. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

VIA LATINA. A First Latin Book. Fortieth Thousand.
Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

HOW to WRITE CLEARLY. Rules and Exercises on English Composition. Forty-first Thousand. Cloth, 1s. 6d.

HOW to PARSE. An Attempt to Apply the Principles of Scholarship to English Grammar. Twenty-second Thousand. Cloth, price 3s. 6d.

HOW to TELL the PARTS of SPEECH; or, Easy
Lessons in English Grammar. Twenty-third Thousand. Cloth, 2s.

ENGLISH LESSONS for ENGLISH PEOPLE. By the Rev. EDWIN A. ABBOTT, D.D., Head-Master of the City of London School, and J. R. SEELEY, M.A., Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge. Fifteenth Thousand. Crown 8vo. cloth, 4s. 6d.

HINTS on HOME TEACHING. Second Edition.
Cloth, 3s.

"There are few teachers so experienced or skilful that they may not learn from it."
—Spectator.

SEELEY'S CHEAP SCHOOL BOOKS.

Conducted by the Rev. A. J. CHURCH, M.A.

Professor of Latin at University College, London.

"We cannot too warmly hail this series.....Most surely if all the schoolmasters in England would adopt it they would have fewer occasions to complain of boys not having read their notes, and fewer grumbings on the part of Patres familias at the heavy items of the book bill."—Saturday Review.

"We believe that the publication of this series, especially of the English part, will prove a great gain to the literary education of the country."—Spectator.

"Such books were much needed. They are edited with great care and ability."
—Pall Mall Gazette.

* * * Complete Lists of the Series may be obtained from the Publishers.

LONDON: SEELEY & CO., LIMITED, ESSEX STREET, STRAND.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW NOVELS.

BY the WESTERN SEA: a Summer Idyl.

By JAMES BAKER, Author of "John Westacott" &c. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.
"It shows the working of two human souls in harmony with the soul of nature, and it is a picture complete in itself."—Athenæum.
"The atmosphere of the story is highly charged with poetic feeling, and many readers will dream over the book and enjoy it."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"Only a perusal of the tale can show how charmingly it is written."—Queen.

WILD DARRIE. By CHRISTIE MURRAY and HENRY HERMAN. 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

SUCH IS LIFE By MAY KENDALL, Author of "From a Garret" and "Dreams to Sell," &c., Joint Author of "That Very Mab." 1 vol. crown 8vo. 6s.

CRICKETING SAWS and STORIES. By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON. Consisting of scraps of advice to duffers (chiefly on points of cricketing culture) by one of them—of saws not sharp enough to hurt anybody, and of stories picked up between the innings. With recti-linear illustrations by the Author. Price 1s.

A PRACTICAL PLAN for ASSIMILATING
the ENGLISH and AMERICAN MONEY as a STEP towards a UNIVERSAL MONEY. By the late WALTER BAGEHOT. Second Edition. Crown 8vo.
price 2s. 6d.
* * * This little book has been long out of print, and is republished in view of the Monetary Congress to be held in Paris during the present month.

Now ready, 8vo. price Sixpence.

The NEW REVIEW. No. IV. SEPTEMBER.

Edited by ARCHIBALD GROVE.

CONTENTS:

THE ARMENIAN QUESTION..... By M. SEVASLY (Editor of the Haitasdan).
A CENTURY OF FRENCH ART AT THE PARIS
EXHIBITION By CLAUDE PHILLIPS.
THE PROGRESS OF CO-OPERATION.
I. IN ENGLAND.... By GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE
II. IN FRANCE..... By M. MILLERAND (Member of the French Chamber).
PITT AND TALLEYRAND IN 1792..... By the Baroness BLAZE
DE BURY.
THE DYING DRAMA..... By WILLIAM ARCHER.
THE FRENCH ELECTIONS By JOSEPH REINACH (Editor
of La République Française).
THOMSON'S TRAVELS IN MORCCCO..... By EDWARD CLODD.
WRESTLING IN JAPAN By the Hon. GEORGE N.
CURZON, M.P.

London: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

THE FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW

For SEPTEMBER.

Edited by FRANK HARRIS.

PARALLELS TO IRISH HOME RULE. By E. A. FREEMAN.
BELGIAN NEUTRALITY. With Map.
WHAT ENGLISH PEOPLE READ. By W. M. GATTIE.
THE CASE AGAINST CAPITAL PUNISHMENT. By B. PAUL NEUMAN.
THE COMING ELECTIONS IN FRANCE. By LADY DILKE.
COLERIDGE AS A POET. By Professor E. DOWDEN.
DRY-NURSING THE COLONIES. By Miss F. L. SHAW.
OUR NATIONAL PASTIME. By WILLIAM DAY.
A FORTNIGHT IN BOSNIA. By A. HULME-BRAMAN.
RUSSIAN CHARACTERISTICS. Part I. LYING. By E. B. LANIN.
CORRESPONDENCE:—
Sir Charles Dilke on the Bombay Army. By Vieux Moustache and the Right Hon.
Sir C. Dilke, Bart.

CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

SEPTEMBER. 2s. 6d.

ITALY DRIFTING. By the MARCHESE ALFIERI DI SOSTEGNO.
DISEASES CAUGHT FROM BUTCHER'S MEAT. By Dr. BEHREND, M.R.C.P.
CRITICISM AS A TRADE. By Professor KNIGHT.
DAS I. GARDE-DRAGONER-REGIMENT. By Col. LONSDALE HALE.
WORDSWORTH'S GREAT FAILURE. By Professor MINTO.
A FEW WORDS TO FRESH WORKERS. By Miss OCTAVIA HILL.
WHAT NEXT IN EGYPT? By EDWARD DICEY, C.B.
IN SEARCH OF A RELIGION. By W. S. LILLY.
THE NEW LIBERALISM: A RESPONSE. By GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.
THE GRIEVANCES OF HIGH CHURCHMEN. By the Rev. Canon PERRY.
AN EIGHT-HOUR LAW. By H. H. CHAMPION.
PARLIAMENTARY MISRULE OF OUR WAR SERVICES. By H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER.

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, & CO.

THE NATIONAL REVIEW.

SEPTEMBER. 2s. 6d.

THE WORK OF THE SESSION. By C. A. WHITMORE, M.P.
THE ORIGIN OF MODERN OCCULTISM. By F. LEGGE.
THE RURAL RHYMES OF TUSCANY. By PAUL SYLVESTER.
SECULAR AND HONORARY DEACONS. By Dr. A. J. H. CRESPI.
ORCHIDS AND HYBRIDIZING. By F. BOYLE.
WORDSWORTH AND THE QUANTOCK HILLS. By W. GRESWELL.
A TORY PLEA FOR THE RIGHTS OF MAN. By W. EARL HODGSON.
COW-KEEPING BY FARM-LABOURERS. By H. EVERSHED.
THE AGE OF REASON. By H. G. KEENE.
POLITICS AT HOME AND ABROAD.
CORRESPONDENCE.

LONDON: W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

SOPHOCLES.—The PLAYS and FRAGMENTS. With Critical Notes, Commentary, and Translation in English Prose, by R. C. JEBB, Litt.D., LL.D., Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge.

Part I.—OEDIPUS TYRANNUS. New Edition. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

Part II.—OEDIPUS COLONEUS. New Edition. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

[Nearly ready.]

Part III.—ANTIGONE. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d.

Part IV.—PHILOCTETES.

[In the press.]

THE OLD TESTAMENT in GREEK, according to the SEPTUAGINT. Edited by H. B. SWETE, D.D., Honorary Fellow of Gonville and Caius College. Vol. I.—GENESIS—IV. KINGS. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

Vol. II., by the same Editor.

[In the press.]

THE BOOK of PSALMS in GREEK, according to the SEPTUAGINT, forming a part of Vol. II. of the above, published separately. 2s. 6d.

A TREATISE on ELEMENTARY DYNAMICS. By S. L. LONEY, M.A., Fellow of Sidney Sussex College. Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d.

A HISTORY of the STUDY of MATHEMATICS at CAMBRIDGE. By W. W. ROUSE BALL, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer on Mathematics of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo. 6s.

NEW VOLUMES OF THE PITT PRESS SERIES.

I. MATHEMATICAL SERIES.

EUCLID. Books I. and II. By H. M. TAYLOR, M.A., Fellow and late Tutor of Trinity College, Cambridge. [Nearly ready.]

II. CLASSICAL SERIES.

EURIPIDES.—HIPPOLYTUS. With Introduction and Notes, By W. S. HADLEY, M.A., Fellow of Pembroke College. 2s.

EURIPIDES.—IPHIGENEIA in AULIS. By C. E. S. HEADLAM, B.A., Fellow of Trinity Hall. [Nearly ready.]

PLATONIS APOLOGIA SOCRATIS. With Introduction, Notes, and Appendices, by J. ADAM, M.A., Fellow of Emmanuel College. 3s. 6d.

PLATONIS CRITO. By the same Editor. 2s. 6d.

PLATONIS EUTHYPHRO. By the same Editor. [Preparing.]

PLUTARCH.—LIVES of the GRACCHI. With Introduction, Notes, and Lexicon, by Rev. H. A. HOLDEN, M.A., LL.D. 6s.

PLUTARCH.—LIFE of NICIAS. By the same Editor. 5s.

PLUTARCH.—LIFE of SULLA. By the same Editor. 6s.

PLUTARCH.—LIFE of TIMOLEON. By the same Editor. [Nearly ready.]

SOPHOCLES.—OEDIPUS TYRANNUS. School Edition. With Introduction and Commentary, by R. C. JEBB, Litt.D., LL.D. 4s. 6d.

CICERO.—DE AMICITIA—DE SENECTUTE—PRO SULLA. Edited by J. S. REID, Litt.D., Fellow and Tutor of Gonville and Caius College. New Edition. 3s. 6d. each.

LIVY. Books XXI. & XXII. With Notes, Introduction, and Maps. By M. S. DIMSDALE, M.A., Fellow of King's College. 2s. 6d. each.

VERGIL.—AENEID. Books I.—XII. Edited, with Notes, by A. SIDGWICK, M.A., Tutor of Corpus Christi College, Oxford. 1s. 6d. each.

VERGIL.—GEORGICS. Books I., II. By the same Editor. Price 2s. Books III., IV. 2s.

GEOGRAPHY, ELEMENTARY COMMERCIAL. A Sketch of the Commodities and the Countries of the World. By H. R. MILL, D.Sc., F.R.S.E. Price 1s.

GEOGRAPHY, an ATLAS of COMMERCIAL. (A Companion to the above.) By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by HUGH ROBERT MILL, D.Sc. [Preparing.]

BRITISH INDIA, a SHORT HISTORY of. By E. S. CARLOS, M.A., late Head-Master of Exeter Grammar School. [Nearly ready.]

NEW VOLUMES OF THE CAMBRIDGE BIBLE FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

THE EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS. By the Rev. H. C. G. MOULE, M.A. 2s. 6d.

THE BOOK OF MALACHI. By Archdeacon PEROWNE. [Nearly ready.]

THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS. By the Rev. E. H. PEROWNE, D.D. [In the press.]

THE SMALLER CAMBRIDGE BIBLE FOR SCHOOLS.

The Smaller Cambridge Bible for Schools will form an entirely new series of Commentaries on some selected Books of the Bible. It is expected that they will be prepared for the most part by the Editors of the larger series (The Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges). The volumes will be issued at a low price, and will be suitable to the requirements of preparatory and elementary schools. The first volumes of the series will be ready for publication before the end of the present year.

THE FIRST AND SECOND BOOKS OF SAMUEL. By the Rev. Professor KIRKPATRICK, B.D.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW. By the Rev. A. CARR, M.A.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO ST. MARK. By the Rev. G. F. MACLEAR, D.D.

LONDON: C. J. CLAY & SONS,
CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE, AVE MARIA LANE.

FREDERICK WARNE & CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.

NEW VOLUME IN THE CAVENDISH LIBRARY.

Large crown 8vo. cloth, uncut, 3s. 6d.

WILLIAM HAZLITT, ESSAYIST and

CRITIC. Selections from his Writings, with a Memoir, Biographical and Critical. By ALEXANDER IRELAND, Author of "The Book-Lover's Enchiridion," "Memoir of Emerson," &c. With Steel Portrait.

Mr. Ireland's lifelong acquaintance with the works of Hazlitt, one of the most brilliant essayists of the century, and certainly the most hardly treated man of genius of his time, guarantees that this volume is edited with care and discrimination.

125 Copies have been printed on fine thick paper, crown quarto, with an Engraving of Winterslow Hutt, a favourite resort of Hazlitt.

"Mr. Ireland has made a wide and excellent selection from Hazlitt's works, so ample and judicious that, while it may no doubt lead to a study of the complete essays, it may be said to afford in itself the material for a fair conclusion as to the place which he should occupy in our literature."—Morning Post.

"Every lover of literature should read, if he can, all that Hazlitt ever wrote, for he will find it rich in nutriment for the intellectual and spiritual nature. Meanwhile, Mr. Ireland's volume may have the effect of bringing Hazlitt's merits once more before the public."—Globe.

"Mr. Ireland has here provided a very excellent selection of very interesting work."—Saturday Review.

"Mr. Ireland has done us a distinguished service by placing before us a writer who ought by no means to fall out of sight, the father of modern essayists, and probably not excelled by any of the legion who create the enormous monthly and weekly volume of our magazine literature."—Liverpool Mercury.

Large crown 8vo. neat cloth binding, uncut, 3s. 6d.

LEIGH HUNT, as Poet and Essayist. Being the choicest Passages from his Works, selected and edited, with a Biographical Introduction, by CHARLES KENT.

"This memoir is both generous and discreet. Mr. Kent's feeling for the man is as clear as his admiration for the writer. He has, in short, written precisely as a friend should write, but as friends too rarely do write in these long-winded days; not a word too much, and yet omitting nothing which could show us the man at his best—a well-drawn, well-composed, genuine little piece of portraiture."—World.

NEW EDITION OF ANNE PRATT'S "FLOWERING PLANTS."

4 vols. medium 8vo. cloth, gilt top, £3.

THE FLOWERING PLANTS, GRASSES,

SEDGES, and FERNS of GREAT BRITAIN, and their ALLIES, the CLUB MOSSES, PEPPERWORTS, and HORSETAILS. By ANNE PRATT. With 313 accurately coloured Plates.

This Set contains all the Matter and Illustrations of the original Six-Volume Edition, now out of print.

Medium 8vo. cloth, gilt top, 15s.

THE GRASSES, SEDGES, and FERNS of GREAT BRITAIN, and their ALLIES, the CLUB MOSSES, PEPPERWORTS, and HORSETAILS. With 74 accurately coloured Plates.

NOW READY, THE SIXTEENTH EDITION.

Medium 8vo. cloth gilt, bevelled boards, 6s.

LITTLE LORD FAUNTLEROY. By FRANCES

HODGSON BURNETT. With numerous Original Illustrations by Reginald B. Birch.

NOW READY, THE FIFTH EDITION.

Medium 8vo. cloth gilt, bevelled boards, 5s.

SARA CREWE; or, What Happened at

Miss Minchin's: and EDITHA'S BURGLAR. By FRANCES HODGSON BURNETT, Author of "Little Lord Fauntleroy." With Illustrations by Reginald B. Birch.

THE LATE EDWARD LEAR'S NONSENSE BOOKS.

Oblong 4to. gilt, 6s.

THE BOOK of NONSENSE. Twenty-sixth

Edition. Re-issue in its Original Form, with 110 droll Illustrations, printed in black and white, with full letterpress descriptions.

Oblong 4to. gilt, 6s.

MORE NONSENSE. 104 Pages of Droll

Illustrations, with full Letterpress Descriptions.

Square 16mo. gilt, 3s. 6d.

NONSENSE SONGS and STORIES. With all the Original Illustrations, and a Preface hitherto unpublished.

Square 16mo. gilt, 3s. 6d.

NONSENSE BOTANY and ALPHABETS.

With 162 Illustrations.

From the Quarterly Review, October, 1888:—"The good and kind old man is gone; he was content to go, he said. But he has left a rich fund of harmless gaiety to those boys and girls he loved so well, and in their name we lay this wreath upon his grave."

Small 4to. boards, 1s. 6d.

LEAR'S NONSENSE DROLLERIES. Containing "The Owl and the Pussy-Cat," and "The Duck and the Kangaroo." By EDWARD LEAR, Author of "The Book of Nonsense." With Original Illustrations by William Foster.

"This charming bit of real nonsense," long out of print, has been reissued in a popular form, with humorous illustrations by Mr. W. Foster.

A MOST SUCCESSFUL BOOK OF HUMOUR.

Demy 4to. stiff picture wrapper, 1s.

FOLLIES, FOIBLES, and FANCIES of FISH, FLESH, and FOWL. Figured by FOSTER.

The drawings, some twenty-five in number, are by Mr. W. Foster, a son of Birket Foster, to whom the little work is dedicated.

"An artistic joke, made up of a series of clever, humorous sketches, and all are good."—Sussex Daily News.

LONDON: FREDERICK WARNE & CO., 15 BEDFORD STREET,
STRAND, W.C.

MESSRS. BELL'S EDUCATIONAL WORKS.

CLASS BOOKS.

ARITHMETIC.

With 8,000 Examples.

By CHARLES PENDLEBURY, M.A., F.R.A.S.
Head Mathematical Master of St. Paul's School, Hon. Sec. of the Association for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching.

Third Edition, Revised and Stereotyped. With or without Answers.

Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. In Two Parts, 2s. 6d. each.

The EXAMPLES (without Answers) and EXAMINATION PAPERS can also be had in a separate volume, 3s.

The Arithmetic is in use at Winchester, Charterhouse, St. Paul's, Merchant Taylors, Christ's Hospital, Sherborne, Manchester, Belfast Academical Institution, Daniel Stewart's College, Edinburgh, and is being extensively adopted in schools throughout the United Kingdom.

Prospectus, with the opinions of teachers, sent post free.

ARITHMETIC.

By the Rev. C. ELSEE, M.A.

Senior Mathematical Master, Rugby School; late Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge.

Thirteenth Edition. 3s. 6d.

ALGEBRA.

By the Rev. C. ELSEE, M.A., Senior Mathematical Master at Rugby.

Seventh Edition. 4s.

ALGEBRA.

A Progressive Course of Examples.

By the Rev. W. F. MACMICHAEL,
Late Head-Master of the Grammar School, Warwick, and
R. PROWDE SMITH, M.A., Master at Cheltenham College.

Fourth Edition. 3s. 6d. With Answers, 4s. 6d.

EUCLID.

BOOKS I.—VI., AND PART OF BOOKS XI.—XII.

With numerous Exercises.

By HORACE DEIGHTON, Principal of Harrison College, Barbados.
Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. Books I. and II., 2s. Books I. to III. 2s. 6d. shortly.

KEY to the Exercises, 5s. (for Tutors only).

ANALYTICAL GEOMETRY.

By the Rev. T. G. VYVYAN, M.A.
Senior Mathematical Master of Charterhouse.
Fifth Edition, Revised. 4s. 6d.

SOLID GEOMETRY.

An Elementary Treatise.

By W. STEADMAN ALDIS, M.A.
Professor of Mathematics in the University College, Auckland, New Zealand.
Fourth Edition, Revised. Crown 8vo. 6s.

GEOMETRICAL OPTICS.

An Elementary Treatise.
By W. STEADMAN ALDIS, M.A.
Third Edition. 4s.

PLANE TRIGONOMETRY.

By the Rev. T. G. VYVYAN, M.A.
Third Edition, Revised. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

CONIC SECTIONS.

Treated Geometrically.

By W. H. BESANT, Sc.D., F.R.S.
Fifth Edition, Revised. 4s. 6d. Solutions to Examples, 4s.
Enunciation and Figures only, 1s. 6d.

ASTRONOMY.

An Introduction to Plane Astronomy.

By P. T. MAIN, M.A.
Fellow of St. John's College, and Lecturer in Natural Science at the same College.
Fifth Edition, Revised. 4s.

HYDROSTATICS.

An Elementary Treatise.

By W. H. BESANT, Sc.D., F.R.S.
Thirteenth Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 4s.

DYNAMICS.

An Elementary Treatise.

By WILLIAM GARNETT, M.A., D.C.L.
Principal of the College of Physical Science, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.
Fifth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 6s.

HEAT.

An Elementary Treatise.

By WILLIAM GARNETT, M.A., D.C.L.
Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 4s.

EXPERIMENTAL PHYSICS.

Examples and Examination Papers in.
By W. GALLATLY, M.A. Pembroke College, Cambridge.PASSAGES FOR TRANSLATION INTO LATIN PROSE.

Preceded by Essays on :—I. Political and Social Ideas. II. Range of Metaphorical Expression. III. Historical Development of Latin Prose Style in Antiquity. IV. Cautions as to Orthography.

By H. NETTLESHIP, M.A., Corpus Professor of Latin in the University of Oxford.
Crown 8vo. 3s. A KEY (for Masters only). Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d."The Introduction ought to be studied by every teacher of Latin."—Guardian.EXTRACTS FOR TRANSLATION IN GREEK, LATIN, AND ENGLISH.By R. C. JEBB, Litt.D., LL.D., Regius Professor of Greek in Cambridge University;
H. JACKSON, Litt.D., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; and
W. E. CURREY, M.A., late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge.

Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d.

RUDIMENTS OF ATTIC CONSTRUCTION AND IDIOM.

An Introduction to Greek Syntax for Beginners who have acquired some knowledge of Latin.

By the Rev. W. COOKWORTHY COMPTON, M.A.,
Assistant Master in Uppingham School.

Crown 8vo. 3s.

"Clear and concise."—Athenæum."An excellent little book."—Journal of Education.

LATIN PROSE CONSTRUING LESSONS.

By ALFRED J. CHURCH, M.A.

Professor of Latin at University College, London.

Ninth Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d.

*Introductory to the study of Cæsar.*TALES FOR LATIN PROSE COMPOSITION.

Arranged with Notes and Vocabulary.

By G. H. WELLS, M.A., Assistant Master at Merchant Taylors' School.
Fcp. 8vo. 2s.

EASY LATIN EXERCISES.

On the Syntax of the Revised Latin Primer and Shorter Latin Primer. With Vocabulary.

By A. M. M. STEDMAN, M.A. Wadham College, Oxon.
Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

This book is intended to accompany Dr. Kennedy's Revised Latin Primer and Shorter Latin Primer, but it may be used with any Grammar. The Exercises illustrate all the elementary rules, and are more copious than in most similar books.

FIRST LATIN LESSONS.

For Preparatory Schools.

By A. M. M. STEDMAN, M.A. Wadham College, Oxon.
Square fcp. 8vo. 1s.LATIN VOCABULARIES FOR REPETITION.

Arranged according to Subjects.

By A. M. M. STEDMAN, M.A.
Fcp. 8vo. 1s. 6d.EASY LATIN PASSAGES FOR UNSEEN
TRANSLATION.By A. M. M. STEDMAN, M.A.
Fcp. 8vo. 1s. 6d.LATIN EXERCISES, GRAMMAR PAPERS,
AND HINTS FOR JUNIOR CLASSES.By T. COLLINS, M.A., Head-Master of the Latin School, Newport, Salop.
Sixth Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d."UNSEEN PAPERS" IN LATIN PROSE
AND VERSE.

With Examination Questions.

By T. COLLINS, M.A.
Fifth Edition, Enlarged. Fcp. 8vo. 2s. 6d."UNSEEN PAPERS" IN GREEK PROSE
AND VERSE.

With Examination Questions.

By T. COLLINS, M.A.
Third Edition. Fcp. 8vo. 3s.EASY TRANSLATIONS OF NEPOS, CÆSAR, CICERO, LIVY, &c.

For Retranslation into Latin.

By T. COLLINS, M.A.
Crown 8vo. 2s.

A List of Books suitable for the Examinations of 1890-91, published by Messrs. BELL, will be ready in a few days, and may be had post free on application.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.
CAMBRIDGE: DEIGHTON, BELL, & CO.

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW EDUCATIONAL BOOKS.

MACMILLAN'S GEOGRAPHICAL SERIES.

Edited by ARCHIBALD GEIKIE, F.R.S., Director-General of the Geological Survey of the United Kingdom.—NEW VOLUME.

AN ELEMENTARY CLASS-BOOK OF GEOGRAPHY.

By HUGH ROBERT MILL, D.Sc., F.R.S.E. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

A TEXT-BOOK of EUCLID'S ELEMENTS. Including Alternative Proofs, together with additional Theorems and Exercises, Classified and Arranged. By H. S. HALL, M.A., and F. H. STEVENS, M.A. Globe 8vo. cloth. Book I., 1s.; Books I. and II., 1s. 6d.; Books I.—IV., 3s.; Books I.—VI., 4s. 6d.; Book XI. (to follow shortly).

CLASSICS.

EURIPIDES—ION. Edited, with an Introduction and Notes, by M. A. BAYFIELD, M.A. Fcp. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

PLINY—LETTERS. Books I.—II. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by JAMES COWAN, M.A. Fcp. 8vo. [In September.]

PLUTARCH—LIVES of GALBA and OTHO. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by E. G. HARDY, M.A. Fcp. 8vo. [In September.]

TACITUS—HISTORIES. III.—V. Edited by A. D. GODLEY, M.A. Fcp. 8vo. [In September.]

ÆSCHYLUS—AGAMEMNON. Edited, with Introduction, Commentary, and Prose Translation, by A. W. VERRALL, Litt.D. 8vo. [In October.]

ÆSCHYLUS—SUPPLICES. Edited, with Introduction, Commentary, and Prose Translation, by Prof. T. G. TUCKER, 8vo. [In October.]

PLINY'S CORRESPONDENCE with TRAJAN. Edited, with Notes and Introductory Essays, by E. G. HARDY, M.A. 8vo. 10s. 6d.

HERODOTUS. Translated, with Introduction, Notes, and Indices, by G. C. MACAULAY, M.A. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. [In the press.]

THE HISTORY of POLYBIUS. Translated from the Text of E. HULTSCH by E. S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A., late Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. 2 vols. Crown 8vo. 21s.

THE WORKS of XENOPHON. Translated into English, with Introduction and Notes, by H. G. DAKYNS, M.A. 4 vols. Crown 8vo. [Vol. I. September.]

A COMPANION to SCHOOL CLASSICS. By JAMES GOW, M.A., Litt.D. With Illustrations. Second Edition, Revised. Crown 8vo. 6s.

SERMO LATINUS. A Short Guide to Latin Prose Composition. Part I. Introduction; Part II. Selected Passages for Translation. By J. P. POSTGATE, M.A., Litt.D. Globe 8vo. 2s. 6d.—KEY, 3s. 6d.

EXERCISES in LATIN VERSE of Various Kinds. By Rev. GEORGE PRESTON, M.A. Globe 8vo. 2s. 6d.—KEY, 5s.

SYNTAX of the MOODS and TENSES of the GREEK VERB. By Prof. W. W. GOODWIN, &c. New Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 8vo. [In October.]

MACMILLAN'S LATIN COURSE. Part II. By A. M. COOK, M.A. Crown 8vo. [In September.]

LITERATURE PRIMERS—New Volume.

ROMAN LITERATURE. By Prof. A. S. WILKINS, Litt.D., LL.D. 18mo. 1s. [In October.]

HISTORY AND GEOGRAPHY.

A HISTORY of the LATER ROMAN EMPIRE, from Arcadius to Irene, A.D. 335—390. By JOHN B. BURY, M.A. 2 vols. 8vo. [In October.]

A SHORT HISTORY of the ENGLISH PEOPLE. By J. R. GREEN, M.A., LL.D. In 4 Parts. With the corresponding portion of Mr. TAIT'S ANALYSIS. Crown 8vo. 3s. each. Part I. 637—1235; Part II. 1234—1533; Part III. 1534—1689; Part IV. 1689—1873.

A GEOGRAPHY of EUROPE. By JAMES SIMS, M.A. With Illustrations. Globe 8vo. [In the press.]

MATHEMATICS.

A COURSE of EASY ARITHMETICAL EXAMPLES for BEGINNERS. By J. G. BRADSHAW, B.A. Globe 8vo. 2s. With ANSWERS, 2s. 6d.

A KEY to MR. LOCK'S "ARITHMETIC for BEGINNERS." By Rev. R. G. WATSON, M.A. Globe 8vo. [In September.]

A SHILLING CLASS-BOOK of ARITHMETIC. Adapted for Use in Elementary Schools. By the Rev. J. B. LOCK, M.A. 18mo. [In the press.]

MATHEMATICS—continued.

A TREATISE on GEOMETRICAL CONICIS in accordance with the Syllabus of the Association for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching. By A. COCKSHOTT, M.A., and Rev. F. B. WALTERS, M.A. Crown 8vo. 5s.

CURIOSA MATHEMATICA. Part I. A New Theory of Parallels. By C. L. DODGSON, M.A. 2s.

STATICS for BEGINNERS. By JOHN GREAVES, M.A. Globe 8vo. 3s. 6d.

SOLUTIONS of the EXAMPLES in Messrs. HALL and KNIGHT'S "HIGHER ALGEBRA." By H. S. HALL, M.A., and S. R. KNIGHT, B.A. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

A TREATISE on TRIGONOMETRY. By W. E. JOHNSON, M.A. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.

KEY to MR. LOCK'S "ELEMENTARY TRIGONOMETRY." By H. CARR, B.A. 8s. 6d.

KEY to MR. LOCK'S "TRIGONOMETRY for BEGINNERS." Crown 8vo. 6s. 6d.

SOLUTIONS of the EXAMPLES in "A TREATISE on ALGEBRA." By C. SMITH, M.A. Price 10s. 6d.

SYLLABUS of MODERN PLANE GEOMETRY. Association for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching. Crown 8vo. sewed, 1s.

SYLLABUS of PLANE GEOMETRY (corresponding to Euclid, Books I.—VI.). Prepared by the Association for the Improvement of Geometrical Teaching. New Edition. Cr. 8vo. 1s. [Immediately.]

A TREATISE on DYNAMICS of a PARTICLE. With numerous Examples. By Prof. TAIT and W. J. STEELE, B.A. Sixth Edition, Revised. Crown 8vo. [Immediately.]

A KEY to MR. TODHUNTER'S "INTEGRAL CALCULUS." By H. ST. J. HUNTER, M.A. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d.

WOOLWICH MATHEMATICAL PAPERS for Admission in the Royal Military Academy for the years 1870—88. Edited by E. J. BROOKSMITH, B.A., LL.M. Crown 8vo. 6s.

MODERN LANGUAGES.

A POETRY BOOK. Compiled by M. A. WOODS. In 3 vols. Fcp. 8vo. Vol. I., 2s. 6d.; Vols. II. and III. 4s. 6d. each.

MACMILLAN'S FRENCH COMPOSITION. By G. E. FASNACHT. First Year, 2s. 6d.—KEY, 4s. 6d. Second Year, in preparation.

PRIMARY FRENCH & GERMAN READING BOOKS

CONTES de FÉES. Par CHARLES PEREAULT. With Notes, Vocabulary, and Exercises, by G. E. FASNACHT. Illustrated. With Exercises, 1s. 6d.

CORNAZ—NOS ENFANTS et LEURS AMIS. Par SUZANNE CORNAZ. Edited, with Notes, Vocabulary, and Exercises, by EDITH HARVEY. 1s. 6d.

FRENCH LIFE in LETTERS. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH. With Notes on Idioms, &c. 1s. 6d.

A HISTORY of EIGHTEENTH CENTURY LITERATURE; 1689—1789. By EDMUND GOSSE, M.A. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

CHRONOLOGICAL OUTLINES of ENGLISH LITERATURE. By F. RYLAND. Crown 8vo. [In September.]

SCIENCE.

IRON and STEEL MANUFACTURE. For Beginners. By A. H. HIGGINS. Illustrated. 3s. 6d.

AN ELEMENTARY TEXT-BOOK of CHEMISTRY. By Prof. W. G. MIXTER. 7s. 6d.

ELEMENTARY LESSONS in ASTRO-NOMY. By J. NORMAN LOCKYER, F.R.S. 5s. 6d.

A GRADUATED COURSE of NATURAL SCIENCE. Experimental and Theoretical. For Schools and Colleges. Part I. First Year's Course for Elementary Schools and the Junior Classes of Technical Schools and Colleges. By BENJAMIN LOWEY, F.R.A.S. Globe 8vo. 2s.

THEOLOGY.

AN INTRODUCTION to the CREEDS. By the Rev. Canon MACLEAR, D.D. 18mo. 2s. 6d.

AN INTRODUCTION to the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES. By the same Author. 18mo. [In the press.]

A HISTORY of the BOOK of COMMON PRAYER. With a Rationale of its Offices. By the Rev. FRANCIS PROCTER, M.A. 18th Edition. 10s. 6d.

CAMBRIDGE LOCAL 1889, OXFORD LOCAL 1890, AND UNIVERSITY OF LONDON 1890 EXAMINATIONS.

ÆSCHYLUS—PROMETHEUS VINCTUS. With Notes and Vocabulary, by Rev. H. M. STEPHENSON, M.A. 1s. 6d.

CÆSAR—The GALLIC WAR. Books II. and III. With Notes and Vocabulary, by Rev. W. G. RUTHERFORD, LL.D. 1s. 6d.

CÆSAR—The GALLIC WAR. Book IV. With Notes and Vocabulary, by C. BRYANS, M.A. 1s. 6d.

CICERO—PRO LEGE MANILIA. Edited by Prof. A. S. WILKINS, Litt.D. 2s. 6d.

CICERO—DE AMICITIA. Edited, with Notes and Vocabulary, by E. S. SHUCKBURGH, M.A. 18mo. 1s. 6d.

EURIPIDES—HECUBA. With Notes and Vocabulary, by Rev. JOHN BOND, M.A., and A. S. WALPOLE, M.A. 18mo. 1s. 6d.

EURIPIDES—MEDEA. Edited by A. W. VERRALL, Litt.D. 3s. 6d.

LIVY. Books XXI. and XXII. Edited by Rev. W. W. CAPES. 5s.

LIVY. Books XXI. and XXII. With Notes adapted from Mr. Capes's Edition, and Vocabulary. By J. E. MELHUSH, M.A. 1s. 6d. each. [In the press.]

VIRGIL—ÆNEID. Book VI. With Notes and Vocabulary, by T. E. PAGE, M.A. 1s. 6d.

VIRGIL—ÆNEID. Book VII. With Notes and Vocabulary by Rev. A. CALVERT, M.A. 1s. 6d.

VIRGIL—ÆNEID. Book IX. With Notes and Vocabulary, by Rev. H. M. STEPHENSON, M.A. 18mo. 1s. 6d.

VIRGIL—GEORGICS. Book I. With Notes and Vocabulary, by T. E. PAGE, M.A. 18mo. 1s. 6d. [In the press.]

VIRGIL—GEORGICS. Book II. With Notes, by Rev. J. H. SKRINE, M.A. 1s. 6d.

THUCYDIDES. Book IV. By C. E. GRAVES, M.A. Fcp. 8vo. 5s.

THUCYDIDES. Books VI. and VII. Edited by Rev. PERCIVAL FROST, M.A. 5s.

XENOPHON—HELLENICA. Books I. and II. Edited by H. HAILSTON, B.A. 4s. 6d.

BACON—ESSAYS. With Introduction and Notes, by F. G. SELBY. 3s. 6d.

MILTON—COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by Professor MASSON. Globe Edition. 3s. 6d.

MILTON—PARADISE LOST. Books I. and II. With Introduction and Notes, by MICHAEL MACMILLAN. 2s. 6d. Book I. separately, 1s. 6d.

MILTON—COMUS. With Introduction and Notes, by W. BELL, M.A. [In the press.]

POPE—POETICAL WORKS. Edited by Professor A. W. WARD. Globe Edition. 3s. 6d.

SPENSER—COMPLETE WORKS. Edited by Dr. MORRIS. Globe Edition. 3s. 6d.

SHAKESPEARE—The TEMPEST. With Introduction and Notes, by K. DEIGHTON. 1s. 6d.

SHAKESPEARE—HENRY V. With Introduction and Notes, by K. DEIGHTON. 2s.

MOLIÈRE—Le BOURGEOIS GENTIL-HOMME. Edited by L. M. MORIARTY. 1s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,768, Vol. 68.

September 14, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

BOYCOTTING AND PICKETTING.

THOUGH the strike is not yet settled, there is a fair prospect that an arrangement will have been made before we go to press. It is idle to speculate on the terms of a settlement we have not seen. We can only hope that the courage of the Companies had not failed them, and made them forget the many encouraging signs of the week—the increasing number of men who were got to work, the diminishing efficacy of the pickets, and the depression among the strikers. It is also, we may add—remembering the signal bad faith shown by the strike leaders last Sunday—early to conclude that the last compromise will have better fortune than the first. The failure of the LORD MAYOR's negotiations has been naturally the text for a great deal of angry contradiction, but the leading facts of the incident are known with tolerable certainty. The Bishop of LONDON, the LORD MAYOR, and Cardinal MANNING met the leaders of the strike last Saturday, and proposed to them a compromise, by which many of the demands of the men were conceded; but, on the other hand, it was stipulated that the dock labourers should return to work at the 5*d.* an hour rate till the 1st of January, and that the men who had been taken on during the strike should not be molested. The scheme, which the Dock Companies had agreed to accept in spite of the resistance of Sir HENRY LE MARCHANT, was actually received by Mr. BURNS and his fellow-managers in a way which convinced the LORD MAYOR and his assessors that they thought it reasonable. Mr. BURNS did, indeed, represent that he must leave the ultimate decision to the Strike Committee, but it might naturally be thought that a popular leader of so much influence, and one who, by way of illustrating the dignity of labour no doubt, deals with opposition by putting himself in a fighting attitude and threatening to smash jaws, would have no great difficulty in persuading this authority to see reason. It was, therefore, a surprise to the zealous peace-makers at the Mansion House when the compromise was not only rejected, but rejected in the rudest way, and was made an excuse for assuring the strikers that the Companies were yielding, and that they had only to hold out to secure all their demands at once. No result could have justified Sir HENRY LE MARCHANT more thoroughly, or have inflicted a better-deserved snub on the busybodies who intruded into the dispute. The Bishop and the LORD MAYOR appear to have taken their lesson. The persistence of Cardinal MANNING in offering his services to the mob leaders who use him as a tool is, however, intelligible enough. If you will play the part of friend of the people when the people does not want you, a certain amount of toad-eating is unavoidable. In the meantime Mr. BURNS, “poor little BEN TILLET,” and the others have, by their own showing, insisted through the week on terms greatly in excess of what they were prepared last Saturday to recommend to their Committee as reasonable.

In the meantime, too, the resources by which the strike is prolonged have become even less mysterious than before. Enough money has been sent from Australia to keep some thousands of men, accustomed at all times to small wages and casual work—accustomed also to be largely supported by their wives, who, it may be observed, are not in a position to conjugate the active voice of the verb to strike—in a condition of idleness refreshed by beer. In spite of the sturdy begging of Mr. BURNS, and his rather amusing shame for the American workmen who will not tip him, less money has been subscribed than would have been acceptable. Still, enough has come in to serve the turn. It is distributed by Mr. BURNS “in a fighting attitude.” As long as it holds out and the distribution confers a position of dignity on the distributor, it is not to be supposed that the human nature of your leader will willingly consent to put a stop to a state of things which keeps the person who enjoys all its advantages, and suffers none of its inconveniences, in a situation so conspicuous. To be at once the friend, the champion, and the master of “the people” is a pleasure given to few. If Sir HENRY LE MARCHANT, now, or Mr. NORWOOD were to threaten to cane a workman, and were not to be knocked down for their bullying, what would the “Liberal” press say? In the admirable strike leader the language is appropriate, and passes unnoted by the friends of the people. What could not be done by doles was done by intimidation. It is true, no doubt, thanks in great part to the resolution of the East-End magistrates, that downright riot has been largely, if not altogether, avoided. The strange story of the lime, which happened to be quite promiscuous-like in somebody's hands, and happened most unaccountably in the flurry of the moment to get into somebody's eyes, requires investigation and explanation. What, however, is very clear is that there was lime about, and that it hurt somebody. This is certainly not what was to have been expected from such orderly people as the strikers. It is very obvious, too, that this lime was only the outward and visible sign of a great deal of intimidation which has proved effective. Mr. MATTHEWS has not, as far as we know, modified his opinion that there has been no organized intimidation, and Mr. MONRO would seem to agree with the HOME SECRETARY. It is highly desirable, if this is a tenable view, that we should shortly obtain a definition of organized intimidation by a competent authority. If the sympathizers with the unlamented LIPSKI had waited for Mr. MATTHEWS at his going out and his coming in, if they had crowded round him on the pavement between the carriage and the house, if they had yelled at him, asked him whether he was not ashamed of himself, called him a weak man who was determined to make good his bungling in the CASS case by hanging one whom he knew to be innocent in defiance of the evidence, if, finally, they had hustled him, would or would not this conduct on their part have been held to amount to assault and intimidation? We are strongly of opinion that it would, and very properly too. But for that very reason we, for our part, are convinced that there has been organized intimidation in the East End. Mr. MATTHEWS may read for himself of the mobbing of “blacklegs” in Fenchurch Street and at the dock gates, of sailors turned back by violence on their way to their ships, of crowds which block the road and howl abuse at men going to the work they have every right to take. This is certainly not picketting as it has been defined by the judges. It is intimidation conducted by bodies of persons banded to prevent others from doing what they have a lawful right to do, and that, though no lime is thrown, no blows struck, and no weapon used, is conspiracy to intimidate. For the rest, does or does not Mr. MATTHEWS think that to tell any one that he will be a marked man if he does this or the other lawful thing, is a threat? It is notorious that this language is freely used, and if it is not threatening and intimidation, a new definition of those terms is greatly needed.

There is abundance of evidence to show how this intimidation works, and by whom it is worked. It is at least highly probable that the rejection of the LORD MAYOR's compromise was partly, if not wholly, due to the clause stipulating for the security of the men taken on by the Companies. If this had been accepted, the strike leaders would have deprived themselves in future of a very useful instrument of coercion. It would never do to confess that they could not carry out their threats. To this same desire to show their power may be attributed the refusal to allow poor Mr. LAFONE, after all his virtuous but cheap exertions, to unload one of the vessels at his wharf. Another freak of the same kind is the compulsory stopping of work by men who were earning 40s. to 50s. a week in the Surrey Docks in unloading timber ships. This work, be it remembered, ends when the ice closes the Baltic, and, therefore, these men will have so much the less to live on during the coming winter. But it is clear that the interest of any class of workers has become a very secondary matter in a strike which was maintained by the Committee, on funds from Australia, and by the obstinacy of one or two Unions which are well off, and can afford to stand out. The declaration of the lightermen, a privileged body, that they will stand out—even if the labourers yield—till the terms first demanded are conceded, and that they will stop the traffic on the river, is a reductio ad absurdum of the strike; but it ought to show mildly sentimental people what the movement has really become.

THE WICKED TURK.

THE troubles, and rumours of troubles, which beset the Porte at most times, and not least at this season—when there is little to do and much must be made to talk about by those whose business is to talk—have recently quieted down a little. The rather inexplicable bickerings between Servia and Bulgaria seem to have shown no symptoms of reaching a more active stage than that in which the weapons are ink and breath—as good harmless instruments, when they do not set others going, as can be found. Any actual quarrel between these Powers or powerlets could only end to the disadvantage of the SULTAN, who in all such cases is made to pay the expenses of his neighbours' and subjects' amusements. In a small way the distress in the Black Mountain is bad news for Turkey. It has been ingeniously pointed out, as was noticed only the other day, by the representative of England in that hilly and heroic district that Montenegro is a very peaceful place, for the reason that every Montenegrin carries, and knows that every other Montenegrin carries, a six-chambered revolver and a knife or two. This securing of peace by preparation of war, however, does not extend to the state of things when men thus armed are hungry and see provisions in neighbouring districts. Here, too, the Turk would have to pay for all; and more here than anywhere else, thanks to the still more closely drawn relations between Russia and Montenegro. But there is little doubt that no trouble will arise here or anywhere except at the instigation of Russia. It is still completely unknown what exact effect vexations, political and other, have had on the CZAR'S mind, and on the working of that mind all depends. The new developments of Panslavist agitation which have resulted in the drawing up of paper schemes of Balkan States, rearranged at the expense of Turkey and Austria, and with armies undisguisedly at the disposal of the CZAR, will be paper schemes merely or dangerous instruments of European disturbance exactly as the personal temper of the CZAR determines—unless, indeed, his hand be forced by a new and alarming manifestation of the Nihilist spirit, of which something has already been heard.

The ill-temper of those curious monomaniacs who see all things in Turkish wickedness, and who imagine that those whose eyes are clearer see all things in Turkish virtue, continues to be a favourable sign. These persons are very much dissatisfied with the state of things both in Armenia and in Crete; nor do they lack good reason for their dissatisfaction. It is once more asserted, and there is no reason to doubt it, that the Armenians, as a nation, have by no means that desire to fling themselves into the arms of Russia, and so lose their nationality altogether, which their English sympathizers think they ought to feel. The Armenian, like the members of many other subject races, is a very curious mixture of qualities. He has the tendency to intrigue, the apparent pusillanimity capable under favourable circumstances of showing fight admirably, the proneness to grumble and whine, the habit of preferring above all things to load himself if he can with the thick clay. But he is really patriotic, extremely shrewd, not seldom very well informed, and not at all of an impulsive nature. These latter qualities would of themselves incline Armenians to submit themselves to an Empire which swallows all nationalities, and which if not, except in war-time, particularly oppressive to the lowest class of the population, is the least favourable ruling Power in Europe, or perhaps in the world, to the prosperous commercial person, which every Armenian desires to be. It is also the fact that the alleged sufferings of Armenians touch only a very small part of the nation, and that this part is much better able to defend itself, if it chooses, than is pretended. Some of the latest news tells how certain villagers, plucking up their courage, did repulse and defeat the fire-breathing brother of the great MOUSSA himself, and there is no doubt that this might be done much oftener. The Porte cannot afford, and its provincial subjects would by no means wish to afford, the cumbrous and costly machinery by which alone the security of life and property, as it is understood in Western countries, can be attained. What it can do is to "see fair" and to interfere with the strong hand in cases of decided oppression. And it may be freely granted that, though this is actually done to a considerable extent in the Turkish dominions, it is not done as universally and, above all, as ostentatiously as the wisdom of the serpent would direct. The Turk, though not a fool, is terribly ignorant of Western ways; Russia understands them very well. While Russia and Russophiles direct a whole reptile press and never cease to advertise or invent, or both, atrocities and what not, the Turk reposes in a supine and childish belief that magna est veritas. At the same time, it would appear, unless the Russophiles lie more than is even their wont, that the treatment of MOUSSA at Constantinople has not been wholly judicious. It would have been much wiser to show him a stern countenance first, even with a deliberate purpose of acquitting or pardoning him afterwards, than to furnish the newspapers of Europe with opportunities of paragraphs about his good reception at Constantinople. But there seems little doubt that the inquiry, though delayed and injudiciously prepared, will be a real inquiry, and that is the important thing.

It is, however, Crete which seems to be giving the greatest grief to the SULTAN'S enemies. In so far as can be judged (though it is never safe to hurry judgment in such cases), SHAKIR Pasha has gone to work with that turbulent island in a thoroughly workmanlike manner. Even the busy brains and shameless fronts of Russian and Greek agents have not been able to report or invent any "atrocities." The district in revolt is admitted to have shrunk to much smaller dimensions, important strongholds of the insurgents have been occupied, and the whole process has been accompanied by that form of conciliation which is the only reasonable form of that much-abused word and thing. The spurious conciliation which our Radical agitators cry up consists in approaching a mutineer cap-in-hand and saying, "Sir, I am dreadfully afraid of you. I am ready to concede everything I possibly can; be merciful, and do not put your heel upon my neck harder than in your merciful wisdom you think necessary." The other conciliator comes to his man with matches burning, edges him out of this position and that, at once as gently and forcibly as he can; and, if there is a sign of resistance, says, "You had better take what I offer you; for, if you don't, the sword will decide it, and a pretty sharp sword too." Even in minor details SHAKIR Pasha's despatches, which appear to be confirmed from Athens and from local sources, contain plenty of reasons for chagrin and no comfort for the atrocitymongers. The first concern of this brutal Turk appears to have been in every case to secure quiet living to both sides; to dissuade both, and not only the Christians, from carrying arms; to parley, where parley was possible, with the local leaders, one by one, and get each to quiet the place where he himself has influence; to pay no attention to idle rumours; and, while making an ample show of force, to abstain from anything like needless violence, and, indeed, from violence at all. The most atrocious act yet charged against him is the sentence on a Cretan agitator of ten years' deportation from the island he has tried to throw into anarchy—a very terrible and unheard-of punishment, no doubt. If SHAKIR Pasha goes on in this way, he will run Mr. BALFOUR hard for the prize of Gladstonian detestation, and, good luck helping him, he will pacify Crete. It is to be hoped that the SULTAN will determine and will be able to keep, as reported, a much larger force in the island for the future than has been kept there for some time past. There is no oppression of any sort there, but there is a most virulent party feeling between Christians and Mussulmans and between different Christian parties. And as all these parties, Mussulman and Christian alike, have a generous determination not to be "put upon" by the others, as there are generally ill-conditioned persons about, who, for their own purposes, are only too glad to make bate between them, it is absolutely necessary that there should be a strong force at the disposal of the central authority. Crete is not the end of the world, and the SULTAN may as well keep his troops there as anywhere else—unless he is obliged by unfriendly proceedings on his neighbours' part to mass them in Armenia or Macedonia.

THE NATIONAL PARTY AGAIN.

WE now know that in Lord HARTINGTON's opinion, as well as that of many other persons less qualified to judge, the time is not far off when there will be a complete and definite change in the array of parties. At present the political world is still divided up into half a dozen sections, all loose, all uncertain and disorderly except one, which, through their divisions and uncertainties, is far stronger than any of the rest. That is unquestionably the case, although the Conservatives have not taken advantage of their own strength and the comparative feebleness of other Parliamentary factions. But, though we may have less reason than some others to complain of a state of things which gives preponderance (or its potentialities) to the soberest party in the nation, it is not well that England should be perpetually vexed, as France is, by four or five contentious factions; and, if otherwise the prospect is a troubled one, there will be some satisfaction in escaping from the petty confusions of the day, and in getting back to the convenient old two-great-party system of political warfare. Everything seems to show that this will happen before long. Although in one part of his recent address Lord HARTINGTON spoke of the Liberals as if they were still linked in some shadowy way with the Opposition; and, though he and his Liberal colleagues remain indisposed to merge themselves in a Government called Conservative, he had a pregnant word to this effect:—"All that is taking place from day to day, the common labours in which we are engaged, the common interests which we are learning to uphold and defend, are laying the foundation at some not very distant time of the formation of a still greater National party"; which party, Lord HARTINGTON went on to say, would be bound together by devotion to Imperial interests, and by "common effort to raise and elevate the condition of our countrymen all over the United Kingdom."

Lord HARTINGTON is probably right in thinking it judicious to keep himself and his friends out of a closer connexion with the Cabinet for yet a while. For that would mean a formal reconstruction of the Ministry by certain extrusions and certain admissions; and we must remember—as no doubt Lord HARTINGTON himself does—that this might displease some Conservative voters as much as some Liberals. It is not so easy to agree with him (a matter of small importance, however) if he believes that the Liberalism of which he is spokesman does not already form a distinct party opposed to the whole spirit of modern Radicalism. Further it might be said that his description of the "still greater National party," of which he foresees the birth, is wanting in distinctiveness; for there is not a single political faction in this or any other land which does not mark itself off in precisely the same terms. Imperialist, Royalist, Republican, Boulangist in France; Conservative, Liberal, Gladstonian, Laboucharian in England—we are all devoted to Imperial interests (rightly considered), and all enlisted in a "common effort to raise and elevate our fellow-countrymen" throughout the length and breadth of the land. But we know what is meant. The party called Radical has taken to itself a variety of doctrine which was totally unknown in English politics till recently. On the ground of this doctrine, with its own peculiar "efforts to raise and elevate our fellow-countrymen," a party is rapidly forming which promises to become very solid and very formidable, since it is likely to include all the various kinds of faddists and to seduce the whole mass of enfranchised ignorance and hunger. To the leaders of this portentous body of experimental revolutionists, a Whig is as hateful as any Tory. The repugnance is mutual; and when we perceive that the next general election is not far off, we also perceive that the time is at hand when the common sense of Whig and Tory, Liberal and old-school Radical, will bring all under one flag against the organized forces of anarchy and excess. Evidently that is what Lord HARTINGTON means, and, in company with many others, we have the satisfaction of knowing that we agreed with him before he spoke.

From some other passages in his address, however, it would appear that he puts the general election first, the formation of the party which is to be called National afterwards. Doubtful of what may happen when the next electoral struggle comes on, he even seems to think that a Radical victory at the polls may possibly precede the reconstruction of parties. If that is to be the order of events, so much the worse for the friends of order, no matter what their denomination. But must it be so? Can nothing be done to form up the national party at once, in preparation for the elections which will certainly put the other side together, and possibly—as Lord HARTINGTON says—give them the victory? Their chance will certainly be reduced if they are promptly met by the combination which their triumph would precipitate, and which will surely have to face them sooner or later. It is true, no doubt, that in the House of Lords we have a constitutional authority which could and would throw out their Home Rule Bills and their other grand measures of subversion and revolution. This safeguard against hasty changes of the first magnitude the Liberal leader insisted upon at great length; arguing for the propriety of putting it to use in a remarkably energetic way. But much is gained whenever resort to the veto of the Peers is avoided; and the prospect of forming a great national party amidst the ravings and riotings of a "conflict with the House of Lords" is not half so pleasant as the hope of a similar operation to avert misfortunes of which that conflict would be only a part. For ourselves, we can but think that it would not be the wisest course to put off the combination which Lord HARTINGTON looks to till after the Radicals have had their fling at the next general election. That is to say, it would not be wise to do so if anything can be done to oppose them on that occasion with all the forces that good sense and moderation can bring together. And something can be done, even though the Liberal-Unionists and the Liberals generally still stand aside as an independent party—allied with the Conservatives, whose counsels they share and whose policies they modify, but declining as yet to come into the same organization. What this patriotic and influential body of men can do is to make no bones of declaring themselves in arms against the new party of Revolutionary Radicalism—not on Home Rule grounds alone. Something else they can do. They can make it clear, for the satisfaction of their allies, and beyond all doubt for the good of the State, that, though they still mean to do their utmost to raise and elevate the condition of their fellow-countrymen all over the United Kingdom, they have no idea of attempting that business with pieces of policy broken from the revolutionary and Socialistic methods of Laboucharian Radicalism, and necessarily swarming with the life thereof. Liberal principles forbid that kind of medicining as sternly as any body of political principles in existence; while, so far as the experiment has been tried (and it has been tried more than a little), nothing but failure, and the punishment of failure, has been the consequence in the long run. With the older Radicalism much could be done in the way of concession and conciliation. With the new Radicalism all such dealing would be as absurd as concession to smallpox (which, indeed, is the demand of one of its tribes); and, if it is to be successfully opposed, it must be opposed from the beginning on that understanding.

STILL MORE CHATTER.

NO, they will never have done. There is always somebody who wants to "chatter about HARRIET" and SHELLEY. Mr. MATTHEW ARNOLD, in his diverting review of Professor DOWDEN's magazine of chatter about HARRIET, might have been supposed to settle the affair once for all. But Mr. H. S. SALT, whose contempt for the middle classes may prove him to be a haughty Eupatrid, returns to HARRIET and to SHELLEY in the International Review. With much that Mr. SALT has to say about Mr. ARNOLD's criticisms of SHELLEY's poetry it were superfluous to express agreement. Everybody agrees. When Mr. ARNOLD spoke as if SHELLEY's prose might survive his poetry we may presume that this was "merely his fun," though the humour be rather subterranean. Mr. SALT tries to show that Mr. ARNOLD's ideas were not so very different from SHELLEY's, though his dislike of SHELLEY's ideas may have helped to prevent him from appreciating his poetry. It was, perhaps, more the manner than the matter that Mr. ARNOLD disliked. Say what you will, the Revolt of Islam is full of the most boyish absurdities, of incidents before which MAYNE

REID sinks into common sense and constructive art. All the windy "Voices," all the reforms which were to take the shape of weaving buds and beams, all the futile optimisms of SHELLEY, may well have discontented Mr. ARNOLD. For this, or for some other reason, it is true that he did not appreciate this "meteoric poet"—the more is the pity. But this, perhaps, vexes Mr. SALT much less than Mr. ARNOLD's very plain, blunt, and accurate criticism of SHELLEY as a young man, and of the detestable set in which he lived.

SHELLEY, to tell the truth, was always a boy, and a boy with a great deal of the schoolgirl in him. Of the boy he had that grave unconscious absurdity which Mr. GEORGE MEREDITH very happily describes in the characters of RIPTON THOMPSON and RICHARD FEVEREL. He believed in certain ideas which, to our mind, the whole course of human history demonstrates to be false. That, however, is not the question. The important thing is that, when it suited him, SHELLEY "lived up to" these ideas with an owl-like solemnity truly boyish. Of the schoolgirl he had the engouement and the caprice; he fell in love with men and women right and left, called them angels and demi-gods, and then lost conceit of them, and named them Brown Demons, and whistled them down the wind of his contempt. We do not see how any grown man can read SHELLEY's biography and not admit these defects; errors not astonishing in a miss of sixteen, but amazing in a man, however young, in a husband, a father, and a poet.

Mr. ARNOLD, of course, saw all this, and he thought it necessary, though perhaps it was superfluous, to tell the truth about these aspects of SHELLEY's character. Mr. SALT, therefore, accuses him of embracing BUMBLE, the representative of that poor middle class which Mr. SALT looks down on from some far pinnacle of birth and culture. But it really is not a question of the middle classes. No duke, no "docker," nobody, no man civilized or savage, would have or could have behaved with SHELLEY's serene absurdity of callousness and cruelty. Let it be granted, for the sake of argument, that SHELLEY's ideas about marriage were correct. Of course he only acted on them when it suited him. He got himself as securely wedded by orthodox forms as he possibly could. He accepted the ordinary legal situation when it suited him and MARY and GODWIN. He played the regular game, which, as a disbeliever in "the long rubber of connubial life," of course he should not have done. Then when it suited him he broke the rules of the game, in accordance with his well-known principles. He should, of course, have done one thing or the other. If marriage was a vain thing foolishly devised by kings and priests, then he should not have married, first HARRIET, and then MARY. But, having married, he was just as much bound to HARRIET as Mr. BUMBLE to Mrs. BUMBLE. But, it may be said, SHELLEY was only doing his best for the women and their interests. But it was in regard to them that this lover of humanity proved so cruel. The cruelty of asking HARRIET to be the guest of himself and MARY, to come like the old-fashioned bride's-maid on the honeymoon, is obscured by the rich absurdity of the proposition. Mr. SALT calls this "an outrage on conventional propriety." Why it is an outrage on the elemental feelings of human beings, which probably no Asiatic despot, no negro voluptuary ever contemplated as feasible. The real difficulty about all these ideal schemes of free love is, of course, the cruelty of the arrangement. One of the partners must be sacrificed to the passions of the other. Both do not simultaneously wish to be off with the old love and on with the new. Even if children did not exist, with their interests, no man of heart, no woman of heart, would sacrifice the old partner to the new conceit. These remarks are elementary; they are part of universal experience; these facts have expressed themselves in the civilized institution of monogamy, which can only be overthrown in a general reversion to savagery, polygamy, polyandry, promiscuity. But SHELLEY, of all men, not only disregarded the laws of the game and was unfaithful. That is a common performance; thousands of persons do as much. But he alone asked the woman he had deserted—the woman who still loved him—to come and see how happy he was with MARY. And he alone, like a new kind of "ALPHONSE," took money from one woman that he might live with another. Perhaps Mr. SALT is equally lonely in his opinion that this is only "a shock to conventional propriety." It is an outrage on those emotions of kindness and affection about which SHELLEY said so much, and in accordance with which, in other affairs, he often acted with much nobility of conduct. Mr. SALT in vain argues that SHELLEY was only acting on his principles, which told him "his marital relations towards HARRIET were absolutely at an end." So they were, but that was no reason why she should be the guest of his mistress, nor why he should take money from her, of all people in the world. Mr. SALT says that Mr. ARNOLD is horrified by the "vulgarity" of GODWIN and his set. Vulgarities! To take money by stealth from the man who has gone off, to your extreme indignation, with your daughter! Why, GODWIN was precisely in the position of M. CARDINAL, and adopted the very attitude of that fiery Republican. In fact, GODWIN and M. CARDINAL, in this matter, are one and the same; yet GODWIN was an educated philosopher who talked about Virtue by the hour. And Mr. SALT accuses Mr. ARNOLD of a "debilitating sense of respectability"! GODWIN sold his daughter's shame, and asked that SHELLEY's cheques might be made payable to some other name. This kind of austerity does not shock respectability alone. It exceeds the inventions of HALÉVY or MOLIÈRE, and might have made TARTUFE blush. It almost seems as if Mr. SALT had forgotten the facts of the case, and the "respectabilities" which pervaded that shabby Thyestean house of the philosopher GODWIN.

As to SHELLEY's "inflammability," only this need be said. The people were right who thought that his behaviour to the unhappy EMILIA VIVIANI was that of a sweetheart to a serving-girl, and a very shabby sweetheart at that.

THE GREATNESS OF MR. GLADSTONE AND THE SMALLNESS OF ENGLAND.

MR. GLADSTONE (on the authority of Lord LYTON, on the authority of M. DE BLOWITZ) is the most illustrious of Lord LYTON's countrymen. We should like to be quite certain of the original form and language (especially the latter) of this statement; but we do not entertain much fear that we should find ourselves at variance with the sentiments which HER MAJESTY's present Ambassador at Paris intended to express after these points were ascertained. Let it be admitted that Mr. GLADSTONE is an illustrious (certainly, if we may borrow the form from Trotting Nelly, he is an "illustrated") Englishman. He has been Prime Minister three times; he has been more remuant (the French language is a great language) than any man of his time; he has the scalps of a hundred institutions hanging in his wigwam; he has betrayed more parties than any three other men have had time, energy, or will to belong to. Of anything that he has, in the emphatic Carlylian sense, "done" we at least are ignorant, though he has undone much. But still it may be admitted that there is only one Mr. GLADSTONE; and unicity is always something, and in its way an illustrious thing. For the light shines on the good and on the evil, and especially on the more prominent objects in both classes.

It was well and fitting (we say this without any irony) that Mr. GLADSTONE (who by his own account has gone there, not as a holiday-maker, but out of goodwill and respect to France) should be banquetted in Paris. M. TIRARD is not quite of the same calibre as M. LÉON SAY; M. YVES GUYOT not entirely of the same class with M. JULES SIMON. But far be it from us to say unkind things of any person who met other persons to do honour to one of the most "illustrious" statesmen of a neighbouring country. The mind which is nothing if not critical may, indeed, take exception to the statement that Mr. GLADSTONE has always "taken the side of the victims." We should say ourselves that he has always taken the side of the victims who looked as if they were going to win; but this is a mere nuance, which a foreigner might easily miss. When, too, M. SAY says that Mr. GLADSTONE's eloquence is "drawn from that which is purest in antiquity," we cannot help remembering the much greater ease with which the obscurest passages of DEMOSTHENES, let alone CICERO, can be construed as compared with the easiest passages of Mr. GLADSTONE. To some minds, M. SAY's touching description of "the oppressed, the feeble, and the forsaken" calls up no image so vivid and exactly correspondent as that of an Irish landlord, and Mr. GLADSTONE has been of late not exactly distinguished as a defender of him. But let us not insist coarsely on these points. Mr. GLADSTONE's own speech in reply to this compliment appears to have been, as might be expected, graceful and ingenious. The "Christianity" of France under the Republic has, perhaps, not impressed other nations to the same extent to which it has impressed Mr. GLADSTONE. The excellent conduct of the French Republican Government at, let us say, the moment of Mr. GLADSTONE's conquest of Egypt is not a subject on which the ghost of M. GABRIEL CHARME and the living presence of his brother M. FRANCIS can be expected to be quite so enthusiastic as Mr. GLADSTONE is. But we repeat that it was a very pretty speech, and there was an audacity almost humorous about its last paragraph in the reference to the proud motto of an Indian College, Ne facias tua culpa minorem. It is good advice and bold to France where many Frenchmen have been making their country minorem for many years. It is bold, if not good, from the lips of the statesman who for many years has laboured to do the same in his own country, who lost us the Transvaal, who brought on us the indelible shame of the Khartoum abandonment, and who is still trying to lop off, or paralyse, an integral part of the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. These audacities are perhaps less pleasant from a man who has not, as SAINT-BEUVE says, "le sentiment personnel du ridicule" than from one who has; but they are still pleasant.

It was when Mr. GLADSTONE, according to M. DE BLOWITZ, unexpectedly took to toasting, not France, but America, that the real interest of the occasion came in. Great men are apt to be seized by these innocent fits of accapapation. It will be remembered that Captain COSTIGAN at a dinner held in his honour behaved in no very different manner on that ever-memorable occasion. The Captain not only responded for his own health, but for his daughter's, for the Army, and (preventing Mr. BINGLEY the manager) for the Drama and the Chatteris Theatre. So, to compare small things with great, did Mr. GLADSTONE, at a dinner given to himself, propose the health of Mr. JEFFERSON BRICK—we beg pardon, of Mr. SUMMERVILLE TUCK—coupled with prosperity to the United States. And in proposing this toast Mr. GLADSTONE gave vent to some of his best arithmetic and some of his most heartfelt sentiments. He pointed out that, in another hundred years, probably six hundred millions of "humans" would call Uncle Sam father—an estimate surpassing the foresight even of Mr. WALT WHITMAN, who has been contented with anticipating the time when "a hundred millions of superb persons" will walk "These States." With this Mr. GLADSTONE, in a parenthetic smile of pity, contrasted the forty millions of "our small islands." We pass the little problem whether the comparison of our smallness now with a prospective greatness a hundred years after date is quite fair; but it is really interesting to find Mr. GLADSTONE still harping on the word "small" in reference to England. It is a kind of catchword with him; he can seldom enter on any subject of the kind without bringing it in. And this introduces us to our chief subject—the interesting contrast between the greatness of Mr. GLADSTONE and the smallness of England. There have been—this is a proposition which the most fervent Gladstonians will hardly contest—great men in England before Mr. GLADSTONE, though, of course, none so great. Yet, somehow or other, an historical memory of tolerable range and exactness does not supply us with the name of any of them who took this curious pleasure in belittling his country. Of course we take no count of an old dotard like JOHN of GAUNT, reported by a poor player, one WILLIAM SHAKSPEARE, to have spoken with his dying breath some lines (it is true they are among the noblest ever written; but no matter for that) about "This royal throne of kings, this sceptered isle." That is only poetry; and, besides, Mr. GLADSTONE may justly urge that even the Duke of LANCASTER called it a "little world." But, to come to more prosaic things and to mere statesmen, we run over the names of CROMWELL, of the two PITTS, of PALMERSTON, of Lord BEACONSFIELD even, to come to very close quarters. How would this talk about smallness seem to suit any of their mouths? Why, very ill certainly. And the reason, of course, is that Mr. GLADSTONE is so much greater than any of them. To a small man, you see, small things seem great; to a great one even tolerably great things seem small. This is undeniable; and much comfort may be imbibed from it by the mind of the doubter about Mr. GLADSTONE's greatness (if haply there be anywhere such an impious man), or the doubter about England's greatness, of which class, unluckily, there seem to be a good many too many about. All things are relative; and England only seems small to Mr. GLADSTONE in the same sense as a guinea seemed small to those City magnates who are said, to the great solace and comfort of the medical profession, to have disdained paying except in cheques, and drawing cheques for anything less than five pounds. It is true that M. DE BLOWITZ has an explanation of a much more commonplace kind. He thinks that Mr. GLADSTONE "wished to make himself agreeable to a country which is the refuge of the Irish beyond the Atlantic." M. DE BLOWITZ has not studied his American papers, or he would know that, if there is any country which at this present moment wishes that the celebrated wish about Ireland and the Atlantic were realized, and that all the Irish-Americans had taken a fancy to visit the home of their ancestors immediately before the realization, that country is the United States of America. But M. DE BLOWITZ has too much on his mind to be acquainted with the details of American politics, which indeed might puzzle a man more malin than himself. No! the true explanation of Mr. GLADSTONE's handsome though rather post-dated present of six hundred millions of gasping ones to America a hundred years hence, and of his regretful acknowledgment of the smallness of England now, lies in his own greatness. Six hundred thousand millions probably represent the number of persons to whom Mr. GLADSTONE feels that he could be a worthy Prime Minister. What a pity that he should waste himself upon a paltry forty!

GREASED-POLE-CLIMBING.

MOST people who read their newspapers know that there was a boat-race in the early part of this week between two professional scullers, of whom one came from Australia and the other from Canada; and, further, that one was called SEARLE and the other O'CONNOR, and that one of them won decisively, if not easily. For the present purpose it will be as well to bear in mind that the Australian won, and the Canadian lost. The winner's name was SEARLE, though that is neither here nor there.

Upon these facts a person, signing himself "Australian," has addressed a remonstrance to us, his fellow-subjects of the United Kingdom, through the columns of a morning newspaper. He asks to be allowed to explain "how disappointed" he was "at the apathy shown" here on the occasion in question. "In English Society the event went simply without notice." It would, indeed, be difficult to define even that most elastic phrase, "English Society," in such a manner as to rob "Australian's" statement of its melancholy accuracy. "Whereas," proceeds our antipodean fellow-subject, "such an event would occupy Melbourne or Sydney for a month, to the exclusion of almost every other topic." Happy is the colony that has—so much in common with the alleged friends of Mr. PETER MAGNUS. "Australian" can "remember last November, when SEARLE won the Championship, George Street, Sydney, was covered with his portraits," and at a race-meeting at Melbourne he "excited far more attention" than the Governor of Victoria. Very likely he did. It is probable that a month ago Mrs. MAYBRICK excited far more attention than, let us say, Mr. GLADSTONE. And then, again, a contrast is drawn with a melancholy as truthful as it is grim. "Whereas in London he has excited less attention than we [Australians?] would give to a contest for climbing a greased pole."

If it is true, as sporting correspondents have not scrupled to allege, that Australian sportsmen have transferred from Canadian pockets to their own the modest sum of 80,000*l.*, solely by their justifiable confidence in Mr. SEARLE's powers with the sculls, there is no need to endure much sympathetic anguish in consequence of the Strand not being covered with his portraits or because the public mind condescended to notice the Tithes Bill, the MAYBRICK case, the dock strike, and the St. Leger. No one can dispute the substantial truth of the statement that the inhabitants of the United Kingdom do care uncommonly little whether an Australian or a Canadian is champion sculler of the world. They would rather prefer that sublime personage to be one of themselves; and, if he cannot be that, they are justly pleased that he should be a subject of the QUEEN's rather than an American citizen. The probability of his being somebody without any British blood at all has not yet emerged into the range of practical athletics. The explanation of this "apathy" is, upon the face of things, not far to seek, and divers small suggestions might be made, such as that "English Society," in several senses of the words, is most of it gone away, and largely beyond the reach even of the daily newspapers, and that professional athletes who choose to perform in the first week of September really cannot expect the rank and fashion of the metropolis to swarm round the scene of their contests. But "Australian" explains the phenomenon he so much resents in a far more wholesale fashion. He says there is "a great and growing lack of interest in sporting matters in England which has resulted in the present humiliating position of that country in matters of sport." We cannot, it seems, either row, box, or run as well as the second-rate men of New South Wales. "W. G. GRACE is the only champion you have in any department." And the cause of all this humiliation is, that though great athletes may exist among us as of old, "there is next to no inducement for them to come out before the public." The argument seems to be that, if we would only cover our streets with pictures of professional boxers, oarsmen, and what not, and mob them at race-meetings, we should still be able to take our fair share of championships of the world. It is certainly refreshing to be told that men like ROBERTS, the late FRED. ARCHER, LOHMANN, and a whole host of professional athletes of other varieties, are languishing in the cold shade of public indifference. We shall not say a word to deny the impeachment. But there is one thing in "Australian's" letter which is not altogether clear to the reflective mind. Why does he think so poorly of climbing greased poles? To climb a greased pole higher and quicker than any one else is an elevating pastime. It requires skill, strength, judgment, and pertinacity. It exercises nearly all the most important muscles of the body. He who can climb a greased pole can à fortiori climb one which is not greased; and to be able to climb a pole may at any moment be an invaluable accomplishment, tending to the preservation of property, life, or even honour. If anybody likes to set up a championship contest for climbing a greased pole, we shall watch the proceedings with the same benevolent interest which we accord to other branches of professional athletics, and shall hope that the champion may occasionally be English. But for some inexplicable reason "Australian" seems to think that particular sport degrading. It is certainly manly.

LORD RANDOLPH'S RECANTATION.

IT is superfluous, and fortunately so, since it might perhaps be deemed a little ungracious, to scrutinize too closely the good faith of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL's recent palinode. That he should have composed and chanted it at all is, for all the practical ends of politics, sufficient. The grace is in the performance of the act, and not in the way in which it is performed. It is enough that it testifies to Lord RANDOLPH's desire not to separate himself avowedly from his party; not to put himself forward, or even to be supposed by the public to be desirous of figuring, as the organizer of a Conservative Cave; and that it reveals him as aspiring to the less picturesque but more innocent position of an advanced, but still loyal, member of a party who, however desirous he may be to indoctrinate it with his peculiar views, will always be willing, in the last resort, to subordinate those views to its deliberate collective judgment. Lord RANDOLPH's anxiety to regain this position is visible in every line of his Newtown speech, and its intensity is measured by the laboriousness of his endeavour to show that his utterances at Birmingham were no more than logical and legitimate application of principles advocated, in common with himself, by the Conservative party at large. To say that this attempt was entirely successful would, of course, be going a good deal too far. Entirely successful it was not, and could not be; and, indeed, the task of justifying himself all round was recognized as so hopeless by the apologist himself that he quietly suppressed some three or four counts in the indictment which has been framed against them, and passed them over without any effort at an answer. Thus he said nothing about Egypt, which six weeks ago he was calling upon HER MAJESTY'S Government to evacuate out of hand. He made no attempt to explain away his loose and vague talk in the Midlands about the law of primogeniture. The eight hours question, on which at Birmingham he declared himself prepared to go greater lengths in the direction of paternal legislation than Mr. JOHN MORLEY, for instance, would be prepared to follow him, never put in an appearance at all in the Newtown speech. And to observe that Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL was compelled to suppress these little matters altogether from sheer inability to reconcile his former deliverances about them with his resumed attitude of orthodox Conservatism is, in effect, equivalent to remarking that at the points at which apology was most difficult the apologist has tacitly confessed his failure.

At the same time, however, we are not disposed to agree with those among Lord RANDOLPH's critics who have treated his plea for the Conservative orthodoxy of his opinions in general as a mere tissue of verbal ingenuities. There is, in our judgment, a great deal more in it than that, and we feel constrained to admit, in justice to the pleader, that a considerable portion of his Birmingham confession of faith was, as he argues, no more than the legitimate expression of a good deal that passes for orthodox Conservatism in these days, and is held, no doubt, in a more or less confused fashion, but still held, by a good many of the Birmingham confessor's scandalized critics. When, for instance, Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL reviewed his former utterances on the question of dealing with "the evil arising from the disgraceful condition of the dwellings which are inhabited by the larger portion of our labouring population," and when he proceeded to compare his proposals for attacking this evil with those which have been approved by politicians high in repute with the Conservative party, we are bound to admit that he made out a very good case. Of course his language was marked by his characteristic exaggeration, and his views put forward in that peculiarly over-emphatic and staccato style to which he has accustomed his public. It is no doubt recklessly absurd to talk of the "larger portion" of "our labouring population" as inhabiting dwellings in a disgraceful condition; and no doubt Lord RANDOLPH stated his proposed remedies as if he meant them—it being one of the best-known and most effective points of his oratory that it always gives him the appearance of very much meaning what he says, whereas the average Conservative who is fond of tickling the ears of popular audiences on these subjects produces quite an opposite impression. But after all due deduction on this head it is not easy to dispute Lord RANDOLPH's contention that whatever there is of "Communistic" or "Socialistic," or of the "many other bad adjectives ending in istic," about his views, is just as discernible on examination in the views of statesmen who are accepted as authorized spokesmen of the Conservative party. So again, too, with the question of temperance legislation. On this Lord RANDOLPH has expressed himself, as on other subjects, in an ultra-Randolphian manner. No man calling himself a moderate Conservative, or indeed a moderate anything, would talk about the "detestable and devilish liquor traffic"; partly because it is abusive nonsense to talk in that fashion of a trade which supplies the legitimate and wholesome wants of millions, and partly because a moderate Conservative would know that, if he did talk in that fashion, he would be justly endangering his reputation either for Conservatism, for moderation, or for both. But it is one thing to censure excess in language, and another to show that the man who errs in this respect can be shown to have exceeded the limits of principle which his censors themselves recognize; and we are very strongly of opinion that many a censor of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL who has had little difficulty in performing the first of these feats would find himself sorely put to it to accomplish the second. It is quite possible for a politician, without dealing in such adjectives as "detestable" and "devilish" on his own account, to commit himself to such a policy on the drink question as is, to all intents and purposes, based on the assumption that the licensed victualler, as such, is an offender against the community, and entitled, therefore, not to receive as of right, but merely, if at all, of grace, the treatment accorded by the Legislature to other persons engaged in other lawful trades. So, again, with the question of a constructive policy of Ireland. It is true enough, as Lord RANDOLPH says, that "five-sixths of the Unionist party are deeply pledged to the establishment of Local Government in Ireland." Equally true is it, as he says, that the same proportion of the party are as deeply pledged to the abolition of the present system of the dual ownership of land in Ireland, or, in other words, are pledged to assist the tenant, by Imperial aid, to purchase out the remaining rights of landlords. And when Lord RANDOLPH proceeds to contend, as he did at Birmingham, and as he was careful not to disdain doing at Newtown—that the establishment of Local Government must precede, and not follow, legislation for land purchase—he is merely giving definite shape to a vague political programme which is almost as often to be found in the mouths of Conservatives as in those of Liberal-Unionists, but which only needs to be set forth with the clearness and precision which Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL has given to it in order to accuse itself as founded upon a fatally foolish reversal of the only safe and wise order of legislative procedure.

It is for reasons suggested by declarations of this kind that we are disposed to regard Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL's occasional escapades with less impatience, perhaps, than the majority of his critics. To us they appear, we must say, to serve the by no means valueless purpose of holding up the mirror—we do not mean the St. James's Gazette—to a certain kind of latter-day Conservatism, and compelling those who profess it to observe what spirit they are of. Of course they do not relish the process—no one in like circumstances ever does—but the process is, nevertheless, a salutary and useful one, to others beside themselves. It cannot but be instructive, not only to the Conservative party, but to the public at large, to be thus pointedly reminded that so-called Tory Democracy finds exponents among a not inconsiderable class of so-called Conservatives who shrink from labelling themselves as Tory Democrats, and that the dashing politician who has definitely adopted that title has no difficulty in showing, when it suits him to do so, that his political doctrines differ only in vigour of expression from those held under another name by these his unavowed disciples. It must do good all round to have this fact brought out so clearly as it has been in Lord RANDOLPH's recent speeches. That latest form of Conservatism which relies for its popularity on repeating the jargon of the Radical on a variety of social and political questions can only be effectively exposed as a sham through the instrumentality of some titular member of the Conservative party, who finds his account like Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL in taking this jargon seriously, and in translating its vague generalities into the language of definite political action. The confusion and embarrassment with which a plainspoken exposition of this sort is then received by the Conservatives who affect the talk of Radicalism without realizing the full import of the principles which underlie it afford significant proof of the futility of such bids for popular favour, and will, we may hope, do much to discourage their repetition.

“WHAT IS A POUND?”

LANDLORDS of English country inns may once more lift up their heads, if not their prices, now that Mr. A. J. BUTLER has confessed to a little exaggeration in his comparative estimate of foreign and English hotel charges. When he wrote that you could not get your bare board and lodging, unless you were an ascetic, for less than one pound a day, it seems he was only trying to “draw” the other side. It was a little judicious move, Mr. BUTLER admits, in order to set the game going, and it succeeded tolerably well. “Tour out, Tour out,” a well-known phrase in The Fortunes of Nigel, seems to have been present, in a punning sense, to Mr. BUTLER's ingenuous mind. From the first we suspected something of the kind. It is a far cry, however, from one pound a day, which was originally fixed by Mr. BUTLER as the minimum sum total exacted by innkeepers in the South-Eastern quarter, to the half a guinea which he is now quite content to accept as nearer the mark. To bring this more modest sum a trifle nearer his first estimate he includes a little wine bill—a mere bagatelle of three shillings for a bottle of claret—apparently forgetful of the fact that he made no mention of wine when extolling the excellence of the Meran hostelry. If this is another attempt at drawing his opponents, it cannot be commended as judicious. Why should Mr. BUTLER assume that the traveller would drink beer or water in the Engadine, and follow more luxurious ways at Dorking? The assumption is altogether gratuitous, and does little to advance Mr. BUTLER's argument. It leaves us a long way on the wrong side of the one pound bare board minimum. Most English travellers, we are confident, drink far more wine on the Continent than when engaged on tours in their own country. Naturally they drink the cheap wines of the country in Germany, France, and Italy, just as they consume the equivalents of those ordinary drinks—ales and cider—at home. After all is said, the cheapness of these things is not to be arrived at by a mere comparison of tariffs. A bottle of claret in an English inn, at three shillings, may be, and often is, a palatable beverage compared with some of the country wines of Switzerland and Italy, which are nevertheless constantly swallowed by the hardy sons of Albion when travelling abroad. On the important subject of quality Mr. BUTLER is singularly vague. He cites a little bill incurred at a village in the Lower Engadine, which is, indeed, miraculously cheap, if figures prove anything. Among other interesting items we have sixty centimes for wine. What this wine was we are not informed, nor whether its character was not so aggressive as to require an inordinate quantity of water to temper it to an educated palate. All that Mr. BUTLER vouchsafes is a general verdict that everything, food and drink alike, was excellent of its kind. In the absence of more explicit information we are perfectly willing to believe the statement that we might fare quite as well in many a Tyrolean inn for three shillings and sixpence a day as Mr. BUTLER fared in the Lower Engadine inns for six shillings.

Until travellers arrive at some common ground of accord as to what constitutes cheapness there can be no prospect of any settlement of the question discussed by Mr. BUTLER. Most tourists do not go abroad for the sake of the few shillings a day they may possibly save, or because they are convinced it is cheaper to see Switzerland or Germany than to travel at home. They desire a more piquant form of novelty or change than they can obtain in the South-Eastern counties or the placid Midlands. They are generally possessed, in a minor degree, with the ancient passion for things new or strange. They would study men's minds and manners with ULYSSES, and care nothing that they are compelled to do so at crowded tables-d'hôte or on steamers and railroads. It is not because English inns are less home-like than foreign hotels that so few native tourists take up quarters in the Home counties. Nor would the annual rush of tourists to the Continent be perceptibly reduced by the establishment of model Tyrolean hotels in this country, with tariffs and accommodation such as Mr. BUTLER would approve. The allurements of travel are not comprised in these base matters. People are impelled to seek the unfamiliar by a resistless migratory instinct. They rightly, if possessed of the genuine locomotive disposition, “reject the lore of nicely calculated less or more,” in which Mr. BUTLER and the correspondents he has “drawn” are so remarkably proficient. A graceless tourist is he who is in the least perturbed because Mr. BUTLER was lodged at a Tyrolean inn for one franc and a half, and “F. J. W.'s” double-bedded room cost nine shillings at Heidelberg, and four at another place. Better is it to emulate the commercial gentleman in Punch who immortalized an inn by the recollection of a generous leg of mutton than to be stretched on the rack of doubt by an exasperating comparison of his hotel bills with the more economical tariffs of Mr. BUTLER's experience.

THE LAST MURDER.

THE inexpressibly disgusting subject of the Whitechapel murders is not to be exhausted yet, obviously. Although all the publicity and comment which is occasionally praised as an assistance to the police has been so utterly useless in these cases that it might as well be omitted, and though there is even some possibility that the noise they are certain to make is an incentive to the crimes, we have had all the familiar newspaper matter over again about the discovery of Tuesday morning. In itself the discovery is not a novel one. It has been a not unusual incident in criminal history since the time of KATHARINE HAYES, and even before, to find the remains of a human body dismembered and hidden away. Indeed, it is only a few days since some such discovery was made in Edinburgh—without, it may be added, convulsing that city. Even in London comparatively little would have been heard of the remains if it were not for the neighbourhood in which they were discovered. But, being found in Whitechapel, they were at once supposed to indicate that another of the usual murders had been committed. There was consequently a great deal of the customary talk about them.

Whether the unknown brute for whom a popular name has been invented has been at work again is a question which may serve as well as many another for a block to chop logic upon. It is a plausible theory that he is at work, and is altering his method to puzzle the police. It is a probable opinion that somebody has been endeavouring to imitate him with just the same intention. There is some appearance of force in the arguments for the contention that neither one thing is the case nor the other. There being nothing worth calling evidence to go by, the occasion is excellent for guessing and sending letters to the papers. Perhaps as profitable a comment as another to make is that, after all, the whole business—Whitechapel murder or imitation of Whitechapel murder—is not so amazing as much comment would seem to make it. The original murderer is, to begin with, probably not much more of a fiend than many others who, for want of a little resolution and a little industry, never get further than the police court. The husband who pulls his hobnailed boots on before kicking his pregnant wife—the mother who burns her daughter with a red-hot poker, so as to inflict life-long injury on her, are both of them as bestial as human beings can be. Such animals would have no more scruple about taking life, or sense of reverence for a dead body, than the Whitechapel murderer himself. Where bestiality of this kind is combined with a diseased imagination, and encouraged by impunity, it would probably add crime to crime for that mere pleasure in inflicting pain and exercising power which prompts a great deal of minor cruelty. That such crimes should be committed with impunity is no more wonderful than that BURKE went on for so long undiscovered—indeed, it is less surprising. In the case of BURKE and HARE there was a risk of treachery, which apparently does not exist here, for all the signs show that the Whitechapel murderer works alone. As long as he does so, and as long as there are women who will prostitute themselves to him in any hole, he may go on murdering. What he can do, others can do. It is idle to be horrified at the prospect, and worse than idle to talk about disgraces to our civilization, and to blame the police. The amazing want of even a rudimentary sense of the ridiculous which distinguishes the Daily News has led it to remark that this sort of thing would not happen if the police had not been called off from their proper duties to interfere with the freedom of Mr. BURNS's hired strikers. We do not see how the police can protect those who slink out of sight to avoid its control. If it is really wished to give effectual protection to the miserable women of the class which has supplied the victims of these crimes, there is an obvious way of doing it; but that way is one which in these days would be denounced by the whole army of shriekers.

THE COMING ELECTIONS.

ELECTIONS, like other things, obey the law of "it never rains but it pours," and just at this moment a batch of considerable interest is coming on. The latest addition to this batch, the vacancy at Peterborough, caused by the early and most regretted death of Mr. FITZWILLIAM, removes a young and very promising member of Parliament of a particularly good type. But, putting private and personal matters aside, it is chiefly noteworthy as having given a fresh example of that incurable want of foresight which no amount of preaching seems to be able to remove. The Unionist majority at Peterborough was by no means very large, and the Gladstonians have for some time had an accepted candidate to run at the first vacancy. But the sitting member was a young man; there appeared to be no immediate necessity for a second string, and accordingly we are told "the Unionists are totally unprepared." If the seat is lost, which we sincerely trust it will not be, this want of preparation will be the reason.

In three of the other vacant constituencies a good fight is going on; it seems to be doubtful whether the fourth, Dundee, will be seriously fought. Mr. JOHN LENG, the selected Gladstonian candidate, is a very strong candidate indeed. As he is an excellent man of business, and is believed to possess ability of other kinds, it may be presumed that his Home Rule politics are a mere accident, and that he would have been equally strong for Coercion if Mr. GLADSTONE had continued to coerce. Dundee, which is a very Radical constituency, and has elected Radicals when they were the merest carpet-baggers, must be capricious if Mr. LENG does not suit it. He is, however, a capitalist; the "labour" party is very strong in the town of jute, and there is, or ought to be, a stout Unionist minority. Had Mr. JOHN BURNS come forward in earnest as a Socialist candidate there might have been a chance for honest men, and even as it is it is sincerely to be hoped that, split or no split, a Unionist candidate will be run. If you fight you may be defeated, but you certainly cannot win if you don't fight. This elementary proposition has not been neglected in the three remaining constituencies—one Scotch, two English—which are memberless. Mr. CHAPLIN's re-election by a handsome majority in the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire ought not to be doubtful; but his opponent, Mr. OTTER, is a well-known local man who has won a similar battle before now, and who has summoned all the professional craft of those about Mr. SCHNADHORST to his aid. The fight in North Bucks has at least one thing to recommend it, that both the candidates have good local connexions. Captain VERNEY, the Gladstonian, has been a busy politician who has never displayed much ability, but who can talk well enough. His silly revival, however, of the silly cry about Pigottism looks as if he had not found much to talk about on this occasion. Mr. HUBBARD is less personally known, and the majority by which his brother beat Captain VERNEY was anything but large, so that the fight will in any case be a narrow one. The best chance of positively winning a seat is in Morayshire. This was for long one of the chief Tory strongholds in Scotland, and it was lost fifteen years ago less by the personal popularity of the present Duke of FIFE (then Lord MACDUFF) and his father, though this helped, than by extraordinarily bad management on the other side. Once lost, however, it has never been recovered by the Tories, though some good fights have been made; and even the split in the Gladstonian party did not enable a Unionist to come in, though the late Mr. ANDERSON won very narrowly. In no part of the country, however, has it been harder to make Tories and Liberal-Unionists work together than in Scotland, and at the last election the Unionists were put to that hardest of all strains, the strain of being expected to vote for the very man they had formerly opposed. In the present contest things are better. The Unionist candidate's programme is Liberal enough, and he is at the same time Commissioner to the Dowager Countess of SEAFIELD, the chief representative of the Tory interest among landowners. And, if "Commissioners" are sometimes as unpopular as they are influential, Mr. LOGAN has the further advantage of being opposed only by Mr. SEYMOUR KEAY, who is not only a carpet-bagger, but, in another useful Americanism, one of the veriest "cranks" that even this age, fertile in cranks, has produced. Mr. KEAY has assorted, with considerable ingenuity, every extravagance of the Radical programme; but Morayshire men, who have had their share, and more, in spreading and profiting by British influence abroad, must be in a singular frame of mind indeed if they choose to be represented by the author of Spoiling the Egyptians.

THE MONETARY CONGRESS.

AN International Monetary Congress is sitting at Paris, together with a Spiritualist, and many other kinds of congresses. We do not note the juxtaposition as a wicked monometallist might for purposes of nihilifloccification, but simply as noting the fact that, while they are discussing every conceivable subject in la ville lumière, they have not forgotten that champion example of the unintelligible, but highly fascinating, the single and the double standard. For the rest it would be highly unbecoming to vilipend the Congress if only because, when Mr. CHAPLIN entertained the House of Commons with a disquisition on bimetallism, HER MAJESTY'S Ministers made the coming Congress in Paris an excuse among others for declining to commit themselves to a decision for or against. It, therefore, behoves us to listen attentively for some explanation of the currency reform by which the British farmer is to be made to find the growing of corn at 30s. a quarter profitable, and he who prefers to pay his debts in a coin worth, say, 15s. is to be able to do it without loss to him who has to take the said coin as equivalent to the sovereign which he lent.

We cannot say that the opening of the Congress has been satisfactory. As was perhaps natural, the bimetallists collected in force. The monometallists were represented by one paper which the partisans of the double standard appear to have pooh-poohed. It was possibly natural that the monometallists being in possession should not bestir themselves as actively as the bimetallists who are claimants. That was only what might have been expected. Still it is not in this way that a profitable discussion is likely to be got up. If the Congress is only going to give us a repetition of the arguments which have been advanced by the bimetallists in many speeches and many letters to papers, it will, we fear, not bring us nearer to a settlement of this great debate. As yet this is all it has done. M. MAGNIN repeated the woeful tale with which the world is perfectly familiar. He showed that the demonetization of silver has been followed by most exasperating falls and fluctuations in prices. That we knew already; but then the difficulty in this case, as in so many others, is to distinguish between post and propter. It is contended on the part of the monometallists, not without some show of argumentative force, that the fall in prices is due to many causes, quite independent of the currency. If that is so, the remonetization of silver would do us little good. We trust that this is one of the matters the Congress will thresh out. Moreover, there is one thing which the onlooker would like to have explained by the bimetallicist, and it is this. If, as he asserts, the State, by declaring that so much of the metal A which bears its stamp can be exchanged for so much of the metal B, whereas they are not of the same value in the market, why should we not break away altogether from our slavery to the precious metals and accept a paper currency at once? which could be controlled as the output of silver cannot be. If it is the stamp of the State which fixes the value, why not put it on paper as well as silver? We know, as a matter of fact, that human folly will not accept a paper currency unless it has a solid metallic basis. It accepts banknotes, as we do silver, as a token as long as there is the security that gold can be got for it, and no longer. As long as that remains the case, of what avail can the fiat of the State be, except to introduce confusion into its currency? The more outspoken advocates of bimetallicism openly avow their preference for it on the ground that it would enable the debtor to pay in the cheaper metal the debts he contracted in the dearer, and so deprive the creditor of the advantage he is held to have obtained by the appreciation of gold. This is natural from the debtor's point of view; but—and on this we look to receive light from the Congress—would not the remonetization of silver bring with it a fluctuation in the market of a rather severe kind? It is surely obvious that the increase would have an immediate effect on prices, or it would not. If it had, there would be one more fluctuation and one more kind of loss added to those we suffer from already. If it did not, it might do no harm to nobody; but also it would do no good. The Congress will cover itself with credit if it produces some authoritative judgment on these points. It is high time that the Congress or some other authority gave the decision, and so put a stop to a controversy which raises wild hopes in some, angry fears in others, and infinite puzzlement in yet others.

"FIRST-CLASS ORIGINAL INFORMATION."

SEVERAL points of interest have been brought out by the correspondence to which the St. James's Gazette has opened its columns on the subject of the American magazines; but that correspondence would have repaid itself in the single letter signed "JAMES DUNDAS." JAMES DUNDAS is well qualified, in one sense, to write about periodical literature. He is a "constant reader" with a vengeance. "I take regularly," he begins with pride—and then proceeds to enumerate the periodicals which he takes regularly, and a goodly list they make. It consists of three American and three English illustrated monthlies, and two English monthlies "plain," seven weeklies, two morning dailies, and two evening papers. All, he says, are more or less interesting; but the English monthly magazines, of which, as we have just seen, he takes in five, "I have given up," he adds, "for many years." Interpreting this somewhat mysterious statement as meaning that Mr. DUNDAS has given up those which he has ceased to take in, we pursue his letter with curiosity to learn his reason, which he evidently thinks imperatively demanded of him, for contenting himself with eight monthlies. He longs, it seems, to increase the number; but he cannot. When a new one comes out, he usually has a look at the first number, hoping to meet with some promise of better things; "but" "they all continue in the same bad way." The average English magazine is, alas! "almost, if not entirely, literary." "There are a couple of stories"—it is instructive to observe what first suggests itself to Mr. DUNDAS's mind under the head of literature—"and beyond that next to nothing. All the other matter is either on subjects of no general interest, or written in that roundabout, gossiping sort of way" [chatter about SHELLEY?] "which says a great deal without conveying any definite or original information of any kind." How different is the "make-up" of the American magazines! There literature is made to know its place. The story is reduced to its proper subordinate position, and the kind of topics which fill the English magazine pages are relegated [would it not have been safe to bet any odds that Mr. DUNDAS would prefer "relegated" to "banished"?] to a few pages of small type at the end of the number. And then we come to Mr. DUNDAS's exquisite reason for preferring the main contents of the American to those of the English magazine. Here is the great secret. "The body of the number" of the American periodical is "filled with first-class original information which has not been previously published in any form."

There you have it. The magazine ought to contain information which is not only "first-class and original," and thereby distinguished from the contents of the newspapers, but "which has not been previously published in any form." This last condition seems at first sight a hard saying. A magazine editor, bound to keep up month by month a perpetual flow of information never previously published in any form, might well despair of success. But a glance at Mr. DUNDAS's examples reassures us. What he evidently means is information which has been published in any work which a man who has to read through four dailies, morning or evening, per diem, and seven weeklies a week, and eight monthlies a month, can be expected to find time to consult. He wants to find in our magazines "the history of our railways, our canals, seaports, potteries, textile industries, glassworks, iron and metal industries," or, in other words, the well-boiled-down contents of an encyclopædia. He wants to find in them "popular descriptions of our cathedrals"; or, in other words, a series of more or less ingenious "cuts" from local guide-books. He thinks it would be a "fertile and interesting" subject—as it would be—"to trace the history of our ships," from the short merchant barques and war "snakes" of early times to the Great Harry, from the Great Harry to the Victory, and from the Victory to the Benbow. But he also thinks apparently that this would be "first-class original information" "which has not been previously published in any form." In all which thinkings, but especially in the last, Mr. DUNDAS proves himself to be essentially a man of his time—of the time that believes that reading is culture, and that culture may be come by, with the assistance of the magazines, in a more expeditious and pleasant way than by wading through one's "hundred best books" so declared by plébiscite. There is no reason why Mr. DUNDAS should care about "literary" articles, meaning "stories," and certainly no reason why he should care about politics, philosophy, theology, economics, art, science, travel, all of which subjects are supposed to be represented, and some of which are certainly over-represented, in our monthly magazines and reviews. But why he should wish to exclude all this variety of subjects from English periodicals in favour of a class of matter which is to be found in any number of familiar manuals would be unintelligible but for one reason. Mr. DUNDAS, we take it, is not a reader of books, but at the same time is laudably solicitous for what he supposes to be the improvement of his mind. And his notion of improving his mind is to stow away in it as much "first-class original information" as can be obtained in a "concise and popular form."

EGYPT.

WE are inclined to think that the sarcastic remarks which have been made on M. SPULLER's address to the young Egyptian Princes, whom he recently entertained at dinner, are a little ungenerous. M. SPULLER, say the cynics, says that Egypt will always find France ready to help her, and, lo! it is but some six weeks or so since France refused to help Egypt in the very substantial way for Egypt, and on the very easy terms for France, of giving a scratch of the pen, which, at no cost whatever to M. SPULLER or his country, would have freed the KHEDEVE's country of some 160,000*l.* per annum of burden. It is astonishing how superficial these cynics are. An illustrious person, who has recently attracted more attention than any one during the last ten years, except Mr. GLADSTONE, Jumbo, and BUFFALO BILL, has recorded the fact that, in his wide and varied experience of the human race, the most cordial friends he has ever had (except Sir GEORGE CHETWYND) have been money-lenders. Soit: Mr. ERNEST BENZON is in case to judge. But, take the most generous example of this most generous order of men; take Mr.

BENZON's pick of money-lenders, take (and take down) his pledge to "help" a young heir to any extent. Could it be fairly urged that he had broken this pledge by standing in the way of a horrid family solicitor (Mr. BENZON knows how objectionable family solicitors are) who proposed to free the heir from a certain portion of his liabilities? No! every fibre of the good man would revolt at such a proposition. In the first place, it is not good for heirs and Egypts to be out of debt; they are ordained to be in it, to supply the purposes of the beneficent money-lender. In the second place, can it be forgotten that it was England which planned the hideous boon referred to? No good can come from England, the land of long teeth, large feet, cowards who manage to win Waterloo and a few other battles, and incompetent financiers who somehow or other succeed in reducing the debt that France helped to pile up. There is a deficiency in "taking the point of view" which is but too unfortunately apparent in these criticisms on M. SPULLER, whose action, we are sure, every true Frenchman approved.

Meanwhile the actual governors of Egypt need trouble themselves very little about M. SPULLER. While that friend of man and of Egypt is protesting, they do. Sir FRANCIS GRENFELL's despatch at length about the battle which crushed and killed that very interesting person, WAD-EL-NJUMI (a good account of whose life would be welcome), suffers a little from the over-minuteness and tendency to award prizes to all the boys in the class which has recently exhibited itself in the bulletins of certain English generals. But it is free, on the whole, from the magniloquence of the Souakim document, and it records, if not a wholly satisfactory, yet a genuine and creditable, bit of work. If we cannot quite say sic itur ad astra, we can, at any rate, say "that is the way to turn interesting barbarians out of a country where they have no business." Whether it is also the way to keep the said barbarians out is a point on which we have expressed our opinions many times, and need not now repeat them. But that was not Sir FRANCIS GRENFELL's business. His colleagues in the Civil Service are doing the same sort of work in the same sort of way—improving the administration, curtailing expenses, abridging the opportunities which the enterprising Gaul (to the great wrath of the said Gaul) has been accustomed to consider as his own opportunities of amassing a decent competence, and so forth. It is all very good work, though we might perhaps wish that it were carried out with less pretence of belief in a consummation which will never come—the education of the Egyptian into the power of "walking alone"—and with less wilful blindness to what is the unum necessarium, the restoration of Egypt's hold on the Upper Nile. However, so long as the immediate things are done well, the others may no doubt, to a certain extent, be left to take care of themselves—or, in other words, to grow to such a point that we shall have to take care of them, whether we will or no. It is not a strictly philosophical course of proceeding, but it is very English; and English courses of proceeding have, in spite of philosophy, had indifferent good success before now.

PHYSICAL "EXAMINATIONS."

ACTING upon a hint thrown out in the last Report of the Civil Service Commissioners, Sir FRANCIS GALTON has applied his mind to the question of the "advisability of" assigning marks for bodily efficiency in the examinations "of the candidates for the public services," and has just read a paper on the subject to the Anthropological Section of the British Association. Whether the matter will ever be practically taken up by the authorities who regulate these examinations it is too soon to say; but, in the meantime, the preliminary inquiries instituted on this question by Sir F. GALTON and others have been productive of at least one enlightening result. They have shown, at any rate, the erroneousness of the War Office theory that literary examinations are in themselves "indirect tests of bodily efficiency"—a theory amazingly opposed to the once popular belief that "high intellect" is usually associated with a "stunted and weakly frame." The fact that two absolutely contradictory dogmas find favour on any obscure or unexplored subject is generally a good prima facie ground for suspecting that neither of them is true; and such would seem to be the case in the present instance. Dr. VENN, we are told by Sir F. GALTON, took "measurements" of 1,095 Cambridge students, divided into the three classes of (1) high-honour men, (2) low-honour men and (3) poll-men—that is to say, men who did not compete for honours, but took an ordinary pass degree. The result was that the physical efficiency proved to be almost exactly the same, "except that there appeared to be a slight 'deficiency of eyesight among the high-honour men.'" Otherwise, they are alike throughout, alike in their average bodily efficiency, and alike in the frequency with which different degrees of bodily efficiency were distributed among them. Hence the fact that a man has succeeded in a literary examination does not give the slightest clue to the character of his physical powers and the view of the War Office that literary examinations are indirect tests of bodily efficiency—if this is the view of the War Office, for the military authorities do no more than declare themselves "completely satisfied with the physique of the young men 'who come to them through our examinations'"—is shown to be erroneous: Q. E. D.

The demonstration, however, does not, it must be owned, carry us much further for the present. Sir F. GALTON contends quite logically that, as the intellectual differences between candidates near the line which divides success from failure are usually small, whereas their physical differences are as great as among an equal number of the other candidates taken at random, it would be "most reasonable, whenever two candidates are almost on a par intellectually, though one is 'far superior physically, that the latter should be preferred.'" "This," adds Sir F. GALTON, "is practically all I propose." Now we shall certainly not be suspected of any prejudice against any proposal which might promise to correct some of the defects of a too "bookish" system of competitive examination for posts requiring many other qualities besides those of the student. Our natural prepossessions are, on the contrary, all in favour of such a proposal; and we ought, therefore, to have the credit of impartial critics when we express a doubt as to whether the scheme of physical examination which Sir F. GALTON then proceeded to explain is capable of being applied on any scale so large as to justify its elaborate character. No doubt the general principle is plain enough. Candidate A, a little inferior intellectually to Candidate B, but physically much superior, ought to be preferred to him. On that we are agreed; but, then, the mere fact that the physical superiority of the former must, by the hypothesis, be well marked (for preference in this case is all that Sir F. GALTON "practically proposes") would appear to render his method of "diagrams" and "isograms," and all the rest of it, a needlessly troublesome and minute mode of ascertaining a fact which would or should be almost patent to the senses. The only case in which, as it seems to us, Sir F. GALTON's machinery would be necessary at all would be when it was a question as to which of two just defeated candidates, nearly equal in superior strength, should be preferred to a successful candidate with a few more marks than either of them, and physically far inferior to both. Cases of this kind, however, will surely be too rare to make the machinery in question repay the cost and trouble of setting it up. And once go beyond this point—once suppose the intellectual difference between two candidates, as measured by marks, to be at all substantial—and we immediately find ourselves landed in the necessarily insoluble difficulty of striking a balance between two sets of qualifications which are not in pari materia, and deciding how much eyesight is to reckon against a lack of historical dates, how much lung capacity is to atone for shaky mathematics.

MORE CURIOUS CURIOS.

INDIA is the home of curious curios—we incline to add, as of all other charming things, but our generation is unprepared to receive this startling pronouncement. The enthusiast must restrain himself awhile; not for long, if the conversion of the Philistine goes on at its present rate. It is not yet forty years since the Commissioners of our first Exhibition issued their Report, if we reckon by time; but a cycle in the history of ethics has gone by since the chosen representatives of taste and judgment in this realm could declare, with official solemnity, that the arts of India have not advanced beyond primitive types, and are, flatly, "immature and imperfect." You may still find books upon architecture which contain no reference to the great Indian monuments; or, more grotesquely barbarous yet, give a few patronizing words to the Taj, as though that were the only one even deserving mention. We ourselves have seen nearly all the grandest and most famous works of human genius—not with a tourist's glance, but with the leisurely survey of weeks and months. Palmyra and Pæstum, and the Moorish trophies of Spain, have still to be visited, but we think of no others. Saving the Acropolis, not one can compare with the Taj Mahal, Akber's palace at Agra, and—in a different style—the palace at Delhi. But these are only the supreme examples. Wherever the Pathans set up their rule beauty and taste gathered round them.

Entertaining this view of Indian art, it may be credited that a gentle form of hypochondria possessed us while dwelling in that glorious land. Columns, we thought just now, would not suffice for a mere list of the strange and lovely things noted there. But, on grasping the pen, reflection chills our eagerness. So many and such excellent books have been published lately on this theme that very few styles of art or handicraft worth describing remain undescribed. We have no intention of naming curios which are registered in Baden Powell or Birdwood; and how many have escaped those industrious and sympathetic observers? Moreover, the public had an opportunity to make its own studies at South Kensington a short time ago, and it appears to have used them. Our reminiscences of India, therefore, will be brief. The very oddest curio observed there—and, indeed, elsewhere—was the dress of a woman belonging, probably, to one of the hill peoples about Simla. We came upon her, with her friends, when leading our pony up a mountain track; they had halted in their descent. Close scrutiny was out of the question; the pundits of Simla could not understand our report; and we were almost inclined to distrust a hasty impression until, years afterwards, we found a sample of this amazing fabric in the collection of Dr. Leitner. The hill-woman had a robe of silky cotton, closely ornamented with very large drops, round or oval or pear-shaped, in symmetrical groupings. They were golden in colour, and they stood forth quite one-third of an inch; the centre one of each design probably half an inch. A most singular object, but by no means ungraceful—what Indian system of ornament is, though it may often err in form? But examination, with Dr. Leitner's assistance, revealed facts infinitely more surprising. The drops might well puzzle an observer; for they are tallow, hardened by some process, stained, and made closely adhesive. They cling to the stuff without fastening. A very elegant class of metal-ware we remarked on the stall of a craftsman at Umritsar, whereof no other examples have come under our notice. Its principle lies in the coating of copper with some white metal through which the design is cut; just as the Cashmiris and their imitators gild silver and incise the pattern down to the white beneath the gold. This Umritsar man, in fact, produced a cheap adaptation of a costly style, which has the merit of lasting—so much to be desired in the beautiful Cashmir work. We gave him an order, but alas! through some misapprehension it reached us, twelve months afterwards, with all the fine tracery blackened—a very poor copy of the Moradabad enamel. Speaking of Cashmir, we recall the exquisite little flower-vases of Sir Richard Thornton, the like of which have never come beneath our notice. These dainty globes had a black surface, outlining foliage in unburnished white metal—perhaps silver—upon which lovely little flowers stood out with the utmost brilliancy. This work must be very rare; Lord Northbrook is said to have a few glorious examples. A much more feeble manufacture in the same style may be found occasionally. Foliage and flowers alike are burnished, in this rougher ware, and the inlaying of white metal is so thin that it will not bear rough usage long. We give the warning from experience. There is a delightful custom among women and girls of the Punjab of wearing lac bracelets, a dozen or more, set with beads of liveliest colour. In the early morning they may be seen waiting at their "jeweller's" stall, and he promptly rigs them out for the day—a day of festival, we presume. The bracelets are cooking gently by a charcoal fire to keep them soft. A young woman stretches out her arm—they are always laughing, those pretty Punjabis—the artist takes a hot knife, divides the warm circlet, clasps it round, and picks up another as fast as his hands can work. As the lac cools it hardens, of course. As charming as could be is the effect of these tasteful trifles in sufficient number. We forget how many go for a halfpenny; but a jeweller filled a biscuit-case for us as large as a hat-box with rolls of them for five rupees; and we paid the stranger's price, no doubt.

The curios of the Further East are not so familiar to Britons. Foremost among them is the kris—which we used to spell creese. A fabulous value is put upon old specimens, and deservedly, for they show fine damascening down the middle of the serpentine blade. A kris, however, is not less a kris though it be straight. That form belongs especially to the instrument used for execution—a doomed man sits smoking and chatting, laughing if a joke arise as cheerfully as usual, while the officer of justice creeps up behind, and thrusts his keen blade downwards, betwixt neck and shoulder. Malays are always original. These heavy crises, eighteen inches long or more, are peculiar to the piratical races. Very awkward implements they must be to handle; but all these peoples are eccentric in the matter of tools. The Malay chopping-knife or sword is not straight. It slants off at an obtuse angle from the hilt, so that seventy-five per cent. of force would be lost in a downright blow if a man grasped it by the handle. We may trace in both these forms of weapon an absurd extravagance of ingenuity. If the Sulu kris were as sharp as a razor, and it could be applied to a man's throat, one lunge of its waving blade might cut his head off; thus, indeed, experts display its use, protruding the object at arm's length, its edge flat, describing narrow horizontal circles therewith. So, if the parang were keen enough, and a man could strike home with it, by the mere arrangement of the blade he must needs draw its full length through the wound. But they are both ridiculous; we only give this explanation because nine people in ten who see these odd things puzzle over them. A Malay chief in robes of state thrusts the kris or parang through his girdle, leaving the hilt of gold or ivory, perhaps set with emeralds, well forward. But a gentlemanly feeling checks the obtrusion of magnificence in weapons—your Malay is a fine gentleman. So he covers the hilt with his kain bandara, silk and gold, thus assuming exactly both in figure and in gait the swaggering waddle of the Albanian. So human nature asserts itself everywhere under like conditions. These kain bandaras are feeble works of art compared with the Indian gold cloths, but they produce the effect of gorgeousness as well, if not better. One which was given to us by the Maharajah of Johore made a blaze in the sun, and a smooth, unbroken sheen in half-light, which we never saw equalled in embroidery. Any woman appeared to have the skill for weaving these things, more or less good, in our time, if the materials were provided, just as any man professed to be able to forge a kris. Their forefathers could, no doubt; but this generation has lost the art. Very many of them, however, can execute goldsmith's work, with just the tools to hand. We bought once a noble pirate's kris, of which the hilt was broken; one of our boys proposed to cover it with silver, and asked a scheme of ornament. A piece of string was given him, and a certain number of dollars, which he somehow converted into wire, and therewith constructed a very handsome and ingenious style of decoration. The reminiscence calls to mind that beautiful white string which the women of the palace manufacture at Coomassie. It is a real work of art, most complicated in pattern, and set off with pretty tufts here and there, made, we imagine, by allowing a strand to escape. There is little enough in the way of curios worth storing throughout the length and breadth of Africa. But we do not regard the inland, negroid races as hopeless by any means. They have much taste and some feeling for art. The cotton stuffs of Ashantee, so much prized all along that coast, promise well for the future. Their graceful and striking ornament, symmetrical but quite irregular, is produced by gathering a bunch of stuff between the fingers and dipping it in the dye; thus a rough, starlike group of patches is stained on the snowy surface. Great judgment and practice, however, must be required to effect by such rude means the pleasing appearance of uniformity in endless variation of detail which gives a charm to the Ashantee cottons. The dyes also are remarkably soft. This same process of bunching and dipping is the secret of those lovely Java silks which used to be so commonly worn both by men and women, white and native, about the Straits. They do not seem to be obtainable now, anywhere, and the younger generation of merchants have no acquaintance with them. The Oriental, of course, makes vastly more profit than the negro out of the same idea. He ties up his silk in numberless bunches tightly, and so manipulates it that when the strings are cut, after dipping, not only does the agreeable variety of starlike prints remain—more than that, the silk is delightfully crumpled, and so continues for any length of years if kept dry. It is most unlikely that the Javanese have abandoned an immemorial class of manufacture which must have been a large item of their trade thirty years ago. These silks have gone out of fashion, probably, in the realm whither they were forwarded from Singapore—which was not England. But—as has been remarked—we have learned something in thirty years, and they might be welcomed with enthusiasm now. Very rare and very wonderful are the Natuna mats woven in the small islands of that name. This is a distinct industry, without parallel elsewhere, so far as we know. All Oriental mats of the show-class are pretty, some superb; but the Natunas stand first. They are plaited in open work, after the manner of old-fashioned antimacassars, so skilfully that no loose end is seen, nor suspected even, and so strongly that they will bear almost as rough usage as the common rush mat. A single one cannot be bought, unless by chance; they are made in sets of five. A family of the average number, giving three adult workers and three children, will turn out a set in two to four years of the usual first-class varieties; but we heard of an order given by a great chief in the Dutch territory upon which half a village had already been working for twelve years. The price agreed was $1,200, and people were already complaining that they had lost money in the contract. An average sum to pay for a set of Natuna mats in our time was $250—say, 60*l.*; but there were bargains in the market at $1,000. European merchants and amateurs had already given commissions which would occupy the whole generation of islanders for their lives long, working in the honest, pleasant old fashion. Probably there are "sweaters" there now, and scamped work, and adulterated materials, and all the other boons of Christian civilization.

LONDON'S FACE.

THE physiognomy of the capital is always interesting to those not too eager in the pursuit of pleasure or gain to contemplate it; but perhaps the ever-shifting face of London has never offered a more fruitful subject of study than at present. "Society" being scattered to the four winds of heaven, the ranks of the remaining four and a half millions, or thereabout, are swollen by the tens of thousands of strangers whose wont it is to invade the metropolis at this period, declared by stay-at-homes to be the most pleasant time of year for those who do not essay to pass the best part of their existence in a whirl of gaiety. It is late in the day to talk of the marvellous growth of London; but in truth those of us who assume to be tolerably well acquainted with its kaleidoscopic changes may well ask when this extension of the town will stop. The new streets which were made seemingly but yesterday are already teeming with life; the south side of the great Avenue cut through the heart of Soho is entirely built upon, although few of the numberless edifices recently raised, as if by magic, are as yet actually completed. When that long range of shops, offices, and chambers is finished and occupied there will be no more imposing commercial thoroughfare than Shaftesbury Avenue—the creation of a couple of years or so. True, there is nothing even remotely suggestive of the picturesque in the architecture on the north side, most of which, to speak frankly, is abominably ugly; but we have yet to witness the advent of an Haussmann or an Anspach in this country. Piccadilly Circus is being gradually metamorphosed into a miniature Place Vendôme; and, the complaints of the æsthetes notwithstanding, the erection of the new “refuge,” with its handsome lamps and strikingly massive, if somewhat nondescript, “trophy” of gleaming Aberdeen granite, cannot be regarded other than as a decided improvement. For a wonder, those vague and shadowy personages, the “authorities,” reversing the “good old rule, the simple plan” of selecting the height of the season for repairing the wood pavement in the Strand and the upper part of Oxford Street have pitched upon August and September for relaying those thoroughfares. One of the most striking changes in the outward aspect of things is to be witnessed in the Haymarket, and is due to the transformation of the front of Her Majesty’s Theatre, which, from being a marvel of dinginess verging on squalor, has now blossomed into a mass of gold-leaf decoration (so far as the background of the entablature is concerned), the effect of which is, however, utterly ruined by the adoption of a rich gamboge colour for the flanking walls. Shade of Owen Jones, what is the art of “decoration” coming to in this our time?

But, after all, it is the human rather than the material physiognomy of London which is more calculated to arrest attention even at this comparatively early part of the saison morte. Surely never before was there such an invasion of our capital by the foreigner, and especially by the American traveller. Our cousins from across the Atlantic swarm and increase in number day by day. Nearly, if not quite, all of them have come to London from Paris, fresh from the questionable delights of fair Lutetia in “Exposition” time. The pavement between the Grand Hotel and Oxford Circus is the special property of these wanderers, whose free-and-easy manner and rough-and-ready garb betray them at every step. Their strident tones penetrate for yards, and their complacency knows no bounds. They are here, the men in drab alpaca suits and soft shapeless hats, the women in the most ultra unfashionable attire ever seen out of Philadelphia or Chicago, to enjoy themselves and for no other purpose; and they do enjoy themselves quand même. A fact, almost unprecedented, may be here mentioned. West-end tradesmen have actually been heard to express themselves favourably when questioned as to the recently-expired season. Strange to say, some of these commerçants consider that, “on the whole,” the London Season of 1889 was a tolerably good one—that is to say, from their, the money-making, point of view. Their hearts must, indeed, expand with gratitude at finding that the “dead” season is anything but the dull, tradeless time it too frequently is. Our fair American cousins haunt the great fashion shops in Regent Street and Oxford Street, fascinated by the “summer sales,” which, be it noted, are, in trade parlance, still “on,” and anything but proof against the blandishments of the “Howell-and-James-young-man” and his kind. The poor policeman is badgered out of his life, one would think, by a repetition of the same mazy questions day after day; but he stands it well, and is infinitely more obliging and good-tempered than the most-times haughty gendarme, with his look of supreme contempt for everybody who does not speak the French of Paris. The manner in which the strangers within our gates amuse themselves of nights might well form the subject of a separate article. Comparatively few theatres are open; but there are the “Promenades” at the two great houses, and, of course, there are the “Halls.” The Spanish Exhibition is a poor substitute for the “internationals” of previous years, with their bands and illuminations; but it doubtless serves our visitors to some slight extent as an open-air resort whither they can be whisked from Charing Cross in half an hour, unless “metal more attractive” offers itself. And, on the whole, perhaps the great army of tourists do not find time hang too heavily on their hands even when London—or, rather, the great world—is out of town.

THE INTERNATIONAL STATISTICAL INSTITUTE.

THE second meeting of the Institute, held last week in Paris under the able guidance of Sir Rawson Rawson, has proved pleasant and profitable. The International Statistical Institute, it will be remembered, was founded in London four years ago, and held its first congress in Rome in 1887. It has taken the place, it is hoped upon a firm basis at last, of the various congresses of International Statistics which in past years have been born to perish like the flowers of the field. These meetings died, strange to say, of their own success, and in consequence of the increased popularity of statistics. They were practically open to any subscriber, and the hangers-on became so overwhelming in numbers that no real business could be effected. The present Institute is more carefully constructed. Its numbers are strictly limited to 150. Accordingly there is no room for drones, and only the working bees of this interesting young science gain admission to the statistical hive. England was well represented at Paris in economical statistics by Mr. Robert Giffen and Mr. A. E. Bateman, both of the Board of Trade, and in agricultural matters by Major Craigie. Germany was conspicuous by the absence of all her representatives, official and unofficial; but most of the other European States had one or more members present, France, of course, having the lion’s share at a Paris meeting.

Although the Congress was not in any sense official, some rooms in the new Ministry of Commerce were lent for the meetings, and a good deal of help in the way of printing and secretaries’ work was kindly given by the same department. After the opening speech of the President, Sir Rawson Rawson, the first day’s work comprised an interesting address by M. Juglar on the periodicity of commercial crises. Mr. Bateman reported the proceedings of the Labour Bureau in England, and there was a general interchange of ideas as to what could be done in the publication of prices and wages statistics. It is doubtful whether an international or even a national Bradshaw can ever be published that will show the working-man what he will have to pay everywhere for rent, clothes, food, taxes, and luxuries, and how much he may expect to earn in the particular industry he is capable of, but some progress is being made in this direction, especially in the United States. Another useful bit of work was Major Craigie’s Committee on landed property and agricultural holdings, which has already improved our knowledge of large and small holdings, and their influence on cultivation in various countries. The “Index No.,” of course, came in for attention, and so did an even more technical and abstruse subject, the measurement of shipping tonnage. When the profits in freights are cut so fine as they often are in the present day, it is most desirable that tonnage and harbour dues should not press more severely on one class of vessels than on another, and, therefore, the deduction from the gross tonnage on account of engine-space, and the like, ought to be uniform.

The Committee, which Mr. Bateman started at Rome in 1887, for improving the bases of the trade statistics of the different countries, continued its labours, and the English representatives were successful in getting a resolution passed in favour of the English system of registering the imports and exports at the prices of the day. In most European countries a serious and solemn Commission fixes these prices some time in the year after the statistics are taken. The result is that such a phenomenon as the recent boom in sugar prices would not be shown this year in their monthly trade accounts, which are based on last year’s prices. The inconvenience, and even the absurdity, of this system are obvious. A more ambitious but less practically useful reform was suggested by the French economist, M. Fournier de Flaix, in his attempt to classify the religions of the world according to population, and to deduce various ingenious theories of increase of population according to religion and sect. A Russian professor questioned the accuracy of these deductions in respect of the Jews in Russia, and showed that climate and geographical position affected the fertility of early or late marriages much more than sect does. A further objection is a forcible one—that in countries such as Italy there are vast numbers of the population who cannot fairly be classed as Roman Catholics, though they are usually counted so. If a religious census is taken, and people enter themselves under one or other sect, there is no need to go behind the figures and inquire whether all really belong to the sect they profess; but it is a different matter to sweep the great bulk of the population into the dominant religion.

One of the most interesting subjects of the Congress was the system of measuring prisoners which has been in force in France for five or six years. Up to the close of 1888 about 100,000 prisoners had been measured and photographed. These measurements are of a most minute character, including height, length and breadth of head, length of forearm, middle finger, foot, and ear. The colour of the eye is also recorded. The cards containing all these and other measurements are tabulated first under “length of head,” the sizes being classed as “long,” “medium,” and “short.” By again subdividing these classes into the “long,” “medium,” and “short-fingered,” “armed,” and so forth, it takes an astonishingly short time to trace out the measurement of a prisoner who has been measured before. By next consulting his photograph it is easy to identify him and his past misdeeds. A fresh terror to malefactors is added in this way; for the récidivistes have hitherto made it a practice to give a false name, in order to avoid the heavier penalties of a second or a third offence.

When Dr. Bertillon had minutely explained the process to the members of the Institution during their visit to the Palais de Justice, it was proposed that an experiment in corpore vili should be made. A curious and rather brutal scene accordingly took place. A man who had been captured the night before in the act of theft was brought into the presence of the statisticians. As usual, he gave a name unknown to the criminal annals, while denying that he had ever been a prisoner before. He was immediately stripped to his shirt and trousers, and measured in the prescribed way. After sorting the measurements for about five minutes an almost exact replica of details was discovered, and, appended to it, a photograph bearing a striking resemblance to the unhappy thief. It was a very curious, but to English notions rather a shocking, sight to watch the toils being drawn closer and closer round the wretched man, and to hear the applause of some of the party, which included a few ladies, when the final touch was given in the production of the criminating photograph. It must be owned that there was no doubt about the matter, as the man at once acknowledged, not merely the photograph, but his own damaging antecedents. But we are accustomed in perfidious Albion to see foxes and human culprits get a fair start, and the detection of crime before trial by such experiments had an air that was painful as well as unsportsmanlike.

It appears from the returns that no less than 2,150 récidivistes, or relapsed criminals, who had denied their identity, have been discovered by this process since it was first introduced in France, besides the large number who now relinquish all idea of concealment when they see the measuring machine, as if it were a modern rack and thumbscrew. Dr. Bertillon is anxious to make the system international, now that locomotion is so very easy that criminals change their country as in earlier times they used to change their village. A further interesting and important result is likely to be reached by the comparison of all these thousand measurements of prisoners—namely, the discovery of the criminal “type.” It seems that the measurements of head, ear, and fingers show formations differing materially from those of the ordinary moral mortal, and the French savants hope that an easy diagnosis may thus be made of the criminal type as a guide to the subjects on whom segregation from their fellow-men ought to be practised, so as to secure society against their depredations. No doubt infinite possibilities may be opened up, but it would be a shocking result of all this statistical investigation if some unfortunate individual, whose venial offence should be letting out his dog unmuzzled or not sending his child to the Board school, should be discovered, by being measured at the police station, to belong to the class of moral lepers, and be stigmatized as “a criminal type.” He might be blameless in word and deed, but the angle of his forehead and the length of his little finger would doom him, by the new statistical philosophy, to a life-long retirement in a settlement of outcasts. To return to the actual process of identification, the greatest difficulty in obtaining certainty is found in cases when the false name given is that of a brother or other near relative. The measurements of brothers are often singularly identical. In these cases the proofs of identity mainly rest on scars and bodily marks. The whole subject is treated with minuteness in an interesting Notice sur le Fonctionnement du Service d'Identification (Paris: G. Masson), just issued by M. Alphonse Bertillon, the inventor.

An interesting report was read by M. Cheysson on the statistics of internal communication, and how to make the returns of the various countries more easily comparable. It seems that in France, which has long been the home of the most elaborate official statistics, not only is the quantity of merchandise carried by railway shown according to the distance conveyed—the ton-kilometre to which our railway Companies object in its English form, the ton-mile—but the tonnage carried on the canals is similarly recorded according to distance, and every five years the traffic along the main roads is at many points counted seven times in the year. In this way every day of the week a count is made of vehicles, distinguished as “light,” “heavy,” and “empty.” A grand reckoning is then made of the total weight of all these vehicles, specimens of each sort having first been solemnly weighed to obtain the average. The coasting trade is also reckoned by distance, so that a 500-ton vessel from Dunkirk to Bordeaux gets its proper allowance for distance over the vessel that passes only between two nearer ports. It was pointed out at the Congress that, to be logical, the foreign trade should be treated in the same manner; but even French statisticians shrink from the double entry of imports and exports by degree of distance.

The next place of meeting of the International Institute of Statistics has been fixed in Vienna, in 1891, and it has been decided to hold a special Congress at Washington, in 1892, on occasion of the fourth Centennial of the discovery of the New World. This second date, however, must be considered as merely probable; the final decision will be left to the delegates to Vienna in 1891. The Institute is to be congratulated on the amount of useful business which it has proved itself able to organize.

THE EXPERIMENTAL MATINÉE.

II.

THE first question with which the matinée-giver will find himself confronted is the choice of a theatre. With the number of houses now open in London this would seem an easy task, but in reality it is more difficult than at first sight appears. By certain managers, and those the very ones whose theatres would appear most desirable, the experimental matinée is tabooed, or is only to be arranged for on terms practically prohibitive. The choice narrows itself down to, at most, some half-dozen houses, outside the walls of one or other of which such performances are rarely, if ever, seen. These houses are, with scarcely an exception, of small size, and, as the giver of the performance in his anxiety to attract the attention of those influential in the theatrical world will invite to his stalls and boxes the representatives of all the papers, the managers of all the theatres, and such others as he may consider of importance, it will readily be understood that he will not have many seats to dispose of at the market price to those anxious to obtain them on those terms. As a matter of fact, he will have plenty of applications for admission on eleemosynary conditions; but to comply with such requests wholesale, though gratifying to his amour propre, will not conduce to a healthy balance-sheet. Still, unless he be desirous of swelling his expenses to a dangerously high figure, or unless he be confident beyond the common of the public support, our experimentalist will do well to choose one of the smaller houses.

The theatre decided on, the entrepreneur will find that, for the payment of a lump sum, he will be supplied with the use of the house for a stipulated number of rehearsals and for the performance, together with the services of the band, and of the staff of carpenters, property-men, gasmen, &c., behind the curtain, and of money-takers, check-takers, &c., before the curtain; also with such scenery and properties as are in stock. Let not, however, the inexperienced in such matters flatter himself that such an arrangement will relieve him of any further expenditure in those departments; for he will find himself debarred from using any scenery or furniture which is employed in the current evening's bill of the theatre; and that brings us face to face with one of the peculiarities of our modern theatrical system—namely, that as a rule the manager of to-day has never within the walls of his theatre the wherewithal, either in personnel or mise-en-scène, to mount more than one play at a time. Actors are engaged generally for the run of a play, and the company of any particular theatre is therefore, with few exceptions, liable to the most sweeping changes with every alteration of programme. So, too, with the inanimate adjuncts of the stage (if anything can be more inanimate than some of the actors of the day). The modern tendency is in favour of small theatres, and the value of ground in favourable situations at the West End of London leads to great economy of space in their erection. Such curtailment is generally effected by the practical abolition of the painting-room and of the scene-dock, the storehouse of such scenery as is not in active use on the stage. The taste of the day also runs towards a solid and even cumbrous method of mounting plays. “Interior” scenes are of small account unless the windows and doors are of solid carpenter's work; while elaborate cornices, dados, and overmantels, imported direct from Tottenham Court Road, have replaced the more legitimate brush-work of the scene-painter. Out-of-door scenes must be built at different levels, with mossy banks and trickling streams and trees with solid trunks. Scenery so manufactured, besides being responsible for many an over-lengthy “wait” between the acts, has the additional disadvantage of bulkiness in storage, which, with the small size of our modern houses, chokes a theatre with the setting necessary for a single piece. Of course each manager possesses a stock of scenery which he has from time to time provided for the various plays he may have produced; such, however, is no longer kept, as of old, in the scene-dock of his theatre, but is warehoused in some outlying building rented for the purpose, generally the arch of a railway viaduct. This stock may generally be drawn upon for the purposes of an experimental matinée; but the “experimentalist” will be expected to pay for the men's time employed in looking out and carting the goods. Failing such stock, a scene may have to be borrowed from another house, or even to be specially painted for the occasion. As with the scenery so with the properties. Many managers keep no stage furniture of their own on their premises, but hire from well-known firms what they may require for their successive productions. Such articles are rarely at the service of the matinée-giver, who is in his turn driven to furnish his scenes in the same way. The item of the band only implies their attendance at the performance itself; should there be any incidental music in the play which renders necessary their presence at rehearsal, extra expense is inevitable. The cost of matinées will, of course, vary very largely; but the experimentalist will be wise in reckoning on an addition of from thirty to forty per cent. on the original charge for the theatre to meet these extra expenses.

The theatre decided on, next arises the question of the date. Perhaps this seems a simple matter; surely one day is as good as another? Not so to any one with knowledge of the theatrical world. Let us take the theatrical week, beginning as it generally does, in London at any rate, on Saturday. That is a day quite out of the question for an experimental matinée, for nearly every stage, like nearly every actor and actress in town, is occupied with an afternoon performance of the current evening's bill. Monday is almost equally out of the question, as no rehearsal would be possible later than Friday, Saturday being a dies non for the reasons above stated. On Tuesdays and Thursdays complete London companies are wont to visit the Crystal Palace and Brighton, which may prevent the attendance of some of the destined cast, while Friday would by many be deemed too “unlucky” a day to be thought of. Even Wednesday, the only day against which we have as yet alleged nothing, is not unfrequently used for the regular matinées of some very popular plays which can bear the strain of eight performances a week. Then there is the difficulty of avoiding a collision with other performances of the same kind, or with any big social or sporting function whose rivalry would be disastrous; all which considerations will show that the date of an undertaking such as we are describing is not so easy of settlement as may at first sight appear.

As regards the choice of a play (except in those cases in which the production of a new piece is the very raison d'être of the performance, when the play may be said to choose itself), recourse is usually made by those histrionic aspirants who seek fortune by means of the matinée to the leading parts of the old stock plays, to Lady Teazle, Julia and Juliana, to Claude Melnotte and Romeo, sometimes by those "around whose breast is oak and threefold brass"—to Shylock and to Hamlet. Such choice is absurdly ambitious, of course; but absurd ambition is of the very essence of the experimental matinée, and there are undoubtedly other considerations which lead the beginner to these parts. Most of the budding geniuses for whose amusement and instruction matinées exist are to some extent in statu pupillari; their coach, generally some actor or actress of the old school, possesses prompt-books wherein all the business pertaining to these old plays is carefully noted, and it is therefore a merely mechanical process, for the teacher at any rate, to teach a novice parrot-like one of the leading parts therein. The business of rehearsal is simplified by the choice of one of these "stock" plays. Notwithstanding that the average experience of the actor in the whole range of dramatic literature is, owing to long runs, touring companies, and other causes, rapidly decreasing, it is still possible to cast the plays of Shakspeare (such of them, at any rate, as are now usually seen on the boards), of Sheridan, and Goldsmith, among actors whom previous experience has rendered familiar with the text and "business" of the piece, and who will, therefore, require but few rehearsals. Such an arrangement simplifies the labours of the organizer of the matinée, generally the "coach" and adviser of the novice; but how hopelessly dull is a performance on such lines, the beginner ineffectually struggling with a task far beyond his (or her) powers, the general cast frequently selected more from economy or "safety" (for it would not do to have the central figure too absolutely eclipsed) than for brilliancy, the mounting always inadequate, sometimes unequivocally ridiculous. It is to witness such a spectacle that many an afternoon audience is summoned to desert its business or its pleasure, and to learn to loathe the very name of the experimental matinée.

THE FINANCIAL CRISIS IN ITALY.

ITALY has been in the throes of banking and industrial difficulties for more than a year, which is likely to have important political as well as economic consequences. The unification of the kingdom and the immense foreign investment that followed led to a great development of industry in Italy. As a consequence there was a very large immigration from the rural districts to the towns, and the towns naturally grew very rapidly. Fortunes were quickly made by those who early foresaw the course that events were taking, and the knowledge that these fortunes were made gave birth to a reckless speculation in lands and houses. Speculative builders without capital of their own were enabled to borrow any sums they pleased to ask for at from 7 to 10 per cent. per annum interest, bankers vying with one another for their custom. The bankers obtained means to lend the immense sums which they advanced by borrowing in turn in France. France had long been the banker as well as the best customer of Italy. French capital had largely provided the means of the economic development to which we have been referring, and had also upheld the credit of the kingdom. So long, therefore, as French capitalists were ready to lend to the Italian banks, the building speculation went on merrily. But when Italy joined the Triple Alliance, and broke off the Commercial Treaty with France, French bankers began to withdraw their money from Italy. For a time the Italian bankers were able to borrow in London, Amsterdam, and Berlin; but the bankers of London, Berlin, and Amsterdam were less accommodating than those of Paris, Lyons, and Marseilles. They very soon intimated that their Italian borrowers must put a limit to the accommodation which they required. Meantime the sale of Italian Rentes and Italian industrial securities by French holders went on, prices continued to fall, and apprehension spread through the Bourses of Italy. In the spring of last year there was a building and banking crisis in Rome. Whether it was that the Italian bankers were over-sanguine, or that they had committed themselves too deeply to be able to find a remedy, nothing was done to limit the speculation, and so the embarrassment of the country continued to increase until last month, when a fresh crisis occurred in Turin. The Banco Sconto in Turin got into difficulties. Its capital was about half a million sterling, and it had reserves of about half as much more, while its deposits amounted to about 1¼ million sterling. The capital of the bank appears to have been advanced on accommodation bills to the Tiberine Bank in Rome, which had a branch in Turin. The General Manager in Turin of the Tiberine Bank was Signor Noli, and he was also Vice-President of the Banco Sconto. The shares of the latter bank began to fall rapidly, and their depreciation led to a fall in the shares of the Tiberine Bank. At this critical moment Signor Noli committed suicide, there was a rush of depositors upon the Banco Sconto, and, though it received assistance from the other banks, it was ultimately obliged to close its doors. The failure of the Banco Sconto sealed the doom of the Tiberine Bank. Application has been made by the latter bank to the National Bank of Italy for assistance. A committee of the National Bank was appointed to examine its condition, and it is now stated that, under pressure from the Government, the National Bank has consented to give the required assistance. As a compensation, however, the National Bank is to be allowed to increase its note circulation by 30 millions of lire, and not to be required to hold either gold or silver as a security for the new issue of notes. The proceeding is somewhat analogous to what we should call a suspension of the Bank's charter, and that the Government has had to have recourse to so grave a measure shows how very serious is the situation in Turin and Rome.

A reckless speculation, long continued, under any circumstances, must of course have ended in a crisis. To enable the reader to understand the actual situation, it is necessary to remind him that France was not only the banker of Italy, but that she was also by far her best customer. Indeed, the trade of Italy with France alone was nearly as large as that which she conducted with this country, Germany, and Austria combined. Since the termination of the Commercial Treaty, however, France has transferred to others as much as possible of her custom. For example, she now buys from Spain the wine which she formerly bought from Italy. The falling-off in the trade with France has impoverished, not only the commercial classes engaged in that trade, but the whole landed interest, and thus the population is not able either to buy or to rent the new houses which have been built in such excessive numbers in all the great towns of the Peninsula. These houses remaining vacant, the builders are unable to fulfil their obligations towards the banks, and the banks in turn are unable to carry out their own obligations. It is not to be forgotten, too, that the persistency and determination with which France for a couple of years past has been selling all kinds of Italian securities has lessened very greatly the borrowing power of Italian holders. There has already been a heavy fall, but the bourses all over Europe fear that, if France continues selling, the fall may be carried much further; and, therefore, bankers are not as ready to lend upon those securities as they formerly were, and certainly not to the same amount. When introducing his Budget for last year, M. Magliani, then Minister of Finance, said:—"We have entered upon a grand foreign policy which costs much and brings little. The expenses of the different Ministries increase enormously and incessantly, without showing any benefit to the country. The law of 1879 regarding railways proves most disastrous to the country. Everything tends to raise expenditure to an enormous extent." In fact, the ordinary expenditure rose from a little over 37 millions sterling in 1862 to very nearly 77 millions in 1888. In the latter year there was an extraordinary expenditure of over 5¼ millions sterling in addition. It is true that the revenue has enormously increased likewise in the interval. In 1862 it but slightly exceeded 21½ millions sterling, and in 1888 it exceeded 71¼ millions sterling. Still it will be seen that in the latter year there was a deficit of about 5 millions sterling, leaving the extraordinary expenditure out of account, or not far short of 11 millions sterling, if we include the extraordinary expenditure. From 1862 to 1876 very strenuous efforts were made to increase the revenue and keep down the expenses, with the result that an equilibrium was at last established, and for five or six years even small surpluses were obtained. But the repeal of the Grist-tax brought the period of prosperity to an end, and since 1883 the deficits have not merely reappeared, but have increased alarmingly. The main causes have been, as M. Magliani points out in the quotation above given, the excessive outlay upon railways and a foreign policy which the country is not able to afford.

As the policy of the Government does not seem likely to be changed, and as the prolonged crisis is sure to be followed by a period of depression and distress, the question naturally arises whether Italy will be able to maintain specie payments. Very generally it is feared that she will not. It is only six years ago since she resumed specie payments by means of large loans negotiated here in London. And she has maintained specie payments up to the present only by having recourse to artificial means to retain the gold she then obtained. The truth is that Italy made a mistake in the policy of resumption she adopted six years ago. She would have acted much more wisely had she contented herself with a silver standard, for she is too poor to afford the luxury of a gold standard. This will appear very clearly when we point out that the imports into Italy ever since the creation of the kingdom have greatly exceeded the exports in value. It is true that in this country and in France also the value of the imports is greater than the value of the exports. But, on the other hand, France and England are immensely richer countries, with enormous investments in all other parts of the world. And besides, our own country earns very large sums every year in the shape of freights, commission, and the like, upon the goods which she carries from nation to nation. But Italy is a very poor country, which earns little in the shape of freights, and has no investments worth speaking of outside her own borders. Therefore she has to pay for the excess of imports over exports in hard cash. And she has been able to maintain resumption only by borrowing. In the five years, 1862-66, the value of the imports into Italy exceeded the value of the exports by very nearly 64 millions sterling. Then the excess diminished until 1881. But in the six years, 1882-7, the excess amounted to as much as 79 millions sterling. During the whole quarter of a century the excess in the value of the imports over the exports was about 220 millions. That a debtor country without a great carrying trade or much foreign investment can permanently maintain specie payments does not seem probable, and just now, when her trade is specially depressed—first, by breaking off the treaty with France; and, secondly, by a crisis which has continued so long—it seems less probable than ever, all the more because the specie held in the country is small. The total paper circulation of Italy amounts to about 56 millions sterling, of which, in round figures, 14 millions sterling are State issues and 42 millions sterling bank-notes. The total stock of coin and bullion held by the banks is about 18 millions sterling. But of this only 14 millions sterling is in gold. And it is to be recollected that there is no large coin circulation to draw upon such as exists in this country and France; so that, if the bank reserves are trenced upon, they can be replenished only by drawing upon the treasury or by borrowing abroad. It is not surprising, therefore, that the authorization of the Government to the National Bank to increase by 30 millions of lire its note circulation, without adding to its metallic reserve, is generally regarded as a first step towards suspension of specie payments.

THE ST. LEGER.

WHEN odds are laid on a horse for the St. Leger within a few days of his victory in the Derby, people begin to prophesy a "dull Doncaster." The Duke of Portland's Donovan confirmed his Derby form by winning the Prince of Wales's Stakes at Ascot a fortnight later; and from 6 to 4 the odds on him were lengthened by fractions until they reached 9 to 4. He had won more than 16,000*l.* last year, and about 23,000*l.* already this season, in all very nearly 40,000*l.*, or a larger sum than any other racehorse had ever won in a lifetime, and if he had not every claim to be a strong first favourite for the St. Leger, what horse, it was asked, ever had? Moreover, Gulliver, in whom certain backers had trusted, fell lame at Leicester, and Chitabob was commonly believed to have rheumatism; so that, in addition to his own undoubted merits, fate appeared to be preparing the way for Donovan's victory. As he had "run through" all the three-year-old form of the season, the only chance of his overthrow seemed to be from some horse that had not yet run in public this year, and about the beginning of August a few bold speculators began to back Nunthorpe, Quartus, and even the rheumatic Chitabob, neither of whom had run in a race since 1888, the consequence being that, five or six weeks ago, the first favourite for the St. Leger represented the best form of the year, and the second, third, and fourth favourites no form at all, so far as the present season was concerned. Backers of Donovan were not altogether pleased when they heard that Mr. C. Perkins was going to send the supposed invalid, Chitabob, to run for the Great National Breeders' Foal Stakes on the 14th of August at Redcar, nor were they more satisfied when they read that, although he had, as they declared, "nothing to beat," he won pulling hard "with his head in his chest" in the easiest possible manner, and that, if a trifle full-fleshed, he looked and moved remarkably well. This race was only a mile in length, and the colt's enemies maintained that he was a non-stayer; great interest, therefore, was taken in the Great Yorkshire Stakes at York, for which he was to run over a mile and three-quarters against the three St. Leger colts, Nunthorpe, Pinzon, and Scottish Fusilier. The last-named colt made the running, while Chitabob brought up the rear, and the pace was slow—too much so, according to some authorities, to test the staying powers of Chitabob. When the field had run a little more than a mile, Pinzon took the lead from Scottish Fusilier, who gradually dropped back from that point until he was hopelessly tailed off in the background. The pace improved after Pinzon had gone to the front, and it soon told upon Nunthorpe, who ran as if he was sadly deficient in staying power. Chitabob, on the contrary, galloped on with remarkable freedom, and presently he dashed past Pinzon as though he were about to win by many lengths; but from the distance Fagan eased him so much that that careful jockey Osborne was enabled to reach his girths at the winning-post with Pinzon. Fagan may have been fully justified in making Chitabob slacken his speed to such an extent; we offer no opinion upon the question; but it is one upon which there was considerable difference of opinion. Immediately after the race, the odds of nearly 2 to 1 on Donovan were reduced to 6 to 4; Chitabob rose from nearly 7 to 1 to 3½ to 1, Nunthorpe fell from 16 to 1 down to 50 to 1, and Scottish Fusilier from 66 to 1 to 100 to 1, while the same odds were offered against Quartus, who had been backed three weeks earlier at 25 to 1. Even Pinzon was sent to 40 to 1, and for the moment only Donovan and Chitabob seemed to be considered in the race at all. Rumours that Donovan had become a roarer, although eagerly contradicted, tended to lessen his stability in the betting market. Chitabob's victory for the Great Yorkshire Stakes rather increased than diminished the controversies as to his ailments. Why, it was asked, had he shirked so many engagements? Was it from rheumatism or was it from unsoundness? Was it true that he sometimes struck the fetlocks of his forelegs with his hind feet? Had he what is technically known as "a leg"? Was there anything in the rumour that there was something wrong with his knees? Every day the reports of his gallops were eagerly watched in the sporting papers, and instead of the dull affair that had been anticipated, the St. Leger became a race of absorbing interest. Throughout last week, until Friday, the distinction in favouritism between Donovan and Chitabob gradually, but steadily, lessened. Others besides bookmakers had laid freely against Mr. Perkins's colt, and there was now a rush to back him, with a view to escaping from the possible dilemma of having to pay bets which had been speculatively laid against him at something like 14 to 1. On Thursday he stood at 7 to 4, and, for a time, the convulsion in the betting market caused by his sudden favouritism could only be compared to a panic on the Stock Exchange. A reaction set in on Friday; on Monday he was slightly lame after exercise; on Tuesday 6 to 1 was laid against him, and he finally started at 5 to 1.

Although the St. Leger was at first regarded as a "one-horse" and afterwards as a "two-horse" race, people who liked to back horses at long prices carefully studied the merits of the outsiders. After all, thought they, horseflesh was but mortal, and Donovan might fall lame or "go amiss," while many things were more unlikely than that Chitabob might have a return of the mysterious malady which had already prevented him from competing for several valuable stakes this season. Mr. Douglas Baird's Enthusiast, an own brother to Energy, although the winner of the Two Thousand and the Sussex Stakes, and the only horse that had beaten Donovan this year, was by no means a favourite for the St. Leger during the greater part of the summer. He was supposed to be, like his famous brother, only a "miler," and it was thought that he would have little or no chance of winning over the mile and three-quarters of the St. Leger course. For exactly the opposite reason some people fancied Sir Robert Jardine's Lord Lorne, who had won the Ascot Stakes, over two miles, by three lengths. He is a beautiful mover and well shaped; but he had scarcely size and substance enough to claim selection as a St. Leger horse. In addition to his staying powers, he had shown speed by winning a Biennial at Ascot and the Drawing-room Stakes at Goodwood over a mile and a mile and a quarter; yet in the last-named race he had only beaten the Duke of Hamilton's Scottish Fusilier by a head, and Scottish Fusilier had been "a bad last" for the Great Yorkshire Stakes. The admirers of Lord Lorne, however, contended that his victory over Scottish Fusilier, although gained by so narrow a margin, had been in reality a very easy one. Now that Quartus, Pinzon, Workington, and Nunthorpe had been so lately "run through" or scratched, Enthusiast and Lord Lorne were almost the only horses with any pretensions to St. Leger honours available to backers, and Enthusiast was established as third favourite last week. For a short time Lord Lorne was as good a favourite; but he fell down on his way to the station on Monday, and he started at 100 to 1.

As a general rule, the second in the Derby might be supposed to have a good claim to be second or third favourite for the St. Leger; but Mr. J. Gretton's black colt, Miguel, held no such position. He had been second in three and unplaced in two races this year, and the common opinion formed of him was that, although he had plenty of quality of a certain kind, he was without the size or the substance of a first-class colt; moreover, his Derby form had been reversed at Ascot with both Morglay and Gulliver, after odds had been laid upon him in each instance.

Usually some filly is a leading favourite for the St. Leger, as that race takes place in what is traditionally known as the "mare's month." This year, however, the fillies had apparently no claim whatever to St. Leger honours. It is true that the winner of the Oaks, Lord Randolph Churchill's L'Abbesse de Jouarre, might have been expected to take rank among the St. Leger favourites; but she had finished three lengths behind Pinzon and Workington at Stockton; and, as Chitabob had beaten Pinzon in a canter at York, she did not seem to have the remotest chance of winning the St. Leger. Lord Bradford is one of those fine sportsmen who likes to be represented in the St. Leger, even without hope of profit; so it was a pleasure to see his colt, Davenport, starting for it, small as was his prospect of victory. Taken as a whole, the St. Leger field was a fairly representative one, as it comprised the winners of the Derby, Two Thousand, and Oaks.

Wednesday afternoon was hot and oppressive, and most of the twelve competitors for the St. Leger were already sweating, while some, including the favourite, were absolutely lathering, when they came out for the race. The field got off without trouble, and Mr. Lowther's Cheroot made the running for Workington and his stable companion, Pinzon, who headed the second division, which consisted, besides himself, of Lord Lorne and Davenport, while the two favourites, as well as the winners of the Two Thousand and the Oaks, with Workington composed the third. When ascending the hill, Cheroot held a lead of about three lengths, and there was a clear interval, again, between the second and third departments. Just before reaching the Red House, Pinzon took the lead, accompanied by Workington and Davenport, and, at a short interval, came Donovan, Chitabob, and Lord Lorne. At the mile-post, Pinzon was beaten, and at the bend, Workington and Davenport, who had been left in front, were passed by Donovan and Chitabob. There was intense excitement as the two favourites raced against each other from that point to the distance, where it is said that Fagan, who was riding Chitabob, distinctly felt that the colt faltered. The least hesitation in so close a race was fatal, and as soon as defeat became certain he eased his "mount," who was pulled up lame. Donovan was now left to win as he liked, and he finished three lengths in front of Miguel, who, by running second, confirmed his Derby form. Lord Bradford's Davenport ran third, three lengths behind Miguel, and the immediate effect of the St. Leger, so far as future events were concerned, was to make Davenport first favourite for the Cesarewitch at 6 or 7 to 1.

In consequence of Chitabob's crippled condition, the St. Leger was no test of the relative merits of that colt and Donovan, and it is probable that they will never be decided. It was the general opinion of horse-critics that, with the exception of Chitabob, the competitors for the St. Leger were below the average in appearance. By winning the St. Leger, Donovan brought his own total winnings, in stakes alone, to 44,562*l.*, and his owner's, for the as yet unfinished season, to 60,218*l.* It is now pretty generally agreed that he "makes a noise"; whether he is a roarer or not remains to be proved. If he is one, he will have followed in the footsteps of at least five other roarers (Ossian, Dutch Oven, Ormonde, Kilwarlin, and Seabreeze) in winning the St. Leger. Very large sums have undoubtedly been lost through the defeat of Chitabob; yet, upon the whole, the race was a very bad one for professional bookmakers; for even during the spasmodic favouritism of Chitabob, not a few backers availed themselves of the opportunity of investing upon Donovan on better terms than before. The attendance is believed by competent authorities to have been the largest ever seen on Doncaster Town Moor. In the inclosures the crowd was highly inconvenient, nor was the pleasure of the day increased by the sultry atmosphere, the cloudy sky, the mist which made it difficult to distinguish a jockey's colours in the distance, or the rain which fell after the racing was over.

PROFESSOR FLOWER'S ADDRESS TO THE BRITISH ASSOCIATION.

THE British Association has already held two meetings at Newcastle-on-Tyne. Each of these gatherings was unusually numerous and successful; the second of them, presided over by Sir W. G. (now Lord) Armstrong, in 1863, was attended by 3,335 persons, and was the largest on record until the Manchester meeting in 1887, at which 3,838 were present. It is hardly to be expected that Newcastle should recover its place at the head of the list, but with a President so generally and deservedly popular as Professor Flower, and with inducements so great and varied as those offered by the Reception Committee at Newcastle, the meeting cannot fail to be a great success.

The President's address in 1863 was chiefly devoted to a record of the progress of the mechanical arts since 1838—the date of the first meeting at Newcastle; and, in conclusion, he expressed the "hope that, when the time again comes round to receive the British Association in this town, its members will find the interval to have been as fruitful as the corresponding period on which we now look back." That hope has certainly been fulfilled, though some of Lord Armstrong's aspirations are not yet accomplished. We have not yet (thank God!) adopted a metric system of measurements. Neither have we, as a nation, paid much attention to our wasteful expenditure of fuel, but continue, with true British improvidence, to shut our eyes to the rapidly approaching epoch when our coalfields will be exhausted, and our prosperity as a nation more than imperilled.

Professor Flower, as was to be expected, has not followed the lead of his predecessor, though he has devoted the latter part of his address to a subject to which Sir W. G. Armstrong called special attention as one of the newest and most important questions in natural science. He has chosen, for the first and larger portion, a subject on which, owing to his experience formerly at the College of Surgeons and recently at the British Museum of Natural History, he is exceptionally qualified to speak. This is the function and use of museums. His remarks, of course, have a more direct application to museums of natural history (adopting the popular term, on the use of which he makes some valuable comments); but they may be applied, with due modification, to a museum of any kind. These remarks are prefaced by a brief sketch of the history of the word and the growth of such institutions, from which we learn that the foundation or the maintenance of a museum at the expense of a State or a municipality is an idea less than two centuries old. After some interesting historical details, Professor Flower passes on to indicate the defects which even now are too often conspicuous in museums, and the aims which their supporters should keep steadily in view.

Among the former the want of due provision for management and the absence of any definite plan in forming the collection are generally the most prominent. It seems to be commonly supposed that, in order to secure the success of a museum, it is enough "to provide a building and cases and a certain number of specimens, no matter exactly what, to fill them." On the contrary, as Professor Flower points out, the work has only then begun. "What a museum really depends upon for its success and usefulness is not its building, not its cases, not even its specimens, but its curator. He and his staff are the life and soul of the institution, upon whom its whole value depends, and yet to many—I may say to most of our museums—they are the last to be thought of." Thousands of pounds are often lavished on a sumptuous edifice, which is sometimes actually ill adapted for its purpose owing to its efforts at architectural splendour; valuable collections are acquired by purchase or by gift, and it is then supposed that a salary such as would be paid to a second-class clerk in one of the less important Government offices will secure the services of a person who is competent to arrange these and render them of real educational value. It follows then, as the outcome of Professor Flower's remarks, that it is idle for a municipality to found a museum without first counting the cost. It must be fully prepared, not only for an immediate expenditure of so many thousand pounds for the building, cases, and contents, but also for a considerable annual charge for maintenance. If it is not prepared to submit to the latter, the idea had better be abandoned. An ill-arranged museum has no educational value; an ill-managed one becomes too often "a trap into which precious—sometimes priceless—objects often fall only to be destroyed."

But the question will probably be put by some:—"What should be the definite aim of those to whom the management of a museum is committed?" To this Professor Flower's reply is no less valuable than his criticism:—"Two objects, quite distinct and sometimes even conflicting, should be kept in view in the formation and maintenance of a museum." These may be briefly designated "research" and "instruction." Equal stress will not, and obviously should not, be laid upon them in all museums. In a national museum, such as that over which Professor Flower himself so admirably presides, the one should hardly be less prominent than the other, but if preference must be given, this, as he implicitly affirms, should be to the needs of research. In a local museum the curators should aim at the instruction of the many rather than the exclusive benefit of the few, though no effort should be spared to make all collections, illustrative of the neighbourhood, as rich as possible. Professor Flower, in a few sentences, admirably enunciates the principles on which the specimens intended "for the instruction of the general visitor" should be arranged:—

In the first place, their numbers must be strictly limited, according to the nature of the subject to be illustrated and the space available. None must be placed too high or too low for ready examination. There must be no crowding of specimens one behind the other, every one being perfectly and distinctly seen, and with a clear space around it. . . . If an object is worth putting into a gallery at all, it is worth such a position as will enable it to be seen. Every specimen exhibited should be good of its kind, and all available skill and care should be spent upon its preservation, and rendering it capable of teaching the lesson it is intended to convey. . . . The purpose for which each specimen is exhibited, and the main lesson to be derived from it must be distinctly indicated by the labels affixed, both as headings of the various divisions of the series and to the individual specimens. A well-arranged educational museum has been defined as a collection of instructive labels illustrated by well-selected specimens, and this is more true than it seems at first.

These and many like suggestive remarks give a more than transitory value to this portion of Professor Flower's address, for they should be studied by all who are responsible for the maintenance or contemplate the foundation of a museum. They are best illustrated—though that, as might be expected, is rather left to inference than directly stated—by the British Museum of Natural History at South Kensington. Those who have watched its development since its migration from Bloomsbury to its present magnificent, though by no means ideally perfect quarters, know well how greatly it has increased in value as an instrument of education. The young student is no longer bewildered by the vast size of the collections, but finds excellent specimens admirably selected to help him over the earlier stages of his work; while the facilities provided for research are in no way diminished. To the authorities of the British Museum students of all ranks in the metropolis owe a debt of gratitude.

In the latter part of his address Professor Flower quits the practical questions with which so large a part of his own time is occupied to touch upon matters of yet wider scientific interest. As we have said, his predecessor in 1863, at the close of his address, referred to the questions which had been raised by the publication, then comparatively recent, of Darwin's Origin of Species. This alone would naturally suggest some remarks upon the present state of opinion in regard to these questions; but, after the publication during the last few months of two works so important as Darwinism, by Mr. A. R. Wallace (to whose modesty and self-abnegation Professor Flower pays a well-deserved tribute), and the Essays upon Heredity, by Dr. August Weismann, it would have been difficult for the President of the British Association, and impossible for one who is also President of the Zoological Society, to avoid some mention of the subject. The result of thirty years of debate, at first not a little acrimonious, is thus enunciated by Professor Flower:—

I think I may safely premise that few, if any, original workers at any branch of biology appear now to entertain serious doubt about the general truth of the doctrine that all existing forms of life have been derived from other forms, by a natural process of descent with modification.

But, though the discoveries of palæontology during the period mentioned above have greatly strengthened the evidence in favour of this conclusion, "it can scarcely afford any help in solving the more difficult problems which still remain as to the methods by which the changes have been brought about." A full discussion of the solutions which have been proposed is, of course, impossible in the limits at Professor Flower's command; but his remarks, though brief, are suggestive. They directly utter a caution, they indirectly submit a plea, both of which are much needed at the present time. As regards the former, in discussions on the question of "natural selection," an "appeal is constantly made to the advantage, the utility, or otherwise, of special organs, or modifications of organs or structures, to their possessors." Is it not often assumed, far too confidently, that this appeal can be answered?

How can we [Professor Flower asks], with our limited powers of observation and limited capacity of imagination, venture to pronounce an opinion as to the fitness or unfitness for its complex surroundings of some peculiar modification of structure found in some strange animal dredged up from the abysses of the ocean, or which passes its life in the dim seclusion of some tropical forest, and into the essential conditions of whose existence we have at present no possible means of putting ourselves in any sort of relation?

The plea, which is rather left for inference than directly stated, is for the more comprehensive study of Natural History. At the present time science undoubtedly is suffering from overspecialization, and from excessive devotion to minute details. The botanist is almost lost in the physiologist; a student fancies himself a zoologist when he has cut up a worm into the greatest possible number of thin slices, and devoted himself wholly to the study of these with the most powerful lenses which can be obtained from the optician. From this method of research too often springs, in all branches of Natural History, a copious crop of memoirs, replete with the most careful observations of the most minute details, and concluding with inductions which are worse than worthless. Science, as Professor Huxley remarked in a presidential address to the Royal Society, is now in danger of perishing, like Tarpeia, under the weight of the gifts which are heaped upon her. The vast mass of scientific literature, to wade through which is by many esteemed not only a duty but also a meritorious action; the exaggerated value attached to minute details; the facility with which reputation can be won in a field of work properly narrowed, unless checked, will make the existence of a Darwin or a Wallace almost impossible in the near future. Work in the library and work in the laboratory have each their value, and it is great; but these cannot replace the study of nature beneath the open sky and in many lands, nor will they alone qualify the student to solve the greater problems which are presented to him, either by the crust of the earth or by the organisms which it supports.

EXHIBITION OF EGYPTIAN ANTIQUITIES.

MR. FLINDERS PETRIE cannot choose his own time for his annual exhibition of Egyptian antiquities. It is only, in fact, by dint of months of hard work that the objects found last season are unpacked, mounted, arranged, and labelled in time for exhibition in the late autumn. Before this long and laborious process could even be commenced, the specimens had to be received by sea from Egypt; and it must be remembered that, when everything possible had been done in that country to propitiate the superior powers to obtain leave for the removal of ever so many cases of contraband antiquities, and to arrange matters with the very strict Custom-House authorities, there still remained the French red-tape establishment which we have helped to set up, for our own chastening, at Boulak. Mr. Petrie is not in the habit of scamping his work, and, as we have already in past years had such good occasion to know, goes to his diggings, not only determined, literally, to leave no stone unturned which can by any possibility bear or conceal the fragment of a hieroglyph, but to turn that stone himself with his own hands. Yet, if we could catechize him as to his year's work, we should probably find that this manual labour, under a hot sun, surrounded by uncongenial and semi-savage hordes of workmen, was but child's play compared to that which had to be accomplished, first at Boulak, where each thing had to be examined and seized or passed, as the case might be; then in packing so that no breakages might occur, and also no confusion arise between different finds; and, finally, in reading and weighing and measuring each object before it could be ready for exhibition.

This year Mr. Petrie has taken rooms in the building known as Oxford Mansion, which stands on the site formerly occupied by the picturesque Oxford Market, close to Regent Circus, north. The rooms are immediately under those of the Royal Archaeological Institute, and the exhibition will be open to the public for a fortnight from Monday next. Although we cannot expect anything quite so novel and startling as the second-century portraits shown last year at the Egyptian Hall, the present exhibition will prove, if we mistake not, of even greater historical importance, containing, as it does, what we have never seen in England before, a large and representative collection of the implements, ornaments, manufactures, and other relics of the remote time of the twelfth dynasty, the dynasty best known to us by the famous, but fast perishing, grottoes of Beni Hassan. It will be remembered by a visitor to the British Museum that objects of this period are conspicuous by their absence in that institution; and, in truth, they were nearly as rare at Boulak. There may be more of them than we suspect in the British Museum, brought in at a time when no invidious distinctions were made between Egyptian periods, and when, as in the works of Sharpe and Wilkinson, Ancient Egypt was Ancient Egypt, whether under the Ptolemies or the Pyramid builders, under the Twelfth Dynasty or the Twenty-sixth, under Usertasen or Rameses. To roll away this reproach from the reputation of our English school of Egyptology—for we may be said to have a little school, at last—has been Mr. Petrie's object in all his researches; and we confess to a feeling akin to jealousy when we hear that he proposes, during part of the coming winter, to devote his remarkable energies to exploration in another Eastern country than that of his great previous discoveries.

The Twelfth Dynasty relics are from the site of a village formerly known as Kahoun, an Arab name which savours strongly of ancient Egypt. They are exhibited in the small room on the right of the passage, and comprise all kinds of household, domestic, and agricultural implements, such as netting and cloth, with portions of looms; wooden sickles, with flint edges; sandals; staves; carpenters' tools; adzes, picks, shovels, and other objects of the kind, chiefly in wood; as well as a very fine set of copper tools in a wicker-basket, with moulds for casting them. There is quite a small museum of children's toys, balls, tops, dolls, and other objects, and by them the rude, square coffers of wood in which children's mummies were found buried for the most part under the floors of the houses. Among these is the brown, wax-like face of a baby, a little cherub, once, no doubt, four thousand years ago, or more. The sculptures, some of them brilliantly coloured, with inscriptions in the beautiful writing of that period, are curious, and among them the fragmentary knee in basalt, of what was once a statue of Usertasen II. Three objects deserve special mention. A whole treatise might be written on a small figure of a masquerade dancer, in wood, with a pair of ivory clappers, or castanets, the mask consisting of the head of the god Bes, hitherto supposed to have come into Egypt at a much later period. In the same case is a full-sized pasteboard mask, representing the same features—a unique discovery. A bronze mirror, with a large ivory handle, is a handsome object and much more conspicuous than the fire-stick which hangs near it on the wall, and which may be described as the rarest thing in the whole collection.

In the passage are fragments of pottery bearing inscriptions or single letters, chiefly in archaic Greek and in the writing now generally recognized as Cypriote. In the larger room are the later objects found at another village in the Fayoum named Gurob. Among these is the coffin of a man described as "a foreigner," in the reign of Seti I.; the upper half of a Roman matron of pronounced features, with a lighted taper in one hand; and a bronze mirror of very Asiatic type, the handle formed of a single figure. The amulets, arranged as found; the beautiful necklaces of gold, beads, and precious stones; the personal relics, such as the painters' palettes; the wreaths of olive-leaves; the very curious glazed pottery vessels, among them a bowl, on which is figured a date orchard and boys robbing it, of the nineteenth dynasty, or contemporary with Moses—these and many other wonderful things should be seen if possible. We trust some of the Twelfth-dynasty discoveries may find their way into the British Museum.

LIME LIGHT ON THE STRIKE.

"WHO conceived the wicked story
Told about those worthy men
Whose demeanour, even the Tory
And the wretched Upper Ten
Recognize as shedding glory
On their leaders, Burns and "Ben"?

"Who has slung the shameful fable
(And to gain what profit by it?)
'Gainst these injured heroes, able
To remain so nobly quiet,
And amid their patrons' Babel,
To refrain from crime and riot.

"These that as the crown and flower
Of our unskilled labourers rank,
These who, since they have the power,
Every day we warmly thank
That they do not mine the Tower,
Fire the Thames, or sack the Bank;

"Take not even to window-smashing,
Capital's alarm to awaken;
Nay, disdain to indulge in 'bashing'
Those who have their places taken;
But content themselves with cashing
Charity cheques with calm unshaken?"

Thus, I asked, exasperated,
Reading, amid other lies,
What some base reporters prated,
Headed thus:—"A Docker shies"
(That's the way the thing was stated)
"Quicklime in a blackleg's eyes."

Such a horrid fabrication
Gave me quite a shock internal.
What could be the sham foundation
For this calumny infernal?
So I turned for explanation
To my favourite Radical journal.

Ah! what wisdom 'tis like-minded
 News-sheets in such case to choose;
 Comfort we may always find hid
 In a print that holds our views.
 Thus I read about the "blinded"
 Blackleg in the D-ly N-ws:—

"*These the facts are as we've found them,
 Pickets were this man approaching
 [As they do with men to sound them,
 Not upon their rights encroaching],
 And a crowd had gathered round them
 While the question was a-broaching.*

"*'Chuck up Norwood, won't you? Scout him,
 Working for him is a crime,
 While the pickets thus up-rout him
 Comes a man who works in lime,
 Flinging lime at large about him
 [Some will do it all the time].*

"*Pickets seized the man disgusted,
 And, while crying 'Stow that, Bill, do,
 If your jacket-back we dusted
 For your larks, we shouldn't ill do,'
 From his fists the quick-lime busted
 [As, with half a chance, it will do].*

"*They had striven in vain to shake it
 From his grasp with several tries,
 When its quickness needs must make it,
 To the general surprise,
 Fly like that, and luck must take it Straight into the blackleg's eyes."*

Thus then dies the idle story
 Told about these splendid men,
 Never more to gull the Tory
 Or the foolish Upper Ten;
 Never more to dim the glory
 Shining upon Burns and "Ben."

REVIEWS.

LORD DALHOUSIE.*

CONSCIOUS of having deserved well of the State and the people, and with pardonable contempt of the superficial and ill-informed criticism on the Sepoy Mutiny, Lord Dalhousie, in the closing years of his life, directed in his will that no portion of his papers should be made public for at least fifty years after his death. The year 1910, therefore, is the earliest date when the opinion of the Governor-General about the striking events of his own administration and the able men by whom he was splendidly served can be known to the public. Many of his State papers, however, are already public property. But, like other statesmen who have filled high offices, he corresponded privately with all sorts of functionaries, high and low. He was in close communication with Sir Charles Wood, then President of the Board of Control, and with the Secret Committee and the Chairman of the Court of Directors. He often wrote demi-officially to Residents at Native Courts, Political Agents, and Chief Commissioners. And he is believed to have kept copies of everything that he penned. But the reserve which a statesman of a high, noble, and sensitive spirit imposed on himself and others is no reason why some account of his life and policy should not now be included in the series of Statesmen, edited by Mr. Lloyd Sandars. In Captain Trotter the editor has found a contributor quite equal to the task. And if his clear, concise, and animated pages may become the occasion for some expressions of dissent and a little captious criticism on the part of Parochial and third-rate Parliamentary censors, impartial readers will find in this neat red volume a succinct account of an important part of history as it was controlled by far-reaching and constructive statesmanship. Lord Dalhousie, in 1857-8, never condescended to answer his assailants. Captain Trotter is not the first writer who has vindicated his memory, but he has done it fearlessly and well.

James Andrew Ramsay was the third son of the ninth Earl of Dalhousie. His father, who fought at Waterloo, had filled the offices of Governor-General of Canada and Commander-in-Chief in India, and it has been said that the son would have left his own mark on wars and campaigns had he followed his father's profession. He was much younger than his predecessor in the Governor-Generalship, Lord Hardinge, who had stood by the dying Moore at Corunna, three years before Lord Dalhousie was born. James Ramsay was educated at Harrow, under the first Dr. Butler; and Cardinal Manning was one of his schoolfellows. At Oxford among his contemporaries were his two successors in India, Lord Canning and Lord Elgin, Dean Liddell and Mr. Gladstone. The death of his eldest brother, then Lord Ramsay, interrupted his academical reading, and the future Governor-General became heir to the earldom, the second son, Charles, having died years before. The new Lord Ramsay went in for a pass, and was rewarded by the Examiners with an Honorary Fourth. It was sometimes said in those times, when the division into "Smalls," "Mods," and "Greats" was unknown, that undergraduates who could not achieve a first or second in Classics preferred a fourth to a tame third class; later the fourth was a terror suggesting, not that a man was too good for Pass, but that he had tried for Class and failed. In the year 1837, after an unsuccessful attempt to carry Edinburgh against such opponents as "Jock Campbell," afterwards Chief Justice and Chancellor, and Mr. Abercromby, who became Speaker, Lord Ramsay entered the House as member for the county of Haddington. In 1838 he succeeded to the earldom of Dalhousie, as tenth Earl. Three years before this he had married Lady Susan Hay, daughter of the Marquess of Tweeddale, who about 1846 was Governor of Madras. By this time Lord Dalhousie's abilities had attracted the notice of Sir Robert Peel, who made him Vice-President, and ultimately President, of the Board of Trade. In this capacity he had to scrutinize the numerous railway schemes due to the unparalleled commercial activity of 1844-5, and it is now admitted by competent judges that much expense, time, and litigation would have been saved had the Prime Minister adopted his lieutenant's plan for placing all railways under the control of the State. Captain Trotter uses the term "management," but Lord Dalhousie's intention was to entrust Government with power to step in, maintain order and sequence, and prevent expensive and unnecessary competition and rivalry. Towards the end of 1847, when Peel's Ministry had resigned, the Governor-Generalship of India was offered to Lord Dalhousie by Lord John Russell; and on the 12th of January, 1848, the veteran of Albuera and Sobraon, on the steps to the north of Government House, Calcutta, welcomed the new ruler, who was about the same age as Wellesley when the latter began his Indian career. It is not too much to say that he was destined to equal that statesman in his foreign policy and surpass him in domestic reforms. Captain Trotter very properly assumes, on the part of his readers, some fair acquaintance with the second Sikh campaign, the pacification of the Punjab, the second Burmese war, which ended in the annexation of Pegu, and the annexation of Berar, Oudh, and other smaller principalities. We shall confine our remarks to the main features of Lord Dalhousie's policy, in the belief that the time has now come when not a few misconceptions may be cleared up and some injustice be remedied.

The late Sir Charles Jackson, who had been Advocate-General in Bengal, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Bombay, and then Puisne Judge of the High Court of Calcutta, in an excellent volume published a quarter of a century ago, reviewed the lapses and annexations which had been talked of as so many high crimes and misdemeanours, and, like the impartial judge he was, dismissed the suit of the grievance-mongers with all costs. The subjugation of the Punjab, the first of these so-called iniquities, has by all but a very small set of bilious and malignant writers been fully ratified and endorsed. The last annexation—that of Oudh—was the deliberate act of an English Cabinet. The incorrigible race of kings whom we ourselves created out of Nawabs at the close of the last century had been reprimanded, forewarned, denounced, and threatened by one Governor-General after another for more than fifty years. Lord Dalhousie, nearly worn out with unremitting toil, was at first rather averse to the annexation of the province, but intimated to the Court of Directors and to the President of the Board of Control that he was willing to remain at his post and to carry out any changes, if it were thought that such were better entrusted to a ruler full of knowledge and experience than to a successor who had a good deal to learn. So far from this act springing out of ambition, lust of conquest, or the like, it was truly described "as the last sacrifice made on the altar of duty." But between the Punjab and Oudh there were divers other acquisitions for which it has been said that Lord Dalhousie invented new doctrines; and further that he was at all times overbearing, regardless of the feelings of the Chiefs, and ready to set aside the stipulations of treaties. Sir John Kaye, in allusion to Sattara, Nagpore, and Jhansi, wrote as if they had been stolen or appropriated by what he calls a "new and appalling doctrine of lapse." Captain Trotter proves incontestably that there was no such terrible novelty in the doctrine or its application. It had been ruled long before Lord Dalhousie's time that no chief was at liberty to adopt an heir to his principality without the permission of the British Government. Such claims had been disallowed in the reigns of Lord William Bentinck and Lord Auckland. Small States had also "lapsed" in 1841 and 1843, and it was then intimated that the Government would persevere in the clear and direct course of not abandoning such just accessions of territory and revenue. Refusal and concessions, often the former, had similarly been known in the Moghul times. When the Rajput chief of Kerowli died without an heir, Lord Dalhousie, out of consideration for the traditions of ancient houses, specially referred the case to the Court of Directors; and Kerowli did not lapse. The case of Nagpore was much weaker. No Mahratta house was more than a hundred and fifty years old. The Raja before his death had made no adoption, nor had he given any Rani leave to adopt. The mass of the inhabitants, who had experience of our equitable administration in the early part of this century, were quite ready to accept our rule. In fact, in this and in all other instances, Lord Dalhousie acted in the interests of vast communities and not in that of the Ranis and their paid agents; and it would not have been statesmanship, but foolish sentiment, to revive an extinct dynasty on the chance that every now and then we might have one or two bright exceptions to a long line of despots of the familiar Asiatic type. When Lord Canning in a very noble State paper, written after the Mutiny, guaranteed to the Chiefs and Princes the privilege of adoption, loyalty and good behaviour were made the conditions of the grant. While there was a military despotism at Lahore, while Oudh was the nursery of soldiers, and might at any time become a field of battle, while Nagpore intervened between the Presidencies of Bengal and Bombay, Lord Canning's admirable policy would have been impossible and premature. In the time of his predecessor the doctrine of one supreme, controlling, Paramount Power was by no means universally accepted. It had been sketched by Warren Hastings, improved by Wellesley, and acted on fearlessly by Dalhousie. After Lord Canning all reasonable doubts were set at rest. But, it may still be argued, you have to explain away the Mutiny, and this would be a hard task, even for Mr. Gladstone. Why did not Lord Dalhousie, with all his experience and his school of devoted followers, forecast this terrible struggle for supremacy? The simple answer is that, with an overgrown, pampered, and now and then insubordinate native army, and a rooted belief in its virtues on the part of everybody, the Mutiny was a mere question of opportunity and time. Sir Charles Napier himself, when the 66th Native Infantry showed signs of disobedience, would not allow "a few mutinous and discontented scoundrels" to tarnish the reputation of the whole Sepoy force. The fidelity to their salt of Pandya and Purbea, their devotion to the Company, their readiness to follow wherever the Englishman might lead, their social merits, had been celebrated by a host of writers since the days of Clive and Arcot. Grey-haired English commanders to the very end believed in the honour and good faith of their respective regiments, were met with swelling protestations about the Company's salt in the morning, and had to flee or were shot down by the same men in the afternoon. But Lord Dalhousie, when he spared two regiments for service in the Crimea, had protested against weakening the English army in India for the necessities of a Continental war. And in some of his latest minutes he proposed to reduce the native army by fourteen thousand men, to double the number of English artillerymen, and to increase proportionally the Queen's forces, horse and foot. That he recommended little or nothing for the Sepoy was because that soldier's condition was hardly capable of improvement; and at the time of the Santal mutiny of 1855 he warned both his employers and his successors never to reckon on peace or on the absence of a disturbing element in India for even a single day.

* Statesmen Series. Edited by Lloyd C. Sandars. The Marquess of Dalhousie. By Captain L. J. Trotter, Author of "India under Victoria." London: W. H. Allen & Co. 1889.

If we turn from acquisitions of provinces and kingdoms, which for a time were popularly believed to occupy the Governor-General to the exclusion of every other subject, the depth and variety of Lord Dalhousie's internal reforms would do honour to a Cornwallis or a Bentinck. His Railway Minute, of one hundred and one paragraphs in length, laid the foundation and has ensured the development of Indian railways, as they now cross the Empire in all directions, doubling our military strength, tempering the severity of famines, imparting vigour, force, and directness to every executive agency. In the space of two years he connected the three Presidency towns, and all the important military and many of the civil stations, by the electric wire. That India has long had the benefit of a one-anna postage, or little more than a penny, is due, not exactly, as Captain Trotter puts it, to the Postmaster-General, but to a Special Commission, in which Bengal was represented by the late Sir C. Beadon, Bombay by Mr. Courtney, and Madras by Mr. Forbes. In other departments constructive vigour was equally conspicuous. Lord Dalhousie created a Secretariat for the Department of Public Works in each governorship, abolishing a controversial, lumbering, dilatory Board which had done nothing but write angry minutes and neglect bridges and roads. In the legislative department of his Council he had for his colleagues the late Mr. Drinkwater Bethune and Sir Barnes Peacock; and a variety of equitable and much-needed laws were passed. One Act ensured liberty of conscience to converts by protecting their rights of succession and inheritance. A second repealed the old law against usury. Others were passed to put down gang robbery and dacoity, to encourage native emigration to the Mauritius and the West Indies, and to protect public officers against the consequences of acts done in good faith and in excess of their legal powers. There are many instances of turbulence and disaffection where a magistrate must act first and receive an indemnity afterwards. Without always putting new legislative irons in the fire, it was Lord Dalhousie's maxim to get as much as possible out of the laws already in existence, and to impress all his subordinates, from the Board at Lahore to the Magistrate and the Deputy Commissioner, with a conviction that things had to be done. He told Rajput chiefs, in his own forcible language, that they must not practise or connive at Suttee; Thakoor, in the same country, that witches were not to be swung nor lepers buried alive; Rajputs, in the North-West Provinces, that the costliness of marriage ceremonies was no excuse for wholesale female infanticide; Boards of Revenue, that they must not be guilty of "unparalleled presumption"; Commissioners of Division, that they were not to mar military combinations by needless fears for the safety of a civil station; and the titular Nawab of Bengal that he had forfeited some of his privileges and would find a diminution in the guns of his salute, because he had allowed a wretched servant to be beaten to death with clubs at the very door of his tent. And with all these censures, which spared neither native prince nor English general, no one was more ready to recognize and reward merit, to encourage rising ability, to discern the civil or the military servant best fitted to reduce a province to order, to warn or to conciliate a refractory or misguided prince, to preside in a Supreme Court of Appeal, or to form and work a new department. It was truly said when the Court of Proprietors of India Stock on his retirement voted him a pension of 5,000*l.* a year, that in all the vexed and varied questions which came before a Viceroy for solution there was "nothing difficult which he did not render more easy; crooked which he did not make straight; intricate which he did not unravel; and vast and extensive which he did not embrace." If he committed errors, like all of us, we do not find them detailed in Captain Trotter's narrative; and if they can be collected from other sources, they were the errors of a resolute, noble, and high-minded Scotchman. One or two eminent men failed to understand Lord Dalhousie's character, and went down in the tournament like Brian de Bois Guilbert before the lance of Ivanhoe. Sir C. Napier entirely mistook his opponent, and in their celebrated controversy the views of the Governor-General in opposition to the Commander-in-Chief were approved by the Duke of Wellington himself. Sir Henry Lawrence was not so unfortunate as Napier; but he either could not or would not comprehend the master whom he had to serve. In a lesser degree this same defect was apparent in General Hastings Fraser, the Resident at Hyderabad. With his colleagues, his lieutenants, and high provincial authorities, his relations were almost always satisfactory; and he was fully supported by the better part of the Anglo-Indian press. What Lord Dalhousie did for John Lawrence, and what Lawrence under him did for the Punjab, for Sikhs, Pathans, and agriculturists, has been often told, and is too well known for repetition here. Lord Dalhousie never showed favouritism, in the ordinary sense of the term. He rebuked presumption, passed over incapacity, and had a keen eye for those qualities of energy, discipline, ability to command, and readiness to obey which were his own marked characteristics. He was often telling his colleagues and followers that the Court of Directors were "your masters and mine," and the Directors, to do them justice, valued and supported their servant and friend.

The end of the biography is rather sad. The retirement from his high post, the private life at home, the meeting with old friends, and the correspondence with former subordinates, the winter residence at Malta, and the gradual failure of a constitution never strong and overtaxed by years of hard work and climate, are all gracefully and quietly told. There is a portrait, but not a very good one, of Lord Dalhousie to be seen at Harrow. An excellent bust, showing the clear-cut features and the high descent, adorns the Town Hall of Haddington. Calcutta has a full-length statue, and an admirable portrait by Watson Gordon, painted after the return home, hangs on one of the staircases of Government House. Changes in India and in public opinion at home forbid us confidently to expect another Dalhousie any more than another Chatham. But there will be room, under any conceivable vicissitudes, for public servants of all grades to profit by a high example. It is in no depreciation of other eminent men who have filled the same office that we select three Indian rulers who stand high above their fellows. The first was impeached. The second is Wellesley. Dalhousie is the third and last.

STORIES.*

THE Kara Yerta Tragedy is, as its title-page implies, a murder story, of which the scene is laid in Australia. It therefore moves and has its being subject to rather narrow limitations. There has to be a mysterious murder of which a virtuous person is unjustly accused; there has to be a faithful being of the opposite sex in love with the accused; there have to be legal proceedings, some of which must be described not absolutely without detail; and the mystery has to be satisfactorily explained both in general and in particular. In two points Mr. Harrison's story bears some resemblance to the late Mr. Fergus's Called Back. These are that, in the first thirty-five pages, a happy situation is constructed with considerable ingenuity, and that the rest of the book is nought. The good situation here is the device whereby the widow of the corpse, without any considerable straining of probabilities, contrives to make a decidedly strong prima facie case against the hero, whose name is Woodstock, and who

* The Kara Yerta Tragedy: an Australian Romance. By J. E. Harrison. London: Walter Scott. 1889.

The Vengeance of Maurice Denalquez. By Selina Dolaro, Author of "Bella Demonica" &c. London: Henry J. Drane. 1889.

Miriam Balestier. A Novel. By Edgar Fawcett, Author of "Olivia Delaplaine" &c. London: Henry J. Drane. 1889.

A Child of Japan; or, the Story of Yone Santo. By Edward H. House, Author of "The Japanese Expedition to Formosa" &c. London: Henry J. Drane. 1889.

Bill Nye's Thinks. London: Brentano. 1889.

Nye and Riley's Railway Guide. By Edgar W. Nye and James Whitcomb Riley. London: Brentano. 1889.

is mate of an ocean mail-steamer. The obvious inference is that the ingenuous reader is intended to suspect Mrs. Thornycroft, the widow, and that Mrs. Thornycroft is, therefore, not guilty. Having got so far the author was in a dilemma. He had either to make Mrs. Thornycroft the criminal or an accessory, which would have been to give up his mystery, or to invent some independent murderer and fit him in with the postulated circumstances. The task was beyond Mr. Harrison, and he fell back on the last resort—no less contemptible than obvious—of introducing a lunatic whose motives were entirely outside the main plot of the story. Romancers of murder cannot lay too closely to their hearts the great principle that the interest of investigating murders, real and imaginary, depends at least as much upon the question why it was done as upon the question how it was done. Mrs. Thornycroft had a reason for wishing her husband to die, and so had Mrs. Thornycroft's strictly virtuous (and rather tiresome) lover, and, if either of them had done it, the story would have had dramatic interest. The lunatic did it because she was mad, and as soon as the wary reader discovers that circumstance—which he is allowed to do a great deal too soon—the story becomes almost as dull as a real crime. Subject to these considerations, Mr. Harrison has done his work rather well. There is a somewhat trifling episode of some futile endeavours of Woodstock's young woman to establish his innocence by means which can hardly fail to recall the adventures of the elder Miss Vanstone in No Name. Also, every here and there occur absolutely unpardonable passages like this:—"How strange it is that in the moments of our intensest feeling we have so often to attend to the ordinary and commonplace duties of life"; and this:—"It [a room of no sort of importance to the plot] was a small but comfortable apartment, containing a round table—on which was a gay-coloured table-cloth, covered with a profusion of books—a pianoforte, two armchairs, and a sofa, besides some old-fashioned horsehair dining-room chairs."

Maurice Denalguez was a Spaniard, and he visited that remarkable metropolis which we are always reading of and which we never see, where they drive in the Row; and "his eyes varied in color as he spoke of varied subjects." He was an old enemy of a fashionable and red-haired but unprincipled widow, whose name was Ethel, and whose friends, therefore, called her Thello. The reason of the enmity was, that before the story began Denalguez had had a brother, who had loved Thello, and whom Thello had loved, and Denalguez had objected, and had told the brother facts to Thello's discredit, whereupon the brother had shot himself, and Denalguez considered that the brother had been morally murdered by Thello, and Thello that he had been morally murdered by Denalguez. Which was right is a question of casuistry unnecessary to adjudicate upon; but as a kind of set off against the startling and disagreeable peculiarity of Denalguez's eyes, already mentioned, it may be recorded that Thello was in the habit of talking to herself like this:—"Oh! my puppets, I hold you in the hollow of my hand, and though the hand is small the grasp is firm. . . . I have so much satisfaction within my reach, that I do not know where to strike first." These two persons, each living mainly for revenge on the other, were brought together through getting mixed up with the affairs of a lady called Edith Warburton, married to a gentleman as dull as herself (which is saying much), and a great deal older, and carrying on a gloomy but harmless flirtation with Sir Reginald Faithorne, a dashing baronet. The consequence ultimately was that "a sharp noise echoed through the room. Philip Warburton had slapped Sir Reginald smartly on both sides of the face"—presumably with both hands at once. Sir Reginald was "thunderstruck for the moment," as he well might be; but immediately afterwards, "indicating the ladies by a wave of the hand, bowed ceremoniously to every one in the room," and went away to arrange the duel. It was worth the trouble; for each man brought two seconds and a surgeon, and all eight were dressed in "most immaculate" black frock coats and tall hats, and they looked like a "conclave of legal crows," whatever those may be, and danced a kind of formal lancers, and then got to work. Warburton, having lost the toss, had to fire with the sun directly in front of him; in spite of which he hit his man, whether or not on both sides of the face is not mentioned. However Sir Reginald soon came right again, and so did everything and everybody else, except Thello.

Where can the sky have "looked so pure and so deep-coloured that it made one think of life in which chastity blends with passion"? Where could a lady villain display her "smile growing ruddier, and her flawless white teeth gleaming behind it in a sort of pearly nudity"? Where could be observed the same lady's "magnificent stride, and her dainty garments blown by the sweet west wind sideways from her sculptural proportions"? Where would a heroine of fiction frankly acknowledge to herself that she was "a liberal-thoughted female"? Where would one not be surprised to see a theatrical manager who was holding his hands "up half-way toward his chin, and was patting the backs of either with the palms of either in an oddly ruminative fashion"? Where would it strike the same gentleman, "in the secret subtleties of his peculiar mentality," not that to have patted the back of your right hand with the palm of your right hand is a feat to be proud of, but that something was the case at once less obvious and less interesting? Where is a person liable to experience "some subtle change . . . trenchant, electric, spiritually molecular"? Of course in the United States of America, and not elsewhere. And, accordingly, in those States, or some of them, were wrought the fortunes of Miriam Balestier, described by Mr. Edgar Fawcett in a style wherein the older and more correct graces of Mr. W. D. Howells struggle for the mastery with the newer and more exciting characteristics of Miss Amelie Rives. Miriam was an actress, and her manager loved her, and took her on tour; but she did not love him. Paula Chalcott, another actress in the same company, did love him; but he did not love her. So one night in the train Paula tried to throw Miriam off the platform of the sleeping-car, and would have carried her fatal purpose out, only an accident happened in the nick of time, and Paula was killed and Miriam was picked up senseless and carried to a neighbouring house, wherein was a youth named Cecil. As soon as Miriam recovered her senses, Cecil began to love her and she began to love him; but he was engaged to somebody else, so Miriam went away, and that's all. Of his two models in style, Mr. Fawcett has forsaken Mr. Howells, and followed Miss Rives as to the important point of length, and he has done well.

"I wonder," says a young American gentleman in A Child of Japan, "how I should relish hearing myself called a 'Yank'!" We extract the passage, partly because it will supply many persons with not altogether unpleasing food for reflection, and partly because the story contains no other of equal interest. Mr. House is of opinion that the people of Japan are undeservedly and intolerably martyred, to the gross and selfish interests of stronger nations, politically by every nation big enough, with a dubious exception in favour of the United States, and socially by every nation, and the United States in particular. To expose these iniquities, he has written a long and earnest story of transcendent dullness. It is about a Japanese girl called Yone, who was greatly ill-treated in childhood, because her parents insisted on her doing household work, and she herself and divers Americans insisted on her going to school at the same time. From these woes she was rescued by a rather wicked elderly doctor, who was very much in love with her, and that after she was married as well as before. However, he had the grace to keep the fact pretty much to himself. Under his instructions Yone laboured at times as a sort of sister of charity, and before long she died, amidst oceans of native and American tears. Before long as young women's lives go, that is; to the patient reader the career of Yone appears to be almost as interminable as it is uninteresting. It is a comfort, however, to find that that particularly deplorable sort of crank whose crankiness consists in yelping about oppressed natives, and calling his own countrymen tyrants and oppressors, exists outside Great Britain.

Some people always occupy themselves in the train. Others are capable of travelling long distances without reading, talking, sleeping, eating, smoking, or writing. Such persons look out of the window at times, but not with the intelligent topographical interest which arises from the active study of maps or guide-books. The occupied ones are a little apt to pity them, and suppose that they must find railway travelling dull. If anybody proud of being able to do things in trains wants to take a broad view, and understand that being able to do nothing in trains also has its advantages, let him procure either Bill Nye's Thinks or Nye and Riley's Railway Guide. Each is a shilling volume, containing pieces in prose or verse in the newest style of "American humour," and anything more tedious than either it would not be possible to conceive.

THE AZORES AND MADEIRA.*

READERS of Cowdray will not be disappointed in their natural expectation that Mrs. Roundell's narrative of her visit to the Azores will be both attractive and interesting. The Azores, which take their name from Açor, a buzzard, or kite, which is probably indigenous to the islands, and which the early settlers at any rate found there in great quantities, are not so often visited by tourists and travellers as they deserve to be. It is true that the voyage has its désagréments; the surrounding seas are rough and stormy, and a more inhospitable-looking, iron-bound coast is seldom to be seen. Only good sailors should trust themselves in those waters where even experienced travellers find it almost impossible to keep an upright position or even to sit down without "holding on." The sufferings of Mrs. Roundell's fellow-passengers are too horrible to relate. Then when one has surmounted the hardships of a rough passage and greasy Portuguese cookery, one feels cut off from the rest of the world. Direct telegraphic communication with England does not exist, and the postal communication is badly managed and very uncertain. Mrs. Roundell was glad of an opportunity to send letters to England by a Norwegian vessel bound to Cardiff. But the hardy traveller, resolved to see none of the lions which obstruct the path of his more easily-discouraged brethren, will find much to repay him for even greater inconveniences than he will be called upon to undergo. We find nothing specially worthy of note in the author's description of Santa Maria, neither will we linger long over her graphic description of San Miguel, where she was much amused by the sight of small carts drawn by sheep as similar vehicles are drawn by dogs in various parts of Europe, and where she studied on the spot the phenomena of the volcanic eruptions formerly so prevalent in that island. If sheep-carts are amusing to see, bullock-carts in the Azores are not pleasant to listen to:—

* A Visit to the Azores; with a Chapter on Madeira. By Mrs. Charles Roundell, Author of "Cowdray: the History of a Great English House." With Illustrations. London: Bickers & Son.

Passing through one village we met three ox-carts, made of wicker-work, and each dragged by six oxen. Their strange wooden wheels, with fixed axles, making a most fearful noise, like that of a circular saw, with the addition of loud groans and wild shrieks. We certainly could not hear our own voices as the carts passed. They are not allowed in the towns on account of their chilrada or noise, but it is supposed to frighten away evil spirits, and every Azorean proudly boasts that he can recognize his cart by its own peculiar shriek.

Even in more civilized Madeira the nuisance exists to a scarcely modified extent:—

As for driving, there is not a wheel in the island, not even a wheelbarrow or a truck, and we found we got most exercise in an open bullock-carro which, as it slowly scraped its way over the pavements, jarred and jolted every bone and muscle in our bodies, and, as the steel runners ground over the stones, added the aggravating sound of a pencil that squeaks on a slate to the incessant shouts of the driver and the attendant boy.

The author regrets that the orange trade should have been allowed to decay in the Azores, especially in San Miguel, and that the cultivation of pineapples should have been substituted, as the revenue thus realized scarcely amounts to one-sixth of that produced by the old staple industry. The cookery of the Azoreans would hardly tempt a scientific gourmand. A mess of bread boiled up with garlic, onions, vinegar, and saffron is seldom relieved by anything more toothsome than salt fish, watercress soup, conger eel, and octopus. The tongue of the dolphin is considered a great delicacy, and the oil of this fish is very plentiful and in common use among the people. In the chapter on the island of Terceira, whose chief town is the seat of the Government, the writer gives a short and excellent summary of the later history of Portugal and the Brazils. She tells us that Dom Pedro, who was extolled a few years ago by many persons in this country as the champion of Liberalism, was declared by the Duke of Wellington to have been a ruffian, and to have framed for his country a Constitution which was odious. Sir Charles Napier, however, claims credit for Dom Pedro as having abolished despotism in Portugal, and Mrs. Roundell would appear to agree with the gallant Admiral. The facts of the struggle between Dom Miguel and his brother are well known, and our readers will draw their own conclusions. San Jorge has the best climate in the Azores, and is never visited by epidemics. Pico is celebrated for the beauty of its women and for the super-excellence of its oranges. Fayal was colonized by the Flemings, it has been frequently visited by earthquakes, and there have been terrible volcanic eruptions in the island. Probably "Flores in the Azores" will be the most interesting of all the islands to the admirers of the Laureate—that is to say, to nearly all English people. Its coast is bold and rugged, without beach or inlet, and passengers by steamer are landed in heavy boats propelled by immense oars. Oranges are not cultivated there, and the fruit generally is very poor. There are no beasts of burden, and travellers have to go about the island in hammocks made of sail-cloth and tightly tied to a long pole. The occupant sits sideways, clinging to the pole, with his feet dangling; were he inadvertently to lie down in the hammock, the sail-cloth would close over him. Mrs. Roundell says that Gervase Markham's description of this island as "black Flores, banefull isle," is still only too appropriate, considering that its iron-bound coasts have no lights, no lifeboats, or no life-saving apparatus of any kind. In the convent chapel at Santa Barbara and the chapel of the Jesuit church are carvings and frescoes the sight of which well repays the traveller for all the roughness and difficulty of his journey thither. The image of Our Lord in the chapel of Nossa Senhora Esperanza is covered with jewels valued at over 150,000*l*. The natural history of the Azores is in no way remarkable; but Mrs. Roundell gives a very interesting description of the fauna and flora of Madeira. Many of the Portuguese names for flowers are very pretty, such as "Perfect Love," "Sweet Gift," "May we be Friends," and "Woman's Love"; but when Mrs. Roundell went back to England, and saw the green fields and hawthorn hedges and banks of primroses and cowslips, she felt "with irresistible force that one wild flower of England was worth all the exotics of Madeira." Mrs. Roundell is one of the few travellers who combine absolute practicality and the soundest common sense with a poetical imagination and a keen sensitiveness to beauty.

TWENTY-NINE SERMONS OF SAVONAROLA.*

THE sermons preached by Fra Girolamo Savonarola in 1496 were written down by one of his hearers, Ser Lorenzo Violi, a notary of Florence, as they fell from the lips of the iconoclast in the Church of Santa Maria del Fiore. "His diction was quick and prompt," says the Dominican Father Serafino Razzi, a contemporary and eyewitness; "yet so well did he pronounce what he had to say that never a word of it was lost. And there are those who, seeing the rapid diction of this man, the copiousness of his conceits, and the eloquence of his word, do deem it a miracle that the worthy man, Ser Lorenzo Violi, should have written down his sermons so well." To these sermons, reprinted from the first and only Florentine edition, the undated work of an anonymous printer, probably issued at the end of the fifteenth or beginning of the sixteenth centuries, Signor Giuseppe Baccini has prefixed a concise and tersely-written Life, which, it need hardly be said, is neither intended to vie with the great work by Professor Villari nor to supplement any other complete and more compendious one. He has, besides, modernized the orthography of the Florentine notary without touching either word or thought of the preacher. These sermons, in the opinion of their latest commentator, prove more conclusively than any others "that Savonarola, far from being ambitious of popularity under a Republican Government, was firmly convinced of his own mission as a prophet appointed by God to reform the manners of his time and preach against its corruption." Yet the question, "Was Savonarola a martyr who gave his life for liberty of thought and political independence?" is answered by Signor Baccini in the negative. Although Savonarola was born and nurtured in the full flush of the Renaissance, he must be classed "among those fanatics who, coming before and after him, have, with the best of all intentions, rather essayed to enchain human genius than to deliver it from the bondage of the ages." His sermons abound in eloquent passages, which contrast favourably even now with the "false eloquence of many modern preachers." Heightened as they were by his wonderful voice, by the tears he shed, and by the people's conception of the sacredness of their prophet's calling, it is not difficult, even in this prosaic age, to realize what must have been their effect upon a sturdy and withal sensitive and highly-strung people. "Audite, principes Jacob et duces domus Israel, numquid non vestrum est scire iudicium?" was a theme easily applied to Papal arrogance and Imperial treachery. Indeed, when the words of Micah inspired the magnificent invective of Fra Girolamo, every thought, every word, every thrill of its prophet thrilled and quivered in the heart of the powerful Republic, chafing in its power, and pride, and strength against the priestly infamy of an Alexander, and the bad faith of a Charles VIII., mindful all the while of the courage, crowned by success, with which it had resisted the oppression of the fourth Sixtus. But for the loss of prestige consequent on the pitiable episode of the trial by fire, there is no saying how far the work of Luther might have been forestalled by his Tuscan precursor. Savonarola not only lacked the iron self-reliance of the Teuton—he lacked his humanity. And this want of sympathy with human joy and sorrow, of the sense of external and intellectual beauty, of the necessity of innocent pleasures, without which "human society would become a melancholy assembly of austere and ferocious individuals," was the most potent cause of his fall. To the purity of the Florentine ascetic's life and manners, to the tenacity of his struggle with the Curia Romana, the holiness of his precepts, the fire and conviction with which, in an age steeped in luxury, he preached his singular and austere doctrine, Signor Baccini does ample justice:—"Yet fell he a victim to his religious fanaticism, to an ideal erroneous both in principle and application . . . not only contrary to the spirit of that age, but, generally speaking, to all progress and civilization." The interest of this work, excellent in form and matter, is heightened by the appended notes of the Padre Serafino Razzi, naïve in expression, and glowing with historic colour. Those who are most comfortably impervious to the thunder of the prophet's word, because it was hurled against bygone grievances, must yet take pleasure in the presentment of the solemn procession with which Carnival began in the year 1497. How when the thousands were assembled in the Piazza di San Marco, it wended its way through the streets, and "to the children was given to carry, on a gilded pedestal, a beautiful little Lord Jesus, standing, made by the great sculptor Donatello, who [the Holy Child, not the sculptor] with one hand did give the benediction, while with the left hand He held the crown of thorns with the nails." And many of us will wince over again at the oft-told tale of the great fire in the Piazza della Signoria, the fuel of which was "Flemish painted canvases, forming a fine frieze . . . portraits of beautiful bygone women painted by most excellent masters . . . musical instruments, lutes, lyres, harps, cymbals . . . and books of profane music . . . the vanities of women, such as unguents, vases of waters, mirrors, Cyprus powders, perfumes, headgear, and such like—books by Morganti, the Centonovelle . . . and others like unto them" . . . besides "masks, false beards, sumptuous disguises, and the diabolic vanities in vogue in that time." The conversion of the "Potenze," with the record of their boisterous and sometimes terrible diversions, the personal appearance and "magnetism" (may we be forgiven the anachronism) of Fra Girolamo, his voice, the miracles he wrought, the signs and portents of his God-appointed mission, with other things of never-waning interest, form a fitting commentary on these remarkable sermons.

MEDIEVAL FRANCE.*

FEW old Harrovians can have heard of the death of M. Gustave Masson without feelings of regret; for he held an assistant-mastership at Harrow for many years, and was uniformly kind

* Prediche di F. Girolamo Savonarola. Edizione integra di Giuseppe Baccini. Firenze: Adriano Salani, Editore.

* Stories of the Nations—Medieval France. By Gustave Masson, B.A., Univ. Gallic., Officier d'Académie, Member of the Société de l'Histoire de France, &c. London: T. Fisher Unwin.

and genial in manner. He had a cultivated mind and a strong taste for literary, and especially for historical, pursuits; his disposition was generous, and he always delighted to acknowledge any good work done by others. His latest book, which contains the "story" of Mediæval France from the accession of Hugh Capet to the death of Louis XII.—not, we think, a very good point of division; the line should have been drawn at the death of Louis XI.—is written with considerable life, and contains several picturesque bits from the early chroniclers. It is, however, somewhat lacking in grasp and firmness of treatment. The strange blunder of reckoning Lorraine and Franche-Comté among the fiefs of the Capetian kingdom, which meets us at the outset, is characteristic of a certain sloppiness which pervades the book generally. When we get to any specially critical period, such as the reigns of Philip IV. and Louis XI., the thinness of the work becomes peculiarly apparent. Several notices are given of early French literature, and these are good as far as they go. Among the tables at the beginning of the volume there is a useful list of the sources of the mediæval history of France.

PHYSICAL TEXT-BOOKS.*

WE have another contribution to the study of organic chemistry in the fifth part of the third volume written by Professors Roscoe and Schorlemmer. Though dealing merely with the benzene hydrocarbons and their principal derivatives, this part occupies 523 pages octavo, which proves that their method of treating the subject is practically exhaustive. Most of the work is naturally of little interest to the general reader, except the historical notes and an excellent account, under the group of terpenes and camphors, of the discovery and preparation of caoutchouc and guttapercha. Professor Remsen, of Baltimore, U.S.A., publishes a text-book of inorganic chemistry, in which we observe several features to be approved of. In some of the large text-books, for example, the student's attention is distracted by detailed descriptions of apparatus and specific directions for the preparation of substances, so that the essential principles of the science are apt to be lost sight of, and his conception of them is less distinct and vivid. Of course no lecturer can afford to dispense with laboratory work, and must set forth special directions to the students for carrying out all its details. In the present work, therefore, we find an appendix of ninety pages of selected experiments to accompany the text from step to step. The main part of the work, of over seven hundred pages, seems to balance fairly a discussion of the leading principles with a classification of the facts. Professor Remsen lays much stress on general relations, pointing out analogies between properties of substances and between chemical reactions. When discussing the double salts of the halogens he applies formulæ expressive of their constitution which he promises to justify by evidence to be given in a subsequent treatise.

Professor Mixter now issues a second edition of his text-book. The author adopts what is called periodic classification in order "to present the elements of chemistry logically as far as possible." From the American States we have also the first part of a compilation which will be useful to all who are practically interested in the "constants of nature." This book of 400 pages gives the specific gravities of 5,227 distinct substances (and many of these with separate determinations), their constitutional formulæ, and the authority for each.

Smaller works are—one in the series of "Blackie's Text-Books," which is intended to cover the same ground as the elementary course in the Science and Art Syllabus; Part I. of an Elementary Course of Natural Science, dealing mainly with air, heat, chemical action, and electricity; and a neatly arranged little work on sound, light, heat, electricity, and magnetism.

To treat the general laws of heat in an elementary manner, yet in a really scientific spirit, is the object of a carefully prepared work before us. The author presupposes but little chemistry on the part of his pupils, and nevertheless treats and illustrates the nature, laws, and phenomena of heat in an extremely simple, precise, and scientific manner. Mr. Madan pays considerable attention to the applications of the general laws of heat to the arts and manufactures; and in the appendices explains many of the numerical questions which practically occur in scientific work. There is a good index.

A second and enlarged edition of Mr. Blakesley's book on electric currents will be welcome to all who appreciate the geometric mode of dealing with certain problems. We are also glad to see new editions of Mr. Lynn's clearly written little work on Astronomy, and Dr. Klein's manual of Histology. The latter now contains some interesting micro-photographs.

In Natural Philosophy there are several new text-books. Mr. Lavery aims at placing Dynamics on a thoroughly sound basis by "avoiding unsatisfactory illustrations and definitions." The importance of Newton's three laws is well brought out, but the utility of inventing the words fas, cas, scas, casgram, scasgram, faspen, bim, cim, and others, may be questioned where real instruction is desirable.

A work on Statics, by an author whom we formerly reviewed favourably, is well equipped with exercises and illustrations. The extraordinary attempt, in a long note, to show that an oar can be regarded as a lever of the first order, seems somewhat out of place in a book of statics. Should there be the opportunity of a second edition, Mr. Warren might advantageously replace this note by an alternative proof of one or two of the leading statical problems, illustrating, for example, the triangle of forces or the principle of work.

Two books belong to the series of Blackie's "Science Text-Books"; one an enlarged edition of a manual which we formerly noticed favourably, the other on applied mechanics, and especially with regard to liquid and gaseous pressure, belt and toothed gearing, hydraulic machines, physical qualities of materials and so forth.

Our present list concludes with two books on statics, both evidently the result of practical work in class-teaching. The first seems a good introduction to a larger work by Mr. Greaves which we formerly had occasion to speak of with favour; the second takes up as much of the science of statics as may suffice for the Cambridge "Previous," and bases the whole subject on Newton's three laws of motion. For the rectangular component of a force, or its effect in a particular direction, a new term, "resolute," is invented with advantage; and there is a good short account of the graphic method of treating statical problems, a solution which no practical treatise can now afford to overlook.

AMID DEVONIA'S ALPS.*

YET another book on Dartmoor, following close on Mr. Page's, which we reviewed a short time ago. Mr. Crossing is the author of The Ancient Crosses of Dartmoor, noticed in the Saturday Review, and he now extends his literary efforts to Dartmoor itself. He says he has culled from his note-book accounts fairly representative of his moorland peregrinations. And this culling process includes extracts descriptive, not only of Dartmoor, but also of Mr. Crossing, his hunger, his thirst, his feelings in general, and his gettings up and lyings down; when he is tired, when he is fresh, when he is wet, and when he is cold. The first person singular of the most important pronoun in our language comes in for a good share of the matter culled from the note-book, and has the not very surprising effect of imparting a prosy sensation in reading a work of praiseworthy—that is, short—dimensions, with a very useful appendix and a good index. There is no doubt that Mr. Crossing knows Dartmoor as a native of the neighbourhood who often walks over it, and calls his walks peregrinations, is likely to know it. But it is hard to see what an evening party at Brent, so pleasant as to keep Mr. Crossing up all night, the jollity, wit, and humour thereof being hidden from his reader, can have to do with Dartmoor.

Amid Devonian's Alps is a poetical, romantic term for peregrinations on Dartmoor. Poetical licence, like licences to shoot and do other pleasant things, must be allowed; and pity 'tis they are not paid for, to swell the revenue. Persons who write about Dartmoor take out these licences, which are not granted by the Duchy of Cornwall on payment of ten and sixpence, as any one who knows the Duchy might expect, and such persons use them to excess, as this book will testify. Nevertheless, it is not well to compare Dartmoor to the Alps of Switzerland. Dartmoor has beauties of its own, but has no similarity whatever to the

* Treatise on Chemistry. By Sir H. E. Roscoe, F.R.S., and C. Schorlemmer, F.R.S. Vol. III. Part V. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Inorganic Chemistry. By Ira Remsen, Professor in the Johns Hopkins University. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Elementary Text-Book of Chemistry. By W. G. Mixter, Professor in the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale University. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

A Table of Specific Gravity for Solids and Liquids. By F. C. Clarke, Chief Chemist, U.S. Geological Survey. London and New York: Macmillan & Co.

Elementary Inorganic Chemistry, with a Course of Chemical Analysis and a Series of Examples in Chemical Arithmetic. By A. H. Sexton, F.R.S.E. London: Blackie & Son. 1889.

A Graduated Course of Natural Science. Part I. First Year's Course. By B. Loewy, F.R.A.S. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Questions and Answers in Elementary Experimental Physics. By B. Loewy, F.R.A.S. London: Macmillan & Co.

Elementary Treatise on Heat. By H. G. Madan, M.A. With Illustrations. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

Papers on Alternating Currents of Electricity. By J. H. Blakesley, M.A. London: Whittaker & Co. 1889.

Celestial Motions. By W. Thynne Lynn, B.A. London: Stanford. 1889.

Elements of Histology. By E. Klein, M.D., F.R.S. London: Cassell & Co., Limited. 1889.

The Laws of Motion. By W. H. Lavery, M.A. London: Rivingtons. 1889.

Elementary Treatise on Mechanics. By Rev. J. Warren, M.A. London: Longmans & Co. 1889.

Outlines of Natural Philosophy. By J. D. Everett, M.A., F.R.S. London: Blackie & Son.

Elementary Text-Book of Applied Mechanics. By D. A. Low, Head-Master of the People's Palace Technical Schools. London: Blackie & Son. 1889.

Statics for Beginners. By J. Greaves, M.A. London: Macmillan & Co. 1889.

Elementary Statics. By Rev. J. B. Lock, M.A. London: Macmillan & Co.

* Amid Devonian's Alps. By William Crossing. London: Simpkin, Marshall, & Co. Plymouth: W. H. Luke.

Alps, and to compare the one to the other amounts to a fanciful delusion.

Mr. Crossing's descriptions of Dartmoor, when he writes of Dartmoor, are accurate, with the exception of the usual exaggerated colouring of what writers on Dartmoor call the antiquities. He may be commended, however, for calling the clapper bridges by their right local name, and not cyclopean bridges, a weak invention of the scholar in common use amongst superior persons. These bridges are made of huge stones piled on one another in the bed of a river to form piers for other huge flat stones to rest on and provide a footing for horse or man. Most of them have resisted the floods successfully for ages, and are certainly ancient and very picturesque. Mr. Crossing follows Mr. Page's example, and, culling from notes of his walks, gives his descriptions of the moor as he goes along, now and then his imagination floating downwards with a river and getting far enough away off the moor. The book, as we have said, is laudably short, but there is the superfluity of personalities before referred to. Mr. Crossing takes long walks with his friends and dogs, with whom his pages are somewhat burdened, and he also has the advantage of riding a pony, which gives him a much-needed insight as to where you can and where you cannot ride on horseback on the moor. In walking the whole moor can be traversed with ease, for Mr. Crossing makes too much of the difficulties, not because they appear difficulties to him, but by virtue of the poetical license aforesaid they are so described. Riding is another matter, and it requires a really good knowledge of the moor to cross it safely on horseback off the roads. On foot there are some mires to be found that are impassable, but they are not extensive, and are easily avoided. On horseback there are large extents of bog land into which a horse's foot would sink, even without a weight on his back. There are some passes through them known to the hunting-man and the moor-man, and, it appears, to Mr. Crossing also. We are surprised to find that Mr. Crossing mentions the Abbot's Way as the same as the Jobber's Path. The Jobber's Path, which was used for driving cattle across the moor, surely crosses the Abbot's Way in a direction almost at right angles, and it is altogether a distinct path. We are also surprised that any authority on Dartmoor should say "the central portion of this great waste still continues to be a Royal Forest" (p. 13), which it most decidedly is not. There are errors in the book, such as the following quotation will show:—"Below this spot, and by the side of a small stream which falls into the Erme, is a little covered erection of the kind frequently seen on the moor, though not often in so complete a state as this, and which it is very likely were used by the miners as repositories of their tools" (p. 104)—the italics are ours. Cranmere Pool, for some occult reason, seems to excite the fancy of writers on Dartmoor, who always dwell on it in a mysterious manner. It is a most disappointing spot to visit, if one be lured thither by these books. It is nothing more than a piece of bare, black peat-bog, on a large elevated plain of moss and sedge growing on the bog underneath. It once held water, and there are many accounts of how it became tapped. It is situated near West Okement Head, and the true explanation of its being no longer a pool is a simple one. A fox was run to earth at Okement Head; a terrier was put in, and not coming out again was dug out, and the digging drained the pool for ever.

The illustrations, apparently taken from photographs, cannot be highly praised. But the appendix is the best part of the book, giving a business-like list of the Tors, with their names, and their heights, and also a list of the rivers and their tributaries. There is the usual speculation about names, as a matter of course. We cannot agree that the Tors which bear the names of animals need have been so called because they resemble the animals in shape. Names have no doubt changed, some wholly, some only partially. But why should not Vixen Tor be so called because the vixen resorted to it for putting down her cubs? Or Fox Tor because it was a favourite kennel for the fox? Or Hare Tor because harriers were apt to find there, hares always frequenting places they like? Or Hound Tor because for the same reason hounds were eager to go to it? Nothing is more likely. Corruptions take place in the most recent times, as one of the Hare Tors has been changed to Har Tor, and from that to Harter by the press of the present day. In the list given of the Tors we miss some, such as New Tor, Brownsen Tor, &c.; but on the whole it is fairly complete, and very useful. So also is the index. The merits of the book are, that it is not lengthy, is generally accurate as far as it goes, and that by the aid of the appendix the Tors and the rivers can be sought and found by name.

ALL SAINTS', MAIDSTONE.*

FEW visitors to Maidstone fail to see the fine old Perpendicular church at the southern extremity of the town. With the closely adjoining remnants of the College it forms a most picturesque group, and, viewed from the other side of the Medway, with varied reflections and all kinds of small shipping for possible foregrounds, it is the subject of innumerable sketches and photographs. An object so attractive has naturally been very fully noticed by local writers and historians. Mr. Cave Browne mentions among his predecessors Newton, whose History and Anti- quities of Maidstone was published about one hundred and fifty years ago; Beale Poste's History of the College, published in 1847, and Whichcord's volume on the same subject, which is dated two years earlier. Two later works are also mentioned—Mr. Gilbert's, which deals only with the church, and Mr. Russell's, which takes in the whole town. Under these circumstances it is not very easy to see what new thing Mr. Browne can have to tell us, and we are not surprised to find that these chapters originally appeared as contributions to the Parish Magazine. We must not, therefore, consult them for any remarkable discoveries or any very recondite information; and, perhaps for the same reason, the references to the Registers are much too meagre, filling in all only some half-dozen pages, although, as Mr. Browne tells us, "down to the close of the last century alone the Registers extend over fourteen volumes," and although they are among the few in England which date back to within six years of Cromwell's Injunctions, by which every parish was enjoined to set up its book and to provide a chest to keep it in. It is a pity Mr. Browne has not given us further particulars and extracts, the more so as he has filled several pages with an account of the stained glass, which, conspicuous as it is, will remain in every visitor's memory as the great drawback to the beauty of the church. The "horsebox pews," the three-decker and the galleries swept away at the last "restoration"—for All Saints' has undergone that destructive process several times—cannot have been half as offensive to the eye as these gloomy windows. In 1880 what might have proved a happy event for the church took place. A traction-engine passing along the road to the eastward suddenly blew up, shattering the east window—a Belgian transparency of most unfortunate design—and otherwise injuring the interior. Instead of seizing the opportunity to effect some really suitable improvements, the authorities now bestirred themselves to obliterate as far as possible, not so much the effects of the explosion, but all the previous history of the church, and, among other so-called improvements, the strange and ghostly, but impressive, monuments of the Astleys and the Knatchbulls were removed from the chancel, and placed, with more or less mutilation and alteration, at the western end of the nave—a situation for which they were never designed or intended. To tell the truth, this explosion, which we may assume was not the result of any prearrangement, gave the restorer opportunities often denied to him—opportunities of which, we may be sure, he fully availed himself. Strange to say, Mr. Browne omits all reference to this momentous event; momentous, of course, rather in its indirect effects than in the magnitude or importance of the damage it actually did to the fabric of the church. Mr. Browne, indeed, is no discriminating admirer of "restoration," and accepts the most thoroughgoing Vandalisms under that name as of necessity improvement. We do not all want the architecture of our old churches improved at the expense of their architectural history; but All Saints', Maidstone, after undergoing more than its share of such "improvement," still remains a very handsome and interesting relic of the time of Richard II.—the palmy days of the Perpendicular style.

Maidstone—Medway's Town—had its church at the time of the Domesday Survey. This church, called in a patent roll of 1495, "ecclesia parochialis Beatæ Mariæ de Maidenstone," was situated on one of the great manors of the see of Canterbury, and appears to have been an object of some solicitude to successive archbishops. When, as in the time of Archbishop Baldwin, and again in that of Archbishop Hubert, the monks of Christ Church made themselves too troublesome, a new foundation, to supersede the old one, was designed for Maidstone, but never carried out. Canterbury, therefore, when opportunity offered, took care to make itself unpleasant to Maidstone. The Prior and his monks, whenever the see was vacant, endeavoured, with by no means unvarying success, to hold visitations over the churches of the diocese. After Archbishop Peckham's death "an abortive attempt" was made to visit Maidstone. The like result followed a similar attempt in 1348; but in 1495 the Prior of Canterbury seems to have been more successful; at least, there is no record of failure extant. But the long-threatened College had then been established a hundred years, and had in no wise affected the predominant position of Christ Church. This College was endowed by Archbishop Courtenay, and Mr. Browne seems to have proved that the old church of St. Mary was not wholly pulled down, but formed something more than a foundation for the new church of All Saints'. The investigation of this point occupies a good many pages; as does the answer to another question—"Where was Archbishop Courtenay buried?" His alabaster tomb, without any inscription, is pointed out at Canterbury, near that of the Black Prince; but Mr. Browne is strongly of opinion that he was buried at Maidstone, and would identify a massive tombstone, from which a magnificent brass has been stripped, still existing in the centre of the choir, though no longer on the carved and emblazoned pedestal described by some old writers. According to Hardy's Le Neve he was buried, by the King's express commands, in Canterbury Cathedral, though he had desired that his grave should be "in the churchyard of the collegiate church of Maidstone." There are many difficulties about this view, and quite as many about the other. Le Neve himself, in his MS. Church Notes in Kent, cited by Mr. Browne, expressly states that Courtenay was buried at Maidstone. The grave was examined in the last century, and a skeleton found, but without any insignia of rank or other marks calculated to assist in the identification of the remains. On the whole, however, the weight of what, at best, is but negative, or, at least, ambiguous evidence, is in favour of Mr. Browne's opinion that the body of the Archbishop was really laid in the chancel of his new church.

* All Saints', Maidstone. By the Rev. J. Cave Browne. Maidstone: Bunyard.

The later history of All Saints' has in it some points of interest. Mr. Browne does not very clearly define the position of the Master of Courtenay's College, but we gather that he succeeded to the duties of the old rectors of St. Mary's. The College was not finally surrendered until the reign of Edward VI., and thenceforward the duties of the parish were carried on by curates, appointed from time to time by the Archbishop, the first apparently being John Porter, who had been sacrist of the College. Some of these curates seem to have been men of character. We find Robert Barrett refusing to allow the Burghmote meetings to be announced in the church; Thomas Wilson omitting to publish the Book of Sports; John Crumpe, who is described as "a godly and painful preacher," and Josiah Woodward, who was one of the originators of what is now the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. Mr. Denne was the antiquary who opened Courtenay's supposed tomb, as mentioned above, and held the curacy from 1753 to 1800, during thirty-five years of which time he seems to have been out of his mind, owing to a fright he had received. As chaplain to the gaol he attended two Italian prisoners under sentence of death. The criminals, the day before that appointed for the execution of the sentence, contrived to break out during Mr. Denne's visit, and, after stabbing the gaoler, to escape. While Denne was incapacitated James Reeve did the duty, and eventually succeeded him; a good man, who, though his own stipend was the poor but poetical 40*l.* a year, first opened a district church in Maidstone. Under the next incumbent, Vallance, the first "restoration" took place, though something of the kind had been attempted a century and a half earlier. The work thus begun languished for some thirty years, until the present "vicar"—for perpetual curacies were abolished in 1869—carried it out thoroughly.

Mr. Cave Browne gives very full details of the monuments and epitaphs. In his account of these memorials his zeal for restoration flags a little, and no wonder. "In the recent work of restoration," he says, "though the upper portions of the church have been so nobly beautified, the pavement bears sad marks of the utilitarian spirit." The grave of the Broughtons is an example; for while part of the tombstone with the family arms forms a step, the rest, with the inscription, is hidden by the next step. Mr. Browne does not pursue the subject. Some of the epitaphs are curious; as, for instance, that of Robert Stapley, a physician, and especially that of his son Richard, whom Phœbus scarcely excelled in his own art, and who was cut off by the Fates lest their own empire should be endangered. Among the monuments removed from their original places after the explosion was that of Laurence Washington, who died in 1619, and who appears to have been an ancestor of the first American President. The tablet, one of the most interesting in the church, was formerly on the north side of the east window, but since the explosion and the restoration it is "skied" on the south wall. The volume concludes with a good and full index. The illustrations, by some photographic process, are dark and unsatisfactory.

HINTS TO LADY TRAVELLERS.*

MISS or Mrs. Davidson (her healthy aversion to babies makes us incline to "Miss") may have done an unkind turn to the Lady Guide Association by her book; but the turn is one which she had a right to do if she liked, and nobody will contest her assertion that "a hundred women travel alone for one who did so in bygone days"—days, we may add, not so very much bygone. On this fact it is no use commenting, even if we felt any particular vocation to do so. Miss Davidson's book has proved amusing to us, and may prove amusing to other people for a different reason. It reminds the amiable student of human nature how very little common sense there apparently is, or at any rate there is thought to be, in that nature. Not that the want of common sense is in Miss Davidson, but that she appears occasionally to assume it in her sisters. We have no quarrel with her, except for her insistence on the fact (we fear it is a fact; but it is surely one to be hidden fathoms deep, not bruited abroad) that the ticket-clerks in booking-offices are bound to answer questions. The female, and even to some extent the male, traveller is but too prone to do this already, to the speechless or speechful agony of those waiting their turn; and it was not kind of Miss Davidson positively to aid and abet the commission of the most hideous crime known to travelling mankind or woman-kind.

She begins with "Accidents" (a cheerful preface, as she seems dimly to feel). From "Accident" you go to "Anticipation," which seems to be reversing the order of things. But, in fact, the arrangement is alphabetic, tempered by caprice, as the table of contents will show:—

Accidents, Anticipations, Apartments, Baths, Boarding-houses, Booking-offices, "Bradshaw," Cabs, Cab Fares, Carriage Clocks, Continental, Cushions, Cycling Tours, Dress, Dress Hampers, Dressing Bags, Driving Tours, Etiquette of Travelling, Etnas, Excursions, Fees, Fellow Travellers, Filters, Flasks, Food, Footwarmers, Foreign Outfits, Guards, Hand-bags, Health Resorts (England and Wales, Scotland, Ireland), Holdalls, Hotels, Hotwater Bags, Hydropathic Establishments, Inns, Insurance, Invalid Comforts, Knapsacks, Lady's Maids, Ladies' Carriages, Lamps, Literature, Luncheon Baskets, Luggage, Medicine Chests, Money, Money Belts, Mountain Climbing, Necessaries of Travel, Night Journeys, Omnibuses, Packing, Pocket Compasses, Porters, Portmanteaux, Pullman Cars, Railways, Railway Keys, Railway Rugs, Return Tickets, Riding Tours, Saloon Carriages, Sandwich Boxes, Scotch Tours, Sea Bathing, Sea Voyages, Sleeping Cars, Soiled Linen Bags, Summer Travelling, Stations, Steamboats, Stewards and Stewardesses, Tea, Tea-pots, Time-tables, Toilet Requisites, Tourist Tickets, Trunks, Umbrella Cases, Unpacking, Waiting Rooms, Walking Tours, Washing, Watering Places, Wedges for Doors, Winter Travelling, Welsh Tours, Yachting.

This is a goodly chapelet, and it is fair to say that good sense is to be found under most of the headings. If lovely woman obeys her guide she will (1) put her feet instantly on the opposite seat at any violent motion of the train [N.B. This is good advice, but should not be put in practice too frequently, as the effect would be odd, especially if the vis-à-vis is a vile male]; (2) not forget her cats before starting [excellent]; (3) put a hand glass between the sheets to see that they are aired; (4) avoid boarding-houses [Miss Davidson does not say this in so many words, but we think she means it, and we heartily agree with her]; (5) count her change; (6) not acquiesce in the vulgar error that Bradshaw is hard to understand; (7) remember that many men of birth and station are driving cabs [from not having led five trumps, no doubt]; (8) possess an air cushion; (9) "not drink too much while riding" [Miss Davidson means tricycling; but we think—we really think—that this caution might be extended. At what period should a lady drink too much?]; (10) wear tailor-made gowns; (11) remember [blessings on Miss Davidson for this!] that the "command of the window" is a fixed, and not a movable law of etiquette; (12) "confine her parting attentions to the maids, unless she has called on the footman for unusual services"; (13) not set down a shutting-up drinking cup while it is full [and, indeed, this is a wise, though we should have thought a superfluous, precaution]; (14) eat a good breakfast [hear! hear!]; (15) not throw empty soda-water bottles into crowded thoroughfares ["O woman, in thine hours of ease, Say, art thou given to deeds like these?"]; (16) carry a hot-water bag [in which case we reluctantly give up the desire to travel in her company]; (17) insure her life; (18) not take a lady's-maid with her; (19) avoid ladies' carriages [this seems unnecessary, as no woman ever attempts to enter them]; (20) supply herself with a filter, a reading lamp, a money belt, a pocket compass, a railway key, a knapsack, a travelling bath, a door wedge, an eyestone, Hinde's curling pins, frizzetta, and thilum.

Now, it will be admitted that most of these persuasions and dissuasions (we except frizzetta and thilum, of which we know nothing) are excellent. Further, the travelling woman will find lists of watering-places, with some remarks on them, hints on the composition of a medicine chest (with which we trust that she will not poison either herself or her companions), and a good deal of miscellaneous information, mixed with a really surprisingly small proportion of talkee-talkee, or "holiday-article" writing. We noted in reading a passage where Shaftesbury is seemingly referred to as a town "in the North," which it certainly is not. But this is of no great importance, and we mention it chiefly because it was the only thing of the kind that we did note.

THE ENGLISH POOR LAW SYSTEM.*

"WHAT do you think of our institutions?" is supposed to be the first question addressed by an American host to the visitor from "the other side." We are less sensitive to the opinions of strangers than our American cousins; but we are no less capable, we may trust, of profiting by the generally disagreeable experience of "seeing ourselves as others see us." None of our institutions are more characteristically English, whether regard be had to its present condition or to its past history, than the Poor-Law system, and Dr. Aschrott has conferred a real benefit alike upon the practical administrator and upon the student of social science by his recent work upon the subject. It was the author's purpose, as he himself explains, to regard the Poor-Law system from the point of view of an outside observer, and "to form a judgment sine ira et studio." That purpose has been, we may say at once, admirably fulfilled. Dr. Aschrott's work is not the hasty impression of a holiday visitor, but the well-thought-out and critical judgment of a man well fitted alike by his previous training and his present position to arrive at an impartial conclusion. The subject, too, is one on which the carefully formed opinions of an educated foreigner may be peculiarly fruitful. Our own system is not merely unique, but even opposed in its most salient features to the systems which obtain abroad. In Germany there is far less uniformity of administration; while in France, the provision of funds for the relief of the poor is, on the whole, left to private benevolence, though the State undertakes to supervise their distribution. This being so, the friendly and, in the main, approving criticism of a man like Dr. Aschrott cannot fail to be of great value.

The great body of the work is devoted to a critical examination of the existing machinery of the English system and the

* Hints to Lady Travellers at Home and Abroad. By Lillias Campbell Davidson. London: Iliffe & Son. 1889.

* The English Poor Law System, Past and Present. By Dr. P. F. Aschrott (Prussian District Judge). Translated by Herbert Preston-Thomas. With a Preface by Henry Sidgwick. London: Knight & Co.

methods at present adopted in its administration. But the first hundred pages of the book contain an excellent sketch of the progress of Poor-Law legislation from the earliest times to the present. Dr. Aschrott rightly ascribes the origin of such legislation to the Act 12 Richard II. cc. 7 & 8, but he fails to notice the great social revolution which rendered legislation imperative. It is true, but hardly adequate, to say that the interference of the State was due in the first instance rather to a desire to repress mendicancy than to benefit the poor. But so long as the old manorial system subsisted even mendicancy, much less pauperism, could not have reached such dimensions as to call for the interference of the State. It was the break up of the manorial system, consequent in great part on the Black Death of 1349 and 1361, which gave rise to a class of landless labourers, the relief of whose necessities called for public intervention. Still it is true in the main that up to the passing of the great Statute of Elizabeth in 1601 the repression of mendicancy rather than the relief of the destitute was the first object of Poor-Law legislation. Under the later Tudors, however, the problem of English pauperism became so pressing as to demand a comprehensive attempt at solution. The dissolution of the monastic orders; the agrarian revolution consequent on the dispersion of their lands; the growing passion for enclosures; the degradation of the currency; the rise of prices and the fall in the rate of wages combined to render the lot of the poorer classes extremely unhappy, while the gathering discontent warned the Elizabethan statesman that a remedial measure could no longer be delayed. For the famous Statute of 1601 Dr. Aschrott has nothing but admiration. "In this Act we recognize the State strong in the consciousness of its civilizing mission, not the State merely discharging the repressive functions of a previous period." Equally unqualified is his denunciation of the famous Act of Settlement passed after the Restoration:—

If in the Act of Elizabeth we recognize the strong and enlightened rule which strenuously maintained the interests of the Commonwealth, the law of Charles II. is a reflection of that unhappy time which was characterized by party spirit and selfish designs, when a weak and morally despicable monarch was ready to sacrifice the good of the community to the selfish wishes of particular classes and parties.

Dr. Aschrott fully appreciates the evils to which the humanitarian administration of the eighteenth century gave rise and the imperative necessity for the Amending Act of 1834. Since the passing of that great statute the principles of Poor-Law administration have been practically unchanged; while subsequent legislation has been directed mainly to amplifying and enforcing the leading provisions of that measure.

Having thus traced the historical development of the Poor-Law system, Dr. Aschrott proceeds to a minute and exhaustive examination of the machinery by which it is carried out. The result of this examination is, on the whole, exceedingly favourable to the system which obtains in this country. There are, however, points of detail in which Dr. Aschrott finds room for criticism. The present incidence of the Poor-rate, for example, he regards as unsatisfactory. In the country districts it is emphatically a tax on revenue, and, applying as it does only to the returns from real property, it seems to our author to be unfair. In the towns, on the other hand, it is, of course, a tax on expenditure, being, in effect, an addition to the house rent. The incidence of this tax Dr. Aschrott regards more favourably, though he urges, and with some reason, that the existence of heavy ground rents renders the tax in many cases inequitable. But it is the perfection of the local organization of the Poor-Law administration which has chiefly excited Dr. Aschrott's admiration. Here, he says, "the English system is a model one." This result he ascribes in the first place to the co-operation of paid and honorary officials in the local administration, and in the second to the harmonious relations of the local organizations and the Central Board. In this way the English system has been successful in "blending with the centralization necessary in the interests of administrative uniformity the independence of local administration necessary for the healthy life of the community." But here, too, there are, in the author's opinion, defects of detail. The office of honorary overseer might, he thinks, be abolished with great advantage to the symmetry of the system. The present method of electing Guardians seems to him to be open to abuse, though he admits that the results are good. He dwells with great minuteness on the workhouse system, combating the views alike of those who attack it on the score of expense and those who denounce it as cruel and inhumane. To the latter class of critics his reply is almost brutal in its directness and common sense. "Poor-Law relief is not based on humanitarian considerations, but is administered in the interests of the community." Or, as Professor Bryce has put it not less clearly, "kindness to the individual is cruelty to the class." Perhaps the most serious objection advanced by our author against existing workhouse management is the fact that, even for the able-bodied, workhouses are not, as the Legislature intended they should be, "places of labour." But this is really due, as he acknowledges, partly to the fact that the percentage of "able-bodied" men capable of ordinary labour is extremely small, and partly to the jealousy generally manifested against the employment of pauper labour in work which may compete with the product of private enterprise. With regard to vagrancy, Dr. Aschrott is inclined to believe that the harsh enactments against it have tended to encourage indiscriminate private charity, and have thus indirectly increased rather than diminished the pauperism of the country. He gravely mistrusts, too, the optimistic official view of the results of the "casual ward" system. The numerical reduction of casual paupers is unquestioned, but is it conclusive proof of the favourable working of the system? This Dr. Aschrott denies. The stringency of the regulations has reduced casuals to the satisfaction of officialism, but it is gravely doubted whether the real result is equally satisfactory. The number of "Refuges" erected by charitable societies has enormously increased—a development in itself sufficient to account for the official diminution. But the real objection to the system as at present worked seems to be that its rigour fails to reach the class for whose correction it is more particularly intended. The "professional vagrant" avoids the casual ward, and its rigours fall therefore almost exclusively upon the respectable labourer in search of work, who possesses too much self-respect to beg for the pittance which would admit him to the company of the regular tramp in the common lodging-houses. That there is much of truth in this criticism no one can doubt. The hard discipline of the casual ward and the increasing dangers of the criminal centres formed in the common lodging-houses attest it beyond dispute.

It will be seen that such criticisms as Dr. Aschrott has to offer are very much criticisms in detail, and that they in no sense detract from his warm appreciation of the system as a whole. But it is interesting to note what are the special features which seem to our author, writing "as a German for Germans," worthy of particular mention as models for the amendment of the relief system in Germany. The first is the uniformity of the system throughout the whole country, which is secured by the general supervision exercised by the Central Board. "The advantage of the uniform character of the English relief system is that the individual may always rely upon being protected from the worst consequences of destitution—namely, from starvation; but, on the other hand, he knows perfectly well that relief, whatever the circumstances in which it is granted, will only be of the prescribed kind and amount." Secondly, the harmonious co-operation of paid and honorary officials in the local organization. Thirdly, the special provision for the sick poor by means of workhouse infirmaries, the dispensary system, and the system of training nurses. Fourthly, the education of pauper children; and, lastly, the existence of a well-defined boundary between public relief and private, which, as Dr. Aschrott truly says, is not only essential for the proper administration of the Poor Law, but is also calculated to effect the much-desired organization of private charity. To elucidate this latter point Dr. Aschrott has added an appendix which deals with the question of Private Relief and the Charity Organization Society as supplementary to the Poor-Law System. A second appendix contains a careful and exhaustive classification of Poor-Law Statistics.

To Mr. Henry Sidgwick, who suggested the introduction of the work to the English reader, to the translator, Mr. Herbert Preston-Thomas, and to the learned author himself, the thanks of all students of social science are due for a most valuable work on a subject which is no less intricate than important.

HEARTS OF OAK.*

"I HAVE," Admiral Winnington-Ingram says, "often felt a regret that the writings of my brother officers so seldom find their way into magazine print." They see many things, but they do not write about them. The lament or reproach is not without foundation; but the Admiral has done his best to remove it. His solid volume is a reprint of articles contributed, as he says with a certain dryness, "gratis" to the Illustrated Naval and Military Magazine. It contains reminiscences of some forty years of service at sea, begun in the days of the sailing fleet and carried down to 1871, before Her Majesty's ships were beginning definitely to cease to be ships. It is a volume to be received with pleasure, in spite of certain drawbacks. One of these, and not the least, is that, being a reprint from the Illustrated Naval and Military Magazine, it is in the same "mo" as that publication. Now, it is one thing to handle a thin paper-bound pamphlet of quarto size, quite another to handle a thick quarto volume in stiff boards of that respectable proportion. It is, in truth, severe work to hold Hearts of Oak, at least for a feeble landsman. Another defect in the book is due to the Admiral's painful sense of duty. He will give historical information about places which we could dispense with. Thus on p. 58 he observes, with an almost hideous calm, "An outline of the particular events which took place in Asia Minor before the Christian era would here be appropriate," and then absolutely goes on to give it. If Admiral Winnington-Ingram had taken good advice before inserting his outline, he would, we imagine, have received the answer given to the bard who asked Dr. Johnson whether his Muse should sing of rats. As it is, he has inserted a lump of the purest guide-book skip.

When this is allowed for, Admiral Winnington-Ingram must be praised for a book which would be thoroughly readable but for its oppressive bulk. He has seen a good deal, from the burlesque sulphur war with Bomba on to the operations in the Baltic and the Garibaldian fighting in Italy. What he has seen he writes about in a pleasing way. The adventures are none of them thrilling, and, by no fault of his own, the Admiral has not seen a great naval war; but he has wandered much, and has come across exceptional experiences. His style of narrating them has a certain simplicity not without a flavour of its own. Take, for instance, this incident, which occurs at the very beginning. The Admiral, when a midshipman, was on his way to the Pacific in the Actæon. A man fell overboard, and the officer of the watch hastened to bring the ship to. While he was directing the manœuvre a rush was foolishly made by some volunteers of more zeal than seamanship at the jolly-boat. She was lowered while the ship was still going through the water, and of course came side on, and was towed under in a moment. Five or six men were now struggling in the water. The Admiral must tell the rest of the tale:—

* Hearts of Oak. By Rear-Admiral H. F. Winnington-Ingram. London: W. H. Allen & Co. 1889.

I was then sent in the cutter to search for them. The stars were shining brightly overhead, but the moon had not risen, so that small objects could only be seen at a short distance from the boat. She had been pulled for an hour or more over the supposed scene of disaster, but without results, and I was about to give the order for returning to the ship, whose lights were dimly seen far away, when a magnificent meteor shot clean across the sky, almost from one horizon to the other, making the surroundings as clear as day, and even bringing the low pampa coast—some distance off—in good view. During this interval, a small black object was observed bobbing on the surface of the water; and its bearing by the stars having been taken, the cutter was steered for it, and we soon picked up a man clinging to an oar, but in the last stage of exhaustion. He proved to be a noted bad character, who was always in trouble on board ship. That he should have been saved by the special intervention of a heavenly phenomenon, when all others in the same predicament perished, is a mystery incapable of being solved; but, if I remember rightly, the man's conduct somewhat improved from the date of his wonderful preservation.

This has Admiral Winnington-Ingram also seen, that good luck sometimes happens to the bad man, and the evil seemed to him great.

In the course of his experience the Admiral, then a lieutenant, was landed to assist in the defence of Monte Video against Rosas. He there made his first acquaintance with Garibaldi, and saw one of the most astounding pieces of savagery on a large scale which has been visible on our earth in this century. The whole siege was a barbarism of the worst kind. We learn from the Admiral that a countryman of our own shone in its worst scenes. This was a certain Cockney Sam, a loafer on the Monte Video mole, who was regularly employed to cut the throats of the sentries of the besieging force, and who showed himself a master in that bad kind of irregular warfare. He struck terror into the Argentine look-outs by shouting "Deténgase usted un instante, estoy Samuel de Londres." "Stop a moment, I am London Sam." When they did stop a moment he cut their throats. We learn from the Admiral that the cant Monte Videan phrase for throat-cutting was "tocar el violín," which is curious, since in old Spain it is a slang phrase for playing the fool. How aptly it may be used in that sense the victim of the amateur violinist knows. Later on the Admiral met his old friend Garibaldi in Sicily as leader of the thousand of Marsala. He speaks as highly as all eye-witnesses do of the hero's imperturbable courage. The Admiral had also the advantage of an introduction to Rosas himself, who received him with hospitality and struck him as looking remarkably like a Scotchman. In these days, when laments over the difficulty of finding competent crews for our ships in war time are so commonly heard, it is encouraging to read the Admiral's account of the difficulties found during the Crimean War in manning the Boscawen. It shows how they had to put up with every sort of nondescript landsmen, and had out of a watch list of 302 only 125 men who had "any proper knowledge of sailors' work." In the old war, ships were sometimes even worse found. So, after all, our troubles are no new thing. We are really obliged to the Admiral for giving us a picture of the old sea life, and wish that some of the others who remember it would collect their recollections before they go and the knowledge is lost.

LITERARY INFLUENCE IN BRITISH HISTORY.*

MR. ALBERT CANNING has done some respectable and useful work in book-making, and we have no desire to be hard on him. But really this volume is a little trying. Mr. Canning says that he hopes "it may be useful to readers not familiar with larger works on the subject." What are the larger works on the subject? We can only think of one, and that one which Mr. Canning certainly does not quote and is not very likely to know—M. A. Beljame's capital Le Public et les Hommes de Lettres en Angleterre, which covers one small period. The "works," however, with which Mr. Canning apparently supposes that the public may not be familiar are quite different from this. They are "Shaw's" and "T. Arnold's" Manuals of English Literature, Macaulay's History and Essays, Buckle's Civilization, the late Mr. Green's History of the English People, the novels of Sir Walter Scott, and a few other recondite lucubrations of the same kind. His extracts from these, all acknowledged with the most transparent honesty and just as a man might acknowledge the rarest discoveries, are woven into a disquisition as to which all we can say is that we do not quite know whether the state of mind which the author reveals or that which he seems to expect in his readers is the more remarkable. We shall best illustrate both by pretty copious citation.

Mr. Canning thinks well of Shakspeare; but his method of expressing his admiration is peculiar:—

If these dramatic chronicles, as Hallam calls them, are compared with his own histories, as well as with those of Hume, Lingard, and Macaulay, it will be seen how truly the poet describes many noble, historic personages, committing or authorizing legal cruelties, for which they cannot be considered personally responsible.

He considers our ballads unduly neglected:—

The old English ballads mostly celebrating deeds of arms, and which Hallam thinks inferior to the Scottish, were comparatively neglected till the last century when republished by Bishop Percy. Although admired by some literary men, Walter Scott especially, they were seldom referred to by former British writers.

That Mr. Canning should say that Raleigh "took no active part in politics" is a little surprising; but it is perhaps not so surprising as his reference to Eikon Basilike:—

Another royalist writer, Bishop Gauden (1605-1664), wrote in behalf of monarchy and the king's memory. The former in his History of the Revolution, the latter in a remarkable work, the Royal Image, pathetically described and deplored the king's character and execution. . . . He [Milton] eagerly attacked Bishop Gauden's singular work, in which that prelate, praising the king's courage at execution, deplored and described the event, most minutely appealing to the English nation to lament and avenge it.

Has Mr. Canning ever opened a page of the book he thus describes? and would he be surprised to hear that Gauden, whether he wrote Eikon Basilike or not, was not a prelate then or for ten years afterwards? That he quotes Milton as describing himself "fallen on evil days, by evil tongues surrounded," is nothing; and "the gay Lucios, Cassios, Gratianos," whose "occasional intemperance" Mr. Canning deplores, are not much more. Cassio, unfortunately for himself, was "occasionally intemperate," but he finds himself in very odd company here. But this is a still odder sentence about Dryden:—

Yet his own joyous, genial disposition, fully shown in his beautiful ode or drinking song of Alexander's Feast, apparently prevented his making personal enemies.

We never heard that glorious John had a "joyous" nature; and, to put Rose Alley and the cudgels out of question, a poet must indeed be a glutton of "personal enmity" who wants more proofs of it than Dryden had, from the Medal of John Bayes downwards. However, the "little, if any, indignation" which Dryden excited may pair off with the "fairness" of Bishop Burnet, and the "political views favouring the British Protestant colonists" which, it appears, distinguish the Tale of a Tub. The statement that Voltaire, "like Bossuet, wrote in French," is capable of misinterpretation by ribalds, though it is strictly true. Let us next hear what Mr. Canning has to say of Gibbon:—

His subject, so vast, so interesting and important, claimed attention not only in lands whose history it described, but in others where the glorious Roman name was never known. In the world's mysterious history it was fated that far more interest in the Roman Empire was felt, and far more knowledge of it acquired in countries long unknown or uncivilized than in those which had displayed either its political or intellectual glory. Britain, France, and Germany, where Gibbon's work was most studied, are yet comparatively seldom mentioned in his historic pages. His grand history ranges throughout southern Europe, western Asia, and northern Africa.

Unlike most histories of his time the "Decline and Fall" addressed all nations enjoying the inheritance of the ancient Roman Empire. It was, therefore, much read by foreigners, a recent edition being prefaced and furnished with notes by M. Guizot, the French Prime Minister under King Louis Philippe.

This statesman, well versed in modern politics, bears valuable testimony to Gibbon's knowledge of human nature.*

* "His eye was never darkened by the mists which time gathers round the dead. He saw that man is ever the same, whether arrayed in the toga or in the dress of to-day, whether deliberating in the Senate of old or at the modern council board."—Guizot's preface to "Bohn's Edition of Gibbon." These words are specially valuable from the French Premier, who, often presiding at many Paris council boards, thus recognizes and acknowledges the English historian's good sense.

It is, perhaps, unfortunate for this handsome tribute that Guizot executed the very superficial work referred to, almost as a boy, long before he was "French Prime Minister," or knew anything about "Paris Council Boards." But this is less interesting to us than the reflection about the mysterious fate. It would be wrong to do more than direct the reader's attention to it. So also we need not dwell on the following statement:—

About this time Defoe's popular work, Robinson Crusoe, probably diverted many young Englishmen's attention from history to the combined amusement and information it furnished.

further than to observe that "this time" is the time of Hume, Robertson, and Gibbon; that Robinson Crusoe was published in 1719, when Hume was eight years old, and five and eighteen years respectively before Robertson and Gibbon were born. The "diversion from history" which it thus effected is one of the most interesting on record.

Observing, in passing, that Dr. Samuel Johnson is known to Mr. Canning to have written the Lounger (the shade of the "Man of Feeling," who had no nasty pride, will surely bow and say, "Trop d'honneur!"), we may congratulate our author on discovering that William Wordsworth "was one of the most pleasing and popular among the friends and contemporary poets of Scott, Byron, and Moore." Wordsworth the friend of Byron, Wordsworth popular at any time during Byron's life, is good—popular Wordsworth is good. What Mr. Canning has to say about "Green and Buckle" and Mr. Justin McCarthy must not delay us; indeed from many unquoted gems we can only select one more:—

Like Scott's History of Scotland, where the great novelist abandoning fanciful romances, devotes himself to historical narration, Mr. Lecky lays aside his former attractive style.

* Literary Influence in British History: an Historical Sketch. By the Hon. A. S. G. Canning. London: W. H. Allen.

That Scott "laid aside his former attractive style" in the Tales of a Grandfather will be new to a good many people.

Such a book as this makes the feeling heart sorry. Mr. Canning is not pretentious; he is industrious after his way; he has selected a subject on which a really brilliant book might be written. But he has taken his literary knowledge apparently from "manuals," his historical knowledge from popular histories, and, what is most remarkable of all, he seems to have entirely lost sight of his nominal theme. By far the larger part of the work has nothing to do with "Literary Influence on British History," but is simply an ill-arranged series of remarks on certain British authors; while many of the most important instances of such influence—such as Puritan pamphleteering, Halifax's tracts, the astonishing political journalism of Swift at its most successful time, that of the Conduct of the Allies, &c.—are not mentioned at all. "Literature and History in England considered in the light of Manuals and Macaulay" would have been the better title, and even then it would be rather hard on Macaulay and the manuals.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

THE remarkable natural force which abides in the one living representative of the oldest school of literature represented at all in modern France (for M. de Pontmartin is a chicken compared with M. Alphonse Karr), exhibits itself still in Les bêtes à bon Dieu (1). Nobody, we believe, quite knows when M. Karr was born; we hope that nobody will know when he dies. He ought never to die, for he is the one perfect living representative of the esprit gaulois as it once was, with all its merits and all its defects—defects which are getting as precious as the merits. As usual, the framework of the present collection of articles is better than the articles themselves. Not that there is not good work in the latter. The history, told in the fashion of Titus Livius, of what the politicians of 1870 and later times ought to have done, and didn't do—how Napoleon III. and all his Ministers fell fighting at Sedan, like Roland at Roncesvalles and James IV. at Flodden, M. Emile Ollivier alone surviving to turn hermit, and expiate his crime; how MM. Jules Favre, Gambetta, and Freycinet imitated their heroic repentance a little later; how M. Ferry and General Boulanger fought for four hours at close quarters with the sword (with the true history of the General, who began by killing Hector of Troy in single combat, communicated by parenthesis, and the new and surprising adventures of President Grévy), is not inconsiderable fun. Some Dialogues of the Dead are also good, especially the remark (quite worthy of him who wrote "Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose"), that the dialogue is "le seul plaisir qu'aient imaginé pour les âmes immortelles les dieux et les poètes, si ingénieux pour les supplices des enfers, et si peu inventifs pour les paradis." Nor is this touch the worse that it is put in the mouth of Frederick the Great. Nor are similar things to seek in the remaining papers. But the introduction is perhaps the most fertile in them, the introduction in which M. Karr explains the reason why he has turned his "wasps" into "ladybirds." He might, by the way, have referred to the very unjust idea, popular in some countries, that ladybirds are capable of leaving a blister on the hand where they alight as well as of polishing off aphides—which is the point in their character on which he dwells. There is in this introduction one of the specially interesting apologies for old age—not too flattering and not too evidently sour-grapish—which men of letters have sometimes known how to compose. Let us hope that when he said "pour elles [les femmes] vieux est le superlatif de scélérat" he was only in a recrudescence of that "ill humour or disappointment" in which he confesses that he must have been when he laid it down long ago that "Il est une cruelle punition pour les hommes qui ont trop aimé les femmes: c'est de les aimer toujours." Nowadays in milder mood he would, it seems, substitute for "punition," which he owns to be a blasphemy, "don" or "privilège." Perhaps there is not quite the same emphatic genuineness about this optimism as there is in the pessimism of the original. It is capped, however, by a maxim wherein is much wisdom:—"L'homme aime la femme qu'il veut aimer, la femme qu'il aime—la femme aime ou croit aimer l'homme par lequel il lui plaît d'être aimé. Cela a l'air assez ténu, mais n'en est pas moins vrai." It is true, and what is more, you may search the whole school or schools of brisk young writers like M. Paul Bourget, M. Henry Rabusson, M. Georges Duruy, and the rest, even M. de Maupassant, not to mention the denizens of the Naturalist pigstye, without finding anything as true on the matter whereof they will all still be talking.

M. Cartailhac's volume of the Bibliothèque Scientifique Internationale (2) is, like most of the volumes of that series, a well-executed and closely-packed treatise. The bones of primitive man and his kitchen-middens, his Caves of Machpelah, his flint weapons and his beads, his menhirs and his circles of stones, all have due notice. The author has gone to excellent authorities for his facts, and he does not appear to possess any tyrannously predominating views of his own which might interfere with impartial statement on points of opinion. As always in this series, the illustrations are numerous, well selected, and mostly very good; though in a few cases there is a certain smudgy effect about some of the details, which may be more artistic, but is less instructive, than if it were otherwise.

We think M. Paul Mahalin (3) was better employed in writing L'hôtellerie sanglante than in cataloguing (not too reasonably) the pretty actresses of Paris from the point of view not so much of their talents as of their profiles, their dimensions, their coats, their hosen, and their hats (the lady on the cover of the volume is not excessively coated or chaussée; but never mind). However, there is no harm in the book, and it provides abundance of gossip about a subject which is, perhaps, better beloved of gossips than any other.

Paris, delighting in foreign novelists, has its Ouida on one side and its Tolstoi on the other to comfort it. It is needless to say much here of Le Colonel Sabretasche (4); of the other, it may be observed that the profane will be wrong to hope that the Swan-song (5) is Count Tolstoi's own. The swan is another than he, and a musician, which swans are not usually, save in extremis. There are other stories in the book besides this, and as the Seer-novelist-count is at his best in short stories, this is not something to be unthankful for.

NEW BOOKS AND REPRINTS.

CLOTHED with allegory as with a garment, mystic, wonderful, is The Dial, the new artistic review projected by Mr. Charles H. Shannon and Mr. C. Ricketts. On its cover there is pictured a sundial, set in a semi-cirque of unutterable things. Its frontispiece, glorious in green and blue and gold, is an exceedingly cryptic design, which, if we may hazard any conjecture, is symbolical of the editorial belief, not now proclaimed for the first time, that "the artistic conscientiousness cannot be controlled by the paying public." The lovely white lady in the "illustration to the Great Worm," by Mr. Ricketts, arrayed in golden hair, worn, like the vulgar or Philistine conscience, all on one side, may represent the artistic conscience. She leans, not too gracefully, against an indigo rock, and offers white lilies to a gold-flecked cerulean monster that issues from a distant range of blue mountains and extends many a rood over the green landscape. It is a mild and unblatant beast, apparently, though terrors untold may lurk in its invisible tail. Perhaps it impersonates the paying public. The accompanying letterpress offers no light. We guess 'tis frightful there to see a lady so lightly clad as she, beautiful exceedingly. Exquisitely dusky is another illustration to the parable of "the Great Worm" by Mr. Shannon; nor is there less scope for the interpreter in Mr. Reginald Savage's "Miracle of the Roses" or the tail-pieces by Mr. Ricketts, some of which are strongly reminiscent of Blake. Altogether there is some relevancy in the editor's apologetic reference to the "seeming aggressiveness" that characterizes The Dial, though it is not a little curious that a magazine put forth with the sole aim of gaining sympathy with its views should so successfully conceal those views under allegorical forms. Mr. Shannon's idyllic sketch, "A Simple Story," is gracefully written, and there is some sound criticism in the introductory paper on M. Puvis de Chavannes; yet neither in these nor in the "Notes" on current movements in the world of art do we find any broad or definite "views" of art that call for comment or criticism. For the present at least the individuality of The Dial is decidedly of a negative kind. It can scarcely do more than cause a little flutter in studios that are disdainful of the methods and traditions of the Academy.

The Life and Letters of Father Damien (Catholic Truth Society) is edited by Father Pamphile, the elder brother of the devoted missionary priest, the story of whose labours among the lepers of Molokai was recently made known in Mr. Edward Clifford's graphic and interesting little volume. Father Pamphile's biographical sketch is brief, yet sober and unaffectedly simple in style. He gives many interesting reminiscences of the home-life at Tremeloo, and relates in few but touching words how his brother Joseph, "as though struck by a sudden inspiration," visited him when stricken with typhus fever, and asked if it would console him if he should take his place as a missionary to the Sandwich Islands. The work had already been assigned to Father Pamphile when his brother volunteered to undertake it, and was warmly encouraged in the enterprise. The success of the mission, and its unforeseen influence since the death of Father Damien, are now known and felt by all. The history of the settlement at Molokai, under the control of Father Damien, in the present volume, shows that the capacity and energy of the young priest in administrative matters were not less notable than his constancy in good works and unselfish devotion.

Decipit exemplar—the proverb is something musty; but what else can be said of a book which might make Mr. Rider Haggard wish he had never put pen to paper to describe hairbreadth 'scapes? The sub-title of The Amber City, by Thomas Vetch (London: Biggs & Debenham), is "The Adventures of a Steam

(1) Les bêtes à bon Dieu. Par Alphonse Karr. Paris: Calmann Lévy.

(2) La France préhistorique. Par E. Cartailhac. Paris: Alcan.

(3) Les jolies actrices de Paris. Cinquième série. Par P. Mahalin. Paris: Tresee et Stock.

(4) Le Colonel Sabretasche. Par Ouida. 2 vols. Paris: Perrin.

(5) Le chant du cygne. Par le Comte Léon Tolstoi. Paris: Perrin.

Crocodile in Central Africa," and from this the practised reader can guess what kind of stuff is before him. The author has yet to learn that to be revolting is not necessarily to avoid dullness.

The story of what may be called a world-wide mission, directed from home, and partly carried out at home, is well told by Canon Scarth in a little illustrated book, In All the World (Griffith, Farran, & Co.), which treats of the St. Andrew's Waterside Church Mission among seamen and emigrants at home and abroad.

Mrs. E. R. Pitman's Lady Missionaries in Foreign Lands (Partridge & Co.) is apparently inspired by the notion that the wives of missionaries serving in foreign parts form a class of missionaries in themselves. Preachers, translators, teachers, catechists, and so forth, are all cited as needful; but, adds Mrs. Pitman, there is another class "not one whit less important—namely, female missionaries." It is scarcely possible that a woman who accompanies her husband on his mission to the heathen can avoid being herself a missionary. The subjects of the biographical narratives that comprise Mrs. Pitman's book, Mrs. Ann Hasseltine Judson, Mrs. Gobat, and the rest, worked in conjunction with their husbands, not apart from them in single blessedness. They are deserving of honour as missionaries, and not mainly as female missionaries.

All persons who are troubled with the theory that man is descended from an anthropoid ape of arboreal habit may gather some consolation from the very confident treatise of one "Laurentius" entitled The Miocene Man of the Bible (R. Tilling). The "Miocene man" of the author—not of the Bible—is no other than the "Missing Link," and he is now discovered by "Laurentius," to the joy of Palæontologists, let us hope, and the confusion of Evolutionists. He had "thirteen ribs and no wife," we are told, and it is due wholly to "lovely woman," as "Laurentius" says in his tropical manner, that man is not in the like evil case, and as ferocious as his anthropoid ancestor.

The Eiffel Tower, a translation of M. Gaston Tissandier's popular little handbook (Sampson Low & Co.), will be read with interest by many who have not visited the Paris Exhibition. The clear yet minute description of the tower and its construction, from foundation to campanile and lighthouse, is such that may be readily grasped by anybody, and the numerous illustrations after photographs are very useful aids.

A reprint that ought to be popular is Mr. Francis Galton's Tropical South Africa (Ward, Lock, & Co.), which forms the new volume of the "Minerva Library." The book is well illustrated with woodcuts and an excellent portrait, and contains, in addition, three accounts of travels selected from Mr. Galton's Vacation Tourists, from the pens of Sir George Grove, the late W. G. Clark, and the author.

Of the pretty and well-printed "Stott Library" we have a second instalment of a Selection from De Quincey, edited by Mr. W. H. Bennett (David Stott). Another volume of selections is edited by Mr. J. R. Tutin—Selections from Keats—in "Routledge's Pocket Library." This includes full reprints of most of Keats's best work, with selections from Endymion that are chosen with discrimination, for the most part, and are fully representative of the poet's early manner.

We have received new editions of Mr. Walter Bagehot's treatise on A Universal Money (Longmans & Co.); the fifth volume of the "Cabinet Edition" of Kaye and Malleon's History of the Indian Mutiny (Allen & Co.), and Professor Dicey's Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (Macmillan & Co.).

We have also received Chronicles of a Health Resort, by A. Helder (Fisher Unwin); Longfellow's Excelsior, illustrated by G. H. Edwards in monotint (Hodder & Stoughton); Sweet Innocence, illustrated by the same artist, with verses by Clarice Cornwall (Hodder & Stoughton), and The Ocean of Life, verses on the twelve months, with illustrations in "Christmas Card" style, by various hands (Hodder & Stoughton).

NOTICE.

We beg leave to state that we cannot return rejected Communications; and to this rule we can make no exception, even if stamps for return of MS. are sent. The Editor must also entirely decline to enter into correspondence with the writers of MSS. sent in and not acknowledged.

ADVERTISEMENTS intended for the SATURDAY REVIEW should be addressed to the MANAGER of the ADVERTISEMENT DEPARTMENT, at the OFFICE, 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON. A printed Scale of Charges can be obtained on application.

The SATURDAY REVIEW may be had in Paris every Saturday from Veuve J. BOYVEAU, 22 Rue de la Banque (near the Bourse); also at Le KIOSQUE DUPERRON, Boulevard des Capucines, and Le KIOSQUE MICHEL, Boulevard des Capucines, by whom also Subscriptions will be received.

Copies of the SATURDAY REVIEW may likewise be obtained in Paris every Saturday of Messrs. GALIGNANI, 224 Rue de Rivoli.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW

OF

POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

Price 6d.

CONTENTS OF No. 1,768, SEPTEMBER 14, 1889:

- Boycotting and Picketting.*
The Wicked Turk. The National Party Again.
Still More Chatter.
The Greatness of Mr. Gladstone and the Smallness of England.
Greased-Pole-Climbing. Lord Randolph's Recantation.
"What is a Pound?" The Last Murder.
The Coming Elections. The Monetary Congress.
"First-Class Original Information." Egypt.
Physical "Examination".
-
- More Curious Curios.*
London's Face. The International Statistical Institute.
The Experimental Matinee—II. The Financial Crisis in Italy.
The St. Leger. Professor Flower's Address to the British Association.
Exhibition of Egyptian Antiquities.
Lime Light on the Strike.
-
- Lord Dalhousie.*
Stories. The Azores and Madeira.
Twenty-nine Sermons of Savonarola. Mediæval France.
Physical Text-Books. Amid Devon's Alps. All Saints', Maidstone.
Hints to Lady Travellers.
The English Poor Law System. Hearts of Oak.
Literary Influence in British History. French Literature.
New Books and Reprints.

London: Published at 38 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—MAGNIFICENT FIREWORK DISPLAY.—Every Thursday at 8, by Messrs. C. T. Brock & Co. Grand special Devices, including the Magic Garden Fountains which spring into life and Flowers that grow and blossom. Brock's Living Fireworks and other novelties of 1889.—Admission daily, One Shilling.

NOTICE to PRINCIPALS of UNIVERSITIES, COLLEGES, and SCHOOLS.

Principals are requested to forward, without delay, particulars of the EXAMINATIONS and OPEN SCHOLARSHIPS for 1890, to the EDITOR, "Schoolmaster's Calendar," 4 York Street, Covent Garden.

ILFRACOMBE.—ILFRACOMBE HOTEL. Thoroughly furnished, equipped, and decorated. 250 Rooms. Eight Lawn-Tennis Courts, Large Swimming Bath, Private Baths. Descriptive Tariff of Manager.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, Strand, W.C.—The COUNCIL earnestly appeal for DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS. £20,000 required for new Nursing Establishment, enlargement of Medical School, the Convalescent Home, and current expenses. Bankers: Messrs. Drummond.
 ARTHUR E. READE, Secretary.

P. and O. MAIL STEAMERS FROM LONDON TO
 BOMBAY, GIBRALTAR, MALTA, BRINDISI, EGYPT, ADEN, and MADRAS via BOMBAY every week.
 CALCUTTA, MADRAS, COLOMBO, CHINA, STRAITS, and JAPAN, AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND and TASMANIA, and ALEXANDRIA every alternate week.
 CHEAP RETURN TICKETS.

For particulars apply at the Company's Offices, 122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., and 25 Cockspur Street, London, S.W.

A Y R T O N & T H O M A S,
 PATENT AGENTS.

Conduct every kind of British, Foreign, and Colonial Business connected with PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRADE MARKS.

Mr. H. M. THOMAS, Author of "The True Position of Patentees," being a practical engineer, PERSONALLY SUPERINTENDS the applications in respect of mechanical inventions.

Moderate Terms. No charge for preliminary advice.

Telegraphic Address, "Prolonged, London."

9 & 10 Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, W.C.

FRY'S

Lancet—"Pure, and very soluble."

Medical Times—"Eminently suitable for Invalids."

PURE CONCENTRATED

Sir C. A. CAMERON, President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland—"I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well."

COCOA.

J O H N B R I N S M E A D & S O N S
 UPRIGHT IRON GRAND PIANOFORTES.

Prices from 40 Guineas upwards.

JOHN BRINSMEAD & SONS, Pianoforte Makers by Special Appointment to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales, 1889.—18, 20, and 22 Wigmore Street, W. Lists free.

EDUCATIONAL.

UNIVERSITY of LONDON.—SPECIAL CLASSES.

LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL COLLEGE.

SPECIAL CLASSES are held in the subjects required for the Preliminary Scientific and the Intermediate M.B. (London) Examinations.

Fee for the whole Course, to Students of the Hospital 8 Guineas.
To others..... 10 "A SPECIAL CLASS is also held for the Primary F.R.C.S. Examination.
These Classes will commence in October, and are not confined to Students of the Hospital.
MUNRO SCOTT, Warden.

HEIDELBERG COLLEGE, Heidelberg.

Principals.

Dr. A. HOLZBERG, Ph.D., M.A. Heidelberg.

A. B. CATTY, M.A., Christ's Coll., Camb.

WALTER LAWRENCE, M.A., St. John's, Oxon.

At the recent Exam. for the I.C.S. a Pupil of the College obtained HIGHEST MARKS IN GERMAN of all Candidates.

SANDHURST FURTHER EXAM., August 1889.

Alexander R. C. Rew..... 7536.

O. & C. SCHOOL EXAMINATION, 1889.

Two Senior and 5 Junior Certificates.

Mr. CATTY in London, 5 Riverdale Road, Twickenham.

OWENS COLLEGE, VICTORIA UNIVERSITY, MANCHESTER.

PROSPECTUSES for the SESSION 1889-90 are NOW READY.

I.—DEPARTMENT OF ARTS, SCIENCE, AND LAW.

II.—DEPARTMENT OF MEDICINE.

III.—DENTAL DEPARTMENT.

IV.—DEPARTMENT FOR WOMEN.

V.—DEPARTMENT OF THE EVENING CLASSES.

VI.—SCHOLARSHIPS, &c. (value £12 to £100 per annum).

Apply to Mr. CORNISH, 33 Piccadilly, Manchester; or at the College.

HENRY WM. HOLDER, M.A., Registrar.

ST. CLARE COLLEGE, WALMER, KENT.

Head-Master—The Rev. E. D'AUQUIER, M.A. Clare College, Camb.

One of the Examiners to the Irish Board of Intermediate Education, late Head-Master of South-Eastern College, Ramsgate, with a staff of Assistant Masters (Graduates).

The College is situated in a delightful spot, close to the sea, and contains teaching and boarding accommodation, chapel, sanatorium, infirmary, playroom, laundry, gymnasium, tuckshop, workshop, &c., 14 acres of well-timbered and beautiful grounds, cycle path, cricket and football fields, tennis-courts, &c., sea-bathing and boating.

The school year is divided into three terms; each term consists of about thirteen weeks.
Inclusive fees, Eighty Guineas per annum. Exhibitions and Scholarships, of £10, £15, and £21, are annually thrown open for competition.

For further information, apply to the HEAD-MASTER.

TUDOR HALL COLLEGE (for Ladies), Forest Hill, Sydenham, S.E.

Established over Thirty Years.—Principals: Mrs. TODD and Rev. J. W. TODD, D.D. Head-Mistress: Miss TODD (Girton), Cambridge. Professors: Seeley, Churton Collins, Garcia, Dient, Loman, Dulcken, Larpent, &c.—Gymnasium, Tennis-courts, Swimming, Riding. Full particulars, Photo of Coll., &c., on application.

THE LONDON HOSPITAL MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1.

The Hospital, which is the largest general Hospital in the kingdom, contains nearly 800 beds, all in constant use. There are wards for Accidents, Surgical and Medical cases, Diseases of Women and Children, and Ophthalmic cases. Special departments for Diseases of the Eye, Ear, Throat, Skin and Teeth, and for Cancer, Tumours, Diseases of the Bladder, Piles, and Fistula. Number of in-patients last year, 8,873; out-patients, 101,518; accidents, 7,456. Surgical operations daily.

APPOINTMENTS—Resident Accoucheur, House Physicians, House Surgeons. Forty of these appointments are made annually. Numerous Dressers, Clinical Clerks, Post-mortem Clerks, and Maternity Assistants are appointed every three months. All appointments are free. Holders of resident appointments are also provided free board. The New College Buildings are now complete, and afford more than double the former accommodation.

Two Entrance Science Scholarships, value £60 and £10, and two Buxton Scholarships, value £30 and £20, will be offered for competition at the end of September to new Students. Sixteen other Scholarships and Prizes are given annually.

Luncheons or dinners, at moderate charges, can be obtained at the Students' Club.

The London Hospital is now in direct communication with all parts of the Metropolis. The Metropolitan, District, and other Railways have stations within a minute's walk of the Hospital and College.

For further information apply personally, or by letter, to

Mile End, E.

MUNRO SCOTT, Warden.

ST. GEORGE'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, HYDE PARK CORNER, S.W.

The WINTER SESSION will commence on Tuesday, October 1, with an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS by Dr. T. CLIFFORD ALLBUTT, F.R.S., at 4 P.M.

A Prospectus of the School, and further information, may be obtained by personal application between One and Three P.M., or by letter addressed to the DEAN at the Hospital.

PROFESSORSHIP of MODERN LITERATURE and ENGLISH LANGUAGE at UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LIVERPOOL, VICTORIA UNIVERSITY.

CANDIDATES for the Chair are requested to send in applications (with testimonials) on or before October 5.

Residence to commence in January 1890. Endowment, £375 with two-thirds of fees.

For particulars apply to REGISTRAR, University College, Liverpool.

ST. MARY'S HOSPITAL MEDICAL SCHOOL, PADDINGTON, W.

The WINTER SESSION begins on October 1, with an INTRODUCTORY ADDRESS by Dr. MAGUIRE, at 4 P.M.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS, one of £105, and FIVE of 50 guineas, of which two are specially open to Students from Oxford and Cambridge, will be awarded by Examination on September 26 and 27 at 10 A.M.

The Hospital has 231 beds, with well-appointed special departments for Diseases of Children and of the Eye, Ear, Skin, and Throat. Eight resident appointments in it are open to students without expense or charge.

The School is replete with all the requisite laboratories and appliances for the study of Anatomy, Physiology, Chemistry, Pathology, Bacteriology, and Hygiene, and the course of teaching both in the hospital and the school provides complete preparation for every examination and degree.

The RESIDENTIAL COLLEGE is under the care of the Warden, Dr. LUFF.

The Prospectus, to be obtained by application to the School Secretary, contains full information as to the Scholarship Examinations, as to the Annual Prizes and School Scholarships, the course of study, and the Special Classes for the higher University degrees.

HERBERT W. PAGE, M.A., M.C., Cantab., Dean.

CITY and GUILDS of LONDON INSTITUTE for the ADVANCEMENT of TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

ENGINEERING.—The Course of TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION at the Central Institution of the City and Guilds of London Institute is adapted to the requirements of persons who are preparing to become Civil, Mechanical, Electrical, or Chemical Engineers, or to enter manufacturing works.

The next Session will commence on October 1, 1889. An Entrance Examination will be held on September 23 and the three following days.

JOHN WATNEY,

WALTER S. PRIDEAUX, } Hon. Secs.

Programme and full particulars of Course of Instruction may be obtained on application at the Central Institution, Exhibition Road, S.W., or at the Office of the Institute, Gresham College, E.C.

THE Misses S. and R. ALLEN-OLNEY (formerly Head-

Mistresses respectively of Blackheath and South Hampstead High Schools), residing in the healthy suburb of Hampstead, receive a few YOUNG LADIES to board and educate. The arrangements are those of a refined home. Large playground and full-sized tennis-court. Preparation for University examinations and degrees. Reference kindly permitted to parents of present and former pupils.—41 Belsize Park Gardens, London, N.W.

PRÉ SCILLA, LAUSANNE.—Miss WILLS, late Head-

Mistress of the Norwich High School, has a very comfortable English HOME for Elder GIRLS. Garden and full-sized Tennis-court. Numbers limited. Subjects taken:—French, German, Italian, Music, Singing, and Painting.

THE Rev. W. ALMACK, M.A., BRUCE CASTLE, near TOTTENHAM, prepares PUPILS wanting special help for the Universities, Army, Legal or Medical Preliminaries, or the ordinary requirements of business life. Excellent house in Park of 20 acres, containing Cricket and Football grounds. References, the Head-Masters of Charterhouse, Cheltenham, and Marlborough.

BELL FARM, CLEWER HILL, WINDSOR.

BOYS prepared for ETON and other PUBLIC SCHOOLS.—Address Miss HIBBARD.

MORNING PREPARATORY CLASS for the SONS of GENTLEMEN (exclusively), 13 Somerset Street, Portman Square.

Miss WOODMAN will be at home for Visitors on and after October 2.

SCHOOL BEGINS October 5, at the usual hour.

THE HEAD-MASTER of ASCHAM SCHOOL, BOURNE-

MOUTH, wishes to form a Class of LITTLE BOYS to EDUCATE with his own Son of Seven. Special terms.

PREPARATIONS for ENTRANCE and SCHOLARSHIPS at PUBLIC SCHOOLS—A few VACANCIES for next Term.—Apply to HEAD-

MASTER, care of A. & A. W. Brown, 4 Little George Street, Westminster, S.W.

EDUCATION, PARIS.—An ENGLISH LADY, residing at

Neuilly, receives a limited number of YOUNG LADIES, who share with her own daughters educational advantages and home comforts. French is the language of the household. English and foreign resident governesses. First-class professors for all accomplishments. The house stands in its own grounds. Large garden, tennis court. Highest references given.—Prospectus on application to Rev. G. G. W. CLEMENGER, the Rectory, Alwalton, near Peterboro'.

FARM PUPILS.—GENTLEMEN are received on the FARM

of the AYLESBURY DAIRY COMPANY, Limited, Horsham, Sussex. 1,400 acres arable and pasture; 400 head of cattle.—For terms and particulars apply to the SECRETARY, Aylesbury Dairy Company, in London, St. Petersburg Place, Bayswater, or Horsham, Sussex.

RADFORD HOUSE, COVENTRY.

PREPARATORY SCHOOL for the SONS of GENTLEMEN. Established 1800. Boys received from Six to Twelve years of age, and prepared for College and Local Examinations, which have hitherto been successfully passed by the Pupils of this School. Eight acres of recreation ground.—Apply for particulars to Mrs. and Miss HOUGHTON.

RE-OPENING of the SCHOOLS.—SCHOOL PIANOS.

NEW MODELS from 18 Guineas. All the latest improvements. These instruments are remarkable for their beautiful tone, perfect action, and durability. PIANOS for HIRE, or on the THREE YEARS' SYSTEM.—W. J. ENNEVER & SON, Manufacturers, 57 Berners Street, London, W.

SCHWEITZER'S

COCOATINA.

GUARANTEED PURE SOLUBLE COCOA.

This Old-established Article retains its position as "the finest Cocoa in the market." It is unequalled in purity and flavour, bears the strictest Chemical test, and keeps in all climates.

THE MOST NUTRITIOUS AND ECONOMICAL.

VAN HOUTEN'S COCOA.	PURE—SOLUBLE. BEST & GOES FARTHEST. EASILY DIGESTED. MADE INSTANTLY.
	"Once used, always used—its PURITY is beyond question." Health.
	"It is admirable—flavour perfect—and so PURE." British Medical Journal.
	C. J. VAN HOUTEN & ZOON, WEESP, HOLLAND.
	DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA. This pure Solution is the best remedy for Acidity of the Stomach, Heartburn, Headache, Gout, and Indigestion.

DINNEFORD'S MAGNESIA. The safest and most gentle Aperient for delicate constitutions, Ladies, Children, and Infants. 180 Bond Street, London; and all Chemists.

First produced and designated CORN FLOUR
by BROWN & POLSON in 1856.

BROWN & POLSON'S CORN FLOUR

Was in the Field some time before any other was anywhere heard of, and no other has now an Equal
Claim to the Public Confidence.

BRAIN FAG, SHATTERED NERVES,
Sleeplessness, Nervous Exhaustion, Rheumatism, Gout, Torpid Liver, Nervous Dyspepsia, &c. yield like magic to the healing influence of mild continuous currents of Electricity, generated, without any shock or discomfort whatever, by wearing

HARNESS' ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT.

This world-famed guaranteed genuine Electric appliance has cured thousands of sufferers, and should be worn by all in search of HEALTH, STRENGTH, and VITAL ENERGY. Write for descriptive pamphlet, containing copies of hundreds of unsolicited testimonials, or call, if possible, and personally consult Mr. C. B. HARNESS, Consulting Medical Electrician (Freident of the British Association of Medical Electricians), 5 Oxford Street, London, W. (corner of Rutland Street). Advice free, personally or by letter.

LIFE ASSURANCES, &c.

NORTHERN ASSURANCE COMPANY,
 Established 1836.
 LONDON—1 MOORGATE STREET, E.C. ABERDEEN—1 UNION TERRACE.
 INCOME AND FUNDS (1888).
 Fire Premiums £615,000
 Life Premiums 203,000
 Interest 149,000
 Accumulated Funds £3,581,000

ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH LAW
 LIFE ASSURANCE ASSOCIATION (Established 1839).
 12 Waterloo Place, London. 120 Princes Street, Edinburgh.
 Whole Life Bonuses never less than £1 10s. per cent. per annum.
 Annuities. Loans. Liberal Conditions.
 ARTHUR JACKSON, General Manager } 12 Waterloo Place,
 FRANCIS E. COLENSO, F.I.A., Actuary } London.
 CITY OFFICE—11 LUDGATE HILL, E.C.
 JOHN MUNRO, Secretary.

PHENIX FIRE OFFICE,
 LOMBARD STREET AND CHARING CROSS, LONDON.—Established 1782.
 Moderate Rates. Absolute Security.
 Liberal Loss Settlements. Prompt payment of Claims.
 W. C. MACDONALD } Joint Secretaries.
 F. B. MACDONALD }
 Losses paid over £17,000,000.

IMPERIAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.
 Established 1803.—1 OLD BROAD STREET, E.C.; and 22 PALL MALL, S.W.
 Subscribed Capital, £1,200,000. Paid-up, £300,000. Total Invested Funds, over £1,600,000.
 E. COZENS SMITH, General Manager.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK, Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane.
 THREE per CENT. INTEREST on DEPOSITS repayable on demand. TWO per CENT. on CURRENT ACCOUNTS when not drawn below £100. The Bank undertakes, free of charge, the Custody of Securities and Valuables; the Collection of Bills of Exchange, Dividends, and Coupons; and the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Shares, and Annuities. Letters of Credit and Circular Notes issued. THE BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free on application.
 FRANCIS RAVENSCROFT, Manager.

SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK.
 ISSUE of £371,320.
 (Authorized by the Sheffield Corporation Acts, 1883 and 1889.)
 The CORPORATION of SHEFFIELD give NOTICE that they are prepared to receive applications for the above sum of SHEFFIELD CORPORATION £3 PER CENT. STOCK. Minimum price of Issue £100 per cent.
 Interest payable half-yearly, on March 1 and September 1, at the Sheffield and Hallamshire Bank, Sheffield, or by their London Agents, Messrs. GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, & CO., 67 Lombard Street.
 No sum less than £50 of Stock will be allotted, and any amount in excess of that sum must be a multiple of £10.
 Under the Trust Investment Act, 1889, recently passed, this Stock is an available investment for every Trustee who is not expressly forbidden by the instrument creating his trust to invest in Corporation Stock.
 Forms of Prospectus, &c., and all information required, will be supplied by Borough Accountant's Office, W. FISHER TASKER, Registrar.
 Bridge Street, Sheffield,
 August 16, 1889.

AMERICAN DENTISTRY. ARTIFICIAL TEETH,
 without plates. Perfect imitations of the natural teeth. Artistic, painless, and perfect. Most moderate fees. Consultations free daily.
 Dr. PAGET, Illustrated pamphlet post free.
SURGEON-DENTIST,
 445 STRAND, W.C.
 (Facing Charing Cross Station.)

THE GREATEST of all PIANOFORTES.

THE STEINWAY PIANOFORTES, New York & London.
 Steinway Hall, LOWER SEYMOUR STREET, Portman Square, London, W.

BOOKS, &c.

H. SOTHERAN & CO.
 BOOKSELLERS, BOOKBINDERS, AND PUBLISHERS.
 GENERAL AGENTS FOR PRIVATE BOOKBUYERS & PUBLIC INSTITUTIONS
 IN AMERICA, INDIA, THE COLONIES, AND FOREIGN PARTS.
 A MONTHLY CATALOGUE of SECOND-HAND BOOKS, published over forty years; Specimen No. gratis and post-free.
 Telegraphic Address: BOOKMEN, LONDON. Established 1816.
 136 STRAND, W.C. AND 36 PICCADILLY, W.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW sent by post at following rates per annum, paid in advance:
 Any part of the United Kingdom £1 8 2
 India and China 1 12 6
 Other British Colonies, Europe, Egypt, and America 1 10 6
 STEEL & JONES, 4 Spring Gardens, London, S.W.

DISCOUNT, 3d. in the 1s.—HATCHARDS, 187 Piccadilly,
 London. All the New and Standard Books. Bibles, Prayers, Church Services, &c.
 Post Orders promptly executed. Libraries arranged and catalogued.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW.—The following NUMBERS of THE SATURDAY REVIEW are required, for which 1s. each will be given, viz. 1, 2, 15, 25, 56, 59, 73, 75, 99, 112, 130, 132, 138, 174, 452, and 1627 (clean copies)—at the Office 34 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a book by a gentleman who cured himself after suffering nearly forty years.
 Post free for 13 stamps, from
 Mr. B. BEASLEY, Sherwood, Willesden Lane, Brondesbury, London; or Hall Green (near Birmingham).

Just published, 3s.; free by post, 3s. 4d.
THE OWENS COLLEGE CALENDAR for the SESSION 1889-90.
 London: MACMILLAN & CO. Manchester: J. E. CORNISH.

IN ACTIVE PREPARATION.
THE SCHOOLMASTER'S CALENDAR.—Handbook of Examinations and Open Scholarships for 1890.
 Advertisers desirous of securing space in the above should communicate at once with the Manager, "Schoolmaster's Calendar," 4 York Street, Covent Garden.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, W.C.;
 241 BROMPTON ROAD, SOUTH KENSINGTON, S.W.;
 AND 2 KING STREET, CHEAPSIDE, E.C.

I
FOR THE CIRCULATION OF BOOKS.

SUBSCRIPTION from £1 1s. per annum.
 Prospectuses and Monthly Lists Gratis.

II
FOR THE SALE OF BOOKS.

Second-hand Copies of all the best Books of past Seasons, at greatly Reduced Prices.
 Lists with Prices Gratis.

III
FOR THE BINDING OF BOOKS.

On the Premises by the best Workmen.
 List of Bound Books Gratis.

N.B.—All Lists and Prospectuses Gratis and Postage Free to any Address.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY,
30 to 34 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

F. V. WHITE & CO.'S RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

NOVELS AT ALL CIRCULATING LIBRARIES.
LADY CLAUD. By Mrs. ALEXANDER FRASER, Author of "Daughters of Belgravia," "The Last Drawing-Room," &c. Second Edition. 2 vols.
MATRON or MAID. By Mrs. EDWARD KENNARD, Author of "A Crack County," "A Real Good Thing," &c. 3 vols.
OFF WITH the OLD LOVE. By N. F. B. 2 vols.
THAT OTHER WOMAN. By ANNIE THOMAS (Mrs. Pender Cudlip), Author of "Her Success," "Allerton Towers," &c. 3 vols.
CLARE STRONG. By G. BERESFORD FITZGERALD, Author of "Lilian" &c. 2 vols.
THE QUEEN ANNE'S GATE MYSTERY. By RICHARD ARKWRIGHT, Author of "Driven Home" &c. 2 vols.
ON CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE. By FLORENCE MARRYAT, Author of "My Sister the Actress," "Facing the Footlights," &c. 3 vols.
LONG ODDS. By HAWLEY SMART, Author of "The Outsider," "Cleverly Won," "The Pride of the Paddock," &c. 3 vols.
SEVERED TIES. By Mrs. HENRY WYLDE. 3 vols.
SHEBA. By "RITA," Author of "Dame Durden," "Miss Kate," "A Vagabond Lover," &c. 3 vols. [Immediately.]
MISS KATE; or, Confessions of a Caretaker. By "RITA," Author of "Dame Durden," "A Vagabond Lover," &c. 1 vol. 6s. [At all Booksellers']

F. V. WHITE & CO., 31 SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND.

BLACKIE'S MODERN CYCLOPEDIA.

The Third Volume of BLACKIE'S MODERN CYCLOPEDIA of Universal Information, Edited by Charles Annandale, M.A., LL.D., with numerous Illustrations, price 6s. in cloth, or 8s. 6d. in half-morocco, is now ready at all Booksellers'.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, 49 AND 50 OLD BAILEY.

Ready immediately at all the Libraries, crown 8vo. handsomely bound, 6s.

THE AUTHORISED TRANSLATION OF
 "Souvenirs intimes de la Cour des Tuileries."
MY MISTRESS, the EMPRESS EUGÉNIE;
 Or, Court Life at the Tuileries.
 By her Private Reader, Madame CARETTE (née BOUVET).
 "We recommend everyone who admires good work to buy and read it."—Morning Post.
 LONDON: DEAN & SON, 160A FLEET STREET, E.C.

Just published.
ECONOMICAL, DAINTY, and PRACTICAL DISHES,

With the use of LIEBIG "COMPANY'S" EXTRACT OF MEAT.
 Compiled by EMILY CORFE.
 London: LIEBIG'S EXTRACT OF MEAT COMPANY, Limited, 9 Fenchurch Avenue, E.C.
 Post free on application.

CLARENDON PRESS NEW BOOKS.

NEW EDITION OF CHAMBERS' HANDBOOK OF ASTRONOMY.

Just published, 8vo. 21s.

A HANDBOOK of DESCRIPTIVE and PRACTICAL ASTRONOMY. By G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S. Vol. I. The Sun, Planets, and Comets. The remaining Volumes, II. Instruments and Practical Astronomy; III. The Starry Heavens, will be published in due course.

Just published, 8vo. cloth, 18s.

A TREATISE on ANALYTICAL MECHANICS. By BARTHOLOMEW PRICE, M.A., F.R.S., F.R.A.S., Sedleian Professor of Natural Philosophy, Oxford. Vol. II. Dynamics of a Material System. Second Edition, Revised and Enlarged.

 Vol. IV. of the Author's "Treatise on Infinitesimal Calculus."

NEW EDITION OF FOWLER'S INDUCTIVE LOGIC.

Just published, extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 6s.

THE ELEMENTS of INDUCTIVE LOGIC. Designed mainly for the Use of Junior Students in the Universities. By T. FOWLER, D.D., Professor of Logic in the University of Oxford. Fifth Edition, with a Collection of Examples.

NEW EDITION OF SWEET'S ANGLO-SAXON READER.

Just published, extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 8s. 6d.

AN ANGLO-SAXON READER. In Prose and Verse. With Grammatical Introduction, Notes, and Glossary. By HENRY SWEET, M.A. Fifth Edition, Revised and Enlarged.

Just published, extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s.

OVID.—TRISTIA. BOOK III. With Notes and Introduction by S. G. OWEN, M.A., Classical Lecturer at the Owens College, Manchester.

UNIFORM WITH "SELECTIONS FROM CLARENDON."

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, bevelled gilt top, 6s.

BURNS.—SELECTED POEMS. Edited, with Introduction, Notes, and a Glossary, by J. LOGIE ROBERTSON, M.A.

Just published, extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

EURIPIDES.—HECUBA. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by CECIL H. RUSSELL, M.A., Assistant Master at Clifton College, late Scholar of Trinity College, Oxford.

Just published, crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

A GRAMMAR of the RUSSIAN LANGUAGE. By W. R. MORFILL, M.A., Oriel College, Oxford. With Reading Lessons.

 The Author's object has been to give a concise and clear analysis of the word-forms and syntax of the Russian language.

Just published, extra fcp. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

SCOTT'S MARMION. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by THOS. BAYNE.

 Uniform with Professor Minto's Edition of "The Lay of the Last Minstrel."

FULL CLARENDON PRESS CATALOGUE FREE ON APPLICATION.

LONDON: HENRY FROWDE, CLARENDON PRESS
WAREHOUSE, AMEN CORNER, E.C.

THREE NEW NOVELS AT ALL LIBRARIES.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A DAUGHTER OF THE PEOPLE."

DIANA. By GEORGIANA M. CRAIK (Mrs. MAY),
Author of "Godfrey Helstone" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"Miss Craik can always be counted upon to write a pleasant domestic story marked by pretty sentiment and excellent taste, and not without a certain quiet humour."—St. James's Gazette.

NOW READY.

AN IRISH COUSIN. By GEILLES HERRING
and MARTIN ROSS. 2 vols. crown 8vo.

"Quite one of the best Irish novels of the generation.....The book is brimful of humour, which emerges even in some of the most tragic situations. As a picture of ramshackle Irish provincial society it is inimitable.....It has the additional merit of being absolutely unpolitical.....a charming and brilliant novel."
Observer.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "WORTH WAITING FOR."

"This novel is one of the best of the season."—Athenæum.

THE SCOTTS of BESTMINSTER. By
J. MASTERMAN, Author of "A Fatal Error" &c. 3 vols. crown 8vo.

"Exciting and well told."—St. James's Gazette.

RICHARD BENTLEY & SON, NEW BURLINGTON STREET.

PARIS EXHIBITION.—The FRENCH DICTIONARY
for TOURISTS—BELLOWS' POCKET FRENCH DICTIONARY. 32mo.
with 4 Maps, roan tuck, 10s. 6d.; morocco, 12s. 6d.

"Complete."—Times. "Without a rival."—Spectator. "The most portable."
Also Scotsman.

TOUS les VERBES.—CONJUGATIONS of all the VERBS,
French and English, with Tables of Weights, Measures, and Equivalent
Values, from Bellows' Dictionary. Second Edition. 32mo. 6d.

LONDON: TRÜBNER & CO., LUDGATE HILL.

PARIS: ERNEST LEROUX, 28 RUE BONAPARTE.
AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

Second Edition. Crown 8vo. price 2s. 6d.

A PRACTICAL PLAN for ASSIMILATING
the ENGLISH and AMERICAN MONEY as a STEP towards a UNIVERSAL MONEY. By the late WALTER BAGEHOT.

 This little book has been long out of print, and is republished in view of the Monetary Congress to be held in Paris during the present month.

LONDON: LONGMANS, GREEN, & CO.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

NOW READY, SECOND EDITION.

DARWINISM. An Exposition of the Theory of Natural Selection, with some of its applications. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, LL.D., F.L.S., &c., Author of "The Malay Archipelago," "The Geographical Distribution of Animals." With Portrait and Map, Crown
8vo. 9s.

The Times says:—"Mr. Wallace has written what may be accepted as a Text-book of Darwinism. He has taken a score of volumes in which Darwin recorded the results of his long and varied researches, and the conclusions to be drawn therefrom, and has condensed them into one volume of 500 pages. He has done this in a style which makes his book a delight to read. In language that is absolutely clear, simple, untechnical, and attractive, Mr. Wallace leads us throughout the new world opened out by Darwin. The method and orderliness of the exposition are admirable; the manner in which the facts and conclusions are arrayed will strike the most casual reader.....No more perfect or more readable exposition of the doctrine as Darwin left it exists than is contained in this volume by one who, more than any one else, is in a position to place himself inside of the whole subject."

New Novels.

MAROONED. By W. CLARK RUSSELL,
Author of "The Wreck of the Grosvenor" &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo. 31s. 6d.
[Next week.]

SANT' ILARIO. By F. MARION CRAWFORD,
Author of "With the Immortals," "Greifenstein," "Paul Patoff," "Mr.
Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," "Marzio's Crucifix," &c. 3 vols. Crown 8vo.
price 31s. 6d.

The Academy says:—"Sant' Ilario" is a continuation of "Saracinesca," and, like that story, is a picture of the ways of the old Roman nobility under the last days of the Temporal Power, drawn with force and fidelity, which we have learned to expect from the author."

The St. James's Gazette says:—"As a picture of modern life in Italy 'Sant' Ilario' cannot fail to make its mark and add to the author's reputation."

NOW READY, WITH NEARLY FIVE HUNDRED PICTURES.

THE ENGLISH ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE, 1889.

The Volume consists of upwards of 900 closely printed pages, and contains nearly 500 illustrations, of various sizes, bound in extra cloth, coloured edges, 8s.

Among the chief Contents of the Volume are the following Complete Stories and Serials

SANT' ILARIO. By F. MARION CRAWFORD.

THE HOUSE OF THE WOLF. By STANLEY J. WEYMAN.

LA BELLE AMÉRICAINNE. By W. E. NORRIS.

GLIMPSES OF OLD ENGLISH HOMES. By ELIZABETH BALCH.

HOW THE "CRAYTURE" GOT ON THE STRENGTH; and other Sketches. By ARCHIBALD FORBES.

ONE NIGHT—THE BETTER MAN. By ARTHUR PATERSON.

SUCCESS. By KATHARINE S. MACQUOID.

JENNY HARLOWE. By W. CLARK RUSSELL.

And Shorter Essays, Poems, and Papers by

A. C. SWINBURNE.
GRANT ALLEN.
OSCAR WILDE.
J. E. HODGSON, R.A.
R. J. BLOMFIELD, R.A.
CHARLES DICKENS, Jun.

Hon. LEWIS WINGFIELD
THEODORE CHILD.
LADY LINDSAY.
H. SAVILE CLARK.
W. TRUSCOTT.
E. E. PRINCE.

BARBARA C. FINCH.
KATE CARTER.
DEWEY BATES.
LOUIS DAVIES.
W. WALLIS, F.S.A.
And other Writers.

The Illustrations include Examples by the following Artists:

Sir JOSHUA REYNOLDS, HARLOWE, ZOFFANY, ROMNEY, G. SCHARF, HOLBEIN,
GERARD DOW, JOHN HOPPNER, R.A., HENRY RYLAND, A. D. MCCORMICK, C. E.
PERUGINI, W. PADGETT, G. MORTON, W. B. GARDNER, W. J. HENNESSY, H. RAILTON, HUGH THOMSON, H. JOHNSON, H. PENNINGTON, R. J. BLOMFIELD, T. C. FARRER, MARGERY MAY, G. L. SEYMOUR, J. E. HODGSON, R.A., LOUIS DAVIS, DEWEY
BATES, H. OAKLEY, and others.

A NEW VOLUME begins with the October Number. Single Numbers, 6d.; by post, 8d. Yearly Subscription, including Double Number, 6s. 6d.; or if by post, 8s. 6d.

Ask your Bookseller for a Prospectus.

SKETCHES of RURAL LIFE: Poems. By
FRANCIS LUCAS. Extra fcp. 8vo. 5s.

The Spectator says:—"It is seldom indeed that one comes across verses so genuinely 'flavouring of the soil,' and so wholesome and bright in all other respects."

NEW EDITION. WITH ILLUSTRATIONS BY BRYAN HOOK.

A YEAR WITH the BIRDS. By W. WARDE
FOWLER, Sub-Rector of Lincoln College, Oxford; Author of "Tales of the Birds." A New Edition. With Illustrations by Bryan Hook. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

Now ready, Parts I. and II.

A TEXT-BOOK of PHYSIOLOGY. By MICHAEL FOSTER, M.A., M.D., LL.D., F.R.S., Professor of Physiology in the University of Cambridge, and Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, &c.
With Illustrations. Fifth Edition, largely revised. In Three Parts, 8vo.
Part I. comprising Book I. BLOOD—THE TISSUES OF MOVEMENT—
THE VASCULAR MECHANISM. 10s. 6d.—Part II. comprising Book II.
THE TISSUES OF CHEMICAL ACTION WITH THEIR RESPECTIVE MECHANISMS—NUTRITION.

BOOKS FOR THE HOLIDAYS.

MACMILLAN'S THREE SHILLING AND SIXPENNY NOVELS.

ROBBERY UNDER ARMS: a Story of Life and Adventure in the Bush and in the Goldfields of Australia. By ROLF BOLDREWOOD.
SCHWARTZ. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY.

NEIGHBOURS on the GREEN. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

THE WEAKER VESSEL. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY.

JOYCE. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

CRESSY. By BRET HARTE.

WESSEX TALES. By THOMAS HARDY.

A LONDON LIFE. By HENRY JAMES.

MISS BRETHERTON. By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

REUBEN SACHS. By AMY LEVY.

A BELEAGUERED CITY. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.

CASTLE DALY. By ANNIE KEARY.

THE WOODLANDERS. By THOMAS HARDY.

 Other Volumes to follow.

MACMILLAN & CO., BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

W. H. ALLEN & CO.'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

HISTORICAL AND EDUCATIONAL.

Now publishing in 6 crown 8vo. vols. each 6s. CABINET EDITION.

HISTORY of the SEPOY WAR. By Sir J. W. KAYE; and HISTORY OF THE INDIAN MUTINY. By Colonel G. B. MALLESON, C.S.I. (Originally published in 7 Volumes.) Edited by Colonel G. B. MALLESON, C.S.I. Vols. I.-V. now ready.

"This consolidated edition, in the handy Cabinet size, must be welcomed as a boon."—Scotsman.

"Messrs. W. H. Allen have done a public service by bringing the best attainable narrative of the Indian Mutiny within the reach of a larger number of readers."—Guardian.

Now ready, 2 vols. crown 8vo. each 6s.

LIVES of INDIAN OFFICERS. By Sir J. W. KAYE. (Originally published in 3 vols.) With Frontispiece. Each Volume is complete in itself.

THE STATESMEN SERIES.

Vols. I.-IX. now ready, each 2s. 6d. Two last Volumes.

THE MARQUESS WELLESLEY. By Colonel G. B. MALLESON, C.S.I.

The Athenæum says:—"A most excellent little Life, of which there is nothing to be said except that it is almost a perfect example of the manner in which to treat a biography in a condensed handbook form."

The Saturday Review says:—"Among the actors in the Anglo-Indian drama no name is more conspicuous than that of Richard Colley Wellesley, and few writers are better qualified to describe his character and administration than Colonel Malleison."

THE MARQUIS of DALHOUSIE. By Captain

LIONEL J. TROTTER.

"The story of Dalhousie's life is very well told in this book."—Scotsman.

"We can heartily recommend the volume to all students of Indian history."—England.

EMINENT WOMEN SERIES.

Vols. I.-XIX. now ready, each 3s. 6d.

TWO LAST VOLUMES.

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING. By

JOHN H. INGRAM.

The Lady says:—"No one has ever more thoroughly appreciated our great poetess than her latest biographer, and no one has given the world such a fresh and vigorous record of her life."

The Whitehall Review says:—"His dispassionate comparison and skilful assimilation of all conflicting and fragmentary memoirs of 'one of England's purest as well as greatest poets,' enable him to give a probably more faithful portraiture than could have been done by any one of her compeers."

JANE AUSTEN. By Mrs. MALDEN.

"The writer's style is clear and unaffected, and her volume is pleasant to read."—Globe.

"The picture presented of this delightful woman is as charming—and that is saying a great deal—as the best of her own creations."—St. James's Gazette.

"This latest addition to the 'Eminent Women Series' is in every way excellent. . . . Jane Austen could herself have chosen no better biographer than this."—Whitehall Review.

"Mrs. Charles Malden has written a pleasant little book—all sensible books about Miss Austen are pleasant—and this book is certainly not only sensible but, in parts, acute."—Spectator.

POPULAR EDITION. Crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

VOLUMES ALREADY ISSUED:

Vol. I. GEORGE ELIOT. By MATHILDE BLIND.

Vol. II. EMILY BRONTË. By A. MARY F. ROBINSON.

Royal 4to. pp. vii. and 1491, cloth, £4 14s. 6d.

A COMPLETE ENGLISH-PERSIAN DICTIONARY. Compiled from Original Sources. By ARTHUR N. WOLLASTON, C.I.E., H.M.'s Indian (Home) Service, Translator of the "Anwar-i-Suhaili" &c. &c.

"All Persian scholars owe the author a heavy debt of gratitude for his undertaking and bringing to so successful an issue so onerous and, in many respects, ungrateful a task."—Academy.

"It is noteworthy that the appearance of this monumental tome, which has occupied the learned leisure of some sixteen years of the author's life, should have been coincident with the visit to our country of his Majesty the Shah. He pleads consideration for inevitable mistakes—but we should be ashamed to look for faults in the vast memorial of patient toil with which the erudite translator of the 'Anwar-i-Suhaili' has enriched all Oriental libraries."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Wollaston's smaller undertaking of the same kind was a great achievement, but this giant lexicon, in which, as far as can be ascertained, hardly a word of importance in our vernacular is omitted, must be of the utmost assistance to all who desire fully to enjoy the fruits of Persian Literature, or to become proficient in perhaps the most poetical of Eastern languages."—Morning Post.

A CHINESE MANUAL, comprising Grammar, with Idiomatic Phrases and Dialogues. By ROBERT R. DOUGLAS, Professor of Chinese at King's College, London, &c. Fcp. 10s. 6d.

ANGLICISED COLLOQUIAL BURMESE; or, How to Speak the Language in Three Months. By Lieut. F. A. L. DAVIDSON, Royal Scots Fusiliers. Fcp. 5s.

LONDON: W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

BLACKWOOD'S EDUCATIONAL SERIES.

DR. MACKAY'S

FIRST STEPS in GEOGRAPHY. 86th Thousand, Revised. 18mo. 4d.

OUTLINES of MODERN GEOGRAPHY. 181st Thousand, Revised. 18mo. 1s.

THE INTERMEDIATE GEOGRAPHY. 14th Edition, Revised. Crown 8vo. 2s.

ELEMENTS of MODERN GEOGRAPHY. 53rd Thousand, Revised. Crown 8vo. 3s.

MANUAL of MODERN GEOGRAPHY. 11th Thousand, Revised. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

ELEMENTS of PHYSIOGRAPHY and PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY. With Illustrations. 30th Thousand, Revised. 1s. 6d.

DR. PAGE'S

INTRODUCTORY TEXT-BOOK of PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY. Twelfth Edition, Revised and Enlarged by Professor LAPWORTH, Birmingham. 2s. 6d.

ADVANCED TEXT-BOOK of PHYSICAL GEOGRAPHY. With Engravings. Revised and Enlarged by the Same. Third Edition. 5s.

INTRODUCTORY TEXT-BOOK of GEOLOGY. With Engravings. Twelfth Edition, Revised and almost entirely Re-written by the Same. Price 3s. 6d.

ADVANCED TEXT-BOOK of GEOLOGY. Sixth Edition, with Glossary. 7s. 6d.

PROFESSOR NICHOLSON'S

MANUAL of ZOOLOGY. Seventh Edition, Rewritten and Enlarged. Post 8vo. with Engravings, 18s.

TEXT-BOOK of ZOOLOGY. Fourth Edition, Enlarged. Crown 8vo. with Engravings, 7s. 6d.

INTRODUCTORY TEXT-BOOK of ZOOLOGY. Sixth Edition, with Engravings, 3s.

OUTLINES of NATURAL HISTORY. Third Edition, with Engravings, 1s. 6d.

MANUAL of PALÆONTOLOGY. Second Edition, 2 vols. 8vo. with Engravings, 42s.

ANCIENT LIFE-HISTORY of the EARTH. With a Glossary and Index. Crown 8vo. with Engravings, 10s. 6d.

PROFESSOR MINTO'S

MANUAL of ENGLISH PROSE LITERATURE. Third Edition, Revised. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

CHARACTERISTICS of ENGLISH POETS from CHAUCER to SHIRLEY. New Edition, crown 8vo. 7s. 6d.

DR. POTTS' & REV. C. DARNELL'S

ADITUS FACILIORES: an Easy Latin Construing Book. Tenth Edition, fcp. 8vo. 3s. 6d.

ADITUS FACILIORES GRÆCI: an Easy Greek Construing Book. Fourth Edition, fcp. 8vo. 3s.

CAMENARUM FLOSCULI. By Dr. POTTS and W. A. HEARD, M.A. Third Edition, crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

PRACTICAL RUDIMENTS of the LATIN LANGUAGE. By Dr. JOHN ROSS. Third Edition, crown 8vo. 1s. 6d.

GREEK TESTAMENT LESSONS. With Notes and Essays. By the Rev. J. HUNTER SMITH, M.A., King Edward's School, Birmingham. Crown 8vo. with Maps, 6s.

STONYHURST LATIN GRAMMAR. By the Rev. JOHN GERARD. Crown 8vo. 3s.

ENGLISH PROSE COMPOSITION. By Dr. JAMES CURRIE. 53rd Thousand. 1s. 6d.

PRIMER of GEOMETRY. By FRANCIS CUTHBERTSON, M.A. LL.D. Sixth Edition. 1s. 6d.

MANUAL of BOTANY. By Dr. ROBERT BROWN. Crown 8vo. with Illustrations, 12s. 6d.

JOHNSTON'S ELEMENTS of AGRICULTURAL CHEMISTRY and GEOLOGY. Revised by Sir CHARLES A. CAMERON, M.D., F.R.G.S.L., &c. Fifteenth Edition, fcp. 6s. 6d.

JOHNSTON'S CATECHISM of AGRICULTURAL CHEMISTRY. Eighty-sixth Thousand. Revised by Sir C. A. CAMERON, M.D. &c. With Engravings, 1s.

STORMONTH'S DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE. Carefully Revised by the Rev. P. H. PHELP, M.A. Library Edition, 31s. 6d. College Edition, 7s. 6d. Abridged School Edition, 2s.

BLACKWOOD'S

ELEMENTARY EDUCATIONAL SERIES,

EMBRACES

Literary, Geographical, and Historical Reading-Books,

STANDARD AUTHORS, RECITATION BOOKS, ALGEBRA, ARITHMETIC, GRAMMAR AND ANALYSIS, COMPOSITION, &c.

A Catalogue of the Complete Series will be sent post free to Head-Teachers on application.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

MR. MURRAY'S LIST OF EDUCATIONAL WORKS.

I. ENGLAND.

THE STUDENT'S HUME: a History of England from the Earliest Times to 1688. Continued to 1878. Thoroughly Revised. By the late Professor J. S. BREWER. With Coloured Maps and Woodcuts. (830 pp.) 160th Thousand. 7s. 6d.
Or, in Three Divisions. Price 2s. 6d. each.
PART I.—B.C. 55-1185. PART II.—A.D. 1185-1688. PART III.—1688-1878.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY of ENGLAND. To 1878. With Coloured Maps and 63 Woodcuts. (400 pp.) 3s. 6d.

PRIMARY HISTORY of BRITAIN for JUNIOR CLASSES. A New and thoroughly Revised Edition. With Coloured Map. (430 pp.) 2s. 6d.

MRS. MARKHAM'S HISTORY of ENGLAND. Down to the year 1880. With 100 Woodcuts. (528 pp.) 3s. 6d.

LITTLE ARTHUR'S HISTORY of ENGLAND. From the Earliest Times down to 1878. With 36 Woodcuts. 490th Thousand. (287 pp.) 1s. 6d.

STUDENTS' CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY of ENGLAND. Henry VII.—George II. By HENRY HALLAM. (680 pp.) 7s. 6d.

STUDENTS' ENGLISH CHURCH HISTORY. 3 vols. Each 7s. 6d. I. 596-1509. II. 1509-1717. III. 1717-1884. By Canon PERRY.

STUDENTS' ENGLISH LANGUAGE. Its Origin and Growth. By GEORGE P. MARSH. (538 pp.) Price 7s. 6d.

STUDENTS' ENGLISH LITERATURE. With Biographical Notices. By T. B. SHAW. (510 pp.) Price 7s. 6d.

STUDENTS' SPECIMENS of ENGLISH LITERATURE. By T. B. SHAW. (560 pp.) 7s. 6d.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER ENGLISH LITERATURE. With Lives of our Chief Writers. (276 pp.) 3s. 6d.

SMALLER SPECIMENS of ENGLISH LITERATURE. To be used with the foregoing book. (385 pp.) 3s. 6d.

DR. WM. SMITH'S ENGLISH COURSE.

- ENGLISH GRAMMAR. With Exercises. (270 pp.) 3s. 6d.
- PRIMARY ENGLISH GRAMMAR. With Exercises and Questions. (120 pp.) 1s.
- MODERN GEOGRAPHY. (400 pp.) 5s.
- SMALLER MODERN GEOGRAPHY. (290 pp.) 2s. 6d.
- ENGLISH COMPOSITION. With Illustrations and Exercises. (210 pp.) 3s. 6d.

A READABLE ENGLISH DICTIONARY. Etymologically arranged. By DAVID MILNE, M.A. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. [Just out.]

II. FRANCE.

STUDENTS' HISTORY of FRANCE. To 1873. By W. H. JERVIS. With Coloured Maps and Woodcuts. (766 pp.) 7s. 6d.
 See also Students' History of Modern Europe, below.

MRS. MARKHAM'S HISTORY of FRANCE. Down to 1878. With 70 Woodcuts. (550 pp.) Price 3s. 6d.

LITTLE ARTHUR'S HISTORY of FRANCE. To the Fall of the Second Empire. With Maps and Woodcuts. (305 pp.) 2s. 6d.

DR. WM. SMITH'S FRENCH COURSE.

FRENCH PRINCIPIA.

- *Part I. Grammar, Exercises, Vocabularies, Materials for Conversation, &c. (202 pp.) 3s. 6d.
- Appendix to Part I. Additional Exercises and Examination Papers. (110 pp.) 2s. 6d.
- *Part II. A French Reading Book; with Etymological Dictionary. (376 pp.) 4s. 6d.
- *Part III. Prose Composition. (386 pp.) Price 4s. 6d.

STUDENTS' FRENCH GRAMMAR. With an Introduction by M. LITTRÉ. (490 pp.) 6s.

SMALLER FRENCH GRAMMAR. (230 pp.) 3s. 6d.

III. GERMANY & ITALY.

STUDENTS' MODERN EUROPE. From the Fall of Constantinople to the Treaty of Berlin. By R. LODGE, M.A. Second Edition. (800 pp.) 7s. 6d.

STUDENTS' HISTORY of EUROPE during the MIDDLE AGES. By HENRY HALLAM. (650 pp.) 7s. 6d.

MRS. MARKHAM'S HISTORY of GERMANY. To 1880. With 50 Woodcuts. (460 pp.) 3s. 6d.

DR. WM. SMITH'S GERMAN COURSE.

GERMAN PRINCIPIA.

- *Part I. Grammar, Exercises, Vocabularies, Materials for Conversation, &c. (244 pp.) 3s. 6d.
- *Part II. A German Reading Book; with a Dictionary. (272 pp.) 3s. 6d.

PRACTICAL GERMAN GRAMMAR. For Advanced Students. (210 pp.) 3s. 6d.

DR. WM. SMITH'S ITALIAN COURSE.

ITALIAN PRINCIPIA.

- *Part I. Grammar, Delectus, Exercises, and Vocabularies. (288 pp.) 3s. 6d.
- *Part II. An Italian Reading Book. (222 pp.) 3s. 6d.

 See also Students' History of Modern Europe, above.

IV. ROME.

STUDENTS' HISTORY of ROME. To the Establishment of the Empire. By Dean LIDDELL. With Coloured Map and Woodcuts. (686 pp.) 7s. 6d.

STUDENTS' GIBBON: The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. With Woodcuts. (700 pp.) Price 7s. 6d.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY of ROME. To the Establishment of the Empire. With Coloured Map and 70 Illustrations. (324 pp.) 3s. 6d.

DR. WM. SMITH'S LATIN COURSE.

PRINCIPIA LATINA.

Young Beginners' 1st Latin Book: an Introduction to Principia Latina. Part I. (112 pp.) 2s.

Young Beginners' 2nd Latin Book: an Introduction to Principia Latina. Part II. (98 pp.) 2s.

- *Part I. Containing Grammar, Delectus, Exercises, and Vocabularies. (216 pp.) 3s. 6d.
- Appendix to Part I. Additional Exercises and Examination Papers. (125 pp.) 2s. 6d.
- *Part II. A First Latin Reading Book. (268 pp.) 3s. 6d.
- *Part III. A First Latin Verse Book. (160 pp.) 3s. 6d.
- *Part IV. Latin Prose Composition. (194 pp.) 3s. 6d.
- *Part V. Short Tales and Anecdotes for Translation into Prose. (102 pp.) 3s.

STUDENTS' LATIN GRAMMAR. For the Higher Forms. (450 pp.) 6s.

SMALLER LATIN GRAMMAR. For Middle and Lower Forms. (260 pp.) 3s. 6d.

LATIN-ENGLISH VOCABULARY to Phædrus, Cornelius Nepos, and Cæsar's Gallic War. (190 pp.) 3s. 6d.

TACITUS, GERMANIA, AGRICOLA, and FIRST BOOK of the ANNALS. With Notes. (376 pp.) 3s. 6d.

A CHILD'S FIRST LATIN BOOK. Comprising a full Practice of Nouns, Pronouns, and Adjectives, with the Verbs. By T. D. HALL. New Edition. (138 pp.) 2s.

OXENHAM'S ENGLISH NOTES for LATIN ELEGIACS. With Rules of Composition. (156 pp.) 3s. 6d.

V. ETON COLLEGE BOOKS.

THE ETON LATIN GRAMMAR. An entirely new work, just out. By F. H. RAWLINS, M.A., and W. H. INGE, M.A. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE ETON ELEMENTARY LATIN GRAMMAR. By A. C. AINGER, M.A., and H. G. WINTLE, M.A. (327 pp.) 3s. 6d.

THE PREPARATORY ETON GRAMMAR. Abridged from the above work. (108 pp.) 2s.

A FIRST LATIN EXERCISE BOOK. Adapted to the above Grammar. (152 pp.) 2s. 6d.

THE ETON FOURTH FORM OVID. Selections from Ovid and Tibullus. With Notes by H. G. WINTLE. (155 pp.) 2s. 6d.

THE ETON HORACE. The Odes, Epodes, and Carmen Sæculare. With Notes by F. W. CORNISH. With Maps. (380 pp.) 6s.

VI. LATIN DICTIONARIES.

A SMALLER LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY. With a Dictionary of Proper Names. By Dr. SMITH, and Professor T. D. HALL, M.A. (733 pp.) 7s. 6d. The Etymological portion by J. K. INGRAM, LL.D.

This Edition is to a great extent a new and original work. Every article has been carefully revised.

A SMALLER ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY. (730 pp.) 7s. 6d.

A COMPLETE LATIN-ENGLISH DICTIONARY. With Tables of the Roman Calendar, Measures, Weights, and Monies, and a Dictionary of Proper Names. (1,200 pp.) 10s.

A COPIOUS and CRITICAL ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY. From original sources. (970 pp.) 10s.

VII. DR. SMITH'S CLASSICAL DICTIONARIES.

CLASSICAL DICTIONARY. With 750 Woodcuts. 8vo. 18s.

SMALLER CLASSICAL DICTIONARY. With 200 Woodcuts. 7s. 6d.

SMALLER DICTIONARY of GREEK and ROMAN ANTIQUITIES. With 200 Woodcuts. Price 7s. 6d.

VIII. GREECE.

STUDENTS' HISTORY of GREECE. With Coloured Maps and Woodcuts. (610 pp.) 7s. 6d.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY of GREECE. To the Roman Conquest. With Coloured Maps and 74 Illustrations. (268 pp.) 2s. 6d.

DR. WM. SMITH'S GREEK COURSE.

INITIA GRÆCA.

- *Part I. Grammar, Delectus, Exercises, and Vocabularies. (284 pp.) 3s. 6d.
- Appendix to Part I. Additional Exercises and Examination Papers. (110 pp.) 2s. 6d.
- *Part II. A Greek Reading Book. (220 pp.) 3s. 6d.
- *Part III. Prose Composition. (202 pp.) Price 3s. 6d.

STUDENTS' GREEK GRAMMAR. For the Higher Forms. (386 pp.) 6s.

SMALLER GREEK GRAMMAR. For Middle and Lower Forms. (220 pp.) 3s. 6d.

GREEK ACCIDENCE. (125 pp.) 2s. 6d.

PLATO.—SELECTIONS. With Notes. (212 pp.) 3s. 6d.

HUTTON'S PRINCIPIA GRÆCA. Comprehending Grammar, Delectus, Exercise Book, with Vocabularies, &c. (154 pp.) 3s. 6d.

IX. BIBLE AND CHURCH HISTORY.

A CONCISE DICTIONARY of the BIBLE: its Antiquities, Biography, Geography, and Natural History. With Illustrations. (1,039 pp.) 21s.

A SMALLER BIBLE DICTIONARY. With Illustrations. (620 pp.) 7s. 6d.

STUDENTS' OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY. By PHILIP SMITH. With Maps and Woodcuts. (630 pp.) 7s. 6d.

STUDENTS' NEW TESTAMENT HISTORY. By PHILIP SMITH. With Maps and Woodcuts. (680 pp.) 7s. 6d.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER SCRIPTURE HISTORY. Down to A.D. 70. With 40 Illustrations. (370 pp.) 3s. 6d.

STUDENTS' MORAL PHILOSOPHY. By Dr. FLEMING. (440 pp.) 7s. 6d.

STUDENTS' ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY. 2 vols.: I. A.D. 30-1003. II. 1003-1611. By PHILIP SMITH. With Woodcuts. Each 7s. 6d.

A SHORT PRACTICAL HEBREW GRAMMAR. With Analysis and Vocabulary. By Professor STANLEY LEATHES. (252 pp.) 7s. 6d.

X. SCIENCE AND GEOGRAPHY.

THE INVISIBLE POWERS of NATURE: Some Elementary Lessons in Physical Science for Young Beginners. By E. M. CAILLARD. Post 8vo. 6s.

NEWTN'S FIRST BOOK of NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. (200 pp.) 3s. 6d.

LYELL'S STUDENTS' ELEMENTS of GEOLOGY. A New and Revised Edition. By Professor P. M. DUNCAN. With 600 Illustrations. (611 pp.) 9s.

KIRKES' HANDBOOK of PHYSIOLOGY. Edited by W. MORRANT BAKER, F.R.C.S., and V. D. HARRIS, M.D. New and Revised Edition. Post 8vo. with 500 Illustrations, 14s.

- ETON EXERCISES in ALGEBRA. By E. P. ROUSE and A. COCKSHOTT. (124 pp.) 3s.
- ETON EXERCISES in ARITHMETIC. By Rev. T. DALTON, M.A. 3s.

STUDENTS' ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY. By Canon BEVAN. With Woodcuts. (710 pp.) 7s. 6d.

STUDENTS' MODERN GEOGRAPHY. By Canon BEVAN. With Woodcuts. (684 pp.) 7s. 6d.

STUDENTS' GEOGRAPHY of BRITISH INDIA. By Dr. GEORGE SMITH. With Maps. (532 pp.) Price 7s. 6d.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER ANCIENT GEOGRAPHY. With 30 Illustrations. (210 pp.) 3s. 6d.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER MODERN GEOGRAPHY. (290 pp.) 2s. 6d.

A DICTIONARY of PLACE NAMES. Giving their Derivations. By C. BLACKIE. With an Introduction by JOHN STUART BLACKIE. Crown 8vo. price 7s.

XI. ANCIENT HISTORY AND MYTHOLOGY.

STUDENTS' ANCIENT HISTORY. To the Conquests of Alexander the Great. By PHILIP SMITH. With Woodcuts. (608 pp.) 7s. 6d.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER ANCIENT HISTORY. Down to the Conquests of Alexander the Great. With 70 Illustrations. (310 pp.) 3s. 6d.

CLASSICAL MYTHOLOGY. For Ladies' Schools and Young Persons. With 90 Woodcuts. (300 pp.) 3s. 6d.

* Keys to these Works may be obtained by authenticated Teachers on application to the Publisher.

Mr. Murray's Illustrated Catalogue, containing full particulars of the above Works, as well as of many other books suitable for Scholars, Students, and School Prizes, sent by post on application.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET.

BLACKIE & SON'S EDUCATIONAL LIST.

COMMERCIAL GEOGRAPHY. A Complete Manual of the Countries of the World, their Chief Centres of Trade and Means of Communication, Natural Productions, Mineral Resources, Exports, Manufactures, &c. By Dr. CARL ZEHDEN. Translated by FINDLAY MUIRHEAD, M.A. Crown 8vo. cloth, 7s. 6d.

"One of the best text-books ever written."—Scotsman.

REALISTIC ELEMENTARY GEOGRAPHY. Taught by Picture and Plan. Embracing Direction, the Elements of Maps, Definitions, &c. The Pictorial Examples are derived chiefly from the Geographical Features of England. By W. G. BAKER, M.A. Cloth, 1s. 9d.

[Just published.]

PRACTICAL FRENCH GRAMMAR. For the use of Schools. With Exercises and Vocabulary. By C. O. SONNTAG. Cloth, 2s.

[Just published.]

"Practical, well arranged, and thoroughly reliable. It seems to us just the thing for elementary school work."—Schoolmaster.

DR. BURNS' PRAXIS PRIMARIA. Progressive Exercises in Writing Latin, with Notes on Syntax, Idiomatic Differences, and Latin Style. Eighth Edition. Cloth, 2s.—KEY, 3s. 6d.

"Amongst the many similar works this ought to take a high place."

Educational Times.

COMPENDIOUS ENGLISH GRAMMAR. With Exercises. For Schools and Pupil Teachers. Cloth, 1s. 6d.

"A clear, simple, sensible elementary grammar, adapted for the use of the higher forms."—Journal of Education.

STORIES and ESSAYS. A Series of Exercises in English Composition. Cloth, 1s.

"This is a useful sequel to the 'Handbook of Composition Exercises' already noticed. The stories are all striking and sufficiently varied, and are classified with a view to correct in succession the common errors of beginners in composition."

Educational Times.

A PRACTICAL ARITHMETIC on an ENTIRELY NEW METHOD. By JOHN JACKSON. Second Edition. Cloth, 4s.

"Compiled on new lines, at once clear and exhaustive, Mr. Jackson's work is, best of all, eminently practical."—Educational Times.

A SYNOPSIS of ENGLISH HISTORY; or, Historical Note-Book. For the Use of Pupil Teachers, Students, &c. Compiled by HERBERT WILLS. Cloth, 2s.

"An excellent abstract of the memory work of History. We can recommend it with the greatest confidence."—Schoolmaster.

HISTORY of the BRITISH EMPIRE. By EDGAR SANDERSON, M.A., late Scholar of Clare College, Cambridge. Brought down to the Year 1888. With Illustrations, Genealogical Tables, Maps, and Plans. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

"A thoroughly good book, well designed and faithfully executed."—Schoolmaster.

AN EPITOME of HISTORY, Ancient, Mediæval, and Modern. For Students and General Reference. By CARL PLOETZ. Translated, with extensive Additions, by H. TILLINGHAST. Cloth, 7s. 6d.

"In the excellence of its arrangement, as well as the fulness and general accuracy of its details, the work is almost unique."—Times.

BAYNHAM'S ELOCUTION. Select Readings and Recitations, with Rules and Exercises on Pronunciation, Gesture, Tone, and Emphasis. By GEO. W. BAYNHAM, Teacher of Elocution in the Glasgow University, &c. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

"As a guide to correct pronunciation, and to the adornments and graces of expression, this volume is marked by qualities of more than ordinary value."

Daily Telegraph.

A CONCISE DICTIONARY of the ENGLISH LANGUAGE: Literary, Scientific, Etymological, and Pronouncing. Based on the New Edition of Ogilvie's Imperial Dictionary. By CHARLES ANNANDALE, M.A., LL.D. Cloth, 10s. 6d.; half-morocco, 15s.

"The 'Concise Dictionary' stands first—and by a long interval—among all the one-volume English Dictionaries hitherto published."—Academy.

THE STUDENT'S ENGLISH DICTIONARY, Etymological, Pronouncing, and Explanatory. By JOHN OGILVIE, LL.D. Illustrated by 300 Engravings. Imperial 16mo. Roxburgh, 7s. 6d.; half-calf, 10s. 6d.

"This is the best etymological dictionary we have yet seen at all within moderate compass."—Spectator.

NEW READING BOOKS FOR ELEMENTARY CLASSES.

THE CENTURY READERS. With numerous Illustrations. Specially designed and Engraved for the Series, and bound in cloth.

PRIMER I., 2½d.	PRIMER II., 3d.	INFANT READER, 5d.
READER I., 8d.		READER IV., 1s. 4d.
READER II., 8d.		READER V., 1s. 6d.
READER III., 1s.		READER VI., 1s. 6d.

"The Century Readers are most prepossessing in appearance. Paper and type are excellent, and we have rarely seen a prettier binding. The passages are well graduated, and those written expressly for the series are admirably simple and sometimes charming, without degenerating into silliness."—Journal of Education.

THE SOVEREIGN READER. Scenes from the Life and Reign of Queen Victoria. By G. A. HENTY. Illustrated. Cloth, 1s. 6d.

"A really admirable volume, describing with some completeness the eventful reign of Queen Victoria, with its stirring events and wonderful progress, right down to the present year."—Teachers' Aid.

THE DICKENS READER. Selected Passages from the works of CHARLES DICKENS, arranged and annotated for Class Reading. With a Biographical Notice of the Author. Cloth, 1s. 4d.

"Such a selection has an irresistible charm for the young. The style is good, the moral is good, and the story is fascinating."—Educational News.

TEXT-BOOKS OF SCIENCE AND MATHEMATICS.

AN ELEMENTARY TEXT-BOOK of GEOLOGY. By W. JEROME HARRISON, F.G.S. Copiously Illustrated. Cloth, 2s.

[Just published.]

EARTH KNOWLEDGE; a Text-Book of Physiology. By W. J. HARRISON and H. R. WAKEFIELD. Part I., Elementary, 1s. 6d.; Part II., Advanced, 2s.

"Carefully compiled, and the grouping of facts and the general arrangement will cause the volume to take a very useful place."—Schoolmaster.

TEXT-BOOK of ORGANIC CHEMISTRY. By Prof. A. BERNTHSEN, Ph.D., formerly Professor of Chemistry in the University of Heidelberg. With the Author's Additions to date. Translated by GEORGE M'GOWAN, Ph.D., Demonstrator in Chemistry, University College of N. Wales, Bangor. Cloth, 9s.

[Just published.]

INORGANIC CHEMISTRY, THEORETICAL and PRACTICAL. With a Course of Chemical Analysis and a Series of Examples in Chemical Arithmetic. By Professor A. HUMBOLDT SEXTON. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

"Clear, and calculated to be useful."—Nature.

ELEMENTARY TEXT-BOOK of DYNAMICS and HYDROSTATICS. By R. H. PINKERTON, B.A. Oxon. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

"The fundamental units are thoroughly well explained, and, from a mathematical point of view, the book leaves nothing to be desired."—Nature.

ELEMENTARY TEXT-BOOK of TRIGONOMETRY. By R. H. PINKERTON, B.A. Oxon. Cloth, 1s. 6d.

"An excellent text-book. The exposition and demonstration of principles are remarkable for clearness and fulness."—Athenæum.

AN ELEMENTARY TEXT-BOOK of APPLIED MECHANICS. By DAVID ALLEN LOW (Whitworth Scholar), M.Inst. M.E. Cloth, 2s.

"An excellent little text-book, and fully sustains the reputation of the author's previous works."—Science and Art.

DESCHANDEL'S NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. Translated and Edited by Prof. J. D. EVERETT. Tenth Edition, revised throughout. Copiously Illustrated. Medium 8vo. cloth, 18s.; in Parts, limp cloth, each 4s. 6d.

Part I.—MECHANICS, HYDROSTATICS, &c.	Part III.—ELECTRICITY and MAGNETISM.
Part II.—HEAT.	Part IV.—SOUND and LIGHT.

"Systematically arranged, clearly written, and admirably illustrated, it forms a model work for a class in experimental physics."—Saturday Review.

ELEMENTARY TEXT-BOOK of PHYSICS. By Prof. EVERETT. Illustrated by many Woodcuts. Fourth Edition, Revised. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

"An unexceptionable work, both in the matter and in the manner of its teaching."—Journal of Science.

OUTLINES of NATURAL PHILOSOPHY: a Text-Book of Elementary Physics. By Prof. EVERETT. Enlarged Edition. Cloth, price 4s.

"A book of great merit: it possesses all the systematic arrangement and lucidity of the author's former publications."—Athenæum.

AN ELEMENTARY TEXT-BOOK of PHYSIOLOGY. By J. M'GREGOR-ROBERTSON, M.A., M.B. Cloth, 4s.

"The text is admirably clear, and it is profusely illustrated with woodcuts, which are well executed."—Lancet.

FIRST MATHEMATICAL COURSE. Comprising Arithmetic, Algebra (to Simple Equations), and the First Book of Euclid. Cloth, 2s.

[Just published.]

ALGEBRA. Up to and including Progressions and Scales of Notation. By J. G. KERR, M.A. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

"A well-arranged, clear, and useful text-book."—Athenæum.

EUCLID'S ELEMENTS of GEOMETRY. With Notes, Examples, and Exercises. Arranged by A. E. LAYNG, M.A. Crown 8vo. Books I. to IV. complete in one volume, 2s. 6d.; or separately, Book I., 1s.; Book II., 6d.; Book III., 1s.; Book IV., 6d.

"Carefully and skilfully prepared.....will become a favourite with many teachers."—Saturday Review.

* * Blackie & Son's Full Catalogue of Educational Books post free on application.

LONDON: BLACKIE & SON, 49 AND 50 OLD BAILEY.

MESSRS. BELL'S EDUCATIONAL WORKS.

FOR THE EXAMINATIONS, 1889-90.

THE SCHOOL CALENDAR, Revised for 1890 .. [Preparing.] .. 1/0

ENGLISH—Annotated Editions—

		EDITOR OR AUTHOR.
ANGLO-SAXON CHRONICLE. From 800 to 1001 } A.D. Two Texts, CCCC 173 and Bodl. Laud. 636. } Edited, with Notes and Complete Vocabulary.. }		R. F. DAVIS, D.Litt. London. [Preparing.]
BACON'S ESSAYS. With Dissertation and Notes..		J. DEVEY, M.A.	1/0
GRAY'S POEMS. With Life, Appendix, and Notes..		Rev. J. MITFORD.	1/6
MILTON'S PARADISE LOST. Book I. Notes, &c.		C. P. MASON, F.C.P.	1/0
SHAKESPEARE'S MERCHANT of VENICE { No Text }		T. DUFF BARNETT, B.A. } London.	1/0
SHAKESPEARE'S HENRY V. No Text.. ..		" "	1/0
"	TEMPEST "	" "	1/0
"	MACBETH "	" "	1/0
"	HAMLET "	" "	1/0

ENGLISH--Class Books--

FIRST NOTIONS of GRAMMAR. 47th Thousand	C. P. MASON, F.C.P.	0/9
OUTLINES of GRAMMAR. 71st Thousand ..	" "	2/0
SHORTER GRAMMAR. 34th Thousand ..	" "	3/6
ENGLISH GRAMMAR. 125th Thousand ..	" "	3/6
PRACTICE and HELP in the ANALYSIS of SENTENCES	" "	2/0
ENGLISH GRAMMAR and ANALYSIS. 17th Thousand	Dr. ERNEST ADAMS.	1/0
ENGLISH LANGUAGE. 22nd Edition ..	" "	4/6

LATIN—Texts only—

CÆSAR—DE BELLO GALLICO	G. LONG, M.A.	1/6
CICERO—DE SENECTUTE et DE AMICITIA } et EPISTOLÆ SELECTÆ. 1 vol. }	" "	1/6
HORATIUS	A. J. MACLEANE, M.A.	1/6
JUVENAL ET PERSIUS	" "	1/6
LUCRETIUS	H. A. J. MUNRO, M.A.	2/0
SALLUSTI CRISPI CATILINA et JUGURTHA..	G. LONG, M.A.	1/6
TERENTI COMOEDIAE	Dr. WAGNER.	2/0
VERGILIUS	J. CONINGTON, M.A.	2/0

LATIN—Annotated Editions—

CÆSAR—DE BELLO GALLICO.	Complete ..	GEORGE LONG, M.A.	4/0
"	Book I. With } Vocabulary by W. F. R. SHILLETO, M.A.... }	" "	1/6
"	DE BELLO GALLICO. Books I. to III.	" "	1/6
"	" " " IV.-V. ..	" "	1/6
"	" " " VI.-VII.	" "	1/6
"	" " " VII. With } Notes, Illustrations, and Maps }	REV. W. C. COMPTON.	4/6
CICERO—DE SENECTUTE	GEORGE LONG, M.A.	1/6
" DE AMICITIA	" "	1/6
HORACE— Bibliotheca Classica	A. J. MACLEANE, M.A.	8/0
" Complete	" "	3/6
" ODES. Book I. With Vocabulary by } A. H. DENNIS, M.A. }	" "	1/6
" ODES, CARMEN SECULARE, and } EPODES }	" "	2/0
" SATIRES, EPISTLES, and ART of } POETRY }	" "	2/0
LIVY. Book II.	J. PRENDEVILLE.	1/6
" XXI.	L. D. DOWDALL, M.A., B.D.	3/6
" XXII.	" "	3/6
SALLUST—JUGURTHA	{ G. LONG, M.A., and J. G. FRAZER, M.A. } ..	2/0
VIRGIL— Bibliotheca Classica 3 vols.	{ Profs. CONINGTON and NETTLESHIP. each	10/6
" ECLOGUES, GEORGICS, and ÆNEID, { Books I. to IV. }	Prof. CONINGTON's Edition Abridged,	4/6
" ECLOGUES and GEORGICS	" "	3/0
" GEORGICS. Books I. and II.	" "	1/6
" ÆNEID. Books V. to XII.	" "	4/6
" " Book I. Vocabulary by W. F. } R. SHILLETO, M.A. }	" "	1/6
" " I. & II., III. & IV. In 2 vols.	" "	each 1/6
" " V. and VI. In 1 vol.	" "	2/0
" " VII. and VIII., IX. and X., } XI. and XII. In 3 vols. }	" "	each 1/6

GREEK—Texts—

ÆSCHYLUS	..	..	..	..	..	F. A. PALEY, LL.D.	2/0
EURIPIDES. 3 vols.	..	..	..	..	..	„	each 2/0
HERODOTUS. 2 vols.	..	..	..	..	..	J. G. BLAKESLEY, D.D.	each 2/0
HOMERI ILIAS. I.-XII.	..	..	..	..	..	F. A. PALEY, LL.D.	1/6
SOPHOCLES	..	..	..	..	..	„	2/0

GREEK—Texts (continued).

GREEK-Texts (continued).		EDITOR OR AUTHOR.
THUCYDIDES. 2 vols...		J. G. DONALDSON, D.D. each 2/0
XENOPHONTIS EXPEDITIO CYRI		J. F. MACMICHAEL, A.B. 1/6
NOYUM TESTAMENTUM GRÆCE, Textus Stephanici, 1550. Editio Major. With additional Readings and References. Small post 8vo. ..	{	F. H. A. SCRIVENER, A.M., D.C.L., LL.D. 7/6

GREEK—Annotated Editions—

ÆSCHYLUS (Bibliotheca Classica)	F. A. PALEY, LL.D.	8/0
AGAMEMNON. PERSÆ. EU- MENIDES. PROMETHEUS VINCTUS, SEPTEM CONTRA THEBAS		each 1/6
ARISTOPHANES—PLUTUS	Rev. H. HOLDEN, LL.D.	2/0
EURIPIDES—HECUBA, ALCESTIS, BACCHÆ, MEDEA, PHENISSÆ, IPHIGENIA IN TAURIS	F. A. PALEY, LL.D.	each 1/6
HOMER—ILIAD. Books I. to VI.		2/6
.. .. . VII. to XII.		2/6
.. .. . XIII. to XXIV. (Biblio- theca Classica).. .. .		6/0
PLATO—APOLOGY of SOCRATES and CRITO	W. WAGNER, Ph.D.	2/6
SOPHOCLES—ANTIGONE, ELECTRA, CEDIPIUS COLONEUS, AJAX.. .. .	F. A. PALEY, LL.D.	each 1/6
.. PHILOCTETES, TRACHINIÆ		each 2/6
THUCYDIDES. Book VI.	Prof. T. W. DOUGAN, M.A.	3/6
XENOPHON—ANABASIS. Book I.	J. F. MACMICHAEL, M.A.	1/6
.. .. . II. and III.		1/6
.. .. . IV. and V.		1/6
.. CYROPÆDIA. Books I. and II.	G. M. GORHAM, M.A.	each 1/6
.. .. . V. and VI.. .. .		each 1/6
.. HELLENICS. Book II.	L. D. DOWDALL, M.A., B.D.	2/0
.. MEMORABILIA	Rev. P. FROST, M.A.	3/0

FRENCH—Annotated Editions—

CORNEILLE—HORACE, Le CID, POLYEUCTE..	F. E. A. GASC.	each	0/6
LA FONTAINE'S FABLES. Eighteenth Edition..	"		1/6
MOLIÈRE—Les FEMMES SAVANTES, Le)	"	each	0/6
BOURGEOIS GENTILHOMME }	"
RACINE—IPHIGÉNIE	"		0/6

FRENCH—Class Books—

FIRST FRENCH BOOK. 106th Thousand	F. E. A. GASC.	1/0
SECOND " " 47th Thousand	"	1/6
(Key to the above two books, in 1 vol., 3s. 6d.)
POCKET FRENCH DICTIONARY. 45th Thousand	"	2/6
FRENCH PROSE COMPOSITION. 17th Thousand	"	3/0
(Key, 6s.)
FRENCH PROSODY	A. GOSSET, M.A.	3/0

GERMAN—Annotated Editions—

BENEDIX—Dr. WESPE. With Vocabulary ..	Prof. F. LANGE, Ph.D.	2/6
GOETHE—HERMANN and DOROTHEA..	E. BELL, M.A.	1/6
GUTZKOW'S ZOPE UND SCHWERT ..	Prof. F. LANGE, Ph.D.	2/6
FREYTAG—Die JOURNALISTEN ..	"	2/6
SCHILLER—MAID OF ORLEANS ..	Dr. WAGNER.	1/6
" MARIA STUART ..	V. KASTNER, B.-ds-L.	1/6
" WALLENSTEIN'S TOD ..	Dr. BUCHHEIM.	2/6

GERMAN—Class Books—

ELEMENTARY GERMAN READER	Prof. LANGE.	1/6
CONCISE GERMAN GRAMMAR (Elementary)..	"	3/0
" " " (Advanced) ..	"	1/6
PROGRESSIVE EXAMINATION COURSE (Ele.)	"	2/0
" " " (Inter.)	"	2/0
" " " (Adv.)	"	1/6
GERMAN PROSE COMPOSITION. 12th Edition	Dr. BUCHHEIM.	4/6
(Key to Parts I. and II., Second Edition, 3s.; to Parts III. and IV., 4s.)

BOTANY—

THE BOTANIST'S POCKET-BOOK. W. R. HAYWARD. Sixth Edition.. .. 4/6

GEOLGY—

STUDENT'S HANDBOOK OF PHYSICAL GEOLOGY.	A. J. JUKES-BROWNE, B.A., F.G.S.	6/0
STUDENT'S HANDBOOK OF HISTORICAL GEOLOGY.	A. J. JUKES-BROWNE, B.A., F.G.S.	6/0

"An admirably planned and well-executed handbook."—Journal of Education.

MUSIC—

TEXT-BOOK OF MUSIC. Thirteenth Edition. Prof. BANISTER	5/0
CONCISE HISTORY OF MUSIC. Ninth Edition. Rev. Dr. BONAVIA HUNT	3/6
LECTURES ON MUSICAL ANALYSIS. Second Edition. Prof. BANISTER ..	7/6

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, YORK STREET, COVENT GARDEN.
CAMBRIDGE: DEIGHTON, BELL, & CO.

GEORGE ALLEN'S PUBLICATIONS.

WORKS BY PROFESSOR RUSKIN.

Uniform with the New Editions of "The STONES of VENICE," and "The SEVEN LAMPS of ARCHITECTURE," a NEW and COMPLETE EDITION of MODERN PAINTERS. In 5 vols. with all the Woodcuts and the 86 Full-Page Steel Engravings, and 1 Lithograph, besides three hitherto unpublished ("The Lake of Zug," "Dawn after the Wreck," and "Château de Blois") etched by Mr. Ruskin and mezzotinted by the late Thomas Lupton, previously intended for the Fifth Volume. The text is that of the last (1873) Edition, with all the Author's subsequent Notes and a NEW EPILOGUE. Cloth, price £6 6s. the 5 vols. (not sold separately).

EXAMPLES of the ARCHITECTURE of VENICE. Selected and drawn to measurement from the edifices. With the Text and the 16 Plates as originally published. The Plates and Text (unbound) in cloth cover, on atlas folio (about 25 in. by 17½ in.), £3 3s.

The Original Plates, engraved by Messrs. Lupton, Reynolds, Armytage, and Cuff, from Drawings by Mr. Ruskin, give good impressions, having comparatively few taken from them for the first and only other Edition published in 1851. The lithographs have been carefully reproduced.

A few of the Special Copies on hand-made paper, with Plates on India paper, still remain, price £6 6s.

THE STONES of VENICE. A New and Complete Edition (imperial 8vo.), 3 vols. with the 53 Plates and all the Woodcuts and Text as originally issued, £4 9s. the 3 volumes.

The Small Edition, containing selections for use of Travellers in Venice and Verona, is still to be had. 2 vols. cloth, 5s. each.

UNIFORM WITH "THE STONES OF VENICE."

THE SEVEN LAMPS of ARCHITECTURE.

An exact Reprint of the Issue of 1880, with its various Additions to the Text of the Second Edition, together with the 14 Original Plates. Imperial 8vo. cloth boards, 21s.

1. The Lamp of Sacrifice—2. The Lamp of Truth—3. The Lamp of Power—4. The Lamp of Beauty—5. The Lamp of Life—6. The Lamp of Memory—7. The Lamp of Obedience.

8vo. paper boards, each 22s. 6d.; purple calf, gilt edges, each 27s. 6d.

ARATRA PENTELICI: Six Lectures on the Elements of Sculpture. With 1 Engraving on Steel, and 20 Plates by the Autotype Process.

1. Of the Division of Arts—2. Idolatry—3. Imagination—4. Likeness—5. Structure—6. The School of Athens.

ARIADNE FLORENTINA: Six Lectures on Wood and Metal Engraving, and Appendix. With 4 Full-page Facsimiles from Holbein's "Dance of Death" and 12 Autotype Plates.

1. Definition of the Art of Engraving—2. The Relation of Engraving to other Arts in Florence—3. The Technics of Wood Engraving—4. The Technics of Metal Engraving—5. Design in the German Schools of Engraving (Holbein and Dürer)—6. Design in the Florentine Schools of Engraving (Sandro Botticelli)—7. Appendix.

VAL D'ARNO: Ten Lectures on Art of the Thirteenth Century in Pisa and Florence. With 1 Steel Engraving and 12 Autotypes.

1. Nicholas the Pisan—2. John the Pisan—3. Shield and Apron—4. Parted per Pale—5. Pax Vobiscum—6. Marble Couchant—7. Marble Rampant—8. Franchise—9. The Tyrrhene Sea—10. Fleur de Lys.

FORS CLAVIGERA: Letters to the Labourers and Workmen of Great Britain. Vols. I., II., III., 7s. each; Vols. IV. to VIII. and Index, 10s. each, paper boards; with several Autotype and other Illustrations.

THE RUSKIN BIRTHDAY BOOK. With Portrait of the Author, specially engraved for the Work. A Selection of Thoughts, Mottoes, and Aphorisms for Every Day in the Year. Cloth extra, 10s.; Large-paper Edition, with India Proof Portrait, 15s. Several other bindings kept in stock. This Work gives a general insight into Mr. Ruskin's teaching and style.

ROADSIDE SONGS of TUSCANY. Translated and Illustrated by FRANCESCA ALEXANDER, and Edited by JOHN RUSKIN. With Articles by Mr. RUSKIN on Domestic Usefulness, the Virtues necessary to Sainthood, the Priest's Offices, and Gipsy Character; also Preface, Epilogue, and Editorial Notes.

In Ten Parts, each containing 2 Full-page Illustrations by the Platinotype Process from Drawings by Miss Alexander, 7s. each Part; or the Complete Work in cloth, £3 10s. medium 4to.

ARROWS of the CHACE. Being a Collection of the Scattered Letters of JOHN RUSKIN. (With added Preface by the Author.) Published chiefly in the daily newspapers during the years 1840-80. In 2 vols. including Letters on Art, Art Criticism, Art Education, Art Fallacies, the Pre-Raphaelites, Turner, Pictures and Artists, Architecture, Science, War, Politics, Economy, Railways, Servants, Houses, Inundations, Education, Women (Work and Dress), Criticism, &c. With Epilogue, Appendix (containing further letters), and Index; also a Steel Engraving, Woodcut, 2 Diagrams, and a Facsimile of part of one of the letters. 8vo, paper boards, 30s. the 2 vols. (not sold separately).

ON the OLD ROAD. A Collection of Mr. Ruskin's Miscellaneous Pamphlets, Articles and Essays (1834-84). In 3 vols. including My First Editor, Lord Lindsay's Christian Art, Eastlake's History of Oil Painting, Samuel Prout, Sir Joshua and Holbein, Pre-Raphaelitism, Opening of the Crystal Palace, Study of Architecture, The Cestus of Aglaja, Minor Writings upon Art, Notes on Science (including early Papers from "London's Magazine," &c. &c.), Fiction, Fair and Foul, Fairy Stories, Usury, Home and its Economies, The Lord's Prayer, An Oxford Lecture, &c. &c. 8vo. paper boards, 30s. the 3 volumes (not sold separately).

Now ready, small post 8vo. cloth, each 5s.; or in roan, gilt edges, each 7s. 6d.

SESAME and LILIES. A small Edition, containing only the Two Lectures, "King's Treasuries" and "Queen's Gardens," and a New Preface. Ninth Edition.

MUNERA PULVERIS. Six Essays on the Elements of Political Economy.

TIME and TIDE, by WEARE and TYNE. Twenty-five Letters to a Working Man of Sunderland on Laws of Work.

THE CROWN of WILD OLIVE. Four Essays on Work, Traffic, War, and the Future of England. With Article on the Economy of the Kings of Prussia.

QUEEN of the AIR: a Study of the Greek Myths of Cloud and Storm.

THE TWO PATHS. Lectures on Art and its Application to Decoration and Manufacture. Delivered in 1858-59. With New Preface and Added Note.

"A JOY for EVER" (and its PRICE in the MARKET). The Substance of Two Lectures on the Political Economy of Art. With New Preface and Added Articles.

THE EAGLE'S NEST. Ten Lectures on the Relation of Natural Science to Art.

LECTURES on ART. Delivered at Oxford in 1870. Revised by the Author, with New Preface.

THE ETHICS of the DUST. Ten Lectures to Little Housewives on the Elements of Crystallization.

PROSERPINA: Studies in Wayside Flowers. Vol. I. containing 13 Full-page Illustrations from Wood and Steel, paper boards, 15s. The first Four Parts of Vol. II. are also to be had, each 2s. 6d.

THE LAWS of FESOLE: a Familiar Treatise on the Elementary Principles and Practice of Drawing and Painting. As determined by the Tuscan Masters. Vol. I. containing 12 Full-page Steel Engravings, paper boards, 10s.

LOVE'S MEINIE: Essays on English Birds. 8vo. paper boards, 4s. 6d.

1. The Robin—2. The Swallow—3. The Dabchicks.

THE ART of ENGLAND: the Course of Lectures delivered at Oxford in 1883.

1. Rossetti and Holman Hunt—2. E. Burne Jones and G. F. Watts—3. Sir F. Leighton and Alma Tadema—4. Mrs. Allingham and Miss Kate Greenaway 5. John Leech and J. Tenniel—6. George Robson and Copley Fielding—7. Appendix, Index, &c. 4to. 1s. per Part, or complete in cloth, 8s.

MORNINGS in FLORENCE. Being Simple Studies of Christian Art for English travellers. 12mo. 10d. each No.

1. Santa Croce—2. The Golden Gate—3. Before the Soldan—4. The Vaulted Book—5. The Strait Gate—6. The Shepherd's Tower.

These Six Parts may be had bound together in cloth, price 5s.

ST. MARK'S REST. The History of Venice. Written for the help of the few Travellers who still care for her Monuments. 12mo. complete in cloth, 7s.

THE KING of the GOLDEN RIVER; or, the Black Brothers, a Legend of Styria. With numerous Woodcuts. Ninth Edition. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

UNTO this LAST. Four Essays on the First Principles of Political Economy. Sixth Edition, cloth, 3s.; 12mo. roan, gilt edges, 4s.

FRONDES AGRESTES. Readings in "Modern Painters." Ninth Edition, cloth, 3s.; roan, gilt edges, 4s.

ULRIC the FARM SERVANT: a Story of the Bernese Oberland. Edited by JOHN RUSKIN. 8vo. cloth, 10s.

"OUR FATHERS HAVE TOLD US": Sketches of the History of Christendom for Boys and Girls who have been held at its Fountains. Now ready, Part I. THE BIBLE OF AMIENS. With 4 Steel Engravings and Plan of the Western Porches of Amiens Cathedral. This volume complete, in cloth or paper boards, 6s.

CHRIST'S FOLK in the APENNINE: Reminiscences of the Tuscan Peasantry. By FRANCESCA ALEXANDER. Edited by JOHN RUSKIN. In Six Parts. Each 1s.; or complete in cloth, 7s.

THE STORY of IDA. By FRANCESCA ALEXANDER. Edited, with Preface, by JOHN RUSKIN. With Full-page Steel Engraving. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s.; roan, gilt leaves, 5s. 6d.

HORTUS INCLUSUS: Messages from the Wood to the Garden. (Mr. Ruskin's Letters to the Sister Ladies of The Thwaite, Coniston.) With a Preface by Mr. RUSKIN. Cloth, 4s.; roan, gilt edges, 5s. 6d.

* * All Books sent carriage paid. Lists post free.

GEORGE ALLEN, Orpington, Kent.

These Works may also be had of Messrs. HAZELL, WATSON, & VINEY, Limited, 1 Creed Lane, Ludgate Hill, E.C.: Messrs. PETHERICK & CO., Sydney and Melbourne; and the principal Booksellers.

Printed by SPOTTISWOODE & CO., at No. 5 New-street Square, in the Parish of St. Bride, in the City of London, and Published by WILLIAM BOYCE, at the Office, No. 38 Southampton Street, Strand, in the Parish of St. Paul, Covent Garden, in the County of Middlesex.—Saturday, September 14, 1889.

THE SATURDAY REVIEW
OF
POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART.

No. 1,769, Vol. 68.

September 21, 1889.

[Registered for Transmission abroad.]

Price 6d.

FIRST-FRUITS OF THE STRIKE.

THE delayed settlement of the strike had such immediate effects as might have been expected from the antecedents of the treaty. A previous failure, which has been sufficiently discussed, had shown that there prevailed on one side what may be most completely described as Gladstonian notions of the meaning of a promise. On the same side there was heard, qualified by occasional formal appeals to the strikers to observe the law, much violent abuse and much threatening. That this was not mere words was made abundantly clear by the undeniable intimidation used by the pickets. With such signs as these to guide an observer who was prepared to use not only his eyes but his sense, it was easy to see that the end of the strike would be but the beginning of new troubles. The stipulation that the so-called "blacklegs" should not be molested was by itself enough to supply the materials of a fresh quarrel. How far the arrangement made with the Dock managers was really acceptable to the men is perhaps doubtful. To judge from much of the shouting heard during the meetings on Sunday they were still for no surrender. On the other hand, they yielded with docility to the orders of Mr. BURNS—when he told them that yield they must, and, moreover, that they must consider themselves to have gained a great victory. The voices, therefore, which were still for war may be more safely taken to indicate that the strikers had not had time to unlearn on the last Saturday night of the strike the formulas they had been taught during its continuance, and so on the last Sunday repeated them by rote while their leader was beginning a new course of instruction. The docility of the strikers to the men who worked the machine was indeed complete. Justice to Mr. BURNS and to his friend "poor little BEN TILLET" (who tells us he had the constructive building up of the strike) demands that their faculty should be recognized. The ability of Mr. TILLET has been mainly seen in the quiet work of constructive building. But Mr. BURNS has shown all the world that he possesses in a considerable degree the qualities of a mob leader. The thoroughly competent strike leader must be businesslike and laborious, and must, moreover, add to the gifts of the tub orator the faculty of the "fighting First Mate." In none of these respects has Mr. BURNS failed, and he has been rewarded by complete success in the work of governing his mob.

It is the defect of success of this kind that it is apt to be temporary and partial. The mob leader is generally found to have instilled a tendency to disorder which lasts, while the control he exercises in favour of moderation is at best effective for a brief interval only. This has again been found to be the case. The strikers returned to work on the understanding that some minor arrangements they desired should be carried out; that the increase of casual pay from 5d. to 6d. an hour should date from the 4th of November; that the men who remained in the service of the Dock Companies, or who joined it during the strike, should not be molested; and that the Companies should not attempt to punish those who had gone on strike. It was obvious at once that the last part of this arrangement rendered the first of no avail to a large percentage of strikers. If the "blacklegs" are not to be driven away, but retained in the service of the Companies as a permanent staff, it follows inevitably that there will be so much the less work to be given to the old body of dock labourers who went on strike. This was an obvious truth, and must, one would think, have been visible even to the Committee of conciliation at the Mansion House. If it was not, the discovery was made on Monday morning. The strikers found that the places of many of them were taken, and that the rise of wages they had helped to secure would benefit others. Under these circumstances, they behaved as they might have been expected to behave, considering the direct and indirect incitements to disorder by which they have been stimulated for weeks. The direct incitements need no comment. The indirect incitements are of more importance. They have been of various kinds. The subscriptions from Australia and from the emotional people at home, who at all times do so much to perpetuate the pauperism of the East-End by doles, have had a large share in the bad work by attracting and supporting a crowd of loafers to whom the strike pay was a temptation. Not much less effective than the subscriptions has been the patronage given to the strike by the Mansion House Committee. There has been a very great abundance of cant talked of and by this body. It has been praised for its exertions on behalf of the men, without the smallest regard to the surely not unimportant question whether those exertions were directed to an attainable end, or were merely the result of emotional excitement which must infallibly lead to disappointment, and may lead to mischief. The wisdom contained in a certain old saw about the paving of the road to hell has not plainly made its way into many heads in these days. Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, M.P., for instance, believes—and there are many who believe with him—that his good intentions justify him in encouraging the men to demand what it is a physical impossibility they should obtain, without the smallest regard to what the consequences of the disappointment may be. Mr. BUXTON's colleagues have been worthy of him. The LORD MAYOR and the CARDINAL (that grand old man, as Mr. BURNS calls him, with striking originality) have displayed exactly the same wordy sentimentality, have talked about what the men should have without the least effort to tell them what they can get, and have in general acted and talked throughout as if work and wages could be made to swell indefinitely by sprinkling them with the milk of human kindness. When the unlucky objects of their good will find themselves suddenly left to deal with the facts, and are made to feel by unpleasant experience that work and wages cannot be controlled by the emotions of Lord Mayors and the honeyed eloquence of Cardinals, it is not wonderful that they break out into violence. In the meantime my LORD MAYOR and HIS EMINENCE, who do not find their places taken by blacklegs, soothe their hungry protégés, who now have not even so much as strike pay, by appeals to their feelings, such as Mr. NICODEMUS EASY proposed to direct to the homicidal butler. A prettier illustration of the practical value of sentiments has not been given since the days of Mr. JOSEPH SURFACE.

By far the most effective of the indirect incitements to the disorder which prevailed through so much of this week remains to be named. It is, in plain language, the scandalous toleration which open violence has received from the Metropolitan police. The City force, wherever it has been employed, has been handled as usual—that is to say, as if its duty was not to go behind the simple obligation to maintain order. At Scotland Yard it would seem that other considerations are apparently taken into account. What they may be we need not waste time in guessing; but it is manifest that they are not compatible with the interests of law and order. Riotous scenes have gone on for days, and in every case the police have proved insufficient. Where any stand has been made against the rioters it has been wholly due to the resolution of the Dock officials. Mr. MONRO, indeed, excuses himself on the ground that his subordinates have not applied for reinforcements. In particular he alleges that the superintendent whose duty it would have been to apply for more men for the Albert Dock expressly asserted that no more men were wanted, and that there was no disorder. Mr. MONRO holds that this report excuses him completely. We put a different interpretation upon it. To us it seems to prove that Mr. MONRO's most pressing duty at present is to institute a rigid inquiry into the conduct of the superintendent. For the truth is that not only did the rioting go on all through Tuesday at the Albert Dock, but that it had begun on Monday evening. It has been so far successful that many of the "blacklegs" have been frightened away, and that the Company has been compelled to hide the others. In any case, an official who felt that he was responsible for the maintenance of order ought—without waiting to shield himself behind his subordinates—to have taken measures to deal with the disorder which he ought to have seen was probable. Mr. MONRO has taken another course, and one which makes his estimate of the duties of Chief Commissioner of Metropolitan Police almost as unintelligible as Mr. MATTHEWS's interpretation of the words "organized intimidation." The somewhat acrimonious correspondence which has passed between him and Mr. NORWOOD certainly leaves the impression that the CHIEF COMMISSIONER thinks it no part of his duty to take measures of precaution, but is quite prepared to wait till a riot has happened before tackling disorder. If that is his opinion, it is intelligible certainly, but it is also the very worst conception of his duty which an official in his position could possibly form.

SOME MORALS OF THE STRIKE.

THE "blackleg" difficulty seems to have come to an end, and the great strike of 1889 is over. Five weeks it lasted, or thereabout; and, though its long duration occasioned great loss, there are some good reasons for satisfaction that, if success was certain, it was yet delayed. By the time that Messrs. TILLET and BURNS's men were seen chasing "blacklegs" up and down the dock quays opportunity for reflection had come in; and it has now become a pretty general discovery, we believe, that error and misconception were largely mixed up with the discussion of the matter.

It cannot be said that the all but universal sympathy amidst which the strike began was unworthy—far from it; but that it was in a great measure mistaken, unfortunate, unpromising, is nevertheless true. This we shall see as soon as we begin to inquire into the origin of it. Then we shall understand that the public mind had long been preparing for some such outburst of sympathy with East-End poverty in revolt, and was ready to "go off" without much investigation into the particular circumstances that provoked an explosion. We say, "with East-End poverty," being convinced that, if this had been a strike of boot-makers at Northampton or tailors at Huddersfield (or even at Turnham Green, for that matter), there would have been no such outpouring of sympathy as the dock labourers of East London profited by. The explanation is that for years past the horrors of life in that squalid region had been the subject of description which when it was restrained was terrible enough, and when the "picturesque" writer went to work upon it became appalling to kindly and sensitive minds. More lately the sweating trades—the trades in which thousands of poor men, women, and children compete with immigrant Jews under middlemen and job-masters—have been put under the spy-glass, and such reports have been made that no humane man can read them without distress; while as for remedy, remedy seems more remote the more it is sought after. Now, from the fact that East-End poverty is most glaring at the dock gates, where hundreds of broken wretches may be seen waiting from hour to hour in all weathers for the chance of earning a shilling; from the extremely "casual" nature of the employment; from the actual fight there is for it; from the constant inclusion of dock labourers in all the picturesque accounts of "misery at the East-End"; and also, perhaps, from the fact that the Dock Companies are supposed to be wealthy corporations, the dockers became classed in the public fancy with those who suffer by the "sweating system." When, therefore, these labourers struck for a penny an hour more, as well as to enforce other demands (some reasonable, some absurdly unreasonable), they at once received the benefit of all the impatience at "sweating" which had long been accumulating in the public mind.

But there was a mistake here. It is not only that the Dock Companies have a right to obtain labour as cheaply as it can be got, just as the labourers have a right to strive by every orderly and lawful means to raise the rate of wages. Nobody denies that, except the crazy preachers of Socialism, and some other persons of whom we shall have a word to say presently. The point is that the employer's right does become odious when sweating for the sake of better profits is suspected; and where that suspicion comes in, sympathy with the labourer in contest with the employer is certain and irrepressible. In this case, however, the idea of association with the sweating system was groundless. Nothing of the kind existed. The unfortunate truth is that outside the dock gates a superfluity of unskilled labour always stands waiting for employment, and that a very large part of it is not what it is commonly supposed to be. The general idea of a dock labourer is of a stalwart though ill-fed man, eager for work, capable as eager, and, therefore, deeply to be pitied if he can only get 5*d.* an hour for the brief occasional times of employment. A considerable proportion of such men there are, no doubt; and they are to be pitied deeply. But the rest? It is a painful but a true thing to say that they are of a very different order. Large numbers of them are wretched, broken-down creatures—failures in all sorts of soft callings, and not always failures from misfortune either—who certainly look as if their labour must be of very little worth. Others belong to a class of which there are thousands in London as well as in every other great city; men to whom four hours' work a day is more welcome than eight, and who are content to earn enough for their own bread and beer, habitually depending for the rest on the labour of their wives. We know, of course, what some folk will say to this. The cynics of the Saturday Review are at it again—traducing the working classes now, and insulting the miseries of the poor. That we must put up with. The truth of the matter is not to be concealed on that account; and the business in hand is to show where a very natural and kindly sympathy has been in error. On its own merits, there was nothing to differentiate the Dock dispute from a hundred similar struggles over a question of wages; and if some of the men deserved more commiseration than the average miner, mason, or cutler on strike, nobody who knows them will deny that others deserved much less.

How far the general sympathy with the strikers—which went far beyond anything of the kind ever before observed—testifies to the spreading of a vague Socialistic sentiment is a matter of more serious importance. One thing is certain. The same sort of persons who a little while ago used to chatter in their thousands about Esoteric Buddhism have taken to the Socialistic Ideal very much of late. They talk of it plentifully, possibly many of them think about it, dwell upon it, and are moved by speculations and theories which would be entirely captivating if they were not barren for everything but anarchy and ruin. Something of this sort may be suspected; and if rightly suspected, here is error indeed. However, the strike lasted long enough, and developed incident enough, to correct a sentimentalism which must evaporate altogether as soon as it is approached by the tests of experience. The true and thoroughgoing Socialist rejoiced when he thought he saw how very possible it was to paralyse the whole trade of London, to reduce this great city to idleness, darkness, and semi-starvation in about three weeks, by a grand combination of labour against capital. The same vision was brought before the sentimentalizing Socialist in something more than a dream. A glimpse of it in sheer actuality was presented to him; and the consequence must almost certainly have been a purgation of vapours in the brain. A similar lesson must have been conveyed to him when he contemplated those hundreds of "blacklegs" penned in a corner like a flock of frightened sheep, while a "cordon of sixty police-men" stood between them and maiming or murder. Second thoughts in abundance have been provided by the whole course of the affair; as, again, when the question arises whether a body of men anxious to do the work that is offered to them have not a claim to the protection of the police when they are violently attacked by other men for selling their own labour at their own choice. At first sight it looks as if the citizen had a right to as much protection as that at least; and as if the State that refused it would open the door to social anarchy. However, there is plenty of time to ponder these second thoughts in peace and quietness, and we hope it is possible to come to right conclusions about them without denying pity to the poor or help to the distressed.

THE SPOOKICAL CONGRESS.

AT last there is something worthy of the Paris Revolutionary Centenary Exhibition. The reports do not say how many persons, in the sense of live, common, material, fourth-round persons, attended the Spookical Congress; but it does not much matter, because Mr. HENRY LACROIX was there, having come from New York as the authorized "representative of twelve millions of American spirits." If twelve million spirits, attending through their representative, are not enough to make a Congress, there would never be any Congresses. The delegation of Mr. LACROIX, by the way, throws a new light on spooks. It may plausibly have been imagined that spooks were denationalized; but it would seem that it is not so, since the twelve million were all Americans. Whether this means that in their most recent incarnations they were American citizens, or that they had never condescended to be incarnated at all save in that glorious capacity, or that, without reference to any fourth-round lives they may have led here, they are American by choice, simply as spooks, it is vain for ordinary men to speculate. We have it that they were American, and very grateful for the privilege they ought to be, and no doubt are. But the twelve million in one were not all. There were Captain VOLPI and M. LÉON DILLY, and M. MIGUEL VIVET, and M. DELAUNE, junior. We have searched the list in vain for the revered name and style of Captain BUMPKINS, but there was M. JULES LERMINA, and he was the chairman, although he is an avowed "Materialist," which was considered very remarkable and interesting.

Like all the other Congresses, they were divided in opinion. Happily, there was no conflict between the three great sub-divisions, which generally fight so furiously among themselves, of Theosophists, Spiritualists, and exponents of Spookical Research. This may have been because they had all wisely determined, for this happy occasion, to compose their differences—which are not really differences at all—or because the Spiritualists, thanks, presumably, to the overwhelming majority of M. LACROIX, were present in such numbers as to have everything their own way. The division was upon the question whether or no it was expedient for the Congress to "affirm the principle of the existence of God." M. LÉON DILLY said that if they did not "spiritualism would be decapitated"; but Spiritualism seems to have thought otherwise, because, when M. MIGUEL VIVET, from Barcelona, spoke to the resolution in the affirmative sense, "as soon as the words were translated, they were received with cries of 'No.'" It is to be hoped that the cries of "No" were speedily translated to M. VIVET, and convinced him and M. DILLY of their error. It would be too horrible to suppose that their view could be correct, inasmuch as it would clearly have involved the decapitation of upwards of twelve million spirits.

This difficulty having been got over, M. DELAUNE, junior, read a paper, and "laid especial stress upon the researches of Dr. CROOKES in England." Dr. CROOKES's researches are commonly believed to have enabled him to hold the most interesting intercourse with denizens of the spirit world, and such as might well excite the respectful emulation of M. DELAUNE, junior, or Mr. Anybody, junior. M. DELAUNE also pointed out that whereas it had been alleged [by the divine WILLIAMS, for example] "that a man ceased to live when his brain was dead," the fact was, that "when the brain was gone" [we have a sneaking preference for "brains were out" ourselves], "there still existed a thinking individuality, combined with which was a fluidic substance, termed the peresprit, that might be described as the organic part of the soul." The thinking individualities of many spiritualists, whether combined with peresprit or taken neat, are certainly in the habit of flourishing about a good deal after there is every indication of the brains being out. (Observe the superior accuracy in this connexion of "out" as compared with "gone." WILLIAMS knew what he was writing about.) Mr. DELAUNE, junior, appears to be a gentleman of much worldly intelligence.

Among the objects of interest submitted to the Congress were a number of photographs of spooks in different stages of decay. "They were genuine photographs." Of course they were. So many people understand photography nowadays that it is probably much easier to procure a photograph than a drawing cunningly contrived to look like one. They showed a medium, sitting in a chair, surrounded by "ghostly faces, more or less distinct." In one there were

"two children in the air." In another, "looking over the sitter's shoulders [both of them?], was the face of an old man, startlingly life-like in expression, but otherwise most unearthly." They appear to have been the sort of photographs which anybody can procure at any photographer's, and which any owner of a camera can take, wherein the person got up as a ghost softly and suddenly withdraws before the end of the period of exposure, with the result that his or her image comes out transparent and rather dim, the other party in the picture coming out solid and wearing a suitable expression of amazement, terror, remorse, or complacent proprietorship, as the composition may require. Mr. Titular-Chairman, JULES LERMINA, however, gave a different explanation. He said the apparent spooks were not spooks—at least, not independent ones, nor were they half-cooked photographs of real people. They were "emanations of the medium's mind—in other words, phenomena of psychic force." This, of course, is a view like another, and no doubt a titular chairman is entitled to his opinions. It is, however, only a particular instance of M. JULES LERMINA's general theory on the subject, which is, that spooks have—as an old-fashioned metaphysician might say—no objective existence at all, but are the products, and more or less under the control, of people who are alive in the ordinary way. Not specially gifted people either, for the titular chairman is reported to have avowed that "he looked upon mediums generally as people in a poor state of health." Now, the great point upon which spookologists of all three subdivisions are thoroughly agreed is that spooks are—again to revert to the old slang—objective. Likewise they are all agreed that the seers and other percipients of spooks and their proceedings, far from being ipso facto in a poor state of health, are privileged and peculiarly interesting. Therefore it would seem that M. JULES LERMINA is a heretic, and wholly unfit to preside at a Spookical Congress.

THE COMING FRENCH ELECTIONS.

ON the eve of the French general elections there is one thing, and one only, which can be asserted in regard to them with any confidence, and it is the apathy of the country. The confident assertions of parties and candidates are not worth considering. They are only part of the shouting in the great political game of brag. In the present, as in various games in which timely audacity is a sign of skill, these bettings on the hands are only the manœuvres of the players to mislead the adversary as to what they really hold. Until the cards are tabled it is idle to guess at them. It is, in fact, the distinguishing feature of this election that the struggle is being conducted on entirely false issues. Not one of the parties has honestly declared what it wants. The Moderate Republicans who have the least cause for concealment are not quite frank. The Radicals are undeniably hiding their real intentions. The Royalists and Bonapartists are certainly not declaring half their mind. What the Boulangists really mean they probably do not know themselves, and certainly nobody else does. The explanations of M. THIÉBAUD only illustrate the hopeless muddle of head among his late friends, and the continuance of that muddle in the mind of M. THIÉBAUD himself. The Bishops have done something to drag the truth out, but the effect of their frankness has as yet only been to make the candidates more reserved. No principle, no theory of government, no administrative question which can be named is manifestly at stake, to judge at least by the language of candidates. Neither is there any personal conflict between leaders which could supply the stimulus needed to rouse the country. On the contrary, the events of the last few months have tended to depress what possible party leaders there were. General BOULANGER is certainly less formidable than he was, and in his decline he seems to have dragged down M. CLÉMENCEAU, to whom he largely owed his rise. The eclipse of M. CLÉMENCEAU is, indeed, one of the most noteworthy signs of the times. A few months ago he appeared to have a career before him, and yet, without any great shock, without any defeat which can be quoted, he has entirely fallen into obscurity. His misfortune is the most striking instance of the fragility of French political reputations. M. BRISSON, who also was counted as a future leader, collapsed, it is true, with amazing suddenness, but he, at least, had time to fail in office. M. CLÉMENCEAU has not done even that.

Amid the prevailing doubt as to what the fight is for, and in the absence of leaders, the indifference of the country is intelligible. It is very hard for a convinced Royalist to show any zeal when his party has to sink its principles for the time being, and adopt a programme made up by borrowing the divine right of plébiscites from the Bonapartists and the sanctity of Revision from the Boulangists, and when he is forced to rub shoulders with such very disreputable allies. This kind of compromise comes perhaps more easily to the Bonapartist, but even he must feel an occasional qualm when he remembers that his Boulangist allies are sure that the plébiscite which they both believe in will confirm the Republic, while he himself is bound to feel sure that it will restore the Empire. It is, however, not a little difficult to believe that there is any belief in principle at all, as it was understood by an older generation, in the French parties of to-day. To judge from their actions, if not their words, the real motive power which urges them on is not so much a belief in any particular form of government as a detestation of what government they have now. They are so sick of this, so ready to get rid of it, that they patch up alliances among parties of the most various principles by the admission of direct contraries. Their object is simply to make a coalition which will last over the general election, and will serve to ruin the "Parliamentary Republicans." What is to follow nobody can know, and nobody for the present seems greatly to care. A species of blight has descended on the political faculty of Frenchmen—corresponding to the very similar infliction which is choking their literature. There is on all things and men in politics a chilling damp which has ruined all originality, all strength of will, and has deprived them of the power to escape from the miserable old routine which has now bound them for so long. The process most admirably described in the French language as paying oneself with words has become universal. In all the late debate no single utterance has been so honest as that of the Bishop of AUTUN, who has not scrupled to declare, in defiance of M. THÉVENET'S bullying circular, that no Christian can vote for the ecclesiastical policy of the Republicans. Whether the frankness of the Bishop of AUTUN and his brother bishops will do them any good remains to be seen; but at least they have set a good example. They at least have not indulged in vague phrases, dishonest suppressions, and equivocal promises, but have stated with precision what measures and what manner of government they detest and what they prefer. It cannot be said that even the Moderate Republicans, though, as we have said, they have least to conceal, are quite frank. M. EMILE DE LAVELEYE has succeeded in drawing from one of their leaders a confession that even he is prepared to revise ultimately, though he would rather not do so at once.

The correspondence between M. DE LAVELEYE and M. PAUL DESCHANEL is, indeed, most characteristic of that very process of paying oneself with words already mentioned. The Belgian publicist writes to assure his French friend how much he agrees with him that it would be very mad to set about revising the Constitution at the present crisis, and then goes on to show how it could be greatly bettered if the time suited. M. DE LAVELEYE mentions six points in which improvement would be possible. Partial renewals of the Chamber of Deputies by yearly fifths, shorter Sessions, and a stronger Senate are the principal points of his new charter. He ends up with a noble phrase, which it would be a pity indeed to spoil by compression or translation. We give it, therefore, in all the unsullied dignity of the original:—"Dans l'intérêt de la démocratie et de la république, donner partout l'autorité à l'expérience, à la sagesse et à la science." M. PAUL DESCHANEL agrees with M. DE LAVELEYE both as to the unfitness as to the time and the excellence of the reform. He is also of opinion that the younger candidates, who are now compelled to consult the prejudices of the constituencies, will shortly show their philosophic courage by throwing overboard the worn-out Jacobin platitudes about the beauties of uniformity and equality. When they are elected we dare say they will—a seat on horseback is often found to have an elevating effect on the minds of such as heretofore went on foot. But the philosophic young candidates are much less interesting to us than the enduring belief of such men as MM. DE LAVELEYE and DESCHANEL in what M. THIERS called Chinoiserie. It is obvious to everybody who does not forget that after all a machine must be worked by a mechanic that the French Chambers, whether they are renewed by general election or by partial, will be just as good as the choice of the electors and the faculty of the elected will permit them to be. If the French nation is prepared to support the present form of government, to elect competent deputies, and to insist on the pursuit of a definite policy, it can do so under the present Constitution. If it is not, no mechanical devices will save that Government from coming down by the run whenever it is attacked. It is curious, too, that M. PAUL DESCHANEL should not have reflected that, if a fifth of the Chamber of Deputies had been elected in the early part of the year when the popularity of Le brav' Général was in flood, it is extremely probable that he would have secured a following of sixty or seventy members in the House, which would have been enough to give him a casting vote in the existing division of parties. In that case how would a partial renewal have tended to give stability to the Republic? But what is even more curious in M. PAUL DESCHANEL'S comment on M. DE LAVELEYE'S plan is his confession that even he, though opposed to division, is not a believer in the present Constitution; he only detests those who are attacking it. So the result of the general election must be to bring together a Chamber in which a majority of the members will in all probability be new men, in which there may be a majority for a division, and in which there can hardly be any sincere devotion to the existing Constitution.

KURDS AND ARMENIANS.

WE may, we trust without suspicion, acknowledge that some faculty of swallow is required by him who would accept Woods Pasha's long plea for justice to Turkey printed in Wednesday's Times, and the Turkish version of the story of GULISAR, in all their details. Woods Pasha goes near to spoil a defensible case by exceedingly fallacious comparisons. There is really not even a formal resemblance between the criminal disorders which exist in the best policed societies and the anarchy of a province in which unarmed people of one race and religion are left at the mercy of armed men of other blood and other creed. There is further a profound difference between a nation which has never allowed to another a right of interference in its private affairs and the nation which has been compelled to submit to this indignity. It is, therefore, fallacious to more than the verge of absurdity to attempt to rebut the charge that anarchy is allowed to go on unchecked in Armenia by retorts about the Whitechapel murders and so forth. This is, moreover, an unfortunate style of argument because it would be so easy and so much more to the point to defend the SULTAN'S Government by proving that it does its best to keep the promises it made as to the administration of Armenia. It is also open to Woods Pasha and other defenders of Turkey to ask to what end the Armenian atrocity agitation is kept up and for whose benefit. These are questions which the managers of the agitation might find it somewhat difficult to answer. As for the Turkish version of GULISAR'S story, it proves that the girl was restored to her family, but it also shows that she was first taken away; and that, as soon as she could speak with safety, she asserted that, in spite of her alleged conversion to Mahometanism, she was still a Christian. Even according to this story it appears that there is considerable disorder in those parts of Armenia which have the ill fortune to be within reach of Kurdish raiders.

We have yet to learn, however, that any one not absolutely ignorant of the facts denied this assertion. Competent witnesses have been known to declare that the most essential difference, as far as the traveller is concerned, between Kurd and Arab is that, whereas the second robs but does not murder unless provoked, the first always adds murder to robbery. He is a pillaging ruffian, and always has been—rather worse than better than those tribes on the North-West frontier of India against whom we have to send periodical expeditions. It is a distinguishing feature of the Kurd that he seems to have a love of killing where nothing is to be gained by it. No doubt men of this race have committed many crimes, and many wives have been carried into the mountains along with herds of black cattle after a fashion not extinct on the Highland border a hundred and fifty years ago. There are unquestionably Kurdish chiefs who are much what SIMON FRASER, Lord LOVAT, was, and who also would be greatly improved if they could be shortened by the head. But, while all that is true, it does not follow that Turkey should therefore be deprived of a province. To what end would that be done, and to whose benefit? The sagacious foreign observer, who knows that all this English sympathy with oppressed peoples is part of a wily scheme to secure allies for England, has discovered that the Armenian atrocity agitation is only another attempt to form another Bulgaria. There might be worse things in the inland parts of Asia Minor than another Bulgaria, but we doubt the power of Armenia to take the place, if only for this reason—that we do not see what equivalent it could receive for that foreign support which has hitherto protected the real Bulgaria from Russian attack. The Armenians might like to try their luck, but they can hardly expect to be helped to the experiment as long as it might only redound to the benefit of a third party whose name suggests itself at once. It is significant of the final cause of this agitation that it should be undertaken on behalf of a people whose country lies so conveniently on a possible Russian road of advance. The Armenians are by no means the least able to defend themselves among the Christian subjects of the Porte. They are a pushing trading people, who are to be found in possession of many places of trust and power in the Turkish Empire. The public offices in Constantinople are full of them, and they have abundant means of bringing their grievances to the attention of the SULTAN. As a matter of fact, they have secured attention at this very time, and undoubted efforts have been made to give them protection and redress. If they have not been more successful, it is because of the unfortunate weakness of the Turkish Government. Why, then, should they be the objects of particular sympathy? The answer is not far to seek, and it is just because it is so obvious that the agitation has fallen so very flat.

MOTHER GOOSE IN PARIS.

THEY order these things much better in France. Here in England, where the beautiful and touching word Folklore was invented, the London County Council does next to nothing for it, and the children of Ma Mère l'Oye never frivol in a friendly way. In Paris, during the Exhibition, the happy folklore people of Europe met at the Mairie of the Sixth Arrondissement itself with every circumstance of gratifying solemnity. The topic of Gipsy Folklore was discussed, and Mr. CHARLES LELAND, as Président d'honneur, delivered an address on a topic which (like so many other unfamiliar topics) he has made his own. Happily, Mr. LELAND is no less at home with the polished language of MOLIÈRE and BOSSUET, not to mention BOURGET, than with the dialects of the Algonkin Indians. Few of us can say more to a Delaware or Mohican than Ho, Nitshi Shangawaba? which, being interpreted, means "Ah, friend, whisky?" Mr. LELAND can "see" that elementary, though festive and fraternal, form of greeting, and "go one better" as between Algonkin and Algonkin. In French he is even more fluent, and a lucky thing it was, for we doubt if many of his learned audience would have known much more of gipsy manners than they did before, had HANS BREITMANN spoken in English. It is pleasant to see gipsy folklore coming to the front, as it may possibly clear up, more or less, the many puzzles offered by the history and origin of a people useful to the poet, and almost indispensable to the self-respecting novelist. We should, perhaps, be told that the fairies who used to steal children at nurse were really only gipsies, and that TAMLANE had not been dwelling with the Fairy Queen, but only with JOHNNY FEA at Yetholm. This euhemeristic "shot" is quite as good as the recent guess that mermaids were only Finnish women, whom the impulsive Shetland shepherds, "set far amid the melancholy main," met, combing their hair, and fell in love with. Some wiseacre seems to have started this hypothesis, and by parity of reasoning, as mermaids are Finnish women, fairies are gipsies. Mr. LELAND may work out the problem as he pleases. His audience included the flower of French folklore and M. CHARLES MARELLE from Berlin, whose own amusing studies in poetry for children are a joy to the grown-up world when it reads them. We also recognize the COMTE DE PUYMAIGRE under the title of "Puyniargre." Some folklore fun is meant when we read "M. KRONH" "déoose sur le bureau les principaux ouvrages relatifs au "folklore Finnois." "Déoose" is good, and suggests that the printer had been revelling with the children of Mother Goose. They had a very jolly dinner, and not only sang songs in all dialects, danced dances of all nations, but, it is believed, related popular anecdotes "in the best manner" "and the seemliest." Who ever heard of English folklorists revelling, telling tales, singing, and generally remembering that folklore has its gaieties as well as its glooms? Life is not all vampires, witches, spooks; there be maypoles and maskings. English folklore wants conviviality. We never hear of Mr. GOMME dancing a bolero, nor of Mr. MAX MÜLLER obliging with a Vedic hornpipe after a Soma breakfast. It is quite in vain that the President invites the members to a Totem dance in costume—that is, in fox, cat, and dog skins. The Welsh folklorists do not "bundle" at their solemn meetings—in fact, British folk-lore is rather sepulchral than festive. The example of France might well be followed, and when a Congress of International Folklorists meets in England we do hope to hear that the science has become a little gay. It would only be in keeping if M. COSQUIN and any English opponent settled their little differences with the gloves, for le boxe is distinctly part of our national folklore. Then fancy a folklore fishing-party, to try all WALTON's magical baits! Ivy juice, mummy powder, the fat of a black cat, and other simple ingredients, might be made matter of experiment. The folklorists could not catch fewer fish with all WALTON's recipes than they generally do with ordinary flies. The field of festal folklore, in short, is just about to be opened, and the pleasures of pedantry may soon become popular in the largest sense of the term.

COMING ELECTION PROSPECTS.

IT is not often that three contemporaneous elections which promise to be so interesting as the contests for Peterborough, for North Bucks, and for Nairn and Elgin, offer so uncertain a prospect of instruction to the political meteorologist. Each or all of them might conceivably result in a victory for either side without giving the victors reasonable ground for congratulating themselves on any material improvement in the general electoral outlook for their party. The Unionists, for instance, might either win or lose Peterborough without having much cause for exultation in the one case or for depression in the other. If they win, they will only be retaining a seat already held by them, and in the contest for which their candidate will have enjoyed the advantage of powerful local influence. If, on the other hand, it should be captured by their opponents, they will be fairly able to console themselves by the reflection that the great family which has for so many years provided the constituency with a member has in this instance furnished no candidate for its representation, and that an election for Peterborough not contested by a FITZWILLIAM must differ widely on that ground alone from previous contests. Again, if Mr. HUBBARD is returned for North Bucks, he will be simply securing the succession to a seat which his brother had held before him, and which he has contested, therefore, with that advantage—no slight one in many constituencies—in his favour. If, on the other hand, Captain VERNEY should be returned, he will be merely repeating the victory which he won in 1885, and continuing the seesaw between Liberalism and Conservatism which North Bucks has now kept up through a series of three contested elections. In Elgin and Nairn, indeed, the significance of the issue will not be qualified by any accidental considerations; but there the majority of 1886 is so small a one—only a little over a hundred—on a total poll of between three and four thousand—that its transfer from the Gladstonian to the Unionist side would not, even in Scotland, be any very tremendous portent. As for the contest for the Sleaford Division of Lincolnshire, we have purposely excluded it from the list of events which are likely, in racing parlance, to "give us a "line"; since nothing but the very improbable event of Mr. CHAPLIN's defeat could possibly make it serve that purpose. If the result of the very ungracious opposition to the re-election of the PRESIDENT of the BOARD of AGRICULTURE should be merely to reduce his majority more or less considerably, it will inform us of nothing but what everybody knew before—namely, that it is extremely difficult to get the supporters of a candidate who is supposed to command a vast preponderance of the votes of a constituency to trouble themselves to come to the poll, especially at a by-election, in anything like the strength which they would show if the contest was expected to be close.

No doubt, however, it is possible that in the other three cases the issue of the election may, under certain circumstances, prove more significant than we have here assumed to be probable. If victory and defeat for either party mean little in themselves, they might, of course, be gained or suffered in such a form as to mean, or, at any rate, to be capable of meaning, much. Should the close contests of the last election be converted into "hollow affairs" in this—and more especially so if that change accompanies the transfer of the seat from one party to the other—no doubt the political meteorologist will be ready at once with his "moral." He is to be found on both sides of politics, and on the Unionist side he would, of course, exult as much at a crushing defeat of Mr. SEYMOUR KEAY—if that enterprising land-nationalizer is permitted to go to the poll—by Mr. LOGAN, as he would rejoice on the Gladstonian side at the wresting of Peterborough from "the FITZWILLIAMS," or, if that could be conceived possible, the ousting of Mr. CHAPLIN from his seat for the Sleaford Division. If anything startling or sensational is destined to occur at any of the four elections now pending, we shall do well to prepare ourselves at once for copious "improvements of the occasion" by those theorists who think it possible to forecast the issue of the next appeal to the constituencies at large from the results of by-elections. That dark and doubtful science, however, will seldom, it appears to us, have been practised under more unfavourable conditions than at present. Our own belief is that, now that even Gladstonians feel that they have ridden the Irish horse to death, and have ceased flogging it, the popular interest in politics has sunk to its very lowest point—as it generally does, indeed, when we reach, as we have now, the mezzo cammin in the life of a Parliament. And we consequently believe that the results, whatever they may be, of the four approaching contests will have as little meaning or bearing upon the position of parties and the political future as it is possible for such events to possess.

PICNIC PHILOSOPHY.

THE University of Oxford has lately been enlarging its borders by a kind of educational Primrose League. The public is invited to the ancient halls during the Long Vacation, and there is entertained by lectures on every conceivable and inconceivable subject. It is a vast "Resurrection Pie" of information that Oxford sets before her inquiring guests, a hash, or salmi, of archæology, chemistry, political economy, history, philology, and nobody knows what.

Among the many cooks who combine in the preparation of this broth Mr. MAX MÜLLER is probably the most skilful. The three lectures which he gave, called The Science of Language (LONGMANS), are really models of pleasant popular exposition. The weariest and weakest mind, hurrying from a lecture on Molecules, and speeding to another on Protozoa, may have listened to Mr. MAX MÜLLER and been amused. Nobody however totally ignorant beforehand, no capacity however "excruciatingly feeble," could have been quite missed by these addresses. The stupidest must have learned something.

What persons hardly so untaught will learn is, that Mr. MAX MÜLLER is of his own opinion still, that he still in one breath calls himself a Darwinian, and speaks of the creation of Man. "Man is a species created once," he quotes from himself, as a proof that he "was a Darwinian long before DARWIN"—that is, four years before the publication of The Origin of Species. Who is to argue with a believer in the special creation of man, who yet calls himself a Darwinian? But Mr. MAX MÜLLER is not only conscious of being an Evolutionist when he talks of Creation, he is also (apparently) unconscious of it when he really is an Evolutionist. In these lectures he returns to his old thesis that language is the barrier between Man and Beast, and yet, as is usual with him of late, he shows that Man was once without language. Then what was Man? If Man be a beast, plus language, and the thought which language makes possible, when he was minus language was he not a beast? And if that be so, how can the possession of speech be, between Man and Beast in the past, an impassable barrier? Mr. ROMANES argues that the barrier has been crossed—that a non-speaking animal evolved speech. Mr. MAX MÜLLER is, at bottom, of the same opinion. He still attributes the origin of roots to the clamor concomitans of early beings engaged in various kinds of common labour. "With regard to the sounds accompanying our motions, we know "from physiology that, under any strong muscular effort it is a relief to the system to let our breath come out strongly and repeatedly, and by that process to let the vocal chords vibrate in different ways. That is the case with savages, and it is the case even with us. These natural sounds accompanying our acts are called clamor concomitans." And these sounds, after a time, became signs of common action, and so grew to be roots. Hence language.

What was man before he engaged in common labour, before he ploughed and dug and wove in common? for these advanced processes have actually been given as examples of what man did before he had speech. If Mr. MAX MÜLLER is right, man was then a beast, which is exactly what Mr. ROMANES would say. Then man was developed out of a beast; but that is exactly what Mr. MAX MÜLLER will not hear of. In the meantime modest inquirers would like a collection of examples of common labour and clamor concomitans among savages; but for this absolutely indispensable historical basis of his theory they ask Mr. MAX MÜLLER in vain. He would have to call the savage into court as a witness to what man was in remote ages. He objects to the witness, and yet he falls back on a vague account of what the witness would say if he were called. For our part, we think that the origin of language, as of religion, is far beyond the ken of science; but we feel pretty sure that Mr. MAX MÜLLER's theory is a piece of picnic philosophy. But even picnic philosophy may excite thought and lead the guests of Oxford's feast of reason to more serious things. That is the one excuse for the picnic.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN AND THE "MODERATE GLADSTONIANS."

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S appeal at Huddersfield to the "Moderate Gladstonians" may have been designed as a serious attempt at political persuasion or as a mere stroke of controversial rhetoric. Its rhetorical effectiveness is conspicuous enough, and needs no better illustration than the fact that most of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S Radical critics in the press, though, as usual, gnashing their teeth with fury at his utterances, and relieving their minds with the wonted flow of insults, have been uniformly careful not to venture on any direct reply to the appeal in question. It is in fact unanswerable by any one who is not prepared to respond to it by an unreserved acknowledgment of the duty which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presses upon the recognition of Gladstonians, and a frank undertaking to discharge it. For a Gladstonian to be asked why he is not prepared to co-operate with his political opponents in passing an Irish Land Purchase Bill is as though a man should be asked why, having the wherewithal, he is unwilling to pay a debt of honour. To one as to the other question there is no answer which is at once true and respectable; the only matter of uncertainty is whether the wilful defaulter will elect to remain silent altogether or to commit himself to some more or less paltry subterfuge. He cannot, in the one case, unless he is absolutely shameless, confess that he has no better reason for declining to pay his creditor than the desire to keep the money in his own pocket; and so in the other case it would be too brazen an avowal on his part to admit that he repudiates the plainest of political liabilities because it does not suit his interests to discharge them. If Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. GLADSTONE'S men abode in the Palace of Truth, they would say in reply to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S appeal:—"Yes, it is perfectly true, as you say, that we are pledged up to the ears to deal with the Irish land question in the Imperial Parliament, and not to leave it to a Home Rule Legislature to settle. And we quite recognize the sound logic of your inference that we are morally bound to give a fair consideration to any measure introduced with this object, and this quite independently of the question whether the authors of such measure are agreed with us or not as to any ulterior steps whatever in Irish policy. But, seeing that to discharge this moral obligation, though an excellent step to take, we agree with you, in the interests of Ireland, would very seriously compromise our prospects as a political party—in the first place, by giving offence to our Parnellite allies; and, secondly, by exposing us to the grave risk of creating a fairly contented Ireland before we have had time to make use of her discontent as an instrument to assist us in the recovery of office—we must "decline your proposal of co-operation with thanks, and inform you that, however well-considered a land-purchase scheme you may devise, we certainly shall have to obstruct its passage through Parliament, and, if we cannot prevent your passing it, to do our best, with the assistance of the Parnellites, to ensure its practical failure." Inasmuch, however, as Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. GLADSTONE'S men do not live in the Palace of Truth, they do not feel prompted to make this candid kind of answer; and, lacking that impulse, they prefer, and far be it from us to blame so natural a preference, to hold their peace.

But Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S calculation—always assuming, that is to say, that his appeal was a serious one—of course is, that even the necessity of tacitly acting upon so cynically unscrupulous a principle of political tactics may be too much for the moral stomach of some of Mr. GLADSTONE'S supporters. There must, he seems to think, be a section of them who are not prepared to go to these lengths in the factious repudiation of pledges and the deliberate sacrifice of the peace and prosperity of a portion of the United Kingdom to supposed party advantage. We sincerely hope he may be right in so thinking, and that if and when the present Government commences the work of what is called "constructive legislation" in Ireland, the existence of this moderate section of Gladstonians may be demonstrated. We must confess, however, that we entertain grave doubts on the point, and that we find considerable difficulty in framing an intelligible conception of that "moderation" which Mr. GLADSTONE has not yet succeeded in alienating, but which is now assumed to be ripe for revolt. The trouble with the moderate politician in all parties is that the excellence of his "level head" is too often balanced by certain extremely serious defects in various parts of his body—by a want of due rigidity, for instance, in the spinal column, and by a lamentable weakness of the knees. What we would fain assure ourselves, and what unfortunately we can obtain no assurance of, is that Mr. GLADSTONE'S Moderates are such confirmed sufferers from these vertebral and crural infirmities that their moderation, for all influence that it is likely to have upon their political conduct, may be regarded as a negligible quantity. They have already had three years' experience of what it is to follow the drum in the rear of Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. PARNELL, and, considering how few of them have deserted in spite of the merry march that they have had of it, and the vast amount of disagreeable and disgraceful service that has been exacted of them, we can see no probability now of their suddenly turning tail on the grounds which Mr. CHAMBERLAIN expects to determine their desertion. Men who have had to support their leaders in a deliberate attempt to paralyse the law in Ireland and in the aiding and abetting of a conspiracy to rob Irish landlords are hardly likely, we think, to "shy" at an order merely to obstruct the Government in legislation which the obstructors are pledged to further.

On the whole, therefore, we think Mr. CHAMBERLAIN will be better advised in looking to the unaided efforts of the "National party" to execute his programme of agrarian legislation, than in counting upon any considerable accession to the ranks of this party among the Moderate Gladstonians. He will more plainly perceive the wisdom of so doing if he will consider the relation in which this division of Mr. GLADSTONE'S followers stands towards these "political heresies," which, as he justly says, it will be one important duty of the National party to combat. We have, he remarks, in the New Radicals a body of men preaching open resistance to the law, and "coquetting with a Socialism derived from Continental models—of men destitute of the ordinary sentiments of patriotism, and, while themselves opposed to every law which is not of their own making, ready at the same time to make laws to interfere with the individual liberty and freedom of everybody else." But against which of these forms of political heresy has any section of the Gladstonians ever raised the faintest protest? To which of them is the whole party, Moderates no less than Ultras, not committed? Their leader, as we have said, has already dragged them through the mire of the Plan of Campaign, and given them "Remember Mitchelstown!" for a watchword. So much for the open preaching of resistance to the law. As for Continental Socialism, the new Radicals have, as yet, had no opportunity of giving formal Parliamentary expression to their inclinations in this direction; but, on the other hand, the Moderates have never given us any reason to suppose that such views are in any way distasteful to them, still less any encouragement to hope that any effective resistance would be offered to them from that quarter. Again, if the presence or absence of the "ordinary sentiments of patriotism" may be fairly tested in any party by their attitude on questions of national defence, it must be remembered that the opposition to the strengthening of the navy did not on this as on previous occasions proceed from below the gangway, but was led from the Front Opposition Bench, and supported by those who habitually sit behind it. As to the legislation which interferes with individual liberty and comfort, there are nearly as many patrons of it, to the best of our belief, among the so-called Moderates in Mr. GLADSTONE'S following as among the New Radicals. In short, so far as we can make out, the entire Gladstonian party is tarred throughout with the same brush, and its extreme members have so completely captured and so subjugated the remainder that there is no longer any effective reserve of moderation and independence for Mr. CHAMBERLAIN or any one else to work upon. His attempt to do so is well meant, and—since it can do no harm, if it does no good—may deserve sympathy and commendation; but, for our part, we cannot help regarding it as foredoomed to inevitable failure.

LEARNING TO WRITE.

MANY people believe nowadays that everything can be taught, and it can hardly be denied that anything teachable in which persons can be examined is worth teaching. It seems that those who enter for Civil Service examinations are required to write essays in the English tongue, and a Mr. HENRY SKIPTON has therefore prepared a little book (CROSBY, LOCKWOOD & SON) to show them how it ought to be done. It consists of a very short introduction and a large number of what Mr. SKIPTON describes as "skeleton essays" on a variety of such topics as are said to commend themselves to examiners, which skeletons are to be clothed with flesh, according to the tastes of the writers, and with such skill as a cruel destiny has vouchsafed to them. Those essayists to whom Providence has not been cruel can hardly have occasion to avail themselves of Mr. SKIPTON'S labours, because they will certainly have too good an opinion of their own style and abilities to want to modify them out of a book. Howbeit Mr. SKIPTON'S "Introduction," which is also called "Hints on Essay-Writing," contains much that is pleasing to the mind not about to be examined. "Have a good dictionary handy," he advises all and sundry; "vigorously look up every word you are not sure about, and get a clear idea of its meaning before you use it." The last phrase is excellent; but it suggests a droll picture of the budding essayist who is so anxious to use a particular word, and so unconscious of the wealth of the English language, that instead of expressing himself in one of the three or more different but equivalent locutions which are always available, he interrupts the flow of his inspiration to consult Dr. JOHNSON or Mr. NUTTALL. Mr. SKIPTON would further seem to be training his neophytes with a view to the "new journalism," for he says, "Break up your work, and place each part under a distinct heading." He advises this abomination, not because it is right, but because it "pays," by reason that examiners like it, and "credit you with possessing order and merit." Perhaps it is natural for the instructor of the examined to have a low opinion of examiners.

Rather the larger part of the "skeleton essays" consists of a crudely-worded summary of "arguments on both sides" of disputed questions, which Mr. SKIPTON seems to think examiners silly enough to be likely to set to their victims. Most of these, of course, are intended to be, and are the merest commonplace. Some, however, are truly refreshing. For instance, the supposed essay being on the question "Ought museums and picture-galleries to be opened on Sundays." Yes, because museums "elevate the mind, and improve the taste," and so on for a page and a half. No, because, among other reasons, "All the salt of the earth, the serious, pious, and God-fearing people, would be grievously shocked at such an innovation. We must respect their feelings, for we may bring on us a judgment of Heaven, if we offend the very elect." Mr. SKIPTON promises in his introduction "to do full justice to both sides impartially" in his statements of arguments, and asserts that "his own individual preferences are, he "trusts, unrecognizable." It is very difficult to avoid the persuasion that he is an ardent and even sarcastic advocate of opening museums on Sundays. Another remarkable passage is to be found in a queer threefold skeleton entitled "The Tongue, the Pen, the Sword—As Instruments of Government." It is there mentioned for the essayist's convenience that "In the last hundred and fifty years statesmen, as a rule, have not been strong with the pen—e.g. . . . CANNING . . . DERBY . . . SALISBURY, BRIGHT, BISMARCK. Brilliant Exceptions.—DISRAELI, GLADSTONE, THIERS, GUIZOT." The quartet is noble.

The main purpose of these skeletons is, as already stated, to enable the student who has them all in his head, and has occupied laborious days and nights in writing them all out for practice, to triumph over the wiles of the examiner. This is avowed throughout the introduction with an almost brutal cynicism. Thus, candidates for examinations with essays in them are advised to "read 'history for amusement,' even if they are not obliged to 'take it up.'" For instance, if the maxim "Fortune favours the brave" were set as the subject of an essay, "History would be useful," and indeed "for some subjects," such as Trial by Jury or the Liberty of the Press, it is "almost essential." As the poet lately remarked, "Poor old history!" But Mr. SKIPTON calmly avows another and a wider purpose, which indicates a still more horrid cynicism on his part. "The Author even ventures to hope that some of the 'Outlines' may supply much-needed information to not a few Members of the Legislature and candidates for election to Parliament." If Mr. SKIPTON had spoken in this way of the First Estate of the Realm, say temp. HEN. VIII., nothing but more obscurity than could well have been the lot of so daring a man would have saved his head. Among other introductory hints Mr. SKIPTON suggests as "Models for manner, i.e. style—The Bible, ADDISON, SWIFT, MACAULAY, GREEN ('Short History'), Leaders of 'Times' and 'Daily Telegraph.'" Also he inserts as a specimen "Summary" of the "Benefits of Cricket," that "the weak have a chance as well as the strong," which is a "benefit to the body," and a "benefit to the mind" that it "makes people submit to orders, sacrifice self, and play into the hands of others." We should not ourselves mark highly an essayist who thought that strength was not of much use in cricket; and, though it is true that cricketers do, generally oftener than they could wish, "play into the hands of others," it is difficult to see exactly where the benefit to the mind comes in.

MORE GOLD BOXES WANTED.

AN appropriate close is to be put to the visit of the English Deputation to Ireland by the bestowal of the freedom of the city of Dublin on Mr. STANSFELD and Lady SANDHURST. The preference shown to these two distinguished members of the party is perhaps a little hard on Mr. SUMMERS, M.P., who has worked with at least equal diligence in the cause of Separation, and who has undergone precisely the same disappointment and mortification in not receiving the attentions which the party had expected from the Irish Executive.

And were you shadowed by the police?
And did you see detectives close?

will not now become questions to be put to them years hence by their little grandchildren, and to be answered proudly in the affirmative. It is very hard upon all of them—this neglect—a piece of mean and ignoble spite of which nobody but Mr. BALFOUR could be guilty; but we submit that it is just as "rough" upon Mr. SUMMERS and the obscurer delegates as it was upon Mr. STANSFELD and Lady SANDHURST. The glory of so mild a martyrdom, so humanely mitigated a persecution as that of having one's movements watched by a policeman, is surely of no less, and probably of much more, value to the humble Gladstonian politician on the back benches than to Privy Councillors and ladies of advanced views, and he has a right to expect the same consolation and compensation for being deprived of them. However, it was always so. Stars and crosses for the officers; for the private soldier only the consciousness of having done his duty. Mr. SUMMERS and his friends must go away and shame the courtly municipality which has passed them over by outdoing, say, Mr. STANSFELD's last oratorical performance at Thurles, in which he spoke of the Parnell Commission as a "Star Chamber Inquisition," adding that he did not blame the judges, but charged the Government with having so framed the Act of Parliament as to make it impossible for the judges to trace the allegations to their original, and, as he believed, their political, source. Such a comment pending judicial proceedings is eminently creditable to an ex-Minister of the Crown; and in respect of the official character of its utterer it is, of course, beyond Mr. SUMMERS's rivalry. But Mr. SUMMERS might make up for that by going through the evidence taken before the Commission, commenting on the relative credibility of witnesses, and criticizing the demeanour of the judges.

That the honour to be conferred on these two eminent members of the deputation is deserved, it would be impossible, after the LORD MAYOR's speech of the other day, to doubt. Their mere arrival in Ireland, it seems, has worked a species of moral miracle; it has procured the complete suspension, if not an absolute reversal of executive policy in Ireland. "The evictions stopped, the battering-ram was laid up in lavender, the prying of the constabulary into the windows of railway-carriages was discontinued"—it was kind and graceful of Mr. SEXTON to cite this as a triumph of the delegates when he knows that it represents the most chilling of rebuffs—"and the hard-driven note-takers were 'allowed a rest.'" Pity that these marvellous effects of the visit of "the noble lady and the eminent statesman" should be so very transitory. The Lord Mayor of DUBLIN, however, felt bound to express his belief that, when the deputation had departed, the old order of things would be revived. The battering-ram would be brought out, and the surplus ammunition of the constabulary used up. All depends upon whether Mr. STANSFELD and Lady SANDHURST are on the east or west of the Irish Channel; and, if coercion is really to be held in check, we see nothing but for the "noble lady and the eminent statesman" to take up their permanent abode in a country where they apparently exercise so magnetic a power over the brutal officers of a persecuting Government. Nothing but this will do, it would seem; whereas, if this course is adopted, success is certain, for the Government, Mr. SEXTON assures us, do not dare to "carry on their peculiar pranks in Ireland except behind the backs of Englishmen." If a deputation is not actually watching what goes on, the pranks of the Government—there being no Irish correspondents of English Gladstonian newspapers, and the Irish press, with United Ireland at its head, being furiously Coercionist—will, of course, be concealed from the English public altogether. What an honour the two new burgesses ought to feel it to be to receive the freedom of the City of Dublin at the hands of a Chief Magistrate who can prattle such infantile nonsense as this!

THE SERB.

SERVIA has lately been brought prominently before the world, not so much by the action of her people as by the vagaries of King Milan, and the cat-and-mouse game with which Russia has sought to while away the summer months. By this time the reading public have got the history of Milan and his Queen at their fingers' ends; but very few have any idea as to what manner of men are the Serbs; or even where Servia is. Letters from England and the Continent are frequently addressed "Belgrade, Turkey," or "Belgrade, Roumania," and we have seen more than one intended for towns in Austria and Bulgaria with "Servia" appended to the name. Side by side with this geographical haziness there exists much confusion in the popular mind on the subject of who the Serbs are. This is more excusable since the Serbs themselves differ on the point. Most of the Servian Serbs claim as part of the clan the inhabitants of Montenegro, Bosnia, Herzegovina, Dalmatia, and the Banat in Austria-Hungary. Some day all these races may, or may not, become Serbs in name as well as in language; but it is the Serb of Servia proper whom we shall now try to describe.

In analysing the national character we have two classes to deal with—the "governmental" and commercial, which wears coats, trousers, and boots; and the peasant, which affects jackets, petticoats, and sandals. The judgment of the world, based on the observations of travellers and foreign residents, must naturally be formed rather from the first class, with which it comes into contact, than from the second, which it only knows vaguely from statistics and by sight. Many of the more pugnacious Serbs, when cornered in argument by irrefragable proof of the corruption and backwardness of their Government, will declare that it is not fair to judge the people by the townsfolk and the bureaucracy. Unfortunately these are the specimens given to the critic for dissection; and, if a people is not to be judged by its institutions and its leading men, or by its civil and social progress in its capital and principal towns, but merely by its visionary ideas of its own capabilities and merits as expressed by those who signally fail to prove their theories in practice, all discussion becomes impossible. As regards the peasants, there is very little difference between them and their neighbours all over the East. The agriculturist is generally a sober, honest, hardworking, hospitable creature, whether he be born a Turk, an Arab, a Roumanian, a Bulgarian, or a Serb. We will allow them most of the national virtues claimed, regretting only that the character of the peasant in no case has much influence on the destinies of a country, and that in this particular case it reflects itself so feebly in the more educated classes.

Perhaps one of the reasons of Servia's unhappiness is that she has too much past and too little present. Her history is her curse. Instead of grappling with the hard, earnest problems of to-day, she lives in an atmosphere of dreams, wherein without effort of her own the old glories of Dushan's kingdom are to be revived. The Serb believes, beyond all power of contrary conviction, that, because Servia was once a formidable empire and possessed certain legendary heroes of the Homeric type, she has a perfect claim on the sympathies of all Europe in her wish to regain her ancient prestige at the expense of other nations who are steadily working out their own salvation. Sitting in his pot-house, and trolling forth lugubrious ditties of the great deeds of Marko Kraljevitich and Milosh, the Serb waits for destiny's last word. He has not yet realized that the nineteenth century is not the sixteenth, and that we are now on the eve of the twentieth. With the fatal birthright of an epic story the Serb also inherits a splendid confidence in his own personal perfections. His imperviousness to all kindly criticism is melancholy, and it is this trait which most utterly destroys his chances of improvement. It is not the blindness of the man who will not see, for he positively does not and cannot perceive his own shortcomings. More than this, he rejoices over them with a joy which would be pleasing in a child or a savage, but which is to the last degree saddening in a man with professed aspirations. The character of a nation is best shadowed forth in its recreations and habits of daily life. When not in actual pursuit of his work or duties the life of the Serb is not passed at home or in outdoor amusements, but in his favourite café. If we enter one of these establishments and call for refreshment, we shall find ourselves at a table covered with a cloth once white, but not destined to recover that hue until all traces of the original colour have disappeared. A remonstrance would cause the most intense surprise, for at the next table, spread in a similar repugnant manner, a couple of Ministers are quite contentedly devouring their meal, and playfully practising the sword-swallowing trick with their knives and green peas. What is good enough for a Minister must be satisfactory to the ridiculous foreigner. A little further off a fifteenth-rate German singing-girl is drinking beer with an officer in uniform, preparatory to mounting the platform, and close beside them are half a dozen private soldiers. This is the discipline of the Servian army. If we were to remark that, not only in England, but in a foreign country and on campaign, in Egypt, for example, all privates and non-commissioned officers would salute and retire on the entry of a junior subaltern, the Serb would fail to see the reason of such outward decency and respect. He rather prefers a dirty tablecloth and the proximity of his inferiors in various stages of moral and physical uncleanness. Let us leave the café and face the perils of the streets. The capital of Bulgaria will shortly be lit from end to end with electric light; but the streets of Belgrade are dimly marked out in the gloom by odd petroleum lamps at irregular intervals. Where the footway—there is no continuous pavement, except for a few yards in the principal street—is especially good there is an abundance of light, but as soon as it deteriorates the lamps also decrease in number. Most of the streets are, as a Frenchman remarked, "composées de trous." Should you hazard a suggestion to a member of the municipality that a few thousand pounds would scarcely be thrown away on improvements he shrugs his shoulders. His internal reflection is that some of those thousands would be much better placed in his own pockets. The streets of Belgrade are quite good enough for the Serbs, who would not complain of them till the Day of Judgment, and why should they put themselves out in obedience to the extravagant whims of strangers? A turn in the road brings us to a fountain. It is nearly midnight, but more than a hundred grooms, servants, and poor people are fighting for water. The Danube and the Save are not a quarter of a mile away, but water is dear, and hard to get. The officials will tell you that they have no pavements, no gas, and no water, because they have no money. The reason they have no money is that they have no credit, and the reason they have no credit is that they have no Ministerial stability or honesty. Starting from the assumption that all foreigners come to Servia to plunder and steal, the Serb puts every obstacle in their way. When ordinary means fail, he robs them himself as soon as their enterprise shows signs of being lucrative. It is impossible to obtain any satisfaction; for, as an ex-Minister once remarked, "La loi, monsieur! mais la loi, c'est moi!" Having very nearly succeeded at length by repeated acts of chicanery and violence in destroying all influx of capital from abroad, the Serbs are beginning to stew in their own juice, and yet they complain that they can obtain no help from outside. Offering no inducements to strangers, treating those from whom they might learn with stupid contempt, and pluming themselves meanwhile on their self-reliance, without perceiving the abyss to which it is leading them, the Serbs, like the Scriptural swine, are rushing headlong down a steep place into the sea of moral and civil corruption. If a foreigner points out an abuse to a Minister he will be met with the rejoinder:—"You appear to think, sir, that, because you are a Frenchman or an Englishman, you are to be treated differently from the rest of the world." He does not see that the abuse is an abuse per se, and that a Serb might, and ought, to protest against it just as vigorously. But the fact is that the Serb is content to endure what is intolerable to ordinary civilized beings. And it is significant that, whereas in other countries it is usually sufficient to bring offences to the notice of Ministers, in Servia one may spare oneself the trouble of doing so, and the annoyance of discovering that the highest officials are no more advanced in their ideas or broader in their views than the humblest of their subordinates. The old Turkish proverb, "The fish begins to rot from the head," is quite as true at Belgrade as at Constantinople; indeed, the Danube fish is quite as unsavoury as that of the Bosphorus.

It is true that there are bright exceptions to prove the rule, and one might with careful search find ten righteous men to save the country. There are a few kindly, sensible Serbs anxious to improve at least their own condition and that of their children, of whom amid such surroundings sufficient good words can hardly be spoken. But they are distinctly exceptions. The majority, especially those who are loudest in proclaiming their patriotism, will not stir a finger in any direction not dictated by self-interest, as falsely understood by them according to their own dim, flickering lights. Hedged round with an impenetrable barrier of self-satisfaction, they will neither listen nor learn; and, if ever there was a pride which promised to herald a fall, it is the present pride of the Serbs.

CURIOUS CURIOS.

THE forest-dwelling peoples of the further East have an odd instrument for making fire. Very seldom, so far as we observed, do they employ the proverbial method of "rubbing" two sticks—which is not rubbing at all. Near the coast every man carries a bit of pitcher in the siri-box of bamboo slung at his waist, a chip of a plate—English or Dutch—and a handful of dry fungus. Holding this tinder under his thumb upon the fragment of earthenware, he strikes the side of the siri-box sharply, and it takes fire. But this method can only be used by tribes which have such communication with the foreigner as supplies them with European goods; the inland peoples use a more singular process. They carry a short cylinder of lead, hollowed roughly to a cuplike form at one end, which fits a joint of bamboo. Placing this cylinder in the palm of the left hand, they fill the cup with tinder, adjust the bamboo over it, strike sharply, remove the covering as quickly, and the tinder is alight. Observers who take a narrow view have declared that the earliest art practised by human beings after they escape from mere barbarism is pottery; these races have long passed that stage; but we do not recall any evidence that they use the art. The fact is, that in countries which produce the bamboo earthenware is hardly needed except for luxury. They make charms and fetiches of dried clay. We once came upon two figures of alligators in the jungle, the size of life, and so well constructed that they had survived the rains of one season at least. But in Borneo the Dyak peoples have a class of foreign earthenware singularly interesting. As Malays employ brass guns for their currency, so the Dyaks employ antique vases. In neither instance do the actual "coins" pass from hand to hand, since by brass gun a Malay signifies a cannon, twenty feet long, perhaps, and a Dyak signifies a vessel eighteen inches high or more. These things are measures of value, divided into imaginary fractions. There are three varieties of this earthenware—the Gusi, which represents about 500*l.*, the Naga and Rusa, much less valuable. The first is certainly Chinese, and the last probably, but perhaps they never came from the continent. At some date unknown the north of Borneo was occupied by a Chinese colony which must have numbered millions. This great time, when a third part of the island was cultivated and densely peopled, may have been eight hundred years ago. But the first paragraph in the Annals of Bruni recognizes a powerful Chinese kingdom of Batangan in the fifteenth century—we are not to digress into that fascinating theme, however. The Celestials were exterminated about two generations ago; an old friend of ours, the great chief Gasing, still carried ten pigtailed trophies of his father's valour, probably. Chinese merchants have tried again and again to counterfeit the old jars, as have the Dutch; but they never succeeded in passing off their imitations. The Naga ware may be Hindoo or Javanese, of very remote antiquity whichever it be; both peoples had great settlements in the island at some time beyond human memory. They have left Buddhist remains of importance here and there.

We secured no examples of these curious things, for reasons that have been suggested. But the recollection calls to mind some extraordinary objects of the same class, in a sense, which are treasured on the other side the world. The Aggry and the Popo beads, which serve for jewels in West Africa, are glass resembling earthenware, of unknown manufacture, of immemorial antiquity, and beyond modern skill to counterfeit. Most European nations, probably, have tried their hand at imitating the Aggry bead. The shrewdest chemists and the cleverest artificers of Venice and Birmingham have done their best; the potters of England, France, and Germany have exhausted their resources—but in vain. It does not seem such a difficult enterprise, however. The beads are irregular in shape and size; many have been sawn in two. They have an opaque ground—ochre-yellow in the most valuable species—but so various that this point gives no trouble. A rough ornament of circles in another hue runs through the material from side to side or end to end. Here, again, imitation seems easy, to the craftsmen of Venice in particular; but appearances are deceptive evidently. The Popo bead, less valuable, but valuable enough, is blue glass, transparent, but so manufactured that it shows a dull yellow against the light. These things are all found in the earth; but, so far as can be ascertained, they never turn up in company with bones or other signs of burial; which, to our mind, is the most curious fact of all. That they are ancient Egyptian is a certainty. Many hundreds, if not thousands, were taken in the sack of the palace at Coomassie, strung, in general, upon that very pretty cord which we mentioned; with gold nuggets beaten flat, and cubes of coral, and tufts of coloured silk interspersed. Very handsome they looked, no doubt, upon the smooth brown skin of the royal dames. A pretty bracelet from Coomassie is made of triangular pieces cut from the rib of a shell, snow-white, strung in groups, alternately with these small flattened nuggets. But the curiosities saved in that loot bear only a miserable proportion to those which men of taste admired in the palace and the big houses of the caboceers. But one stool was carried away—as a memorial for the Princess of Wales—among the hundreds adorned with silver which lay in all directions. Very charming were many of these—the Ashantee artist seemed to devote his best attention to stools. Seven were piled, as if for removal, in the courtyard of a great house, each plated with repoussé work, showing much taste and ingenuity of design. Those people have “gifts.” One single specimen of their ability in casting bronze was preserved—a group representing the procession of the king in his man-carriage, attended by the officers of State; it was bought by “the Russian Prince” for a very round sum. But the objects most to be regretted were two tables of black wood, deeply and profusely carved; the one adorned with plaques of gold, graven and hammered, all round its edge, with a disc in the middle; the other, a match, but furnished with gold and silver plaques alternately.

Returning from this digression to the further East, we should mention the extraordinary sword, or chopping-knife, called the parang ilang. This has been used pretty frequently to point the moral suggested by the boomerang—that certain savages show an acquaintance with abstruse principles in mechanism which they could not learn by chance or experience. We should not think of disputing that the parang ilang is as wonderful an application by the naked barbarians of complex laws which our ingenious and scientific craftsmen had not thought of as the most enthusiastic believe, but—has anybody ever tried it in comparison with other implements? Doubtless Europeans who pass much time in the jungle prefer this knife, but they might well do so without regard to its peculiar virtues. These are supposed to lie in the convexity of its blade, supplemented by a twist which becomes perceptible if one survey it at arm's length, the edge downwards. The weapon must be used from right to left; a special form is manufactured for left-handed persons. If it is properly handled, the concave surface of the blade inclines to the object struck, and deals, as the legend goes, a blow like that of an axe; but if improperly handled it flies back, with awful consequences. Upon this latter point there is no question whatsoever; for, if there were a Registrar-General in Borneo, such accidents would fill a column in his Return. Nor is it open to doubt that the parang ilang cuts astonishingly deep into a tree; only it is not proved that a blade of ordinary form, as heavy and as well balanced, would not do as much. There are specimens at the disposal of any grave and competent authority who wishes to test them. The Kyans, however, who invented this odd weapon are certainly ingenious—in warlike matters at least; as they should be, since war has been their occupation from the dawn of history. They use an iron spear, for throwing, so balanced that it flies upwards, turns, and falls point down. The advantage of this in a fight among trees and brushwood is obvious, if a warrior be so skilful as to direct the fall aright. The sumpitan, or blow-pipe, is a favourite with them, also; but they do not make it. The manufacture of these wonderful instruments lies in the hands of the Pakatans, Ujits, and such utter savages, who are not recognized as human by their neighbours. It is they, also, who make the poison most esteemed; though any warrior who buys, or steals, or loots, a blow-pipe from them contrives to brew some villainous stuff that answers his purpose fairly. That these wild men should be able to fashion such a tool is, upon the whole, the most surprising fact in our experience of travel. The sumpitan is made from the hardest and heaviest wood of the jungle, saving Bilian alone. There are examples eight feet in length, bored with absolute precision from end to end—that is assured, for they had “passed proof,” and a tiny deflection, which must have serious influence upon the arrow's flight, would have been detected. A practised warrior will puff his dart some fourscore paces, but it cannot be trusted to break the skin at that distance. The astonishing power of these weapons at close range may be estimated by the fact that any one whose lungs are fairly sound can drive an arrow halfway through a French novel of the ordinary thickness at ten yards. Those helpless tribes, surrounded by fierce and athletic races, would long since have been exterminated had they not found protection in their awful powers of mischief.

ZERMATT, PAST AND PRESENT.

THIRTY years ago the English Alpine Club was barely a twelvemonth old. Mountain-climbing was regarded by many “potent, grave, and reverend seniors” as an almost reprehensible pastime, which could only be justified if undertaken in the cause of science. Our great authority on travel—the guide-book of Murray—still gravely assured us of the remarkable fact that the majority of those who had ascended Mont Blanc were persons of unsound mind. At that date, however, the small group of Englishmen who, whatever their mental condition, had yielded to the charm of mountain scenery and the fascination of mountain-climbing had come to the conclusion that the peaks and glaciers around a little village named Zermatt were not less grand than those of the more famous Chamouni, while its guides were free from the regulations—pedantic, ludicrous, but extortionate—which rendered the latter an abomination to all true lovers of the Alps. It already possessed two small hotels with modest accommodation. During the preceding ten years visitors had become no longer infrequent. The highest peak of Monte Rosa—inferior in altitude only to Mont Blanc—had at length been scaled by a party of Englishmen, but most of the more lofty and difficult summits still remained intact. The reputation of Zermatt spread rapidly. It was even then predicted that a formidable rival to Chamouni had been discovered. Thirty years has seen this prediction accomplished. The Zermatt of earlier days has not, indeed, disappeared, but those who knew it then and return thither after many years find themselves perplexed in a strange jumble of old and new. But Zermatt, however “translated,” is by no means a modern village. Its history has been quite recently written in Mr. Coolidge's interesting work on Swiss Travel and Swiss Guide-Books.

Let us now look back thirty years. There is no railway up the valley of the Rhone. Visp must be reached by a long and rather tedious diligence journey. Thence a rough mule track leads by Stalden, where there is a homely inn, by St. Nicolas, where is one of larger size, by Randa and Täsch, where are none, to Zermatt. It is a walk of between seven and eight hours, and all, except the most active mountaineers, must return by the same way. A few—very few—glacier passes are known to lead from the head of the valley, and all but one are considered difficult. Thus Zermatt was out of the track of the ordinary tourist; it was only frequented by the climbers, or at least the lovers, of mountains. The village was a collection of chalets, built of pine logs, which in the course of years had assumed a rich brown tint. They were crowded together—often picturesque both in form and grouping—on both sides of the narrow ill-paved street, all stone lumps and hollows, across which a streamlet rushed, into which it was easy to step on a dark night. In the middle of the village the houses ceased for a time on the eastern side of the street, which was parted from the meadows by a low wall. Opposite to this, in full view of the slopes of the Riffelberg, was the Hôtel du Mont Rose; the other inn, also augmented so as to be still the larger of the two, was nearer the entrance of the village. The former was the favourite haunt of the mountain-climbers. Clustered around its door or seated on the low wall opposite, they smoked the pipe of peace after the labours of the day, or discussed the prospects of the morrow, and consulted with their guides, who occupied the same perch at a few yards' distance. In Mr. Whymper's well-known book is a picture representing this “club-room of Zermatt,” as it might have appeared twenty-five years ago. This includes the portraits of many of the best-known travellers and guides of the early days of mountain-climbing. Time, alas! has made gaps in the ranks. Some of the guides, four at least of the travellers, have finished their course—three in the very prime of life. One of them, if we are right in our identification, was brought during the next summer from beneath the crags of the Matterhorn to be laid in the adjacent churchyard. Six men form a group in the middle of the picture, of whom five have been presidents of the Club. All these are still living; one still enjoys a mountain climb of moderate difficulty, but of late years his hammer has been used in the Alps more than his ice-axe; another has scaled one of the summits of his profession, and is seated on the judicial bench; the rest practically have ceased from mountaineering, one owing to weak health, the others because threescore and ten years is a heavy weight to carry uphill. A new generation, both of guides and of travellers, has sprung up, more skilful, more adventurous, perhaps more rash, than the old, but certainly not less sincere in their love of the mountains.

Let us now look at the Zermatt of the present day. A railway drops us at Visp. A carriage road leads from St. Nicolas to Zermatt. That it does not run the whole way is attributed to the fears of the men of Visp lest their gains would suffer if Zermatt were made too accessible. Bad times are in store for them, for a railway is in process of construction, and when that is completed no one will halt at Visp. The first view of Zermatt perplexes the visitor—peaks, alps, meadows, are, of course, the same; but from among the brown cottages, just where the white walls of the Hôtel du Mont Cervin once made a small but unsightly blotch, rises a big hotel, which would not seem out of place on the quays of Geneva or Lucerne. It must be, it is that hotel; but it is heightened, broadened, much more than doubled in size. We pass up the street. This, indeed, is the old pavement, provocative of curses. There are the old brown chalets, and this is the old familiar smell, suggestive of valuable matter in the wrong place; there is the old church, only altered by a new coat of whitewash; there, too, is the Monte Rosa Hotel, little changed; but what is this opposite? Another gigantic inn; another export from Vevay or Interlachen, dropped down by mistake among the Pennine peaks. The old wall still remains, though it seems lower than formerly; but the adjoining part of the meadow has become an ornamental garden, with a fountain, arbours, and a lawn-tennis court, where British youths and maidens are at play as if this were the Vale of Health, beneath the heights of Hampstead. Two or three other hotels of smaller size have sprung up in the village—several white-walled houses are now intercalated among the old chalets. There are shops in plenty for the sale of dried plants, minerals, things Alpine, needful and unneedful; stuffed, in short, with the heterogeneous contents of a Swiss bazaar in a tourist centre; there is even a hairdresser. But that is not all; as we mount the familiar but improved path towards the Gorner Grat, just at the upper margin of the pine forest, we find another huge building. This is the Riffelalp Hotel, commenced by M. Seiler at a time when the jealousy of the commune—for, if report be true, Zermatt has been hostile, even to the verge of boycotting and the need of police protection—seemed likely to exclude him from the Riffelberg inn, and opened in 1884. Thirty years ago this would have found few equals in any part of Switzerland. The salons are large; the furniture is almost luxurious; nothing has been forgotten. On one side is a chapel for the Roman Catholics, on the other one for the Anglican communion. By the latter a court for lawn-tennis is being constructed. The site of the hotel has been most happily selected. About a thousand feet below the old Riffelberg, it enjoys a milder climate, while the adjacent forest gives a charm and a variety to the scenery which is wanting in the bleak alps around the other house. The view is slightly less extensive, but certainly not inferior; for the Matterhorn forms a picture of unequalled beauty. Changes, too, have passed over the Riffelberg Hotel. It has been greatly enlarged; the latest development being a glazed verandah. In old days the evening pipe before the doors was often a chilly pleasure.

Thus the Zermatt of to-day is no longer the Zermatt of thirty years ago. Mountaineers are constant to it, but they are lost in the crowd of tourists. Ice-axes are numerous, far more numerous than in olden times, when most climbers still contented themselves with alpenstocks, but not a few are in the hands of men with unscorched faces. Are travellers nowadays more careful of their complexions, or can it be that the axe does not make the mountaineer any more than the cowl the monk? As the dinner-bell rings, quite an ordinary sample of middle-class Britons, with not a few from the other side of the Atlantic, is seen flocking towards the table-d'hôte.

When the railway is opened the transformation will be complete. The old Zermatt, with its homely life, its good fellowship, its freedom from conventionalities, will have disappeared; the new Zermatt, with its crowds of tourists come to "do the place," will have supplanted it; piles of luggage will be discharged at the station; elaborate toilets for the Alpine excursion and for the evening table-d'hôte will become the rule; there will be picnic parties in every quiet nook, the alps will blossom with sandwich papers, the multitude of broken bottles will add a new peril to crag-climbing, and sooner or later there will be a rope railway to the Gorner Grat.

THE EXPERIMENTAL MATINÉE.

III.

THE selection of the cast and the conduct of the rehearsals will give very little trouble if, for the purpose of exploiting some individual actor or actress, the old "stock" repertory be drawn upon. The majority of the principal parts will probably be entrusted to actors who have played them before; at any rate, the arrangement and business of the scenes are all mapped out and recorded in prompt-books. To rehearse a play under such conditions is easy work; but when the matinée's raison d'être is the production of some new play, possibly by a new and absolutely inexperienced author, let it not be expected that rehearsals will prove other than long, tedious, and trying to the temper. Indeed, in such cases the troubles of author and manager (and not unfrequently the author is on these occasions his own manager—for has he not failed to persuade any one else to be his manager? else why should he give his matinée?) begin before rehearsals with their endeavours to cast the play. Actors know well enough, from long and sometimes bitter experience, that such engagements are, in nine cases out of ten, more trouble than they are worth; that the play so produced is seldom seen after its initial performance; and that therefore all the labour of rehearsal and study is to be repaid solely by the honorarium they are able to exact for that occasion. Hence it comes that the terms usually demanded for an experimental matinée are fully equal to a week's salary; nor can this be wondered at when it is considered that rehearsals must be attended, and dresses provided (which in the case of all modern pieces is at the actor's expense) as if the play were expected to run for weeks; and that by the time the salary has been earned and paid it has often been nearly, if not quite, swallowed up in incidental expenses. This being so, an actor frequently regards himself as conferring a favour by taking part in a matinée, and shapes his conduct accordingly. The strict attention to business which marks the preparation of a play intended for the regular evening's programme is rarely found in the matinée rehearsals. Actors arrive late, go out of the theatre and keep others waiting for their return, and in these and other ways sorely try the patience of the unhappy impresario and his stage-manager.

It must be confessed that there is generally some excuse for this laxity of discipline. The financial reward is not sufficiently substantial to inspire any dread of forfeiting it, as would be the case with an engagement for a season, or for the run of a play; and it is impossible to draw the reins of authority very tightly with a "scratch" company, collected from various sources, many of whom, being in regular engagements, will owe a prior allegiance to the calls of the manager of their own theatres, for it must be noted that, while many managers altogether decline to allow the members of their companies to take part in these performances, none would permit their own arrangements to be thereby disturbed, but would not unnaturally regard themselves as possessing the first claim on their actors' services. If, therefore, an unexpected rehearsal at an actor's regular theatre should clash with a rehearsal for a matinée, it is the latter which would go to the wall.

Again, it often happens that there is a rush, for matinée purposes, on the services of some particular performer, who finds himself engaged in the simultaneous rehearsal of some two or three new pieces, and fails to solve the puzzle of being in more than one place at a time. But all these drawbacks to efficient rehearsal are often but as nothing compared with the shortcomings of the play itself. The operation of rehearsal is a tedious one at the best of times; but there is an undoubted consolation and satisfaction if the performers can feel their work is making progress, that the piece is, as the phrase goes, "shaping well." But what if it is standing still, or even retrograding? Many are the plays produced at experimental matinées which never "shape" at all, or which do so only after the most strenuous and persevering labour. Defects, inconsistencies, and absurdities, unsuspected (by the author at any rate) as long as his work remained on paper, start to light as soon as the attempt is made to give it concrete form; and the patience of a company is severely taxed while councils of war are held, and the unhappy drama is re-written piecemeal on the prompter's table. Bad as the matinée play often is, the public would, indeed, open its eyes in wonder could it see the state from which pains-taking rehearsal has rescued it. Then, when the "business" and stage management of some scene may have been carefully and satisfactorily arranged, it may be found necessary to alter it at the last minute, because the scenery, when at length disinterred from its railway arch, is discovered to have its doors and windows in quite unexpected places. By these and similar disadvantages is the luckless matinée-play sorely handicapped. And by whom is the result of all this labour and worry finally witnessed and judged? There are, no doubt, instances of such pieces, at certain theatres, by certain authors, with certain performers, which attract an audience as representative and critical as ever assembled to judge a "first night"; but how rare are such matinées!

On ordinary occasions, when the utility actor, or the writer of a successful or unsuccessful tale, or the hero (or heroine) of a hundred back drawing-rooms may be tempting fate, what is the complexion and composition of the audience? Stalls upon stalls are reserved for the press; but "the press" is wary, looks in for a time, lest (as has been done ere now) it notice, as a fait accompli, a performance which has never taken place, and betakes itself elsewhere, content to judge the whole from a part, and that not a large one; the boxes have been placed at the service of the managers of London theatres, who fail to respond in person, and depute their representation to the female members of their families or to the gentleman who puts the postage-stamps on their letters; actors and actresses of sorts will be there in plenty; it is a good opportunity for an afternoon lounge and the meeting of friends; and no one need attend to the play if it passes human endurance; so the lesser lights of the drama, especially those who have not long joined "the profession," and to whom the pleasure of writing for, and receiving, as of right an "order" is still somewhat of a novelty, are present in battalions; friends of the author and of the actors will also swell the crowd; but of the paying public, of those who a few hours later will sit on the same seats, or on those of neighbouring theatres, and with their honest shillings and sovereigns enable the manager to meet his liabilities in business, and entertain the aristocracy at home, how many, think you, will be present? It will, indeed, be an exceptional matinée play that will attract within the walls of a theatre any of the great paying public; time was when such may have come in hopes of being among the first to recognize genius hitherto unappreciated, but bitter experience has taught them that the safer, wiser game is to stay away; that, if there is any good in the play or the player, there will be plenty of opportunities in the future of repairing their omission, while they are much more likely to congratulate themselves on their absence than to regret it.

Still, in these days, when long runs rob the actor of his chances of practical experience, it would be unfair altogether to condemn the experimental matinée. It has in its time introduced to the London stage good plays against which managers had unaccountably closed their doors, it has (and this, we think, is its chief recommendation) given young actors an opportunity of playing more than one new part in a twelvemonth, and so in some small degree has done something towards remedying a state of things which is, to any one with the interest of the future of the English stage at heart, most deplorable, and finally it has furnished, and continues to furnish, those writers on the contemporary drama of whom a stated contribution is expected week by week with an almost unfailing source of inspiration, a favour, however, for which these gentlemen scarcely seem as grateful as might be expected.

RACING AT DONCASTER.

THE Champagne Stakes on the first day of the Doncaster Meeting was a race of exceptional interest. The relative form of most of the more celebrated two-year-olds had already been more or less tested, either directly or indirectly; but Tristan's first colt of special renown, Baron Rothschild's Le Nord, had not yet met either Surefoot, Heaume, Riviera, Semolina, Signorina, or any colt or filly through whom his relations to either of them could be measured. He was now to run against Riviera, who had been beaten by Signorina and Heaume, and had beaten Heaume and Semolina, who, in her turn, had beaten Surefoot, who had beaten Heaume. It was almost a matter of mere conjecture whether Heaume, Riviera, Surefoot, Signorina, or Semolina was the best of a party that had run so closely and intricately; as, on some of their running, it might have been argued that one might be about as good as the others. There was, however, no evidence on which any opinion could be formed as to whether Le Nord, who was greatly admired, and had won the only two races for which he had hitherto run in a canter, was superior or inferior to the above-mentioned lot, which represented the best two-year-old form of the year. So close was the favouritism between Le Nord and Riviera, that 21 to 20 was laid on the former, and 6 to 5 against the latter. Their only opponents were Mr. J. H. Holdsworth's Alloway, who had been beaten by Heresy and Dearest at Derby, and now started at 12 to 1, and Mr. Warren De la Rue's 2,600 guinea colt Heckberry, who started at 33 to 1. Heckberry led Le Nord and Riviera, with Alloway bringing up the rear, for about half the course; but at the bend Riviera went to the front, followed by Le Nord, while Heckberry subsided into the background. From the bend to the distance Le Nord seemed beaten, yet he struggled on with such astonishing gameness from the distance, while Riviera, after having the race well in hand, appeared to tire, that it became a very fine point between the pair as they approached the winning-post, and at last Riviera barely won by a head. Tom Cannon finished only three-quarters of a length behind Le Nord with Alloway, and this made that colt's form at Derby look all wrong, as he there received a beating equal to quite a stone from Heresy. Both Le Nord and Riviera were much admired; and, in the opinion of some experts, nothing, with the exception of Chitabob, that ran on the following day for the St. Leger could be compared to either of them for good looks. The question presents itself whether Riviera or Le Nord is the more likely to improve, and many think that it should be answered in favour of Le Nord. The most unfurnished of the quartette that ran for the Champagne Stakes, however, was the enormous Alloway; and, as he finished within a length of the winner, it is not impossible that he may yet obtain a place in the first class, although he is of a type that does not invariably grow "in the right direction." If Alloway's had been the only form at Derby which was inconsistent with subsequent running at Doncaster he might be suspected of being an uncertain colt; but almost, if not quite, as unequal was the form shown at Derby and Doncaster by St. Peter, who won the Devonshire Handicap of 950*l.* in a field of eighteen at the former meeting, after starting at 12 to 1, and only ran fifth at the latter meeting for the Glasgow Plate, after starting a good second favourite at 3 to 1. At Derby, again, W. I'Anson's Queen Laura had been beaten two lengths by Elgiva, an outsider at 14 to 1; yet at Doncaster she won the Clumber Plate in a canter by four lengths from Glory Smitten, a winner of six races this season, and by six lengths from Enamel, a winner of two races. From this it would appear that, owing to the state of the course or some other cause, the form shown at Derby was in some instances untrustworthy, although it could scarcely be said that in either of those quoted the Derby form was directly reversed at Doncaster. Mr. J. Lowther, who is in luck this season, won the Great Yorkshire Handicap with Houndsditch, a three-year-old colt by Peter that he bred himself, and with whom he has already won something over 2,000*l.* in stakes. Lord Penrhyn's Far Niente, now that he has at last begun to win races, seems determined to persevere in well-doing, and he won the above-mentioned Glasgow Plate in excellent form. With plenty of bone, a fine frame, and not a little speed, he ought to be well worth the 1,300 guineas given for him by his owner.

Of the racing on the Wednesday at Doncaster, apart from the St. Leger, there is seldom much that is worth the trouble of saying or hearing. On this occasion the fields were good, and the favourites won in exactly half the races. Backers lost heavily over the Tattersall Sale Stakes for two-year-olds, which was unexpectedly won by Mr. Maple's Narrator by a neck, at 5 lbs., from Lockhart, a winner of five races. They were also hard hit in the Cleveland Handicap, for which Count Lehndorff's Hortari, the winner of the Babraham Handicap at Newmarket, was made the favourite. The race was won by Mr. W. M. Redfern's Polynesia, who started at 5 to 1; but its honours really rested with Sir R. Jardine's Wise Man, who was giving weight to everything in the race, including 37 lbs. to the winner, whom he ran to a length, while Hortari was a bad third. As to the St. Leger itself, which we noticed last week, we need only add that the settling on Monday last is said to have been exceptionally heavy.

Mr. Redfern won the first race of the Thursday with Yard Arm, who started a better favourite than Lal Brough, the winner of the first race of the previous day. Lord Penrhyn's industrious colt, Noble Chieftain, who was running in his fifteenth race of the season, was first favourite for the Portland Plate. Ill luck befell him, as he was shut in against the rails by other horses when the time came for him to make his effort. At any rate, that was the excuse commonly made for his defeat. The fretful Gallop Queen, who sweated profusely beforehand, won the race for Mr. Leopold de Rothschild; and it was high time that the filly earned something, as she had run six times unsuccessfully this year. Lord Penrhyn's Curraghmore was made favourite for the Scarborough Stakes, which was easily won by Mr. H. Milner's Mercy, who had run second to Houndsditch for the Great Yorkshire Stakes on the Tuesday. She had also run second to Houndsditch at Leicester, and on that occasion Curraghmore finished many lengths behind her; so he had no right on public form to be made favourite at Doncaster, even when allowance was made for his meeting her on 8 lbs. better terms than at Leicester. Robert the Devil's well-shaped son, Bel Demonio, giving weight to all his opponents, won the Rous Plate of 500*l.* after a close race with Touchwood, an own brother to Fullerton, to whom he was giving 12 lbs. There was a grand struggle for the next race, the Corporation Selling Handicap, between Lord Penrhyn's Lady Yarmouth and Mr. F. Cleveland's Stockton, the former winning by a short head after fighting out every yard of the course from the distance to the winning-post. The next, and the last race of the day, the Alexandra Plate, produced an even finer struggle. Lord Dudley's Fullerton, with 9 st. 6 lbs. to carry, was first favourite; Lord Zetland's Caerlaverock, with 7 st. 12 lbs., was the second; and Colonel Forester's Stone Cross, with 7 st. 3 lbs., was the third favourite. As much as 8 to 1 was laid against the sixth favourite, Mr. Clayton's St. Helen, although Caerlaverock had been unplaced to her when giving her only 3 lbs. more weight at the Newmarket July Meeting. In the same race Hawthorn had been unplaced to her, and now, on 10 lbs. better terms, Hawthorn was the most fancied of the pair. As they came round the bend Caerlaverock was leading with Hawthorn next to him, then came St. Helen, and, in her wake, Fullerton. Soon afterwards Hawthorn got up to Caerlaverock, and the two leaders were fighting hard against each other before they reached the distance. At that point St. Helen joined them, with Fullerton, on whom the weight was evidently telling, close at hand. There was a grand race between Caerlaverock, Hawthorn, and St. Helen. Hawthorn was the first to give way a little, and then Caerlaverock was just passed by St. Helen, who won by a head, while Hawthorn was only beaten by half a length for second place, and Fullerton was an excellent fourth. No fault can fairly be found with a handicap which produces such a closely contested race; but for a five-year-old of some merit St. Helen was certainly very favourably treated at 7 st. 2 lbs., although she does not always run up to her best form, as may be inferred from the fact that she was unplaced at Newmarket to Hortari at 6 lbs., whereas she now beat him by very many lengths at 2 lbs.

For the Westmoreland Stakes on the Friday, Mr. F. Murray's Lown was favourably handicapped in receiving 36 lbs. from Deuce of Clubs, and he beat his ten opponents without difficulty. Backers were successful again in the next race, a Selling Race for two-year-olds, which was won by Mr. Baker's Magistrate, though by a short head only. Three St. Leger colts, Lord Bradford's Davenport, Sir R. Jardine's Lord Lorne, and Mr. J. Lowther's Workington, ran for the Doncaster Stakes. Davenport had finished third for the St. Leger, and Lord Lorne and Workington had been something like twenty lengths behind him; so, as the trio were now to meet at even weights, it might have been expected that odds would have been laid upon Davenport; but the ring were content to take even money. Davenport made all the running, and won easily by a length from Lord Lorne, who finished a long way in front of Workington, although the latter had been fractionally the better favourite of the pair. This performance on the part of Davenport proved his St. Leger form to have been no fluke, and it strengthened the position which he held as first favourite for the Cesarewitch. A field of a dozen came out for the Prince of Wales's Nursery Plate of 500*l.*, which was won by a 10 to 1 outsider, in Sir R. Jardine's St. Benedict. Six fillies went to the post for the Park Hill Stakes, and as there had been some "plunging" on Lord Penrhyn's Carmine for the Cesarewitch, she was made first favourite instead of Mr. Vyner's Minthe, the winner of the One Thousand. Moreover, Carmine had twice beaten Pinzon, at even weights—curiously enough he was handicapped to give her 10 lbs. for the Cesarewitch—and Pinzon had beaten Antibes, whose form in the Yorkshire Oaks had been, at the weights, about equal to that of Minthe. After they had run a quarter of a mile, Carmine took the lead, but just below the distance Minthe caught her, passed her easily, and won by half a dozen lengths. Considering that Minthe was giving 7 lbs. to Carmine, this was a remarkable defeat, and it might have been expected that it would have had a more immediate effect upon Carmine's position in the Cesarewitch betting than to send her from 9 to 1 down to 16 to 1, for she is handicapped at the same weight as Davenport, who not only had finished as near Donovan for the St. Leger as Carmine now did to Minthe, but had twice within the week given a tremendous beating to Workington, whose form was better than that of Minthe. Although four horses started for the Doncaster Cup, the race really lay between Lord Howe's great, weight-carrying Claymore, the winner of the Great Northamptonshire Stakes, and Mr. Maple's neat little mare Mill Stream, the winner of the Chester Cup. Claymore won by a length and a half, after an exciting race, and he seemed wearied out when he was pulled up. Of the sales during the Doncaster week we will only say that they were more than usually interesting, and that the three highest-priced yearlings—one by Wisdom and two by St. Simon—were purchased by Colonel North for 8,800 guineas.

TWO MELODRAMAS.

IF one were, with the authority of age and wisdom, putting the young theatre-goer on the path he should follow for his own greater good and happiness, and if what he was about to see was a melodrama, one would say to him, My boy, do not ask too much; do not expect all you see to be consistent or possible; remember that the object of melodrama is to give you the impossible in a plausible form. Now to do this without flaw almost passes the wit of men. There were giants in old days who did it, or missed doing it by so little that the miss was not worth mentioning. They are gone, those great men; and now we can but hobble after them. Therefore be content with an approximation; and, if what is actually going on before your faithful eyes is fairly exciting in itself, do not be too curious to inquire whether it follows naturally from what went before or is leading on inevitably to what is to come after.

Had our young friend acted on this secret of theatre-goers' happiness (which we reveal the more readily because your healthy-minded audience has discovered it by the light of nature already), had he, we say, been inspired by this wisdom, he would, we think, have enjoyed himself at the Haymarket any one of these evenings last past along with several hundred natural philosophers. The play is called A Man's Shadow in English, and is of the new and original kind which is borrowed from the French. There are in it an honest man, Laroque his name, who has a villainous double known as Luversan. There is a friend of Laroque's, Raymond de Noirville, barrister, and hero of the war. Raymond has a wife, Julie, once the mistress of Laroque, now that fury, a woman scorned. Julie is tempted to use Luversan as a tool to punish Laroque. Luversan murders a banker who lives opposite Laroque, and in sight of Laroque's wife and child. Need it be added that they are misled by the resemblance, that the innocent man is suspected, appearances are against him (for you see he owed money to the murdered man), is defended by Raymond de Noirville, that in the course of the trial the history of Julie is revealed to the barrister, that he dies of emotion, that the innocent man is condemned, but in due time escapes from prison, and returns to have his character cleared, partly by fortune, partly by the now repentant Julie. All ends happily, and Luversan meets the reward of his crimes. Here are surely indicated in a summary way (for one really cannot put the whole of a four-act melodrama into less than a column of print) the outlines of a sufficient though not very novel night's amusement. He or she who, having read this, goes to the Haymarket in the proper spirit, will not be, we promise them, disappointed. Of course if he, our gallantry will not permit us to suppose that she would be guilty of the folly, will insist on thinking of the joints, and will inquire whether the bones are as neatly put together as they might be, why, that is another story. We must confess that the limbs of the puppet, though they kick and flourish briskly, are fastened with unduly obvious pieces of wire. The word "why" does occasionally force itself on the critical mind in the course of the evening. What were the relations of Laroque and Julie; how does Luversan come to know as much as he does; how does such a glaring scamp contrive to walk into the houses of the most respectable people as if they were tap-rooms; why did Julie's secret not come out on the trial after all; and why, finally, did she, after keeping silence so long, come forward as she does in the last act? Was it that she did not know, or because she would not say? Some of these obscurities, and others we could mention if we chose, are simply due to the fact that the long explanations a French audience loves have been cut down to make way for the swift self-explanatory action dear to the English. Some of them are inherent to the play, but what do they matter? There is plenty of go in the piece, plenty of situations, plenty of good, honest, intelligible emotion, and that is enough.

The acting of the piece is even and capable. No doubt it might be and will be improved in the course of the run; but there is nothing which strikes a spectator as manifestly below a fair standard, and not a little is really good. Mr. Tree will, we are sure, join the halves of his double performance as Laroque and Luversan. At present he is good in Laroque, and often very good as Luversan, but he hardly makes them alike enough. Perhaps there is a greater ring of sincerity in the representation of the "shadow"; but that may be partly accounted for by the fact that there is a better opportunity for character-acting in the villain than in the honest man. Of this we should not complain; but it is a fault that the two men should be so unlike as they are. The whole probability of the action depends on the likeness between the two; but as Mr. Tree presents them in the first act it would be impossible for the most hasty observer to confound them. At the first glance the difference between the copper-faced Luversan, with his raffish air, his staring eyes, his greasy, bad hat, his obviously ready-made clothes, and the strictly correct look and get-up of Laroque is too violent to allow of any mistake. A slight toning down of Luversan, a little approximation to similarity of costume between the two, would remove much of this defect, and greatly add to the probability of the action. It is but fair to say that the resemblance is better indicated in the last act than in the first two. Of the ladies we can speak with approval. Miss Minnie Terry makes a good stage child, a rôle which is almost always rather painfully artificial. Mrs. Tree does all there is to do with the somewhat colourless part of Henriette, Laroque's wife; and Miss Norreys is pleasing and acceptable as the servant Victoire. In the more effective part of the erring Julie de Noirville Miss Julia Neilson is so good that we could wish she would win even greater honour by dropping the emotional stage exit in three times, which is one of the worst and most universal traditions of bad acting. Among the minor male parts, the only one which gives many chances to the actor is Raymond de Noirville. Mr. Fernandez, whom we have never yet seen inferior to any part he had to do, played it with genuine force and was fully equal to the death scene in court—which, by the way, is about the best chance for strong acting in the piece. The other parts are taken in a workmanlike way.

Good nature or indifference to probability, literature, or common sense must be carried very far by him who can enjoy The Middleman at the Shaftesbury. The difference between the two plays is glaring. In A Man's Shadow the improbabilities seem capable of explanation—in The Middleman they are manifestly due, not to failure in the effort to construct a coherent story, but to sheer want of intelligent effort to lead up to an effective curtain without violating all verisimilitude. Essentially the piece is a common Surrey-side melodrama, in which there is a rich man with a son and a poor man with a daughter. These two love one another. They are separated by a stern, rich, and villainous father, only to appear at the end of the last act married, when everything is to be happily arranged. No reasonable man will complain of this material for a plot—only one does want a plot. Now there is no such thing in The Middleman, only a succession of unconnected events. The son disappears at the end of the first act. His father intercepts a letter to the girl. She, having reasons for hiding herself, runs away in the second act. The theft of the letter has no consequences. Then, at the end of the fourth act, they turn up married—having met nobody knows where—simply in order that a "curtain" may be made in which Mr. Willard shall occupy a central position. And this is only one instance of the haphazard way in which the old stock materials out of which the piece is made have been put together. Who would waste his time in taking to pieces and examining the machinery of such a pepper-mill as this? To be sure, the candid public has been asked to see something very different from an ordinary Surrey-side melodrama in The Middleman. It is, it seems, "palpitating with actuality," and deals boldly with the great labour question. Well, as for that, there is some talk in it about the hard lot of workpeople in mills—which does not sound quite new—and the central character, Cyrus Blenkarn, is an inventor who has been "exploited" by a manufacturer. Now beyond all doubt this is a character which might be made most effective on the stage. It is not new in literature. Bulwer Lytton, for one, has handled it in The Last of the Barons. That, however, is no great reproach to Mr. Jones—the fault of his inventor is, that he is not really sympathetic. He is, to begin with, a selfish old fool who, having made one useful discovery in pottery, then neglects his family and spends twenty years making futile experiments at the expense of the wicked capitalist. Finally, he makes his great discovery by a pure fluke. A furnace goes out sooner than he intended that it should, and his pottery is found just sufficiently baked. Obviously if he had had his way he would have bungled the experiment as he had done the others for twenty years. His reward for half a working lifetime of failure, for neglect of his duty as a father, and for the amazing luck which caused him to run out of money to buy coal at the right moment, is enormous wealth. That there is some truth in all this, which an artist of sufficient skill and cynicism might have made effective, we do not deny, but how it illustrates the villainy of middlemen or the wrongs of the poor, we fail to see. The gallery, however, applaud as if every man of them had made a great discovery, and been defrauded of the fruits. Yet if Cyrus Blenkarn had not had a middleman to supply him with funds, and look to the selling of his first discovery, how could he have had the leisure to spend twenty years' pottering over the second before his luck helped him?

A few words are enough for the acting. Mr. Willard is so clever a performer, that he could hardly go through four acts without doing well in parts of them. Accordingly, there are passages of his Cyrus Blenkarn which are truly excellent. He interprets very cleverly the moonstruck, vague, self-absorbed manner of the half-maniacal men who are for ever fumbling at discoveries, and do now and then, once in a thousand cases, perhaps, hit on something valuable. There are touches of excellent pathetic comedy from time to time. But when he ought to be tragic he is, save for a few flashes of power, coarse and loud. Throughout the third act his voice is a uniform, inexpressive, monotonous howl. Mr. Mackintosh is, as he commonly is, intelligent and credible as the capitalist Chandler. Mr. H. Cane gives a really clever rendering of the vulgar, low class man of business in the part of the manager Batty Todd. Miss Annie Hughes is lifelike in the part of Blenkarn's sensible daughter Nancy. The other performances call for no notice.

THE STOCK MARKETS.

AT home and abroad there is a strong tendency on the Stock Exchanges towards a further rise of prices; but it is held in check for the time being by uncertainty regarding the result of to-morrow's French elections, and by the apprehension of dear and scarce money by-and-by. The speculative spirit which has been rampant for so long has lost none of its strength. On the contrary, speculators argue that trade is improving everywhere, and is likely to go on improving for a considerable time to come; therefore that profits are larger than they were, and that consequently the saving classes have more money to invest. But larger savings necessarily tend towards higher prices, unless there is an unexpected increase in sound investment securities. Further, they contend that the great financial houses all over the world have entered into arrangements of many kinds, which make it necessary for them to assist in raising prices. The Russian Conversion, they point out, is not yet completed. The Egyptian Conversion was prevented a few months ago by the French Government, they observe, for purely political reasons; but as soon as the elections are over France will be sure to withdraw her objections to the measure. Then, again, France has to fund her inconveniently large floating debt and to convert her Four-and-a-Half per Cents. Over and above all this, there is scarcely a Government in the world which does not need money. And there are numerous industrial and other Companies to be brought out or to be provided with additional funds. Lastly, the speculators have lately come to the conclusion that the selling of securities in Paris, which was a necessary consequence of the failure of the Comptoir d'Escompte and the copper crash, has now very nearly come to an end. As long as that selling continued it was scarcely possible to raise prices on the Continental bourses. But it has been going on throughout the summer, and the general impression consequently is that it is now very nearly at an end. This argument refers more particularly to the Continental exchanges and the market for international securities in London. It is, however, also contended that everything points towards a recovery in the market for American railroad securities. For nearly three years now that market has been depressed. This year, however, the crops are all good; and good crops will not only give larger traffics to the railway Companies, but will improve trade. Further, it is predicted that the railway companies will cease quarrelling among themselves when there is plenty of business for all, and that as soon as wars of rates end the rise which has begun in the American market will be carried still further. And it is predicted with equal confidence that we are about to witness a greater boom in the market for South African shares than has yet been seen, since there is now sufficient evidence afforded that the gold-fields are really rich, and consequently general confidence is being inspired here at home. Notwithstanding the high prices of British railway stocks and other industrial securities, it is very confidently maintained that their prices will continue to rise—firstly, because of the steady improvement in trade; and, secondly, because the advance in all other departments will encourage speculation in home securities. For all these reasons, then, speculators argue that the rise in prices which has been witnessed for some years past is about to begin again, and to be carried further—provided always that peace is maintained and the money market does not become too difficult.

Assuming, however, that the result of to-morrow's elections is such as to reassure Stock Exchange operators, and that, consequently, there is a general rise in prices, operators will very soon have to give their attention to the money market. For the moment, the London money market is much easier than seemed probable a little while ago, but the reserve of the Bank of England is entirely too small, and the probability appears to be that next month there will be apprehension entertained that money will become so scarce and so dear as to imperil the position of reckless speculators. It is quite true that the action of the Secretary of the United States' Treasury has put an end to the fear so lately entertained that there will be a large American demand for gold from Europe. He has bought bonds upon so large a scale that he has supplied the New York money market with abundance of funds, and rendered it exceedingly improbable that there will be any stringency in that market, for the present at all events. At the end of this month the interior demand for coin and notes to move the crops will be satisfied. Next month there will be a return flow of money to New York, and then no serious stringency is to be apprehended until the end of the year. The removal of the fear of a large American demand for gold has, of course, lessened the anxieties and apprehensions of speculators; but it has not, for all that, assured an easy money market throughout the year.

During the next six weeks there will be a large increase of the internal coin circulation. And if at the same time there should be large exports of gold the position might become very critical, unless the Bank of France were willing to part with enough of gold to relieve our difficulties here. The Bank holds at present over 53 millions sterling of the metal, and it clearly could part with many of those millions without danger to itself or any French interest. But whether the Directors would be willing to do so is another question. We may safely conclude that they would not, if there were any danger of disturbance at home or war abroad. Even if the political outlook were clear, there are reasons why they should wish to keep the Bank as strong as possible. One of these reasons is, the negotiations that have been begun for the renewal of the Latin Union. Whether justified or not, there is a belief in Paris that the French Government is inclined to take advantage of the financial difficulties of Italy to compel it to adopt a more friendly attitude towards France. Therefore people argue that the negotiations will be delayed, and that the French Government will rather affect a desire to break up the Union. That it may carry out this plan it is obviously necessary that the Bank of France should hold so much gold that it would appear to be in a position to face any danger that might arise, supposing the Latin Union broken up. Even if the French Government does not entertain the designs attributed to it, it is quite possible that the negotiations for other reasons may be protracted, and then also it would be desirable from the point of view of the Directors of the Bank of France to hold as much gold as that institution can retain. Then again, it is always to be recollected that much bad business was accumulated in Paris during the last year or two, that a crisis, indeed, was averted at the time of the failure of the Comptoir d'Escompte only by the intervention of the Bank of France, and that some day or other, therefore, there may be serious financial difficulties to face in Paris. That is another reason why the Bank of France should be unwilling to part with much of its gold. Still, it is hardly probable that the Directors of the Bank of France would allow the European stock markets to be disturbed by a money stringency in London; and consequently it may reasonably be assumed that, if gold be seriously needed here, it will be obtained from the Bank of France. But speculators would do well to recollect that, apart altogether from the political dangers which they recognize, there are the risks of a very dear and tight money market; and that, though the Bank of France may prefer to part with a considerable part of its gold rather than that the stock markets should be disorganized by stringency in the London money market, still there may be such stringency before the gold is parted with as may involve incautious speculators in serious losses.

KING JOHN AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

ANY lover of Shakspeare who went on Thursday to the Crystal Palace eager to see one of the finest of the historical plays, and one which has not been given in London for several years, might well be ready to overlook many shortcomings due to hasty preparation for a single performance, to make allowances for defects of stage management, and to be duly grateful if only he might hear a fair rendering of the play as a whole. Such a playgoer would have been most agreeably disappointed. The performance went without a hitch; the voice of the prompter was almost unheard, and, considering the small size of the stage, which could not but mar the effect of such scenes as those before Angiers, the stage management was excellent throughout. Indeed, the only fault to be found with the mounting of the play is that the arms of England on the banners were those of the present day. We have heard it rumoured that the preparations for producing the play occupied little more than a week, and if this be the case the degree of perfection attained is indeed remarkable.

To the majority of the audience probably the chief point of interest was the assumption of the part of King John by Mr. Tree, whose presentation of a very different Shakspearian character is fresh in all memories. Tall and gaunt, with a rather colourless face, thin light beard, and wandering eyes, he represented well the anxious claimant of a crown not his by right. Perhaps he made rather too much of this aspect of the character; a little more kingly dignity would not have been amiss in the scene, for instance, with the nobles in the fourth act. Mr. Tree was at his best in the two great scenes with Hubert—that in Act III., where he first broaches to him the death of Arthur, and again where he reproaches him with the murder. The former scene was led up to by a well-conceived piece of "business." The King, weary from battle, sets down his helmet encircled by the crown. Arthur takes it up and places it on his own head. John, seeing him, snatches the crown away, and his hints to Hubert arise quite naturally from this incident and the thoughts which it suggests. The speech itself was admirably given. The guilty look and broken utterance, the nervous repetition of the words "I had a thing to say," were as good as they possibly could be. The conclusion of the scene lost something of its impressiveness by the omission, whether intentional or accidental, of the significant interchange of words which follows Hubert's promise so to keep Arthur "that he shall not offend your Majesty." The text runs thus:—

K. John. Death.

Hub. My lord?

K. John.

